Unger, M. F., Harrison, R. K., Vos, H. F., Barber, C. J., & Unger, M. F. (1988). The new Unger's Bible dictionary. Revision of: Unger's Bible dictionary. 3rd ed. c1966. (Rev. and updated ed.). Chicago: Moody Press.

Because the Bible came into being in a different age, many readers have difficulty understanding its details. A Bible dictionary, defining and clarifying unfamiliar names, places, and objects, is an indispensable tool for the Bible student. Since its introduction in 1957, the Unger's Bible Dictionary has proved its value as an authoritative reference work. Prepared by Merrill F. Unger, Th.D., Ph.D., this volume has been a long-standing favorite among students of the Bible. Today, after years of exhaustive revisions and updates, The New Unger's Bible Dictionary offers up-to-date scholarship. Cross-referencing and bibliographies make this information easily accessible, no matter which Bible translation you choose. Due to copyright constraints this edition does not include photographs.

Book Description

This has been one of the best-selling Bible dictionaries on the market since its introduction almost 50 years ago. Now, this timehonored classic is more valuable than ever. Packed with current scholarship, more than 67,000 entries are supplemented with detailed essays, colorful photography and maps, and dozens of charts and illustrations to enhance your understanding of God's Word.

About the Author

MERRILL F. UNGER (A.B., Ph.D., Johns Hopkins University; Th.M., Th.D., Dallas Theological Seminary) was a pastor and a professor of Old Testament Studies at Dallas Theological Seminary. He was the author of many books as well as several invaluable reference works including Unger's Bible Handbook.

A

AARON (ār'un; Heb. derivation uncertain). The son of Amram the Levite and Jochebed (Ex. 6:20) and the first high priest of Israel. Third in line of descent from Levi, he was the brother of Moses and his senior by three years, although he was younger than his sister Miriam (which see). His wife was Elisheba, the daughter of Amminadab, by whom he had four sons: Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar (6:23).

Moses' Assistant. He was eloquent of speech and divinely appointed to be Moses' mouthpiece (prophet). God specifically told Moses that Aaron would be his spokesman and that "he shall be as a mouth for you, and you shall be as God to him" (Ex. 4:16). Together with Moses he withstood Pharaoh and saw the deliverance of the Israelites from Egypt by great signs and miracles. In the battle with Amalek, Aaron and Hur supported Moses' arms, which held the official rod, the uplifting of which brought victory to Israel. When Moses went up to Mt. Sinai to receive the tables of the law (24:12), Aaron and his sons, Nadab and Abihu, and the seventy elders accompanied him part of the way, being granted a glimpse of the divine presence (24:1–11). While Moses was on the mountain, Aaron in a moment of weakness and under pressure from the people made a golden image of a male calf as a visible symbol of Jehovah (32:4). The choice of this animal was doubtless suggested by the vigor and strength symbolized by it and by the people's recollection of bull worship in Egypt.

High Priest. In the divine institution of the priesthood Aaron was appointed high (Heb. "great") priest, and his sons and descendants priests. The tribe of Levi was consecrated as the priestly caste. After the Tabernacle was erected according to the divine plan and the ritual established (Ex. 24:12–31; 18; 35:1–40:38), Aaron and his sons were solemnly consecrated to their priestly office by Moses (Lev. 8:6) about 1440 B.C. (cf. 1 Kings 6:1). Tragedy overtook the family shortly thereafter, when Nadab and Abihu, his elder sons, died because they conducted the worship improperly (Lev. 10:1–2).

The elaborate description of the high priest's garments of glory and beauty (Ex. 28:2), including the jeweled ephod, turban, and crown, is not an interpolation from a later period. Archaeology has shown that in the Desert of Sinai at Serabit el-Khadem turquoise and copper were being mined for Egyptian craftsmen at this early period. The jewels of silver and gold that the Israelites obtained from the Egyptians (11:2) are illustrated from ancient times. Artistic gold and jeweled ornaments were recovered from the ruins of Sumerian Ur over a millennium before the Mosaic period, and there is nothing in the furnishing of the Tabernacle or the clothing of the high priest that would be out of keeping with the artistic accomplishments of contemporary craftsmen.

In his invidious conduct against Moses (Num. 12:1–15) the same weak side of Aaron's character appears as in the incident of the golden calf. In the conspiracy formed against Aaron and Moses led by Korah, a Levite, and Dathan and Abiram, Reubenites, the destruction of the conspirators by the hand of God resulted in the vindication of the Aaronic priesthood (chap. 16). An added attestation of Aaron's divine priestly appointment was the budding of his rod, which was preserved for "a sign against the rebels" (17:10). Aaron shared Moses' sin at Meribah (20:8–13, 24) and consequently was not allowed to enter the Promised Land, dying soon after (20:22–29) on Mt. Hor at the borders of Edom.

Type of Christ. In Scripture typology Aaron is a figure of Christ, our High Priest (Ex. 28:1), who executes His priestly office after the Aaronic pattern (Heb. 9). This type is seen (1) in Aaron's offering sacrifice; (2) in his being anointed with oil by pouring (Ex. 29:7; Lev. 8:12), prefiguring our Lord's measureless anointing with the Holy Spirit (John 3:34); and (3) in his bearing the names of the Israelite tribes upon his breast and shoulders, thus presenting them perpetually before God as our Lord bears our cause before the Father (John 17; Heb. 7:25). Aaron entered into the Holy Place on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16) as Christ has entered "heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us" (Heb. 9:24).

AAR'ONITE. Descendants of Aaron, and therefore priests, who to the number of 3,700 fighting men under Jehoiada joined David at Hebron (1 Chron. 12:27). Later we find that their leader was Zadok (27:17).

AB (āb). Babylonian name of the fifth ecclesiastical and the eleventh civil month of the Jewish year. It was introduced after the Babylonian captivity, and is not mentioned in Scripture, in which it is known as the fifth month (Num. 33:38), i.e., July-August.

AB (āb; "father"). The first member of several Hebrew compound names, e.g., Absalom.

ABAD'DON (a-bad'don; Gk. Abaddon, "destruction"). The angel of the bottomless pit (Rev. 9:11), and corresponding to Apollyon, "destroyer." The word abaddon means destruction (Job 31:12), or the place of destruction, i.e., Hades or the region of the dead (Job 26:6; 28:22; Prov. 15:11).

ABAG'THA (a-bag'tha). One of the seven chief eunuchs of Xerxes who were commanded by the king to bring Queen Vashti into the royal presence (Esther 1:10), 483 B.C.

ABA'NA. See Abanah.

ABA'NAH (a-bā'na). One of the rivers of Damascus (2 Kings 5:12; marg., Amanah; Gk. Chrysorrhoeas, "golden river"). It is, no doubt, the present Barada, about fifteen miles NW of Damascus, and has its source in the Anti-Lebanon Mts. and flows through the city of Damascus; thence after fifty miles it is lost in the marshy lake Bahret el-Kibliyeh. It was one of the rivers that Naaman would have washed in rather than the Jordan River.

AB'ARIM (ab'ā-rîm; "regions beyond"). A mountain chain SE of the Dead Sea, at the N end of which stands Mt. Nebo (Deut. 32:49). It also featured an elevated outcrop (Heb. happisgâ) from which Moses viewed the Promised Land (3:27). Israel had an encampment in the mountains of Abarim (Num. 33:47–48).

AB'BA (ab'a). A customary title of God in prayer (Mark 14:36; Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6). It was in common use in the mixed Aram. dialect of Palestine and was used by children in addressing their father. It answers to our "papa." The right to call God "Father" in a special and appropriative sense pertains to all who have received the testimony of the Spirit to their forgiveness. See Adoption.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: N. Turner, Christian Words (1980), p. 1.

AB'DA (ab'dā; "the servant," i.e., "of God").

1. The father of Adoniram, who was "over the men subject to forced labor" under Solomon (1 Kings 4:6), about 960 B.C.

2. The son of Shammua, and a Levite of the family of Jeduthun, resident in Jerusalem after the Exile (Neh. 11:17), 444 B.C. Elsewhere (1 Chron. 9:16) he is called Obadiah the son of Shemaiah.

AB'DEEL (ab'dē-ēl; "servant of God"). The father of Shelemaiah, one of those appointed to seize Jeremiah (Jer. 36:26), before 606 B.C.

AB'DI (ab'dī; "my servant").

1. A Levite and the grandfather of Ethan, and one of the singers appointed by David for the sacred service (1 Chron. 6:44).

2. A Levite, in the reign of Hezekiah, father of Kish (2 Chron. 29:12).

3. A son of Elam who put away his Gentile wife after the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:26), 456 B.C.

AB'DIEL (ab'di-ēl; "servant of God"). Son of Guni and father of Ahi, one of the Gadites resident in Gilead (1 Chron. 5:15).

AB'DON (ab'dōn; "servile").

1. The son of Hillel, a Pirathonite, of the tribe of Ephraim. He ruled Israel for eight years, about 1120–1112 B.C. The only other fact respecting him is that he had forty sons and thirty grandsons, who rode on young asses—a mark of their consequence before the introduction of the horse into Israel. Upon his death he was buried in Pirathon (Judg. 12:13–15), a place probably six miles WSW of Shechem.

2. A son of Shashak and one of the chief Benjamites dwelling in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:23), before 1200 B.C.

3. The firstborn of Gibeon (or, as in NIV, Jeiel), a Benjamite resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:30; 9:36), ancestor of King Saul.

4. The son of Micah, and one of those sent by King Josiah to Huldah to inquire concerning the recently discovered books (2 Chron. 34:20), about 624 B.C. In 2 Kings 22:12 he is called Achbor (or Acbor).

5. A Levitical city of Asher, about nine miles NE of Acco (Josh. 21:30; 1 Chron. 6:74).

ABED'NEGO (a-bēd'ne-gō; "servant of Nego or Nebo"). The Babylonian god of wisdom, connected with the planet Mercury. Abednego was the Aram. name given by the king of Babylon's officer to Azariah, one of the three Jewish youths who, with Daniel, were selected by Ashpenaz (master of the eunuchs) to be educated in the language and wisdom of the Chaldeans (Dan. 1:3–7). Abednego and his friends Shadrach and Meshach were cast into the fiery furnace for refusing to worship the golden statue set up by Nebuchadnezzar, but were miraculously delivered (chap. 3), about 603 B.C. The Heb. name Azariah means "Jehovah has helped." The folly of trying to change inward character by an outward name is hereby illustrated. A tyrant may change the name but not the nature of one true to God. M.F.U.

A´BEL (ā´bēl; Heb. hebel, “breath”). Probably applied to the younger son of Adam and Eve anticipatively because of the brevity of his life, being slain by his elder brother, Cain. Abel, a shepherd and a righteous man (Matt. 23:35; 1 John 3:12), speaks of a regenerate believer. Cain, the farmer, on the other hand, well illustrates the unregenerate natural man, whose worship was destitute of any adequate sense of sin or need of atonement, and who offered the works of his hands instead of faith as a basis of acceptance with God. Abel by contrast “brought of the firstlings of his flock and of their fat portions” (Gen. 4:4) and shed atoning blood (Heb. 9:22). By this act he confessed his sense of sin and need of atonement and exercised faith in the interposition of a coming Substitute (Gen. 3:15; Heb. 11:4) instead of presenting the works of his hands as a ground for acceptance with God. M.F.U.

A´BEL (Heb. ābēl, “watercourse”).

1. A word used as a prefix in a number of cases (2 Sam. 20:14, 18). See Abel-beth-maachah.

2. A great stone (1 Sam. 6:18) near Beth-shemesh, upon which the Philistines set the Ark when they returned it to Israel.

A´BEL-BETH-MA´ACHAH, or Abel Beth Maacah, Abel Bethmaacah (NIV; ā´bel-beth-mā´a-kā; “brook [?] of the house of oppression,” 2 Sam. 20:14–15; 1 Kings 15:20; 2 Kings 15:29). A place in the north of Palestine, identified with Abil el-Qamh, twelve miles N of Lake Huleh. In 2 Sam. 20:14, 18, it is called simply Abel. It was a place of importance, a metropolis, and called a “mother in Israel” (20:19). It was besieged by Joab, Ben-hadad, and Tiglath-pileser (20:14; 1 Kings 15:20; 2 Kings 15:29).

A´BEL-KERA´MIM (ā´bel-keramim), or Abel Keramim (NIV). A place E of the Jordan to which Jephthah pursued the Ammonites (Judg. 11:33), and possibly now represented by a ruin bearing the name of Biet el-kerm—“house of the vine”—to the N of Kerak. Its location cannot be definitely determined.

A´BEL-MA´IM (ā´bel-mā´im; “water brook” [?]), or Abel Maim (NIV). Either the name by which Abel-beth-maachah is called in 2 Chron. 16:4 or the name of a nearby city.

A´BEL-MEHO´LAH (ā´bel-me-hō´lā; “watercourse of dancing”), or Abel Meholah (NIV). A place in the Jordan Valley and the home of Elisha (1 Kings 19:16; Judg. 7:22). It was in the tribe of Issachar. Identified by Nelson Glueck with Tell el-Maqlub (see The River Jordan, pp. 166–74), but by others with Tell Abu Sifri, a neighboring site.

A´BEL-MIZ´RAIM (ā´bel-miz´ra-im; “mourning of Egypt”), or Abel Mizraim (NIV). The scene of the lament of Egypt over Jacob (Gen. 50:11); the name the Canaanites gave to the “threshing floor of Atad” in Transjordan.

A´BEL-SHIT´TIM (ā´bel-shit´tim; “watercourse of acacias”), or Abel Shittim (NIV). The last halting place of Israel during the Exodus (Num. 33:49). Identified with Khirbet Kefrein or Abila in the plains of Moab opposite Jericho, the acacias still fringe the upper terraces of the Jordan with green. Near Mt. Peor at Shittim in the shade of the acacia groves, Israel was lured into the licentious rites of Baal worship (Num. 25:1; Josh. 2:1; Mic. 6:5), resulting in the death of twenty-four thousand by plague.

A´BEZ (ā´bez). In the KJV, the same as Ebez (so NIV), a town in Issachar (Josh. 19:20).

A´BI (ā´bī; “my father”). The daughter of Zechariah and mother of King Hezekiah (2 Kings 18:2). The fuller form of the name, Abijah, is given in 2 Chron. 29:1, NASB, and in 2 Kings 18:2, NIV.

A´BI (ǎbī; an old construct form of “father of”). Forms the first part of several Heb. proper names.

ABI´A. See Abijah.

ABI´AH. See Abijah.

A´BI-AL´BON (a´bī-al´bôn; “valiant”). One of David’s mighty men (2 Sam. 23:31), called in the parallel passage (1 Chron. 11:32) by the equivalent name Abiel (which see).

ABI´ASAPH (a-bī´a-saf; “my father has gathered”). The last mentioned (Ex. 6:24) of the sons of Korah, the Levite. His identity with Ebiasaph (which see) (1 Chron. 6:23, 37) is a matter of much uncertainty and difference of opinion. The probability is that they are the same person.

ABI´ATHAR (a-bī´a-thar; “the father is preeminent”). A high priest and fourth in descent from Eli, who alone of the sons of the high priest Ahimelech escaped death when Saul, in revenge for aid given to David, attempted to wipe out this entire line of priests (1 Sam. 22). Fleeing to David, Abiathar inquired of the Lord for him in the fierce struggle with Saul (23:9–10; 30:7) and became David’s lifelong friend. When David became king, he appointed Abiathar high priest (1 Chron. 15:11). David did not depose Zadok, whom Saul had appointed after Ahimelech’s decease. Both appointments accordingly stood, and Zadok and Abiathar constituted a double high priesthood (1 Kings 4:4). They jointly superintended the transfer of the Ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 15:11). During Absalom’s rebellion Abiathar remained loyal to David (2 Sam. 15:24). However, he adhered to Adonijah when the latter attempted to gain the royal succession at David’s death, while Zadok cast his lot with Solomon (1 Kings 1:19). For this unwise move Solomon banished Abiathar to Anathoth, deposing him from his office (2:26–27) and confining the high-priestly succession to Zadok of the elder line of Aaron’s sons. In this manner the rule of Eli’s house terminated in fulfillment of prophecy (1 Sam. 2:31–35).

The reference to Ahimelech, the son of Abiathar, as priest with Zadok (2 Sam. 8:17) is most unusual and is regarded by many as a simple copyist’s error, in which the names of the father and the son were accidentally transposed. But this solution of the difficulty is unlikely since the references to Ahimelech, the son of Abiathar, as priest are so clear that a mistake is not easily explained (1 Chron. 18:16, LXX; 24:3, 6, 31). The best explanation seems to be that the reference is to Ahimelech, who was a son of Abiathar (2 Sam. 8:17; 1 Chron. 18:16; 24:3, 6, 31). He should not be confused with his grandfather. (See Ahimelech, no. 2.) The reference to Abiathar in Mark 2:26 as high priest at Nob (instead of his father Ahimelech, as recounted in 1 Sam. 21:1) is to be explained under the supposition either that our Lord used the name of the more famous priest of the two, who, though not then actually high priest, was at the Tabernacle at the time alluded to, or that the son acted as coadjutor to his father as Eli's sons apparently did (4:4). M.F.U.; R.K.H.

A'BIB (ā'bib; "an ear of corn"). The month the Hebrews were divinely directed to make the first of the year as a memorial of their deliverance from Egypt (Ex. 12:1–2; 13:4). The Passover and the feast of unleavened bread occurred in it, and it marked the beginning of the barley harvest. On the tenth day the Passover lamb was selected and on the fourteenth day was slain and eaten. On the fifteenth day the Jews began harvesting by gathering a sheaf of the barley firstfruits and on the sixteenth day offered it (Lev. 23:4–14). The slaying of the lamb was typical of the death of Christ, the feast of unleavened bread of the believer's separated walk, while the waving of the sheaf of firstfruits spoke of the resurrection of Christ. The Jewish months were lunar and do not exactly correspond to ours, which are fixed. Abib corresponds to March-April, and its name was changed to Nisan (which see) after the Exile (Neh. 2:1; Esther 3:7). M.F.U.

ABI'DA (a-bi'da; "father of knowledge," i.e., "knowing"). The fourth of the five sons of Midian, the son of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. 25:4; 1 Chron. 1:33).

ABI'DAN (a-bi'dan; "father is judge"). The son of Gideon and head of the tribe of Benjamin (Num. 1:11; 2:22; 10:24; cf. 7:60, 65).

A'BIEL (a'bi-el; "God is my father").

1. A Benjamite, son of Zeror (1 Sam. 9:1) and father of Ner (14:51), who was the grandfather of King Saul (1 Chron. 8:33, 9:39). In 1 Sam. 9:1 the phrase "son of Abiel" should be "grandson of Abiel."

2. One of David's mighty men (1 Chron. 11:32). He is the same as Abi-albon (or Abi-Albon, NIV), the Arbathite (2 Sam. 23:31), about 1000 B.C.

ABIE'ZER (a'bi-ē'zer; "father of help").

1. The second son of Hammoleketh, sister of Gilead and granddaughter of Manasseh (1 Chron. 7:17–18). He was the founder of the family to which Gideon belonged, and which bore his name as a patronymic (Josh. 17:2; Judg. 6:34); before 1170 B.C. He is elsewhere called Iezer, and his descendants Iezerites (Num. 26:30).

2. The Anathothite, one of David's thirty chief warriors (2 Sam. 23:27). Abiezer commanded the ninth division of the army (1 Chron. 27:12), 1000 B.C.

3. Another name for Bukki's father Abishua (which see; the term Abiezar appears in Josephus Ant. 5.11.5.).

ABI'EZRITE (a-bi'ez-rīt; "father of the Ezrite"). A patronymic designation of the descendants of Abiezer (Judg. 6:11, 24; 8:32).

AB'IGAIL (ab'i-gāl; "my father rejoices").

1. The wife of Nabal (which see), a sheep master of Carmel (1 Sam. 25:3), about 1000 B.C. In sheep-shearing time David sent some of his young men to Nabal for a present, which was insolently refused. David was greatly enraged and set out with four hundred men to avenge the insult. Abigail, having been informed of her husband's conduct and the impending danger, went to meet David with an abundant supply of bread, grain, and wine. She prayed for David's forbearance, arguing from Nabal's character (v. 25), the leadings of God by which David had been kept from murder by her coming to meet him, and the fact that God is the avenger of the wicked (v. 26). David was mollified by Abigail's tact and beauty, and he recalled his vow. Returning home, Abigail found her husband intoxicated and told him nothing of her conduct and his danger until morning. The information produced so great a shock that "his heart died within him so that he became as stone" (v. 37), and he died about ten days after. Abigail became David's wife and shared his varying fortunes, dwelling at Gath (27:3), being among the captives taken by the Amalekites from Ziklag (30:5), and accompanying her husband to Hebron when he was anointed king (2 Sam. 2:2). She bore David a son named Chileab (3:3; Kileab, NIV), also called Daniel (1 Chron. 3:1).

2. A daughter of Nahash (Jesse) and sister of David, and wife of Jether, or Ithra, an Ishmaelite, by whom she had Amasa (2 Sam. 17:25; 1 Chron. 2:16–17).

AB' THAIL (ab'i-hāl; "father of might").

1. The father of Zuriel and chief of the Levitical family of Merari when Moses numbered the Levites at Sinai (Num. 3:35), c. 1440 B.C.

2. The wife of Abishur (of the family of Jerahmeel) and the mother of Ahban and Molid (1 Chron. 2:29).

3. The son of Huri and one of the chiefs of the family of Gad, who settled in Bashan (1 Chron. 5:14).

4. The "daughter," i.e., descendant, of Eliab, David's oldest brother and second wife of Rehoboam. She could hardly have been the daughter of Eliab, as David, his youngest brother, was thirty years old when he began to reign, some eighty years before her marriage (2 Chron. 11:18).

5. The father of Esther and uncle of Mordecai (Esther 2:15; 9:29), c. 500 B.C.

ABI'HU (a-bi'hū; "He [God] is my father"). One of Aaron's sons, who with his brother Nadab offered "strange [i.e., "unauthorized," as in NIV] fire before the Lord, which He had not commanded them" (Lev. 10:1). As a result both priests were struck dead by the divine Presence manifested in fire (v. 2). The sin of Nadab and Abihu, illustrative of the sin of a believer unto physical death (1 Cor. 5:5; 1 John 5:16), was in acting in the things of God without first seeking the mind of God. It was "will worship" (cf. Col. 2:23). Supernatural fire from the divine Presence had kindled the natural fire that burned upon the altar of burnt offering. It was the priests' duty to keep this fire burning continuously. No command, however, had been given as to how the incense should be kindled (Lev. 16:12). Not waiting for instruction concerning taking the sacred fire from the brazen altar, but taking common fire that they themselves had kindled, they lighted the incense on the golden altar. This flagrant sacrilege at the commencement of a new dispensation (the legal) had to be divinely punished to serve as a warning, as the sin of Ananias and Sapphira at the beginning of the NT church age was similarly severely dealt with (Acts 5:1–11). Aaron's disobedient sons seem, moreover, to have committed their serious trespass under the influence of wine (cf. Lev. 10:8–9). The true source of exhilaration for the genuine spiritual priest is not wine, with its attendant temptations and perils, but the Holy Spirit (Eph. 5:18). M.F.U.

ABI'HUD (a-bi'hud; "father of renown"). One of the sons of Bela, the son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:3).

ABI'JAH (a-bi'jā; “God is my father” or “daddy”).

1. A son of Jeroboam I, king of Israel. On his falling ill Jeroboam secretly sought help from the God whom he had openly forsaken. He sent his wife, disguised and bearing a present of bread and honey, to Ahijah, the prophet, who was at Shiloh. The prophet was blind but had been warned by God of her coming. He revealed to her that, though the child was to die, yet because there was found in Abijah only, of all the house of Jeroboam, “something good ... toward the Lord,” he only, of all that house, should come to his grave in peace and be mourned in Israel (1 Kings 14:14). The queen returned home, and the child died as she crossed the threshold. “And all Israel buried him and mourned for him” (1 Kings 14:18), about 922 B.C.

2. The second king of Judah, the son of Rehoboam and grandson of Solomon (1 Chron. 3:10). He is called Abijam in 1 Kings 14:31; 15:1–8 (though Abijah throughout in NIV).

Two names are given for his mother. In 1 Kings 15:2 we read, “His mother’s name was Maacah the daughter of Abishalom” (cf. 2 Chron. 11:20, 22); but in 2 Chron. 13:2 it is written, “His mother’s name was Micaiah [or Maacah in NIV], the daughter of Uriel of Gibeah.” The solution of the difficulty probably is that the mother of Abijah had two names, and that Abishalom was her grandfather.

Abijah began to reign 913 B.C., in the eighteenth year of Jeroboam, king of Israel, and reigned three years. Considering the separation of the ten tribes of Israel as rebellion, Abijah made a vigorous attempt to bring them back to their allegiance. He marched with four hundred thousand men against Jeroboam, who met him with eight hundred thousand men. In Mt. Ephraim he addressed a speech to Jeroboam and the opposing army, in which he advocated a theocratic institution, referred to the beginning of the rebellion, showed the folly of opposing God’s kingdom, and concluded with urging Israel not to fight against God. His view of the political position of the ten tribes with respect to Judah, though erroneous, was such as a king of Judah would be likely to take. He gained a signal victory over Jeroboam, who lost five hundred thousand men, and though he did not bring Israel to their former allegiance, he took Bethel, Jeshanah, and Ephraim (Ephron, NIV), with their dependent towns, from them, and Jeroboam never again warred with him (2 Chron. 13:1–20). He imitated his father’s sins (1 Kings 15:3) and had fourteen wives, by whom he had twenty-two sons and sixteen daughters (2 Chron. 13:21). He was succeeded by his son Asa (14:1).

3. The second son of Samuel, appointed with Joel, his elder brother, judge of Beersheba by his father. The brothers “turned aside after dishonest gain and took bribes and perverted justice” (1 Sam. 8:3). By reason of their conduct Israel demanded of Samuel a king (8:2, 6; 1 Chron. 6:28), before 1030 B.C.

4. The wife of Hezron and mother of Ashhur (1 Chron. 2:24).

5. One of the sons of Becher (or Beker, NIV), the son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:8).

6. One of the descendants of Eleazar, the son of Aaron, and chief of one of the twenty-four divisions or orders into which the whole body of the priesthood was divided by David (1 Chron. 24:10). Of these the division of Abijah was the eighth; 1000 B.C.

7. The daughter of Zechariah and mother of King Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:1) and, consequently, the wife of Ahaz. She is also called Abi (2 Kings 18:2); before 719 B.C.

8. One of the priests, probably, who affixed their signatures to the covenant made with God by Nehemiah (Neh. 10:7). He seems to be the same (notwithstanding the great age this implies) who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (12:4), and who had a son Zichri (12:17; Zicri, NIV); 445 B.C.

ABI'JAM (a-bi'jam; "father of the sea"). The name always given in the book of Kings to the king of Judah (1 Kings 14:31; 15:1, 7–8); elsewhere called Abijah (see NIV, however, where Abijah is used consistently). First Kings 14:1 refers to another person. Abijam is probably a clerical error, some manuscripts giving Abijah.

ABILE'NE (ab-i-lē'ne; Gk. Abilēnē, so called from its capital, Abila, which probably in turn was derived from Heb. ʾābēl, "watercourse"). A tetrarchy on the eastern slope of Lebanon, governed in the fifteenth year of Tiberius by Lysanias (Luke 3:1). Abila lay on the Barada (Abana) some fourteen miles NW of Damascus, where the modern village of Suk Wadi Barada now stands. Tradition, in naming the spot as the location of the tomb of Abel, the first martyr, is the result of confusing Abel, properly Heb. hebel, with ʾābēl, "a watercourse." Latin inscriptions found here mentioning repairs to the local road by the "Abileni" and having reference to the sixteenth legion, identify the place. Archaeological remains cover two small hills—Tell Abil and Tell umm el-Amad—and include a temple, a theater, and a basilica. M.F.U.

ABIM' AEL (a-bim'ā-ēl; "my father is God" [?]). One of the sons of Joktan, in Arabia (Gen. 10:28; 1 Chron. 1:22). He has been supposed to be the founder of an Arabian tribe called Maël.

ABIM' ELECH (a-bim'e-lek; "my father is king," or "royal father"). Probably a general title of royalty, as Pharaoh among the Egyptians.

1. The Philistine king of Gerar in the time of Abraham (Gen. 20:1–16), about 2086 B.C. After the destruction of Sodom, Abraham moved into his territory and remained some time at Gerar. Abimelech took Sarah, whom Abraham had announced to be his sister, into his harem, being either charmed with her beauty or desirous of allying himself with Abraham. God appeared to Abimelech in a dream and threatened him with death on account of Sarah, because she was married. Abimelech, who had not yet come near her, excused himself on the ground that he supposed Sarah to be Abraham's sister. That Abimelech, in taking Sarah, should have supposed that he was acting "in the integrity of my heart and the innocence of my hands" (20:5) is accounted for by considering the customs of that day. The next morning Abimelech obeyed the divine command and restored Sarah to Abraham, providing him with a liberal present of cattle and servants and offering him settlement in any part of the country. He also gave him a thousand pieces of silver as, according to some, an atoning or vindicating present. Others think that the money was to procure a veil for Sarah to conceal her beauty, that she might not be coveted for her beauty. Thus she was "cleared" for not having worn a veil, which as a married woman, according to the custom of the country, she ought to have done. Some years after, Abimelech, accompanied by Phicol (or Phicol, NIV), "the commander of his army" (21:22), went to Beer-sheba to make a covenant with Abraham, which is the first league on record. Abimelech restored a well that had been dug by Abraham but seized by the herdsmen of Abimelech without his knowledge (21:22–34).

2. Another king of Gerar in the time of Isaac (Gen. 26:1–31), about 1986 B.C. Supposed to have been the son of the preceding Abimelech. Isaac sought refuge with Abimelech from famine and dwelt at Gerar. Having the same fear concerning his wife, Rebekah, as his father entertained respecting Sarah, he reported her to be his sister. Abimelech discovered the untruthfulness of Isaac's statement (v. 8), whereupon he reproved him for what he had said and forbade any of his people to touch Rebekah on pain of death. The agricultural operations of Isaac in Gerar were highly successful, returning him in one year a hundredfold. He also claimed his proprietary right to the soil by reopening the wells dug by his father. The digging of wells, according to the custom of those times, gave one a right to the soil. His success made the Philistines envious, so that even Abimelech requested him to depart, fearing his power. Isaac complied, and encamped in the open country ("the valley of Gerar," v. 17). In this valley he opened the old wells of Abraham's time, and his people dug three new ones. But Abimelech's herdsmen contended concerning two of these, and the patriarch moved to so great a distance that there was no dispute respecting the third. Afterward Abimelech visited Isaac at Beersheba and desired to make a covenant of peace with him. Isaac referred to the hostility that the Philistines had shown, to which Abimelech replied that they not strike him, i.e., drive him away by force, but let him depart in peace, and he closed by recognizing Isaac as being one blessed of God (vv. 27–29). Isaac entertained Abimelech and his companions with a feast, contracted the desired covenant with them, and dismissed them in peace (vv. 30–31). See also Gerar.

3. King of Shechem (Judg. 9). After Gideon's death Abimelech (Judg. 9:1–5), son of Jerubbaal (Jerub-Baal, NIV), formed a conspiracy with his mother's family, who seem to have had considerable influence in Shechem. The argument used was the advantage of the rule of one person to that of seventy. He also reminded them that he was one of themselves. Thus influenced, the Shechemites furnished him with money out of the treasure of Baal-berith, with which Abimelech hired desperate men and, returning to Ophrah with them, killed all his brothers save Jotham, the youngest, who hid himself.

At a general assemblage of the men of Shechem (which see) and the house of Millo (which see) Abimelech was declared king, c. 1108–1105 B.C. When Jotham was told of the election of Abimelech he went to the top of Mt. Gerizim, where the Shechemites were assembled for some public purpose, perhaps to inaugurate Abimelech (Kitto), and rebuked them in his famous parable of the trees choosing a king (Judg. 9:6–21).

Judgment against Abimelech was not long delayed, for in three years "God sent an evil spirit between" him "and the men of Shechem," and they "dealt treacherously with Abimelech" (9:23). They caused ambushes to be laid in the mountains and robbed all that passed. The design was, probably, to bring the government into discredit by allowing such lawlessness, or to waylay Abimelech himself. The insurgents found a leader in Gaal (which see), the son of Ebed, who, while they were cursing Abimelech in the excitement of a village feast to Baal, called upon them to revolt from Abimelech and declared that he would dethrone him. He then challenged the king to battle (9:25–29).

Zebul, the ruler of Shechem, sent word to Abimelech of the revolt and requested him to place himself in ambush that night and be prepared to surprise Gaal in the morning. As was expected, Gaal started out in the morning, was met and defeated by Abimelech, and prevented by Zebul from entering the city. The next day, when the people went out into the field, possibly to continue their vine dressing, Abimelech and two companies of troops killed them. At the same time his remaining company seized the city gates. After fighting against the city all day he took it, destroyed it utterly, and strewed it with salt (9:30–45).

When the leaders of Shechem, who took refuge in the city's tower, heard of the fate of the city they went to the temple of Baal-berith (which see; El-Berith, NIV).

Their purpose in so doing was evidently not to defend themselves, but to seek safety at the sanctuary of their god from the vengeance of Abimelech. When he heard of this, Abimelech went with his men to Mt. Zalmon and brought from there branches of trees. These were piled against the building and set on fire. The building was consumed with all its occupants, about one thousand men and women (9:46–49).

At last the fate predicted by Jotham (9:20) overtook Abimelech. He went from Shechem to Thebez, besieged the town, and took it. This town possessed a strong tower, and in this the inhabitants took refuge. When Abimelech approached the door to set it on fire a woman threw a piece of millstone (the upper millstone) upon him, crushing his skull. Seeing that he was mortally wounded, he called upon his armor-bearer to thrust him through with a sword, lest it should be said, “A woman slew him” (v. 54). After Abimelech’s death his army was dissolved. “Thus God repaid the wickedness of Abimelech, which he had done to his father, in killing his seventy brothers” (v. 56).

4. The son of Abiathar and high priest in the time of David (1 Chron. 18:16). The name is probably an error of transcription for “Ahimelech,” as in NIV (2 Sam. 8:17).

5. In the title of Ps. 34 the name Abimelech is interchanged for that of Achish (which see), king of Gath, to whom David fled for refuge from Saul (1 Sam. 21:10).

ABIN’ADAB (a-bin’a-dab; “father is noble”).

1. A Levite of Kiriath-jearim (or Kiriath Jearim, NIV) in whose house the Ark was deposited after it was returned by the Philistines (1 Sam. 7:1; 2 Sam. 6:3–4; 1 Chron. 13:7); before 1030 B.C.

2. The second of the eight sons of Jesse (1 Sam. 17:13; 1 Chron. 2:13) and one of the three who followed Saul to the campaign against the Philistines in which Goliath defied Israel (1 Sam. 17:13).

3. One of the four sons of King Saul (1 Chron. 8:33; 9:39; 10:2). He was slain by the Philistines in the battle of Gilboa (1 Sam. 31:2; 1 Chron. 10:2), c. 1004 B.C. His name appears as Ishvi in the list in 1 Sam. 14:49.

4. The father of one of Solomon’s purveyors (or, rather, Ben-Abinadab is to be regarded as the name of the purveyor himself) who presided over the district of Dor and married Taphath, the daughter of Solomon (1 Kings 4:11); after 960 B.C.

ABIN’OAM (a-bin’ō-am; “father of pleasantness”). The father of Barak, the judge (Judg. 4:6, 12; 5:1, 12), about 1190 B.C.

ABI’RAM (a-bi’ram; “exalted father”).

1. One of the sons of Eliab, a Reubenite, who with his brother Dathan, and with On, of the same tribe, joined Korah, a Levite, in conspiracy against Moses and Aaron, about 1430 B.C. He and the other conspirators were destroyed by an earthquake (Num. 16:1–33; 26:9–10; Deut. 11:6). See Korah.

2. The eldest son of Hiel, the Bethelite, who died prematurely (for such is the evident import of the statement) for the presumption or ignorance of his father, in fulfillment of the doom pronounced upon the posterity of him who should undertake to rebuild Jericho (1 Kings 16:34). Perhaps what is really involved in the prophecy and its fulfillment is infant sacrifice. It was a common practice of Canaanites to make a sacrifice of an infant and bury it in the foundation of a structure in order to placate a god and assure divine blessing on a people or a project. For prophecy, see Josh. 6:26.

AB'ISHAG (ab'i-shag; "father of error"). A beautiful young woman of Shunem, in the tribe of Issachar, who was selected by the servants of David to minister to him in his old age (1 Kings 1:3–4), 965 B.C. She became his wife, but the marriage was never consummated (1:4). Soon after David's death Adonijah sought, through the intercession of Bathsheba, Solomon's mother, the hand of Abishag. But as the control and possession of the harem of the deceased king were associated with rights and privileges peculiarly regal, Solomon supposed this demand to be part of a conspiracy against the throne. Adonijah was therefore put to death. (2:17–25). See Adonijah.

ABISH'AI (a-bish'a-ī; "father of a gift"). A son of Zeruah, sister of David (by an unknown father), and brother to Joab and Asahel (1 Chron. 2:16). The first we learn of Abishai is his volunteering to accompany David to the camp of Saul, about 1006 B.C. The two went down by night and found Saul and his people asleep. Abishai begged of David that he might slay Saul with his spear, which was stuck in the ground near his head (1 Sam. 26:6–12). With his brother Joab, Abishai pursued after Abner (who had just slain Asahel) until sundown, and until they had reached the hill of Ammah (2 Sam. 2:24) and aided in the treacherous assassination of Abner (3:30). In the war against Hanun, undertaken by David to punish the Ammonites for insulting his messengers, Abishai, as second in command, fought the army of the Ammonites before the gates of Rabbah and drove them headlong into the city (2 Sam. 10:10, 14; 1 Chron. 19:11, 15). The same impetuous zeal and regard for David that he showed in the night adventure to Saul's camp Abishai manifested in his desire to slay Shimei, when the latter cursed David (2 Sam. 16:9, 11; 19:21). When the king fled beyond Jordan, Abishai remained faithful to David and was entrusted with the command of one of the three divisions of the army that crushed the rebellion (18:2, 12), 967 B.C.

In the revolt of Sheba the Benjamite, David ordered Amasa to muster the forces of Judah in three days. His tardiness compelled David to again have recourse to the sons of Zeruah, and Abishai was appointed to pursue Sheba, which he did (accompanied by Joab), leading the Cherethites (or Kerethites, NIV), the Pelethites, and all the mighty men (2 Sam. 20:4–10). Later, when David's life was imperiled by Ishbi-benob (or Ishbi-Benob, NIV), Abishai came to his help and slew the giant (21:15–17). He was chief of the three "mighty men" (23:8) who performed the chivalrous exploit of breaking through the host of the Philistines, to procure David a draught of water from the well of his native Bethlehem (23:14–17). Among the exploits of this hero it is mentioned (23:18) that he withstood three hundred men and slew them with his spear, but the occasion of this adventure, and the time and manner of his death, are equally unknown.

In 2 Sam. 8:13, the victory over the Edomites in the Valley of Salt is ascribed to David, but in 1 Chron. 18:12, to Abishai. It is hence probable that the victory was actually gained by Abishai but is ascribed to David as king and commander.

ABISH'ALOM (a-bish'a-lom). A fuller form (1 Kings 15:2, 10) of the name Absalom (which see).

ABISH'UA (a-bish'ū-a; "father of salvation").

1. The son of Phinehas (grandson of Aaron), and fourth high priest of the Jews (1 Chron. 6:4–5, 50; Ezra 7:5).

2. One of the sons of Bela, the son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:4); possibly the same as Jerimoth (7:7).

AB'ISHUR (ab'i-shūr; “my father is a wall,” i.e., “stronghold,” or perhaps “mason”). The second son of Shammai, of the tribe of Judah. He was the husband of Abihail, and father of two sons, Ahban and Molid (1 Chron. 2:28–29).

AB'TAL (ab'i-tal, “father of the dew,” i.e., “fresh”). The fifth wife of David and mother of Shephatiah, who was born in Hebron (2 Sam. 3:4; 1 Chron. 3:3).

AB'TUB (ab'i-tüb; “father of goodness,” i.e., “good”). A son of Shaharaim, a Benjamite, by his wife Hushim, in Moab (1 Chron. 8:11).

ABI'UD (a-bi'ūd). A Gk. form (Matt. 1:13) of Abihud (which see). The great-great-grandson of Zerubbabel and father of Eliakim, among the paternal ancestry of Jesus (Matt. 1:13). He is probably the same as Judah, son of Joanna, and father of Joseph in the maternal line (Luke 3:26), and also as Obadiah, son of Arnan and father of Shechaniah (or Shecaniah, NIV) in 1 Chron. 3:21.

ABLUTION. A ceremonial washing, it might be of the person (or part thereof), clothing, vessels, or furniture, as a symbol of purification.

1. Cleansing from the taint of an inferior condition preparatory to initiation into a higher one. Of this sort was the washing with water of Aaron and his sons before they were invested with the priestly robes and anointed with the holy oil (Ex. 29:4; Lev. 8:6). The same is doubtless true of the ablution of persons and clothing that was required of the Israelites as a preparation to their receiving the law from Sinai (Ex. 19:10–15).

2. Preparation for a special act of religious service. Before they entered into the service of the Tabernacle the priests were required, under penalty of death, to wash their hands and feet. For this purpose a large basin of water always stood in readiness (Ex. 30:18–21; Lev. 16). The Egyptian priests carried the practice to a burdensome extent. Herodotus tells us (2. 37) that they shaved their bodies every third day and that no insect or other filth might be upon them when they served the gods. The Muslim law requires ablution before each of the five daily prayers, permitting it to be performed with sand when water is not to be had, as in the desert.

3. Purification from actual defilement. Eleven species of uncleanness of this nature are recognized by the Mosaic law (Lev. 12–15), the purification for which ceased at the end of a prescribed period, provided the unclean person then washed his body and his clothes. In a few cases, such as leprosy and the defilement caused by touching a dead body, he remained unclean seven days. The Jews afterward introduced many other causes of defilement, being equaled, however, by the Muslims.

4. Declaration of freedom from guilt of a particular action. An instance of this is the expiation for the murder of a man by unknown hands, when the elders of the nearest village washed their hands over a slain heifer, saying, “Our hands have not shed this blood, nor did our eyes see it” (Deut. 21:1–9). The Pharisees carried the practice of ablution to such excess, from the affectation of purity while the heart was left unclean, that our Lord severely rebuked them for their hypocrisy (Matt. 23:25).

All these practices come under the head of purification from uncleanness; the acts involved were made so numerous that persons of the stricter sect could scarcely move without contracting some involuntary pollution. Therefore, they never entered their houses without ablution, from the strong probability that they had unknowingly contracted some defilement on the streets. They were especially careful never to eat without washing their hands (Mark 7:1–5). A distinction must be made between this ceremonial washing and ordinary cleansing of the hands as a matter of decency. When the charge was made against our Lord's disciples that they ate with unwashed hands, it was not meant that they did not wash their hands at all, but that they did not do it ceremonially.

These ceremonial washings were prescribed with such minute details as to be not only burdensome but sometimes impossible. Before the ceremony one had to decide the kind of food to be partaken of—whether it was prepared firstfruits, common food, or holy, i.e., sacrificial food. “The water was poured on both hands, which must be free from anything covering them, such as gravel, mortar, etc. The hands were lifted up, so as to make the water run to the wrist, in order to insure that the whole hand was washed and that the water polluted by the hand did not again run down the fingers. Similarly, each hand was rubbed with the other (the fist), provided the hand that rubbed had been affused; otherwise the rubbing might be done against the head, or even against a wall. But there was one point on which special stress was laid. In the ‘first affusion,’ which was all that originally was required when the hands were not Levitically ‘defiled,’ the water had to run down to the wrist. If the water remained short of the wrist, the hands were not clean. Accordingly, the words of St. Mark can only mean that the Pharisees eat not ‘except they wash their hands to the wrist.’ If the hands were ‘defiled’ two affusions were required: the first to remove the defilement, and the second to wash away the waters that had contracted the defilement of the hands. Accordingly, on the affusion of the first waters the hands were elevated, and the water made to run down at the wrist, while at the second waters the hands were depressed, so that the water might run off by the finger joints and tips” (Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus, 2:11).

AB'NER (ab'ner; “my father is Ner” [?]). The son of Ner and uncle of Saul (being the brother of his father, Kish).

Under Saul. Abner was a renowned warrior and the commander in chief of the army of Saul (1 Sam. 14:50), 1030 B.C. He was the person who conducted David into the presence of Saul after the death of Goliath (17:57). He was doubtless held in high esteem by Saul, and with David and Jonathan sat at the king's table (20:25). He accompanied Saul to Hachilah (Hakilah, NIV) in his pursuit of David, who sarcastically reproached him for not guarding his master more securely (26:1, 5, 15).

Under Ish-bosheth. After the death of Saul, 1004 B.C., Abner, taking advantage of the feeling entertained in the other tribes against Judah, took Ish-bosheth, a surviving son of Saul, to Mahanaim, proclaimed him king, and ruled in his name. This happened five years after Saul's death, the intervening time being probably occupied in recovering land from the Philistines and in gaining influence with the other tribes. Desultory warfare was kept up for two years between the armies of David and Ish-bosheth. The only engagement of which we have an account is the battle of Gibeah, Joab and Abner commanding the opposing forces.

Slays Asahel. Abner was beaten and fled for his life but was pursued by Asahel (brother of Joab and Abishai). Not wishing to have a blood feud with Joab (for according to usage, Joab would become the avenger of his brother Asahel, in case he was slain), Abner begged Asahel to cease following him and pursue someone else. Asahel refused, and Abner thrust him through with a back stroke of his spear. The pursuit was kept up by Joab and Abishai until sunset, when a conference of the leaders was held, and Joab sounded the trumpet of recall. Abner withdrew to Mahanaim and Joab to Hebron (2 Sam. 2:8–30).

Breaks with Ish-bosheth. At last Abner took a step that was so presumptuous and significant of his consciousness of power that even the feebler Ish-bosheth protested. It was the exclusive right of the successor to the throne to cohabit with the concubines of the deceased king. Yet Abner took to his own harem Rizpah, one of Saul's concubines. The rebuke of Ish-bosheth so greatly enraged Abner that he declared his purpose of abandoning the house of Saul and allying himself with David (2 Sam. 3:6–9). To excuse his conduct he asserted that he was aware of the divine purpose concerning David.

Joins David. Abner made overtures through messengers to David, who required, as a preliminary, the restoration of his wife, Michal, who had been given to Paltiel by Saul. Abner made a tour among the elders of Israel and Benjamin, advocating the cause of David. He then went in person to David, who showed him great attention and respect, giving him and the twenty men accompanying him a feast. In return Abner promised to gather all Israel to the standard of David and was then dismissed in peace (2 Sam. 3:9–22).

Slain by Joab. Joab, returning from Hebron from a military expedition and fearing the influence of such a man as Abner, resolved to avenge his brother's death. Unknown to the king, but doubtless in his name, he sent messengers after Abner to call him back. Drawing Abner aside under the pretence of private conversation, he struck him under the fifth rib so that he died (2 Sam. 3:26–30). Abner was buried at Hebron with the honors due to a prince and chieftain, David himself following the bier (vv. 31–32). David's lamentation over Abner exonerated him in public opinion from any blame, and his declaration to his servants (3:38–39) showed that he could properly estimate the character even of an enemy and that he would have punished his murderer had he the power to do so.

ABOMINATION (Heb. piggûl, "filth," Lev. 7:18; shiqqûs, "unclean," Deut. 29:17, etc., sheqes, "rejected," Lev. 7:21, etc.; tô:ēbâ, "causing abhorrence," Gen. 43:32; Gk. bdelugma, Matt. 24:15, etc.). This word is used to denote that which is particularly offensive to the moral sense, the religious feeling, or the natural inclination of the soul. Israel became an abomination ("stench," NIV) to the Philistines because of the antipathy caused by war (1 Sam. 13:4); David, for his distressed condition, was an abomination ("repulsive," NIV) to his friends (Ps. 88:8).

The practices of sin—such as the swellings of pride, lips of falsehood, the sacrifices of the wicked, and the foul rites of idolatry—are stigmatized as abominations (Prov. 6:16; 12:22; 15:8; Jer. 6:15; "detestable" in Prov., "loathsome" in Jer., NIV).

There are some peculiar applications of the term, to which attention is called:

1. "The Egyptians could not eat bread with the Hebrews, for that is loathsome [tô:ēbâ; "detestable," NIV] to the Egyptians" (Gen. 43:32). The explanation probably is that the Egyptians thought themselves ceremonially defiled if they ate with strangers. The primary reason may have been that the cow was the most sacred animal to the Egyptians, and the eating of it was obnoxious to them; whereas it was eaten and sacrificed by the Jews and most other nations. The Jews themselves, in later times, considered it unlawful to eat or drink with foreigners in their houses, or even to enter their dwellings (John 18:28; Acts 10:28; 11:3).

2. Joseph told his brothers to answer when questioned by Pharaoh, "Your servants have been keepers of livestock from our youth even until now, both we and our fathers." Joseph adds as a reason for giving this statement, "That you may live in the land of Goshen; for every shepherd is loathsome ["detestable," NIV] to the Egyptians" (Gen. 46:34). The origin of this feeling is nowhere given either in sacred or secular history, but the fact is beyond dispute, being amply attested by the evidence of the monuments, on which shepherds are always represented in a low and degrading attitude.

3. When Pharaoh told the Israelites to sacrifice to “your God” without going to the desert, Moses replied, “It is not right to do so, for we shall sacrifice to the Lord our God what is an abomination to the Egyptians. If we sacrifice what is an abomination [“detestable,” NIV] to the Egyptians before their eyes, will they not then stone us?” (Ex. 8:26). Some think the abomination to consist in the sacrifice of the cow. Others (K. & D., Com., ad loc.) think that “the Israelites would not carry out the rigid regulations observed by the Egyptians with regard to the cleanness of the sacrificial animals, and in fact would not observe the sacrificial rites of the Egyptians at all.” The Egyptians would, doubtless, consider this a manifestation of contempt for themselves and their gods, and this would so enrage them that they would stone the Israelites.

ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION. Interpreted by premillennialists as the idolatrous image to be set up by the final Antichrist (the “beast,” or “man of lawlessness” of 2 Thess. 2:3–4) in the restored Temple at Jerusalem in the latter half of Daniel’s seventieth week (Dan. 9:27; 12:11). For the first part of the three and one-half days (years) of the prophetic week of years, the Antichrist keeps his covenant with the Jews. At the beginning of the last half of the week he breaks it (Zech. 11:16–17), compelling the Jews to worship his image. This is “the abomination (idol) of the desolator” or “the idol that causes desolation” (cf. Dan. 11:31; 12:11), inaugurating the period of “Jacob’s trouble” (Jer. 30:7), a time of terrible suffering to Palestinian Jews of the end time, of which our Lord spoke (Matt. 24:15). In Dan. 11:31 the reference is to the act of Antiochus Epiphanes, prototype of the final Antichrist, who, in June 168 B.C. desecrated the Temple at Jerusalem. He built an altar to Jupiter Olympus on the altar of burnt offering, dedicated the Temple to this heathen deity, and offered swine’s flesh. Premillennialists maintain that neither Antiochus Epiphanes nor the Romans under Titus in A.D. 70 exhausted Daniel’s prophecy, which still awaits fulfillment. Amillennial interpretation, however, sees a fulfillment in the advance of the Romans against Jerusalem in A.D. 70 with their image-crowned standards, which were regarded as idols by the Jews.

A BRAHAM (ā’bra-ham; “father of a multitude”). Up to Gen. 17:5, also in 1 Chron. 1:27; Neh. 9:7, he is uniformly called Abram, “high father.” The name Abram—Aburamu, “the exalted father”—is found in early Babylonian contracts.

Family. Abraham was a native of Chaldea, and descendant in the ninth generation from Shem, the son of Noah. His father’s name was Terah, and he was born in Ur, 2161 B.C. (Gen. 11:27).

Personal History. The life of Abraham, from his call to his death, consists of four periods, the commencement of each of which is marked by a divine revelation of sufficient importance to constitute a distinct epoch.

The First Period. The call and Abraham's journey to Canaan, to Egypt, and back again to Canaan occurred during this period.

Moves to Haran. When Abraham was about seventy years of age he, with his father, Terah, his nephew Lot, and his wife Sarah, went to live in Haran (Gen. 11:27–31). The reason for this movement is given in Acts 7:2–3: “The God of glory appeared to our father Abraham when he was in Mesopotamia, before he lived in Haran, and said to him, ‘Depart from your country and your relatives, and come into the land that I will show you.’”

Departs from Haran. At the death of his father the call to Abraham was renewed. “Now the Lord said to Abram, ‘Go forth from your country, and from your relatives and from your father's house, to the land which I will show you’” (Gen. 12:1). A condition was annexed to the call that he should separate from his father's house and leave his native land. He left his brother Nahor's family (who had also come to Haran, cf. Gen. 22:20, 23; 24:29; and 27:43) and departed, taking with him Lot, probably regarded as his heir (Josephus Ant. 1.7.1), and all his substance, to go “not knowing where he was going” (Heb. 11:8). Genesis 12:5 states that Abraham “set out for the land of Canaan,” but Heb. 11:8 states that “he went out, not knowing where he was going.” At first the name of the country was not revealed to him. It is designated simply as a “land which I will show you” (Gen. 12:1). But even if the name Canaan had been mentioned at the onset, it might still be true that he went forth “not knowing where he was going.” For, in those days of slow transit, imperfect communication, and meager geographical knowledge, the mere name of a country several hundred miles distant would convey almost no idea of the country itself (Haley).

Arrival in Canaan. He traveled until he came into the land of Canaan, and there he formed his first encampment beside the oak of Moreh, between the mountains of Ebal and Gerizim, where his strong faith was rewarded by the second promise that his seed should possess this land. Abraham built “an altar there to the Lord who had appeared to him” (12:6–7). It is probable that the Canaanites were jealous of Abraham, and that he therefore soon removed to the mountainous district between Bethel and Ai, where he also built an altar to Jehovah.

In Egypt. He still moved southward until, at length, compelled by a famine, he went into Egypt. Fearing that the beauty of Sarah would tempt the Egyptians and endanger his life, he caused her to pass for his sister, which was partly true, for she was his half sister, having the same father but a different mother (Gen. 20:12). Sarah was taken to the royal harem, and Abraham was loaded with valuable gifts which he did not deserve, that could not be refused without an insult to the king. Warned of his mistake, Pharaoh summoned Abraham, and indignantly rebuked him for his subterfuge. He then dismissed Abraham, who went out of Egypt, taking his wife and Lot and his great wealth with him (Gen. 12).

Return to Canaan. Having reached his former encampment between Bethel and Ai, he again established the worship of Jehovah (Gen. 13:3–4). The increased wealth of Abraham and Lot became the cause of their separation. The country did not furnish sufficient pasture for the flocks and herds of both Abraham and Lot, and dissensions arose between their herdsmen. In order to avoid strife and consequent weakness before their enemies, Abraham proposed that they occupy different districts. He gave the choice of locality to Lot, who selected the plain of the Jordan and pitched his tent there. The childless Abraham was rewarded with a third blessing, in which God reiterated His promise to give him the land and a posterity as numerous as the dust of the earth. Then Abraham moved his tent, dwelt in Mamre, near Hebron, and built an altar (Gen. 13).

Rescue of Lot. Lot was now involved in danger. The five cities of the plain had become tributary to Chedorlaomer (Kedorlaomer, NIV), king of Elam. In the thirteenth year of their subjection they revolted, and Chedorlaomer (Kedorlaomer) marched against them with three allied kings. The kings of Sodom and Gomorrah fell, their cities were spoiled, and Lot and his goods were carried off (Gen. 14:1–12). Word was brought to Abraham, who immediately armed his dependents, 318 men, and with his Amorite allies overtook and defeated them at Dan, near the springs of Jordan. Abraham and his men pursued them as far as the neighborhood of Damascus and then returned with Lot and all the men and goods that had been taken away, about 2080 B.C.

Meeting with Melchizedek. Arriving at Salem on their return, they were met by Melchizedek (which see), king of Salem, and “priest of God Most High,” who brought him refreshments. He also blessed Abraham in the name of the most high God, and Abraham presented him with a tenth of the spoils. By strict right, founded on the war usages still subsisting in Arabia, Abraham had a claim to all the recovered goods. The king of Sodom recognized this right, but Abraham refused to accept anything, even from a thread to a shoe latchet, lest any should say, “I have made Abram rich” (Gen. 14:17–24).

The Second Period. The promise of a lineal heir and the conclusion of the covenant (Gen. 15–16) took place in this period.

Vision of Abraham. Soon after this Abraham’s faith was rewarded and encouraged by a distinct and detailed repetition of former promises and by a solemn covenant contracted between himself and God. He was told, and he believed, that his seed should be as numerous as the stars of heaven, that his posterity should grow up into a nation under foreign bondage, and that after four hundred years they should come up and possess the land in which he sojourned (Gen. 15).

Birth of Ishmael. Abraham had lived ten years in Canaan, and still he had no child. Sarah, now seventy-five years of age, followed contemporary custom and allowed Abraham to take Hagar, her Egyptian handmaid, who bore him Ishmael (Gen. 16), 2075 B.C.

The Third Period. The establishment of the covenant, the change of Abraham’s name, and the appointment of the covenant sign of circumcision (Gen. 17–21) occurred during this period.

Change of Name. Thirteen more years passed, and Abraham reached his ninety-ninth year. God appeared to him and favored him with still more explicit declarations of His purpose. He changed his name from Abram to Abraham, renewed his covenant, and in token of it commanded that he and the males of his company should receive circumcision. Abraham was assured that Sarah, then ninety years old, should in a year become the mother of Isaac, the heir of the special promises. Abraham wavered in faith and prayed for Ishmael, whom God promised abundantly to bless, but declared that He would establish his covenant with Isaac.

Circumcision. That very day Abraham, his son Ishmael, and all the males of his household were circumcised (Gen. 17).

Visit of Angels. Abraham was favored, shortly after, with another interview with God. Sitting in his tent door under the oaks of Mamre he saw three travelers approaching and offered them his hospitality. They assented, and partook of the fare provided, Abraham standing in respectful attendance, according to oriental custom.

These three persons were, doubtless, the “Angel of Jehovah” and two attending angels. The promise of a son by Sarah was renewed, and her incredulity rebuked. The strangers continued their journey, Abraham walking some way with them.

Destruction of Sodom. The Lord revealed to him the coming judgment upon Sodom and Gomorrah; and then followed that wondrous pleading in behalf of the cities (Gen. 18). Abraham rose early the next morning to see the fate of the cities and saw their smoke rising “up as the smoke of a furnace” (19:27–29), 2063 B.C.

Sarah Taken by Abimelech. After this Abraham journeyed southward, and dwelt between Kadesh and Shur, and sojourned in Gerar. Abimelech, king of Gerar, sent for and took Sarah, but was warned of God in a dream and sent her back the next morning to Abraham, whom he reproved for the deceit he had employed. He was healed in answer to Abraham’s prayer (Gen. 20).

Isaac Born. At length, when Abraham was one hundred years old, and Sarah ninety, the long-promised heir was born, 2061 B.C. The altered position of Ishmael in the family excited the ill will of himself and his mother. This was so apparent in the mocking behavior of Ishmael at the weaning of Isaac that Sarah insisted that he and Hagar should be sent away, to which Abraham reluctantly consented. Abraham, after settling a dispute concerning a well taken by Abimelech’s servants, made a treaty with him (Gen. 21).

The Fourth Period. In this period occurred the test of Abraham’s faith and his final years.

Abraham’s Great Trial (Gen. 22–25:11), 2036 B.C. When Isaac was nearly grown (twenty-five years old, says Josephus Ant. 1.13.2) God subjected Abraham to a terrible trial of his faith and obedience. He commanded him to go to Mt. Moriah (perhaps where the Temple afterward stood) and there offer up Isaac, whose death would nullify all his hopes and the promises. Probably human sacrifices already existed, and therefore the peculiar trial lay in the singular position of Isaac and the improbability of his being replaced. Abraham decided to obey, because “he considered that God is able to raise men even from the dead” (Heb. 11:19). Assisted by his two servants, he made preparations for the journey and started early the next morning. On the third day he saw the place and told his servants that he and his son would proceed on further to worship, then return. Upon Isaac’s asking, “Where is the lamb for the burnt offering?” Abraham replied, “God will provide for Himself the lamb.” The altar was built and Isaac placed upon it. The uplifted hand of the father was arrested by the angel of Jehovah, and a ram caught in the thicket was substituted for Isaac. Abraham called the name of the place Jehovah-jireh, “The Lord Will Provide.” The promises formerly made to Abraham were then confirmed in the most solemn manner. Abraham returned to his young men and with them went to Beersheba and dwelt there (Gen. 22:1–19).

Some have found it difficult to reconcile God’s command to sacrifice Isaac with His prohibition of human sacrifices (Lev. 18:21; 20:2). We answer, “God’s design was not to secure a certain outward act, but a certain state of mind, a willingness to give up the beloved object to Jehovah” (Haley). “The divine command was given in such a form that Abraham could not understand it in any other way than as requiring an outward burnt offering, because there was no other way in which Abraham could accomplish the complete surrender of Isaac than by an actual preparation for really offering the desired sacrifice” (K. & D., Com.). Moreover, any criticism of Abraham’s sacrifice of his son must be modified by his evident belief in God’s ability to raise that son from the dead.

Death of Sarah. The next event recorded in Abraham's life is the death of Sarah, 127 years of age, at or near Hebron (which see). Abraham purchased from Ephron the Hittite the cave of Machpelah (which see), the field in which it stood, and all the trees in the field, and there he buried Sarah (Gen. 23).

Marriage of Isaac. His next care was to procure a suitable wife for Isaac. He commissioned his eldest servant to go to Haran, where Nahor had settled, and get a wife for his son from his own family. The servant went and, directed by God, chose Rebekah, the daughter of Bethuel son of Nahor. In due time he returned, and Rebekah was installed in Sarah's tent (Gen. 24). Some time after Abraham took another wife, Keturah, by whom he had several children. These, together with Ishmael, seem to have been portioned off by their father in his lifetime and sent away to the E, that they might not interfere with Isaac.

Death. Abraham died when he was 175 years old and was buried by Isaac and Ishmael in the cave of Machpelah (Gen. 25), 1986 B.C.

Man of Faith. The spiritual experience of Abraham was marked by four far-reaching crises in which his faith was tested, and which, in each case, called forth the surrender of something naturally most dear to him: first, his giving up country and kindred (Gen. 12:1); second, his breaking off with his nephew, Lot, particularly close to Abraham by virtue of kinship as a fellow believer and possible heir (Gen. 13:1–18); third, the abandonment of his own cherished plans for Ishmael and his being called upon to center his hope in the promise of the birth of Isaac (Gen. 17:17–18); fourth, the supreme test of his mature life of faith in his willingness to offer up Isaac, his only son, whom he loved passionately and in whom all his expectations centered (Gen. 22:1–19; Heb. 11:17–18).

Man of Covenant Promise. As a friend of God and a man who implicitly trusted the divine promises, Abraham was the recipient of an important covenant involving not only himself, but his posterity, natural as well as spiritual. The Abrahamic covenant as originally given (Gen. 12:1–4) and reaffirmed (Gen. 13:14–17; 15:1–7; 17:1–8), contains the following elements: (1) "I will make you a great nation," fulfilled: (a) in a natural posterity, "as the dust of the earth," the Hebrew people (13:16, John 8:37), (b) in a spiritual progeny (John 8:39; Rom. 4:16; Gal. 3:6–7, 29), comprising all persons of faith, whether Jew or Gentile, (c) in the descendants of Ishmael (Gen. 17:18–20). (2) "I will bless you," fulfilled in a double sense: (a) temporally (Gen. 13:14–18; 15:18) and (b) spiritually (Gen. 15:6; John 8:56). (3) "And make your name great." In three great world religions—Judaism, Islam, and Christianity—Abraham is revered as one of the eminent men of all time. (4) "And so you shall be a blessing." By his personal example of faith and that faith as manifested in his descendants, Abraham has been a worldwide blessing. (5) "I will bless those who bless you, and the one who curses you I will curse." This has been remarkably fulfilled in the Jewish dispersion. Nations who have persecuted the Jews have fared ill, and those who have protected them have prospered. Prophecy, both fulfilled and unfulfilled, substantiates this principle (Deut. 30:7; Mic. 5:7–9; Hag. 2:22; Zech. 14:1–3; Jer. 50:11–18; 51:24–36; Ezek. 25:2; 26:2–3). (6) "In you all the families of the earth shall be blessed." This is the great messianic promise fulfilled in Abraham's descendant, Christ (John 8:56–58; Gal. 3:16).

Abraham and Archaeology. Archaeological evidence related to the time of Abraham has been found in Mesopotamia and Palestine.

Life in Ur. The biblical chronology would place Abraham's birth in lower Mesopotamia about 2161 B.C. According to one chronology, he lived there under the new Sumero-Akkadian empire of Ur Nammu, the founder of the famous Third Dynasty of Ur (c. 2135–2035 B.C.), who took the title of “King of Sumer and Akkad,” and whose mightiest work was the erection of the great ziggurat (temple tower) at Ur. Abraham left “Ur of the Chaldeans” (Gen. 11:31) when it was entering the heyday of its commercial and political prestige. According to the new minimal chronology, Abraham was born in Ur and left it during the period when the hated Guti ruled the land (2180–2070 B.C.). He then left Haran for Canaan about the time Ur entered her golden age (Ur III period). The new chronology dates Ur III 2070–1960 B.C. It was the appearance of “the God of glory” to him “when he was in Mesopotamia, before he lived in Haran” (Acts 7:2) that enabled Abraham to leave a famous center of wealth and culture for an unknown destination. In addition to a lucrative woolen trade, Ur was the center of numerous other industries that centered about the worship of the moon god Sin (Nannar) and his consort Nin-gal. The great temples and ziggurat of this deity made Ur a mecca for thousands of pilgrims. The far-flung commercial ventures of Ur gave her so much economic power in Mesopotamia that she virtually controlled the region. The total population of the city-state at that time has been estimated at 360,000.

At Haran. The town of Haran (Gen. 11:31; 12:5) in NW Mesopotamia to which Abram migrated on his way to Canaan is still in existence on the Balikh River sixty miles W of Tell Halaf. It was a flourishing city in the nineteenth and eighteenth centuries B.C., as is known from frequent references to it in cuneiform sources (Assyr. Harranu, “road”). It was on the great east-west trade route, and like Ur, it was the seat of the worship of the moon god. Whether Terah chose Haran as a place to settle because he had not made a clean break with the idolatry of his youth, or perhaps for commercial reasons, can only be surmised. The city of Nahor, which was Rebekah’s home (Gen. 24:10) is also attested by the Mari Tablets, discovered in 1935 and belonging to the eighteenth century B.C. Evidence of Hebrew occupation of this region also appears in names of Abraham’s forefathers, which correspond to the names of towns near Haran: Serug (Assyr. Sarugi) and Terah (Til Turakhi, “Mound of Terah”) in Assyrian times. Other immediate ancestors of Abraham listed in Gen. 11:10–30 have left their trace in this territory called Padan-Aram (Paddan Aram, NIV; Aram. “field or plain of Aram,” Gen. 25:20; 28:2–7). Reu corresponds to later names of towns in the Middle Euphrates Valley, and Peleg recalls later Paliga on the Euphrates just above the mouth of the Habur River.

In Canaan. After the death of Terah, Abraham left Haran and came into Canaan (Gen. 12:4–5). Archaeological and historical studies show that in Palestine and much of Syria deurbanization had set in as early as the twenty-fourth century B.C. and certainly characterized the land during the period 2200–2000 B.C. Newer discoveries indicate that this abandonment of towns resulted not from invasion but from a significant shift to drier conditions combined with a greatly weakened economy and disruption of trade systems. After 2000 B.C. reurbanization of Palestine gradually occurred once more, but the central and southern hill country of Palestine continued to be rather thinly settled even after the rapid growth of urbanization elsewhere. Thus the patriarchal period in Palestine fits admirably into what is now known of the historical context. No great cities or city-states could have confronted the patriarch. And when reurbanization occurred, it was less pronounced in the central and southern hill country, where the patriarchs spent most of their time.

The places that appear in connection with the movements of the patriarchs are not the sites of later periods, such as Mizpah or Gibeah, but include Shechem, Bethel, Dothan, Gerar, and Jerusalem (Salem)—all known by means of exploration and excavation to have been inhabited in the patriarchal age. The five cities of the plain of the Jordan (Gen. 13–14) that appear prominently in the story of Abraham and Lot, namely, Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboiim, and Zoar also belong to this early period (c. 2065 B.C.), being located at the southern end of the Dead Sea. This area “full of tar pits” (Gen. 14:10) was overwhelmed by a catastrophe of fire, which with the salt and sulphur of the region, doubtless accompanied by earthquakes common in this area of the Arabah, was the natural aspect of the supernatural destruction of the cities of the plain. These cities are now probably under the slowly rising waters at the southern end of the Dead Sea. The account of Lot’s wife turned into a pillar of salt is reminiscent of the great salt mass, five miles long, stretching N and S at the SW end of the Dead Sea.

Clash with the Mesopotamian Kings. The fourteenth chapter of Genesis is the pivotal passage in the patriarchal narratives from a historical point of view. Although archaeology has not yet furnished a link to tie it into the general context of ancient Near Eastern history, evidence is continually increasing of its historical character, which used to be almost universally denied by critics. A remarkable fact about this chapter, demonstrating its great age and authenticity, is its use of archaic words and place names, often appended with a scribal explanation to make them comprehensible to a later generation when the name had changed. Examples are “Bela (that is, Zoar)” in v. 2; “the vale of Siddim (that is, the Salt Sea)” in v. 3; “En-mishpat (that is, Kadesh)” in v. 7; “the valley of Shaveh (that is, the King’s Valley)” in v. 17. Interesting examples of the confirmation of place names occur in the reference to Ashteroth-karnaim and Ham (Gen. 14:5). These two cities, mentioned in the invasion of Chedorlaomer and the kings with him, have both been shown to have been occupied at this early period, as archaeological examination of their sites has demonstrated. Ham was first surmised to be identical with a modern place by the same name in eastern Gilead, and examination of the site by A. Jirku and W. F. Albright (1925 and 1929) disclosed a small but ancient mound going back to the Bronze Age. Thutmose III lists the place among his conquests in the early fifteenth century B.C. Archaeology has likewise confirmed the general line of march followed by the invading kings, later known as “The King’s Highway.”

Added Archaeological Light. The site of Nuzi near modern Kirkuk (excavated between 1925 and 1941) dates from the fifteenth century B.C. and has yielded several thousand tablets illustrating vividly adoption (cf. Gen. 15:2), marriage laws (cf. Gen. 16:1–16), rights of primogeniture (Gen. 25:27–34), the teraphim (Gen. 31:34), and other customs and practices appearing in the life of Abraham and the Hebrew patriarchs. Also the discoveries at Mari (which see), a site near modern Abou Kemal on the Middle Euphrates, since 1933 have shed a great deal of indirect light on the age of Abraham. Moreover, the name Abraham (not of course the biblical character) has been found in Mesopotamia in the second millennium B.C., showing that it was actually a name in use at an early date. Certain radical literary critics such as J. L. Thompson (The Historicity of the Patriarchal Narratives [1974]) and J. Van Seters (Abraham in History and Tradition [1975]) have dismissed the validity of Early and Middle Bronze Age archaeology for the dating of Abraham. Van Seters actually proposed locating the patriarch about 600 B.C., but Near Eastern history simply does not support such a late date. Additional archaeological evidence to that inadequately “disproved” or suppressed by Thompson and Van Seters supports a much earlier date than they propose through the use of literary critical methods. See Sacrifice, Human. ABRAHAM'S BOSOM. The phrase “to be in one’s bosom” applies to the person who so reclines at the table that his head is brought almost into the bosom of the one sitting next above him. To be in Abraham’s bosom signified to occupy the seat next to Abraham, i.e., to enjoy felicity with Abraham. Jesus, accommodating His speech to the Jews, describes the condition of Lazarus after death by this figure (Luke 16:22–23). “Abraham’s bosom” is also an expression of the Talmud for the state of bliss after death. Father Abraham was, to the Israelites, in the corrupt times of their later superstitions, almost what the virgin Mary is to the Roman church. He was constantly invoked as though he could hear the prayers of his descendants, wherever they were; and he was pictured standing at the gate of paradise to receive and embrace his children as they entered, and the whole family of his faithful descendants was gathered to his arms.

A'BRAM (ā'bram; “high father”). The original name (Gen. 17:5) of Abraham.

ABRO'NAH (ab-rō'na; “passage”). The thirtieth station of the Israelites on their way from Egypt to Canaan (Num. 33:34–35). Since it lay near Ezion-geber on the W as they left Jotbathah, it was probably in the plain “Kâ'a en-Năkb,” immediately opposite the pass of the same name at the head of the Elamitic branch of the Red Sea. In the KJV this term is rendered Ebronah.

AB'SALOM (ab'sa-lom; “father of peace”). The third son of David, and his only one by Maacah, the daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur (2 Sam. 3:3), born about 1000 B.C. He was known for his personal beauty—“In all Israel was no one as handsome as Absalom” (2 Sam. 14:25). Though his hair was doubtless very heavy, and thus was considered beautiful, the weight given, two hundred shekels, is too much and is evidently a scribal error (K. & D., Com.; 2 Sam. 14:26).

Avenges Tamar. Absalom’s sister, Tamar, became the object of the lustful desire of Amnon, her half brother, David’s eldest son, and was violated by him (2 Sam. 13:1–18). According to Eastern notions the duty of avenging his sister’s wrong fell upon Absalom. He therefore took Tamar and kept her secluded in his own house, saying nothing to Amnon “either good or bad.” After two years had passed he found an opportunity for revenge. He then invited all his brothers, including Amnon, to a great sheep-shearing at Baal-hazor, and, to lull suspicion, requested the presence of his father also. Amid the mirth of the feast, while they were warm with wine, the servants of Absalom, at a preconcerted signal, fell upon Amnon and killed him (13:23–29). Absalom fled to his grandfather Talmai and remained there three years (vv. 37–38).

Return to Jerusalem. David, yearning for his exiled son Absalom (v. 39), yielded easily to the scheme of Joab and permitted Absalom to return to Jerusalem, but not to appear before him. Absalom lived for two whole years in Jerusalem, and then sent for Joab, who refused to see him until Absalom ordered his servants to burn Joab's barley field. Then Joab secured an interview for him with the king (2 Sam. 14).

Preparations for Revolt. But Absalom proved himself false and faithless. He secretly plotted a revolt, winning over the people by his handsomeness and charisma and by the magnificence of his trappings, riding in a chariot with fifty outriders. He also fostered the discontent of the people by insinuations against his father's justice. Other causes, doubtless, were favorable for Absalom: the affair of Bathsheba, the probable disaffection of Judah for being merged in one common Israel, and less attention on the part of David, because of his age, to individual complaints (2 Sam. 15:1–6).

Revolt. When the plot was ripe, Absalom obtained leave to go to Hebron, to pay a vow that he had made at Geshur in case he should be permitted to return to Jerusalem. (The reference in 2 Sam. 15:7 to "forty years" is a scribal error, for David reigned but forty years in all [1 Kings 2:11], and he certainly had reigned many years before Absalom's rebellion. The Syr. and Arab. versions read "four years," and with this Josephus and NIV agree.) Absalom had sent spies throughout all the tribes of Israel, summoning those favorable to his cause to assemble at Hebron, where he went attended by two hundred unsuspecting adherents (2 Sam. 15:7–11). His next step was to send for Ahithophel, David's counselor, and secure his approval and advice (15:12), Ahithophel being an oracle in Israel (16:23).

Entry into Jerusalem. When David heard the sad tidings of revolt he at once prepared for flight and, leaving Jerusalem, went to Mahanaim, beyond the Jordan (2 Sam. 15:13–17). Absalom now entered Jerusalem (15:37) and, through the advice of Ahithophel, publicly took possession of the portion of his father's harem left in the city. The motive in this latter act was to gain the more unreserved support of the people, from the assurance that any reconciliation between Absalom and his father would thereafter be impossible (16:20–22). Absalom had already met Hushai, who had been sent to join him by David, that he might be instrumental in thwarting the counsels of Ahithophel (15:33–37; 16:16–19). A council of war was held to consider the course to be pursued against David. Ahithophel advised the immediate pursuit and death of the king—that one death would close the war. Hushai, to gain time for David, urged the king's skill and bravery, the number and might of his warriors, and the possibility and disastrous consequences of defeat, and he advised a general gathering against David and the total annihilation of him and his followers. The advice was accepted by Absalom. Information was secretly sent to David, who then went beyond Jordan and there collected a force sufficient to oppose Absalom (17:1–14, 21–24).

Anointed King. Absalom was formally anointed king (2 Sam. 19:10), appointed Amasa captain of his host, and crossed over Jordan in pursuit of his father (17:25–26). A battle was fought in the wood of Ephraim. The army of Absalom was defeated, twenty thousand were slain, and a still greater number perished in the defiles of the forest.

Death. Absalom fled on a swift mule, and as he was riding through the forest, his "head" became wedged between two branches. When he raised his hands to try to dislodge himself, he let go of the bridle and the unrestrained mule kept going. More than likely Absalom was riding without a saddle, and he simply slipped off the animal's back and hung suspended in midair. The text does not say he was caught by his hair; the historian Josephus stated that. He probably had a helmet over his hair on this occasion; so his hair would not have caught in the branches. Joab, being informed of what had happened to Absalom, hastened to the spot and killed him, notwithstanding David's request that he should be spared. The body was taken down and cast into a pit, over which the people raised a great heap of stones as a mark of abhorrence, a burial that the historian contrasts with the splendid monument prepared by Absalom for himself in the "King's Valley" (2 Sam. 18:1-18), about 967 B.C. The so-called tomb of Absalom that stands today in the Valley of the Kidron can have no connection with the monument Absalom erected for himself; it probably dates to the first century A.D. Absalom had three sons and one daughter, the latter named Tamar (14:27), who alone survived him (18:18) and became the mother of Maacah, the wife of Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:20-21). H.F.V.

ABSTINENCE. A general term signifying to refrain from something or some action. In the ecclesiastical sense it means the refraining from certain kinds of food or drink on certain days.

Jewish. The first mention of abstinence in Scripture is found in Gen. 9:4, where the use of blood was forbidden to Noah. The next is in Gen. 32:32: "Therefore, to this day the sons of Israel do not eat the sinew of the hip which is on the socket of the thigh, because he touched the socket of Jacob's thigh in the sinew of the hip." The law confirmed abstinence from blood (Lev. 3:17) and the use even of lawful animals if the manner of their death rendered it likely that they were not properly bled (Ex. 22:31; Deut. 14:21). Whole classes of animals that might not be eaten are given in Lev. 11. See Animal: clean and unclean. Certain parts of lawful animals, as being sacred to the altar, were forbidden, namely, the caul (or fat covering the liver), the kidneys and the fat upon them, the fat covering the entrails, and also the "entire fat tail" (Lev. 3:9-11). Everything consecrated to idols was also interdicted (Ex. 34:15). While engaged in their official duties, the priests were commanded to abstain from wine and strong drink (Lev. 10:9), and the Nazirites had to abstain from strong drink and the use of grapes during the whole time of their separation (Num. 6:3). The Rechabites (which see) voluntarily assumed a constant abstinence from wine (Jer. 35:6). The Essenes (which see), a Jewish sect, were stringent in their abstinence, refusing all pleasant food, eating nothing but coarse bread and drinking only water, while some abstained from all food until evening.

Christian. Some among the early Christian converts thought themselves bound by Mosaic regulations respecting food, and abstained from flesh sacrificed to idols and from animals accounted unclean by the law. Others considered this a weakness, and boasted of the freedom with which Christ had set them free. Paul discusses this matter in Rom. 14:1-3 and 1 Cor. 8 and teaches that everyone is at liberty to act according to his own conscience, but that the stronger should refrain from that which might prove a stumbling block to his weaker brother. In 1 Tim. 4:3-4 he reproves certain persons who forbid marriage and enjoin abstinence from meats. The council of the apostles at Jerusalem limited enforced abstinence upon the converts to that of meats offered to idols, blood, and "things strangled" (Acts 15:29).

In the early church catechumens were required, according to Cyril and Jerome, to observe a season of abstinence and prayer for forty days; according to others, twenty days. Superstitious abstinence on the part of the clergy was considered a crime, and if that abstinence arose from the notion that any creature of God was not good they were liable to be deposed from office. Strict observance of the church fasts was enjoined.

ABYSS' (à-bîs'; Gk. hēabussos). In the NT the abyss is the abode of the imprisoned demons (Rev. 9:1–21). At least many of the demons whom Jesus expelled in His earthly ministry were commanded to return to the abyss (cf. Luke 8:31), but these evil spirits dreaded to go there before their predetermined time. Myriads of demons will be let loose during the period of Tribulation to energize age-end apostasy and revolt against God and His Christ, but will be shut up again in this prison together with Satan at the second advent of Christ (20:1–3). The abyss is therefore to be distinguished from sheol (hell) or hades (which see). This “unseen world” is revealed as the place of departed human spirits between death and the resurrection (Matt. 11:23; 16:18; Luke 10:15; Rev. 1:18; 20:13–14). It is also to be distinguished from “tartarus,” the “prison abode of fallen angels” (cf. 2 Pet. 2:4) and “the lake of fire” (Rev. 19:20; 20:10; 21:8), or the eternal abode of all wicked, unrepentant creatures, including Satan, angels, and men. The LXX renders Heb. tfhôm, “the primeval ocean” (Gen. 1:2; Ps. 24:2, etc.) as “abyss.” In classical Gk. the word abussos is always an adjective meaning “very deep” (“bottomless”) or “unfathomable” (“boundless”). See Hell; Lake of Fire.

ACACIA, ACCACIA. See Vegetable Kingdom: Acacia.

AC'BOR. See Achbor.

AC'CAD or Akkad (ăk'ăd). An ancient center of Hamitic imperial power founded by Nimrod (Gen. 10:10). The city is evidently Agade, which Sargon I brought into great prominence as the capital of his far-flung Semitic empire, which dominated the Mesopotamian world from about 2360 to 2180 B.C. The location of Accad cannot presently be identified, but it must be in the vicinity of Babylon, perhaps N of it. The country was named after its capital and embraces the stoneless alluvial plain of southern Babylonia N of Sumer (which see). The term “the land of Shinar,” in which the world’s first imperial power developed embracing “Babel [Babylon, NIV] and Erech [Uruk] and Accad and Calneh” (Gen. 10:10), is descriptive of the entire alluvial plain of Babylonia between the Tigris and the Euphrates, in approximately the last two hundred miles of the course of those great rivers as they flowed in ancient times. In the cuneiform inscriptions the region is divided into a northern part called Accad (Akkad), in which Babel (Babylon) and the city of Accad (Agade) were situated; and a southern part called Sumer, in which Erech (ancient Uruk, modern Warka) was located. At Uruk the first sacred temple tower (Babylonian, ziggurat) was found, as well as evidence of the first cylinder seals (Finegan, Light from the Ancient Past, pp. 19–23). The inhabitants of this region were originally non-Semitic Sumerians, who racially must have been of Hamitic origin, according to Gen. 10:8–10, and who were the inventors of cuneiform writing and the cultural precursors of their later conquerors, the Babylonian Semites. The city of Accad (Agade) disappeared in ancient times and by Assyrian times was utterly unknown. M.F.U.; H.F.V.

ACCEPT, ACCEPTABLE, ACCEPTED (Heb. rāšâ, “to take pleasure in”; Gk. dechomai, “to take with the hand,” i.e., “to receive with hospitality”). To accept is to receive with pleasure and kindness (Gen. 32:20) and is the opposite of to reject, which is a direct refusal with disapprobation (Jer. 6:30; 7:29). An accepted or acceptable time (Ps. 69:13; 2 Cor. 6:2) is the time of favor, a favorable opportunity. Luke 4:24 means that no prophet is welcomed or appreciated favorably in his own country.

Acceptance also means that relation to God in which He is well-pleased with His children, for by children of God only it is enjoyed. In Acts 10:35 we learn that “in every nation the man who fears Him and does what is right, is welcome to Him.”

The Christian scheme bases acceptance by God on justification. Paul in Eph. 1:6 refers to the grace of God, “which He freely bestowed on us in the Beloved.” In Christ only are we acceptable to God. Out of Him we are sinners and subjects of wrath.

The Calvinist teaches that the sins that are pardoned in justification include all sins, past, present, and future, and that God will not deal with the believer according to his transgressions; whereas the Arminian holds that the state of acceptance can be maintained only by perpetually believing in and appropriating to himself the atoning merits of Jesus, and obediently keeping God’s holy commandments.

ACCESS TO GOD (Gk. prosaḡōgē, “act of moving to”). That friendly relation with God whereby we are acceptable to Him and have assurance that He is favorably disposed toward us (Rom. 5:2; Eph. 2:18; 3:12). In substance it is not different from the “peace of God,” i.e., the peaceful relation of believers toward God, brought about through Christ’s death. By the continuous power and efficiency of His atoning act, Jesus is the constant Bringer to the Father. Access means the obtaining of a hearing with God, and if a hearing, the securing in some form an answer to our requests. The apostle John (1 John 5:14–15) says: “This is the confidence which we have before Him, that, if we ask anything according to His will, He hears us. And if we know that He hears us in whatever we ask, we know that we have the requests which we have asked from Him.” Here we learn that access to God involves asking according to His will. A child has right of access to his father. Such right and privilege are granted to, and should be enjoyed by, every child of God. We must not infer that our access is cut off if we do not realize direct answers to some of our requests, but we must believe that God always hears His children and does the best things for them.

AC’CO (ác’kō). A town on the Mediterranean coast, thirty miles S of Tyre, and ten from Mt. Carmel (Judg. 1:31). It was known to the ancient Greeks and Romans as Ptolemais, from Ptolemy the king of Egypt, who rebuilt it in 100 B.C. During the Middle Ages it was called Acra, and subsequently called St. Jean d’Acre. Paul visited this place (Acts 21:7). The original site is a mound called Tell-el-Fukhar, located one mile E of the present city.

Archaeological activity at Acre has concentrated on Crusader structures under the present city. In 1955 the Israel Department of Antiquities cleared the refectory of the Knights of St. John, and in 1956 and from 1959 to 1962 the Department of Antiquities and the National Parks Authority cleared a hospital and chapel of the order.

Other finds in the town include sections of the wall of the Hellenistic city (10–15 feet thick), and a glass furnace and temple dating to the same period. In 1976 Moshe Dothan worked at the harbor area where he uncovered a large tower and defensive wall of the Hellenistic town of Ptolemais. See Ptolemais. H.F.V.

ACCOUNTABILITY. Not a Bible word but an abstract term for that return for his talents and opportunities that every soul must make to God day by day, and especially at the judgment, as we are taught in Matt. 12:36, Rom. 4:10, Heb. 13:17, and 1 Pet. 4:5. It is a well-established doctrine of Holy Scripture, attested to by human consciousness, that we are free moral agents, entirely dependent upon our Creator for our existence and maintenance, and rightly answerable to Him for our conduct; and that God consequently has a right to our perfect obedience and service. It is accordingly easy for us to feel that He is justified in calling us to a strict reckoning for all He has entrusted us with. Disabled by our fall into sin, gracious strength has been provided for us in the atonement, so that we are without excuse if we fail to do God's will.

ACCURSED. See Anathema; Oath.

ACCUSER (Heb. shāpaṭ “judge”; śātān “adversary”; in the NT, Gk. katēgoros, “prosecutor”).

1. One who has a cause or matter of contention; the accuser, opponent, or plaintiff in any suit (Judg. 12:2; Matt. 5:25; Luke 12:58).

2. In Scripture, in a general sense, an adversary or enemy (Luke 18:3; 1 Pet. 5:8). In the latter passage reference is made to the old Jewish teaching that Satan was the accuser of men before God (Job 1:6–11; Rev. 12:10). See Adversary.

ACEL DAMA (a-sel'dā-mā; ASV and NIV, Akeldama). Called at present “Hak ed-damm,” it signifies “Field of Blood” (Matt. 27:8; Acts 1:18–19), now at the E end and on the southern slope of the valley of Hinnom. The tradition that fixes this spot reaches back to the age of Jerome. Once the tradition was that the soil of this spot, a deep pit or cellar, was believed to have the power of consuming dead bodies in the space of twenty-four hours, so that whole shiploads of it are said to have been carried away in A.D. 1218, in order to cover the famous Campo Santo in Pisa.

ACHAI'A (a-kā'ya). The name once applied to the NW portion of the Peloponnesus and afterward applied to the entire Peloponnesus, called now the Morea. It was one of the two provinces, of which Macedonia was the other, into which the Romans divided Greece (27 B.C.). It was under a proconsular government at the time when Luke wrote the Acts, so that the title given to Gallio, “proconsul,” was proper (Acts 18:12), A.D. 51 or 52.

ACHA'ICUS (a-kā'i-kus; “an Achaean”). A Christian of Corinth who had rendered Paul personal aid, and by him was kindly commended to the Corinthian church (1 Cor. 16:17), A.D. 54.

A'CHAN (ā'kan; “troublesome”). A son of Carmi, of the tribe of Judah; called also Achar (1 Chron. 2:7).

Achan's Sin. By one incident of his life Achan attained a disgraceful notoriety. Before Jericho was taken, the city was put under that awful ban whereby all the inhabitants (excepting Rahab and her family) were consigned to destruction, all the combustible goods to be burned, and the metals consecrated to God (Deut. 7:16, 23–26; Josh. 6:17–19). After Jericho fell (1400 B.C.) the whole nation kept the vow, with the exception of Achan. His covetousness made him unfaithful, and, the opportunity presenting, he took a “beautiful mantle from Shinar [or Babylonia, NIV] and two hundred shekels of silver and a bar of gold fifty shekels' in weight” (7:21).

Result of Achan's Sin. Ai had been visited by spies, who declared that it could easily be taken. An expedition of three thousand men sent against the city was repulsed, and they returned to Joshua, who inquired of the Lord concerning the cause of the disaster. The answer was that “Israel has sinned,... they have even taken some of the things under the ban and have both stolen and deceived” (Josh. 7:11). This was the reason for Israel's defeat, and Joshua was commanded to sanctify the people and on the morrow to cast lots for the offender. Achan was chosen and, being exhorted by Joshua, made a confession of his guilt, which was verified by the finding of the spoil in his tent.

Objection has been urged against the use of the lot to discover the guilty party. We answer that the decision by lot, when ordered by God, involved no chance but was under His special direction, as is evident from the expressions “which the Lord takes” (Josh. 7:14), and “the lot is cast into the lap, but its every decision is from the Lord” (Prov. 16:33).

Achan’s Punishment. Achan was conveyed with his family, property, and spoils to the valley (afterward called Achor, “trouble,” or “disaster” as in NIV), where they “stoned them with stones; and they burned them with fire” (Josh. 7:25).

The severity of the punishment of Achan, as regards his family, has excited considerable comment. Some vindicate it by saying that Achan by his sin had fallen under the ban pronounced against Jericho and was exposed to the same punishment as a town that had fallen away into idolatry (Deut. 13:16–17); others believe that the family of Achan were aware of his crime and therefore were deserving of a share in his punishment (K. & D., Com.); others, again, consider it as the result of one of those sudden impulses of indiscriminate popular vengeance to which the Jewish people were exceedingly prone (Kitto). The real explanation is evidently to be found in the fact that the iniquity of the inhabitants of Canaan was now “complete” (cf. Gen. 15:16), and God’s righteous wrath was poured out upon them.

A’CHAR (ā’kār; “trouble”). Another form of the name Achan (which see), and given to that person in 1 Chron. 2:7.

ACH’BOR (ak’bor; “mouse”), or Acbor (NIV).

1. The father of Baal-hanan, the seventh Edomite king, mentioned in Gen. 36:38–39.

2. The son of Micaiah and one of the courtiers whom Josiah sent to Huldah to inquire about the course to be pursued respecting the newly discovered book of the law (2 Kings 22:12, 14), 624 B.C. In the parallel passage (2 Chron. 34:20) he is called Abdon the son of Micah. He is doubtless the same person whose son, Elnathan, was courtier of Jehoiakim (Jer. 26:22; 36:12).

A’CHIM (ā’kim; perhaps the same word as Jachin, “whom God makes firm”), or Akim (NIV). The son of Zadok and father of Eliud, among the paternal ancestors of Christ (Matt. 1:14), after 410 B.C.

A’CHISH (ā’kish). Probably a general title of royalty, like Abimelech (which see), another Philistine kingly name, with which, indeed, it is interchanged in the title of Ps. 34.

1. A Philistine king of Gath with whom David sought refuge from Saul (1 Sam. 21:10–15). The servants of Achish soon recognized David as the successful champion of Israel against Goliath, and he escaped only by pretending madness, “well knowing that the insane were held inviolable, as smitten but protected by the Deity” (De Rothschild, Hist. of Israel). This is undoubtedly the same King Achish to whom David again returned. Achish received him kindly, probably considering their common enmity against Saul as a strong bond of union. After living for a while at Gath, David received from Achish the town of Ziklag for a possession (27:2–6). He made numerous forays against the neighboring nomads, which activity he persuaded Achish was as much in his interest as his own (27:8–12). Achish still had great confidence in David, and he proposed making him chief of his bodyguard (28:1–2). He took David and his men with him when he went up to the battle that sealed the fate of Saul but was led to dismiss them by the jealousy and opposition of the Philistine leaders. Thus David was spared from participating in the battle (29:2–11), about 999 B.C.

2. Another king of Gath, the son of Maacah, to whom two servants of Shimei fled. Shimei went to reclaim them, and thus, by leaving Jerusalem, broke his parole and met his death (1 Kings 2:39–40), 957 B.C.

ACH'METHA (ak'mē-tha; “a station, fortress”). The capital of Media. The classical name is Ecbatana, modern Hamadân, high in the Zagros Mountains, about 180 miles WSW of Tehran. Cyrus II, the Great, founder of the Persian Empire (died 530 B.C.) held his court here during the summer. It is stated (Ezra 6:2) that here was found in the palace a scroll upon which was the decree of Cyrus for the rebuilding of the Temple at Jerusalem. A considerable amount of Persian treasure has been unearthed at Achmetha, often by illegal diggers. Much of it has found its way to the Archaeological Museum in Tehran. The Iranian Archaeological Service has begun clearing old buildings on the mounds at the city's northern outskirts, but so far scientific excavations are only in their infancy. Excavations at the NE corner of Hamadan have uncovered remains of walls and foundations of the palaces of Median and Persian kings. H.F.V.

A'CHOR (ā'kôr; “trouble”). A place SW of Jericho; now identified with the el-Buqei'ah plain near Qumran. Its name resulted from the sin and consequent punishment of Achan (Josh. 7:24–26). The term “valley of Achor” was proverbial, and the expression of the prophet (Hos. 2:15), “the valley of Achor, a door of hope,” is suggestive of the good results of discipline.

ACH'SA (ak'sā), or Acsah (NIV). A less correct mode (1 Chron. 2:49) of anglicizing the name Achsah (which see).

ACH'SAH (ak'sāh; “anklet”), or Acsah (NIV). The name of Caleb's daughter (1 Chron. 2:49). Caleb offered her in marriage to the man who should capture the city of Debir, c. 1362 B.C. His own nephew, Othniel, won the prize. On her way to her future home Achsah asked of her father an addition to her dower of lands. She received the valley full of springs situated near Debir. Her request was probably secured the more readily as it was considered ungracious to refuse a daughter under such circumstances (Josh. 15:16–17; Judg. 1:12–13).

ACH'SHAPH (ak'shaf; “sorcery”), or Acshaph (NIV). Identified with Tell Kīsân. It belonged to Asher (Josh. 19:25).

ACH'ZIB (ak'zib; “falsehood, deceit”), or Aczib (NIV). A town of Asher (Josh. 19:29; Judg. 1:31), identical with ez-Zib, about ten miles N of Accho. The town of the same name in Judah (Josh. 15:44; Mic. 1:14) is probably the same as Chezib (Gen. 38:5).

ACRE (Heb. šemed, “a yoke”). Given as the translation of the Heb. word that is used as a measure of land, i.e., so much as a yoke of oxen can plow in a day (1 Sam. 14:14; Isa. 5:10).

ACROP’OLIS (a-crop’o-lis). A fortified hill overlooking many Greco-Roman cities. When the apostle Paul visited Athens, the most famous center of art and culture in Greece, the acropolis was adorned with splendid temples. The renowned sculptor Phidias, who died about 432 B.C., made a colossal statue of Athena Promachos, the goddess who fights in front, which was erected on the acropolis. Then the magnificent Parthenon was built, housing a great gold and ivory statue of Athena by Phidias. Later, the stately entrance, the Propylaea, was completed, as were the beautiful temples, the Erechtheum and the shrine of Athena Nike, the goddess of victory. Paul in his second missionary journey visited other cities with a fortified acropolis, such as Philippi and Corinth. But at Athens “his spirit was being provoked within him as he was beholding the city full of idols” (Acts 17:16). M.F.U.

ACROSTIC. An ode in which the first, the first and last, or certain other letters of the lines taken in order, spell a name or sentence. They are not found in this form in the Bible.

In the poetical parts of the OT are what may be called alphabetical acrostics: e.g., Ps. 119 has as many stanzas or strophes as there are letters in the Hebrew alphabet. Each strophe has eight lines, each beginning with the same letter, the first eight lines beginning with Aleph, the next with Beth, and so on. In Bibles the divisions of Ps. 119 are sometimes indicated by the placement of the Heb. character and its name immediately above the successive sections of the psalm. Thus “א Aleph” appears before vv. 1–8, “ב Beth” before vv. 9–16, and “ג Gimmel” before vv. 17–24, the process continuing through the last letter, ט (Tav), which marks the close of the psalm, vv. 169–76. Psalms 25 and 34 have one verse to each letter in its order. In others, as Pss. 111 and 112, each verse is divided into two parts following the alphabet. The Lamentations of Jeremiah are mostly acrostic, and the last chapter of Proverbs has the initial letters of its last twenty-two verses in alphabetical order.

In ecclesiastical history the term acrostic is used to describe a mode of performing the psalmody of the ancient church. A precentor began a verse and the people joined him at the close. It was then much used for hymns, as follows:

J esus, who for me hast borne
E very sorrow, pain, and scorn,
S tanding at man’s judgment seat,
U njust judgment there to meet:
S ave me by thy mercy sweet, etc.

The acrostic was also commonly used for epitaphs. But the most famous of all ancient acrostics is the one used by ancient Christians as a secret symbol of faith. This is the Gk. word ichthus, “fish,” formed from the initial letters of five titles of our Lord, “Jesus Christ, God’s Son, Savior.”

ACTS, BOOK OF. The fifth book of the NT.

The Name. Commonly called “The Acts of the Apostles,” a more accurate title would be “The Acts of the Holy Spirit,” since He fills the scene. As the presence of the Son, exalting and manifesting the Father, is the central theme of the four gospels, the presence of the Holy Spirit, who came at Pentecost (Acts 2), magnifying and revealing the risen and ascended Son, is the underlying truth of the Acts.

The Date . The book was probably written about A.D. 63 or a little later, since it concludes with the account of Paul’s earliest ministry in Rome.

The Author . Luke, the “beloved physician,” who also wrote the gospel of Luke (Acts 1:1), was the author. Both the gospel and the Acts are addressed to “most excellent Theophilus,” who was evidently a distinguished Gentile. The numerous “we” sections (16:10–17; 20:5–21:18; 27:1–28:16) indicate where Luke joined Paul as a fellow traveler.

The Theme . Acts is the continuation of the account of Christianity begun in the gospel of Luke. In the “first account” Luke relates what Jesus “began to do and teach” and catalogs in the Acts what Jesus continued to do and teach through the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven. The book, accordingly, records the ascension and promised return of the risen Lord (Acts 1); the advent of the Spirit and the first historical occurrence of the baptism of the Spirit (Acts 2; cf. 1:5 with 11:16); with the consequent formation of the church as the mystical Body of Christ (1 Cor. 12:13). It also recounts Peter’s use of the keys of the kingdom of the heavens in opening gospel opportunity for this age to Jew (Acts 2), Samaritan (Acts 8), and Gentile (Acts 10). It describes Paul’s conversion and the extension of Christianity through him to the “remotest part of the earth.”

The Content . The book is arranged about the threefold outline given in 1:8:

- I. The apostles as witnesses “in Jerusalem” (1:1–8:3)
- II. “In all Judea and Samaria” (8:4–12:24)
- III. Paul as a witness “even to the remotest part of the earth” (12:25–28:31)

Acts and Archaeology. Researches have greatly strengthened the historical credibility of the Acts. Early in this century William M. Ramsay pioneered in NT archaeology, especially as it bore on the accuracy of Luke’s narratives. Among the more useful of his voluminous works is The Bearing of Recent Discovery on the Trustworthiness of the New Testament. Subsequently, A. T. Robertson made an important contribution with his Luke the Historian in the Light of Historical Research. In 1981 Jack Finegan published the second volume of his The Archeology of the New Testament, which bears particularly on the narrative of Acts. A multitude of excavations and explorations has now been conducted at places mentioned in the book of Acts. Reference to some of this activity is included in the articles on those places appearing in this dictionary.

Besides being accurate in detail, Luke gives a remarkably vivid account of many phases of first-century life in the Mediterranean world, for example, the philosophical inquisitiveness of the Athenians (Acts 17:17–18) and the commercial monopoly of the silversmiths at the temple of Artemis in Ephesus (19:24–34). His picture of modes of travel of the day is far clearer than that set forth in the Odyssey. Whether on land by foot or horse (23:24, 32) or chariot (8:27–38), or on sea by coastal freighter (21:1–3; 27:1–5), Luke’s account is filled with local color. The story of the wreck of Paul’s ship is the most exciting and dramatic narrative of sea adventure in ancient literature (Acts 27–28). M.F.U.; H.F.V.

ACZIB. See Achzib.

ADADAH' (a-da-dah'). A city in the southern part of Judah (Josh. 15:22).

A'DAH (ā'dā; "adornment").

1. One of the two wives of Lamech and the mother of Jabal and Jubal (Gen. 4:19–23).

2. Daughter of Elon the Hittite, the first of the three wives of Esau, and the mother of Eliphaz (Gen. 36:2, 4, 10, 12, 16). She is elsewhere (26:34) called Basemath.

ADA'IAH (ād-ā'yā; "whom Jehovah adorns").

1. A native of Boscath (Bozkath, in the valley of Judah, Josh. 15:39), and father of Jedidah, the mother of Josiah, king of Judah (2 Kings 22:1), the latter born 632 B.C.

2. The son of Ethni and the father of Zerach, of the Levitical family of Gershom, in the ancestry of Asaph, the celebrated musician (1 Chron. 6:41). Probably the same as Iddo (v. 21).

3. A son of Shimei and one of the chief Benjamites living in Jerusalem before the captivity (1 Chron. 8:21), before 586 B.C.

4. A priest, son of Jeroham, who, after the return from Babylon, was employed in the work of the sanctuary (1 Chron. 9:12; Neh. 11:12).

5. The father of Maaseiah, one of the "captains of hundreds" during the protectorate of Jehoiada (2 Chron. 23:1).

6. A "son of Bani" and an Israelite who divorced his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:29).

7. Another of the sons of Bani (probably not the same Bani as in no. 6) who put away his Gentile wife (Ezra 10:39).

8. The son of Joiarib and the father of Hazaiah, of the tribe of Judah (Neh. 11:5), some of whose posterity dwelt in Jerusalem after the captivity, 445 B.C.

ADALIA (a-da'li-a). The fifth son of Haman (which see), a Persian ruler under Ahasuerus (Esther 9:8). E.H.M.

AD'AM (Heb. ādām, "red"; hence ādāmâ, "the ground"). The first man and "son of God" (Luke 3:38) by special creation. The name that God gave him (Gen. 5:2) is founded upon the earthly side of his being: Adam from ādāmâ, earth, the earthly element, to guard him from self-exaltation; not from the red color of his body, since this is not a distinctive characteristic of man, but common to him and to many other creatures.

Creation. In the first nine chapters of Genesis there appear to be three distinct histories relating more or less to the life of Adam. The first (1:1–2:3) records the creation; the second (2:4–4:26) gives an account of paradise, the original sin of man, and the immediate posterity of Adam; the third (5:1–9:29) contains mainly the history of Noah, referring to Adam and his descendants principally in relation to that patriarch. “The Lord God formed man of dust from the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living being” (2:7).

In Eden. God gave him dominion over all the lower creatures (Gen. 1:26), and placed him in Eden that he might cultivate it and enjoy its fruits (2:15–16). The beasts of the field and the birds of the air were brought to Adam, who examined them and gave them names. This examination gave him an opportunity to develop his intellectual capacity and also led to this result, that there was not found a helper suitable for man.

Creation of Eve. “So the Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon the man, and he slept; then He took one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh at that place. And the Lord God fashioned into a woman the rib which He had taken from the man” (2:21). The design of God in the creation of the woman was perceived by Adam when she was brought to him by God: “This is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh; she shall be called Woman, because she was taken out of Man” (Gen. 2:21–23). Thus Adam was given charge of the earth and its inhabitants and was endowed with everything requisite for the development of his nature and the fulfillment of his destiny. In the fruit of the trees he found sustenance; in the tree of life, preservation from death; in the tree of knowledge, a positive law for the training of his moral nature; in the care of the garden, exercise of his physical strength; in the animal and vegetable kingdoms, a capacious region for the development of his intellect; and in the woman, a suitable companion and helper. The first man was a true man, with the powers of a man and the innocence of a child.

Fall. But Eve, having been beguiled by the tempter to eat of the forbidden fruit, persuaded her husband to do the same. When called to judgment before God, Adam blamed his wife, who in turn blamed the tempter. God punished the tempter by degradation and dread, the woman by painful travail and submission (see Eve), and the man by a life of labor. With the loss of innocence came a feeling of shame, and they sought to hide their nakedness with leaves, but were afterward taught by God to make clothing from the skins of animals. Adam and Eve were expelled from the garden, at the eastern side of which cherubim and a sword of flame turning every way were placed. The object of these was to guard the way of the Tree of Life (which see), and prevent Adam’s return to it (Gen. 3).

Subsequent History. It is not known how long Adam lived in Eden, and therefore we cannot determine the length of his life after the expulsion. Shortly after leaving Eden, Eve gave birth to Cain (Gen. 4:1). Scripture gives the names of only three sons of Adam—Cain, Abel, and Seth—but contains an allusion (5:4) to “other sons and daughters.”

Figurative. Paul declares that Adam was a figure of Christ, “a type of Him who was to come” (Rom. 5:14); hence our Lord is sometimes called the second Adam. This typical relation stands sometimes in likeness, sometimes in contrast. In likeness, Adam was formed immediately by God, as was the human nature of Christ; in each the nature was holy; both were invested with dominion over the earth and its creatures (see Ps. 8). In contrast, Adam and Christ were each a federal head to the whole race of mankind, but the one was the fountain of sin and death, the other of righteousness and life (Rom. 5:14–19); Adam communicated a living soul to all his posterity, Christ is a “life-giving spirit” to restore life and immortality to them (1 Cor. 15:45).

Chronology. The opening chapters of the Bible leave both the date of the creation of the world and of man an open question. Genesis 1:1 places the origin of the universe in the dateless past. Man’s appearance upon the earth is set forth as the result of a direct creative act of God, which took place at least over 4,000 years B.C. and perhaps as early as 7,000 or 10,000 years B.C., “which is more in the spirit of the Biblical record than either Ussher’s compressed chronology or the evolutionist’s greatly expanded ages” (Laird Harris, “The Date of the Flood and the Age of Man,” Bible Today 37, no. 9 [Sept. 1943]: 570). Byron Nelson, a conservative, argues for a still greater antiquity for man (Before Abraham, Prehistoric Man in Biblical Light [1948], p. 95). In dealing with the genealogies of Gen. 5–11 it must be remembered that they are not exhaustive or complete and most certainly are abbreviated. B. B. Warfield demonstrated long ago that there are gaps in biblical genealogies (Ex. 6:16–24, Ezra 7:1–5, Matt. 1:1–17; see “The Antiquity and Unity of the Human Race,” Studies in Theology [1932], pp. 235–58).

Furthermore, Semitic idiom dealing with “beget,” “begotten,” “father” and “son,” and so on, differs strikingly from our usage, and thus “son” may be an actual son, a grandson, a great-grandson, or even, in the case of royalty, no blood relation at all. To employ the genealogical lists of Genesis to calculate the creation of man about 4004 B.C., as Archbishop Ussher has done, is not only unwarranted from the text of Scripture, but is incontrovertibly disproved by the well-attested facts of archaeology. ADAM. A town near the Jordan, and beside Zaretan (Josh. 3:16; Zarethan, NIV). It is identified with Tell ed-Damieh on the E bank of the river, near the mouth of the Jabbok and eighteen miles above Jericho. Here the waters miraculously rose in a heap while the Israelites crossed the Jordan River.

AD’AMAH (ad’ā-mā; “earth, ground”). A fenced city of Naphtali (Josh. 19:36). The modern Tell ed-Damiyeh.

ADAMANT. See Mineral Kingdom: Diamond.

AD’AMI (ad’ā-mī; “pertaining to [red] earth, earthy”). A place in Palestine near the border of Naphtali, now identified with Khirbet Damiyeh.

ADA’MI. See Adami-nekeb.

ADA’MI-NE’KEB (adā’mī-ne’keb; “a hollow, narrow passage”). A town on the border of Naphtali (Josh. 19:33), halfway between Tiberias and Mt. Tabor.

A’DAR (a’dār; from Akkad. adaru, addaru, probably “dark” or “cloudy”). A later name of the twelfth month of the Jewish year borrowed by the Jews from the Babylonian calendar during the Exile. It extended from the new moon of February to that of March (Ezra 6:15; Esther 3:7, 13; 9:15). See Time. For the city, see Hazaraddar.

ADBEEL (ad’bēl). The third son of Ishmael (which see) (Gen. 25:13; 1 Chron. 1:29). E.H.M.

AD'DAN (ad'dān). Another form (Ezra 2:59) of the name (Neh. 7:61) Addon (which see).

AD'DAR (ad'dār; “threshing floor,” or “wide, open place”). A son of Bela and grandson of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:3), elsewhere (Gen. 46:21) called Ard. For the city, see Hazaraddar.

AD'DER (ad'der). The rendering in the KJV of four Heb. words, each of which probably signifies some kind of venomous serpent. See Animal Kingdom: Serpent.

AD'DI (ad'dī; “ornament”). The son of Cosam and father of Melchi (Melki, NIV) in the maternal ancestry of Jesus (Luke 3:28).

AD'DON (ad'don). The name of the second of three persons (Neh. 7:61) who, when they returned from the captivity to Palestine, were unable to “show their fathers’ houses or their descendants, whether they were of Israel,” 536 B.C. In Ezra 2:59, this person is called Addan.

ADER. See Eder.

A'DIEL (a'dī-el; “ornament of God”).

1. One of the family heads of the tribe of Simeon, who seem to have dispossessed the aborigines of Gedor (1 Chron. 4:36).

2. A priest and the son of Jahzerah and father of Maasai, which last was active in reconstructing the Temple after the captivity (1 Chron. 9:12), 563 B.C.

3. The father of Azmaveth, the treasurer under David (1 Chron. 27:25).

A'DIN (a'din; “effeminate” [?]).

1. The head of one of the Israelite families, of which a large number returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem from Babylon, 536 B.C. The number is given in Ezra 2:15 as 454; in Neh. 7:20 as 655, the discrepancy being occasioned by an error in the hundreds and the including or excluding of himself. Fifty more of the family returned (with Ebed, the son of Jonathan) under Ezra (Ezra 8:6), 457 B.C.

2. One of those who sealed the covenant made by Nehemiah and the people after their return to Jerusalem (Neh. 10:16), about 445 B.C.

AD'INA (ad'ī-na; “slender, delicate” [?]). The son of Shiza, a Reubenite, and captain of thirty of his tribesmen, Adina was one of David’s mighty men (1 Chron. 11:42), before 1000 B.C.

AD'INO (ad'ī-nō; “slender as a spear” [?]). The name given in 2 Sam. 23:8 (but lacking in the NIV) as one of David’s mighty men. Much difference of opinion respecting it exists. Some think the passage has been corrupted. It is clear that these words “Adino the Eznite” are not proper names, although their grammatical construction is not easy. See also the parallel passage (1 Chron. 11:11).

ADITHA'IM (ad-i-thā'im). A place in Palestine, but location unknown (Josh. 15:36).

ADJURATION (Heb. ālā, in Hiphel, “to cause to swear,” in 1 Kings 8:31; 2 Chron. 6:22, “to make swear”; Gk. exorkidzō, “to exact an oath”).

1. An act or appeal whereby a person in authority imposes upon another the obligation of speaking or acting as if under the solemnity of an oath (1 Kings 22:16; 2 Chron. 18:15). In the NT we have an example of this where the high priest calls upon

Jesus to avow His character as the Messiah (Matt. 26:63; cf. Mark 5:7). Such an oath, although imposed upon one without his consent, was binding in the highest degree; and when it was connected with a question, it made an answer compulsory.

2. In Acts 19:13, the term occurs with reference to the expulsion of demons.

3. In the Roman Catholic church, the use of the name of God, or of some holy thing, to induce one to do what is required of him.

AD'LAI (ad'lā-i). The father of Shaphat, a chief herdsman under David (1 Chron. 27:29), after 1000 B.C.

AD'MAH (ad'māh; "red earth"). A city in the Siddim Valley (cf. Gen. 10:19; 14:1–3), destroyed with Sodom (19:24; Deut. 29:23). Supposed by some to be identical with Adam of Josh. 3:16.

AD'MATHA (ad'mā-thā; perhaps "earthly, dark-colored"). The third named of the princes or courtiers of Ahasuerus (or Xerxes, NIV; Esther 1:14).

ADMINISTRATION (Gk. diakonia, "service"). In the NT it signifies "to relieve," "to minister," as in 2 Cor. 8:19–20.

AD'NA (ad'nā; "pleasure").

1. An Israelite of the family of Pahath-moab, who divorced his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:30).

2. A chief priest, son of Harim, and contemporary with Joiakim (Neh. 12:15), about 536 B.C.

AD'NAH (ad'nāh; "pleasure").

1. One of the captains of the tribe of Manasseh who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:20), before 1000 B.C.

2. A warrior of the tribe of Judah and principal general under Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 17:14), about 872–852 B.C.

ADO'NI-BE'ZEK (a-dō'nī-be'zek; "lord of Bezek"). King or lord of Bezek, a city of the Canaanites. He had subdued seventy of the petty kings around him and, after having cut off their thumbs and great toes, compelled them to gather their food under his table. At the head of the Canaanites and Perizzites he opposed the men of Judah and Simeon and, being defeated, was served in the same manner as he had treated his own captives; about 1375 B.C. He died of his wounds at Jerusalem, where he was carried by his captors (Judg. 1:5–7).

ADONI'JAH (a-dō-nī'jāh; "my lord is Jehovah").

1. The fourth son of David and second by Haggith, born in Hebron while his father reigned over Judah only (2 Sam. 3:4); about 1003 B.C. According to oriental usages Adonijah might have considered his claim superior to that of his eldest brother, Amnon, who was born while his father was in a private station; but not to that of Absalom, who was not only his elder brother, and born while his father was a king, but was of royal descent on the side of his mother. When Amnon and Absalom were dead, Adonijah became heir apparent to the throne, but this order had been set aside in favor of Solomon, who was born while his father was king over all Israel.

Adonijah aspired to the throne, prepared a guard of chariots and horsemen and fifty foot runners, and gained over to his side Joab and Abiathar, the priest. He was also a man of handsome appearance and likely to win the people. Waiting until David seemed to be at the point of death, he called around him his brothers (excepting Solomon) and other influential men and was proclaimed king at Zoheleth by the spring of En-rogel at the S end of the Kidron Valley. The plot was defeated by the prompt action of the aged king, who, through the influence of Nathan and Bathsheba, caused Solomon to be proclaimed king and to be anointed by Zadok, the priest, at the Spring Gihon, a few hundred yards N of En-rogel.

Adonijah fled for refuge to the altar, which he refused to leave until pardoned by Solomon. He received pardon but was told that a future attempt of the same kind would be fatal (1 Kings 1:5–53).

Some time after David's death he covertly asserted his claim in asking for Abishag (which see) the virgin widow of his father in marriage. Adonijah was immediately put to death by the order of Solomon (1 Kings 2:23–25), about 960 B.C. The execution of Adonijah by Solomon must not be judged by the standards of the present day. According to the custom of Eastern princes a thousand years before Christ, Solomon would probably have slain all his brothers upon ascending the throne, whereas we learn of the death of Adonijah alone, and that only after his second treasonable attempt.

2. One of the Levites sent by King Jehoshaphat to assist in teaching the law to the people of Judah (2 Chron. 17:8), after 875 B.C.

3. A chief Israelite after the captivity (Neh. 10:16), probably the same elsewhere (Ezra 2:13; 8:13; Neh. 7:18) called Adonikam (which see).

ADONI´KAM, (a-dōn-ī-kam; “my Lord has risen”). One whose descendants, to the number of 666, returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:13), 536 B.C. He himself is included in Neh. 7:18. Somewhat later, three of his immediate descendants, with sixty male followers, came with Ezra (Ezra 8:13), 458 B.C. He appears (from the identity of the associated names) to have been the Adonijah who joined in the religious covenant of Nehemiah (Neh. 10:16).

ADONI´RAM (ă-dō-nī-rām; “high lord”). The son of Abda, and receiver-general of the imposts in the reigns of David, Solomon, and Rehoboam (1 Kings 4:6). During his extended term of office he rendered both himself and the tribute so odious to the people, in sustaining the immense public works of Solomon, that when Rehoboam rashly sent him to enforce the collection of the taxes the exasperated populace rose upon him and stoned him to death. This was the signal for the revolt under Jeroboam (1 Kings 12:18), 922 B.C. Adoniram is called, by contraction, Adoram (2 Sam. 20:24; 1 Kings 12:18) and Hadoram (2 Chron. 10:18).

ADO´NI-ZE´DEK (a-dō´nī-ze´dek; “just lord”). The king of Jerusalem when the Israelites invaded Palestine (Josh. 10:1), about 1400 B.C. After Jericho and Ai were taken and the Gibeonites had succeeded in forming a treaty with the Israelites, Adonizedek induced the Amorite kings of Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, and Eglon to join him in a confederacy against the enemy. They began operations by besieging the Gibeonites, who sent to Joshua for help. Joshua marched all night from Gilgal and, falling unexpectedly upon the besiegers, put them to flight. The five kings took refuge in a cave at Makkedah but were detected, and the cave's mouth was closed by placing huge stones against it. When the Israelites returned from the pursuit the cave was opened and the kings taken out. The chief men of Israel then set their feet upon the necks of the prostrate monarchs—an ancient mark of triumph. The five kings were then slain, and their bodies hung on trees until evening, when, as the law forbade a longer exposure of the dead (Deut. 21:23), they were taken down and cast into the cave. The mouth of the cave was filled up with large stones, which remained long after (Josh. 10:1–27). In considering the severe treatment of these kings we must remember that the war was one of extermination and that the treatment of the Jews was neither better nor worse than those of the people with whom they fought.

ADOPTION (Gk. huiiothesia, the “placing” as a “son”). The admission of a person to some or all of the privileges of natural kinship. As the practice of adoption was confined almost exclusively to sons—the case of Esther being an exception—it probably had its origin in the natural desire for male offspring. This would be especially true where force, rather than well-observed laws, decided the possession of estates.

Hebrew. Abraham speaks of Eliezer (Gen. 15:3), a house-born slave, as his heir, having probably adopted him as his son. Jacob adopted his grandsons Ephraim and Manasseh, and counted them as his sons (48:6), thus enabling him to bestow through them a double portion upon his favorite son Joseph. Sometimes a man without a son would marry his daughter to a freed slave, the children then being accounted her father’s; or the husband himself would be adopted as a son (1 Chron. 2:34). Most of the early instances of adoption mentioned in the Bible were the acts of women who, because of barrenness, gave their female slaves to their husbands with the intention of adopting any children they might have. Thus Sarah gave Hagar to Abraham, and the son (Ishmael) was considered the child of Abraham and Sarah (Gen. 16:1–15). The childless Rachel gave her maid, Bilhah, to her husband (30:1–7) and was imitated by Leah (30:9–13). In such cases the sons were regarded as fully equal in the right of heritage with those by the legitimate wife.

Roman. Adoption was a familiar social phenomenon, and its initial ceremonies and incidents occupied a large and important place in their laws. By adoption an entire stranger in blood became a member of the family in a higher sense than some of the family kin, emancipated sons, or descendants through females. Such a one assumed the family name, engaged in its sacrificial rites, and became, not by sufferance or at will, but to all intents and purposes, a member of the house of his adoption. The tie thus formed could only be broken through the ceremony of emancipation, and formed as complete a barrier to intermarriage as relationship by blood. At Rome there were two kinds of adoption, both requiring the adopter to be a male and childless: arrogatio and adoption proper. The former could only take place where the person to be adopted was independent (sui juris) and his adopter had no prospect of male offspring. The adopted one became, in the eyes of the law, a new creature. He was born again into a new family. This custom was doubtless referred to by Paul (Rom. 8:14–16).

The ceremony of adoption took place in the presence of seven witnesses. The fictitious sale and resale, and the final “vindication” or claim, were accompanied by the legal formula, and might mean the sale of a son into slavery or his adoption into a new family, according to the words used. The touch of the festuca or ceremonial wand might be accompanied by the formula, “I claim this man as my son,” or “I claim this man as my slave.” It was the function of the witnesses, upon occasion, to testify that the transaction was in truth the adoption of the child.

Greek. In Athens adoption took place either in the lifetime of the adopter or by will; or if a man died childless and intestate, the state interfered to bring into his house the man next entitled by the Attic law of inheritance, as heir and adopted son. If there were daughters, one of them was usually betrothed to the adopted son. If after that a male heir was born, he and the adopted son had equal rights.

ADOPTION (Theological). This term as used in a theological sense commonly denotes that act of God by which He restores penitent and believing men to their privileges as members of the divine family and makes them heirs of heaven.

1. Theology owes its use of the word adoption in this way to the apostle Paul. He is the only Scripture writer who employs the term thus translated. The passages in Paul's writings in which the doctrine of adoption is stated in connection with the use of that term are Rom. 8:15–17; Gal. 4:4–6; Eph. 1:5. These are not by any means, however, the only passages in his writings in which the essential thought is plainly declared (2 Cor. 6:18). And more generally speaking this may be said to be one of the doctrines upon which the NT lays special stress. That we who have forfeited and lost our place and privileges as children of God may be fully reinstated therein was one of the great teachings of Jesus Christ. For that the parable of the prodigal son was spoken.

Taking the Scripture teachings as a whole, adoption, it appears, while not the same as our justification, is necessarily connected with it, as forgiveness would be empty without restoration to the privileges forfeited by sin. Adoption and regeneration are two phases of the same fact, regeneration meaning the reproduction of the filial character, and adoption the restoration of the filial privilege. See Justification; Regeneration.

Adoption is a word of position rather than relationship. The believer's relation to God as a child results from the new birth (John 1:12–13), whereas adoption is the divine act whereby one who is already a child is, through redemption from the law, placed in the position of an adult son (Gal. 4:1–5).

2. The word adoption is also used by the apostle Paul with reference to the full and final outcome of salvation, the complete "revealing of the sons of God" and perfect investiture with all their heavenly privileges, for which Christians must wait. So he writes of waiting "for the revealing of the sons of God" and "waiting eagerly for our adoption as sons, the redemption of our body" (Rom. 8:19, 23).

3. Another use of this word by the same apostle is in Rom. 9:4, where he speaks of the Israelites "to whom belongs the adoption." By this is meant the special place that was given to Israel among the nations as the chosen people of God.

ADORA'IM (a-dō-rā'im). A town, doubtless in the SW of Judah, since it is enumerated among the cities fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:9). It is met with in 1 Macc. 13:20 as an Edomite city, "Adora," and so also frequently in Josephus. It was taken by Hyrcanus. Robinson has identified it with the present Dûra, a village about five miles to the W of Hebron.

ADO'RAM (a-dō'ram). An officer in charge of the forced labor (2 Sam. 20:24; 1 Kings 12:18), elsewhere called Adoniram (which see).

ADORATION. In its true sense, the act of paying honor to a divine being. In the Scriptures various forms of adoration are mentioned; e.g., putting off the shoes (Ex. 3:5; Josh. 5:15), bowing the knee (Gen. 41:43), falling prostrate (43:26; Dan. 2:46), and kissing (Luke 7:38). The passage "If I have looked at the sun when it shone, or the moon going in splendor, and my heart became secretly enticed, and my hand threw a kiss from my mouth, that too would have been an iniquity calling for judgment” (Job 31:26–28) clearly intimates that kissing the hand was considered an overt act of worship in the East. In the same manner respect was shown to kings and other persons of exalted station. “Put your hand over your mouth” (Job 21:5; 29:9; Ps. 39:9) implied the highest degree of reverence and submission.

ADORN (Gk. kosmeō, “to ornament”). To embellish with honor, gain; followed by a participle designating the act by which the honor is gained (Titus 2:10; 1 Pet. 3:5).

ADRAM´MELECH (a-dram´mel-ek; “splendor of the king” [?]).

1. A son of Sennacherib, king of Assyria. The king was dwelling at Nineveh after his disastrous expedition against Hezekiah. While worshiping his god in the house of Nisroch, Sennacherib was murdered by Adrammelech and his brother Sharezer, 681 B.C. Having accomplished the crime, the two brothers fled into the land of Ararat (2 Kings 19:37; Isa. 37:38).

2. The name of a Sepharvite god (2 Kings 17:31). See Gods, False.

ADRAMYT´TIUM (a-dra-mit´ti-um; “the mansion of death”). A seaport of Mysia, in Asia Minor (Acts 27:2–5), whence Paul sailed in an Alexandrian ship to Italy. The site is known today as Karataş, and a nearby town is named Edremit. R.K.H.

A´DRIA (a´dri-a). Called the “Adriatic Sea” in the NASB and NIV (Acts 27:27). It is the modern Gulf of Venice, the Mare Supernum of the Romans, as distinguished from the Mare Inferum or the Tyrrhenian Sea. It probably derived its name from Adria, a city in Istria.

A´DRIEL (a´dri-ēl; “God is my help”). A son of Barzillai the Meholathite. Saul gave to him in marriage his daughter Merab, who had been promised to David (1 Sam. 18:17–19). His five sons were among the seven descendants of Saul whom David surrendered to the Gibeonites (2 Sam. 21:8) in satisfaction for the endeavors of Saul to extirpate them, although a league had been made between them and the Israelites (Josh. 9:15).

ADUL´LAM (a-dūl´lam). A town SW of Jerusalem about midway to Lachish and 4½ miles NE of Beit Jibrin; now identified as Tell esh-Sheikh Madhkur. It first appears as the resident city of a Canaanite king (Josh. 12:15; 15:35) but is most famous for its cave in which David hid as a fugitive from Saul (1 Sam. 22:1; 2 Chron. 11:7).

ADUL´LAMITE (a-dul´la-mīt). An inhabitant (Gen. 38:1, 12, 20) of Adullam (which see).

ADULTERY. In Jewish thought adultery was seen as the willful violation of the marriage contract by either of the parties through sexual intercourse with a third party. The divine provision was that the husband and wife should become “one flesh,” each being held sacred to the other. Jesus taught: “Have you not read, that He who created them from the beginning made them male and female . . . and the two shall become one flesh.” When the Pharisees, with the apparent hope of eliciting some modification in favor of the husband, put the question, “Why then did Moses command to give her a certificate and divorce her?” Jesus replied, “Because of your hardness of heart, Moses permitted you to divorce your wives; but from the beginning it has not been this way . . . whoever divorces his wife, except for immorality, and marries another commits adultery” (Matt. 19:3–9). In perfect accord with this also is the teaching of the apostle Paul (Eph. 5:25–33; 1 Cor. 7:1–13; 1 Tim. 3:12). It will be seen that according to the fundamental law it is adultery for the man as well as the woman to have a sexual relationship with a person other than the legal spouse. In ancient times, however, exception was made among the nations generally in favor of the man. He might have more wives than one or have intercourse with a person not espoused or married to him without being considered an adulterer. Adultery was sexual intercourse with the married wife, or what was equivalent, the betrothed bride of another man, for this act exposed the husband to the danger of having a spurious offspring imposed upon him. In the seventh commandment (Ex. 20:14) all manner of lewdness or unchastity in act or thought seems to be meant (Matt. 5:28).

The Roman law appears to have made the same distinction as the Hebrew between the unfaithfulness of the husband and wife, by defining adultery to be the violation of another man’s bed. The infidelity of the husband did not constitute adultery. The Greeks held substantially the same view.

Trial of Adultery. A man suspecting his wife of adultery, not having detected her in the act, or having no witness to prove her supposed guilt, brought her to the priest that she might be submitted to the ordeal prescribed in Num. 5:11–31. See Jealousy, Offering of.

When adultery ceased to be a capital crime, as it doubtless did, this trial probably fell into disuse. No instance of the ordeal being undergone is given in Scripture, and it appears to have been finally abrogated about forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem. The reason given for this is that the men were at that time so generally adulterous that God would not fulfill the imprecations of the ordeal oath upon the wife.

Penalties. The Mosaic law assigned the punishment of death to adultery (Lev. 20:10) but did not state the mode of its infliction. From various passages of Scripture (e.g., Ezek. 16:38, 40; John 8:5) we infer that it was by stoning. When the adulteress was a slave the guilty parties were scourged, the blows not to exceed forty; the adulterer was to offer a trespass offering (a ram) to be offered by the priest (Lev. 19:20–22). Death does not appear to have been inflicted, perhaps by reason of guilt on the part of those administering the law (John 8:9–11). We find no record in the OT of a woman taken in adultery being put to death. The usual remedy seems to have been a divorce, in which the woman lost her dower and right of maintenance, thus avoiding public scandal. The expression “to disgrace her” (Matt. 1:19) probably means to bring the matter before the local Sanhedrin, the usual course.

The Roman civil law looked upon adultery as “the violation of another man’s bed,” and thus the husband’s incontinence could not constitute the offense. The punishment was left to the husband and parents of the adulteress, who under the old law suffered death. The most usual punishment of the man was mutilation, castration, and cutting off the nose and ears. Other punishments were banishment, heavy fines, burning at the stake, and drowning. Among the Greeks and other ancient nations the adulterer might lose eye, nose, or ear. Among savage nations of the present time the punishment is generally severe. The Muslim code pronounces it a capital offense.

Spiritual. In the symbolical language of the OT adultery means idolatry and apostasy from the worship of Jehovah (Jer. 3:8–9; Ezek. 16:32; 23:37; Rev. 2:22). This figure resulted from the sort of married relationship, the solemn engagement between Jehovah and Israel (Jer. 2:2; 3:14; 13:27; 31:32; Hos. 8:9). Our Lord used similar language when He charged Israel with being an “adulterous generation” (Matt.

12:39; 16:4; Mark 8:38), meaning a faithless and unholy generation. An “adulterous” church or city is an apostate one (cf. Isa. 1:21; Jer. 3:6–9; Ezek. 16:22; 23:7).

Ecclesiastical. The following views prevailed in the early church:

1. Under Justinian the wife was regarded as the real criminal, and her paramour as a mere accomplice. This view seems to have been held during the whole early Christian period. Gregory of Nyssa makes a distinction between fornication and adultery. A canon of Basle furnishes this definition: “We name him who cohabits with another woman (not his own wife) an adulterer.” Ambrose says: “All unchaste intercourse is adultery; what is illicit for the woman is illicit for the man.” Gregory Nazianzen argues that the man should not be left free to sin while the woman is restrained. Chrysostom says: “It is commonly called adultery when a man wrongs a married woman. I, however, affirm it of a married man who sins with the unmarried.” Jerome contends that 1 Cor. 6:16 applies equally to both sexes.

2. A convicted adulterer cannot receive orders. An adulterer or adulteress must undergo seven years’ penance. A presbyter so offending is to be excommunicated and brought to penance. The layman whose wife is guilty cannot receive orders, and if already ordained must put her away under pain of deprivation. An unchaste wife must be divorced, but not the husband, even if adulterous. The adulterer must undergo fifteen years of penitence but only seven for unchastity. Two conclusions were drawn by canonists and divines: (1) divorce, except for adultery, is adultery; (2) to retain an adulterous wife is adultery. A woman must not leave her husband for blows, waste of dower, unchastity, nor even disbelief (1 Cor. 7:16), under penalty of adultery. An offending wife is an adulteress and must be divorced, but not so the husband. The Catholic church holds that marriage is not and ought not to be dissolved by the adultery of either party (Council of Trent, sess. xxiv, can. 7).

3. The following are treated as guilty of actual adultery: a man marrying a betrothed maiden; a girl seduced marrying someone other than her seducer; consecrated virgins who sin, and their paramours; a Christian marrying a Jew or an idolater.

ADUM’MIM (a-dum’im; “red” or “bloody”). A place on the road from Jerusalem to Jericho (Josh. 15:7; 18:17) and supposed to be the scene of the Good Samaritan’s rescue of the man who fell among thieves. It has the modern name of Tal ‘at ed-Damm (“ascent of blood”).

ADVENT, SECOND. See Millennium.

ADVERSARY. In its general meaning refers to an enemy, as in the expression “The Lord takes vengeance on His adversaries” (Nah. 1:2). Frequently it is derived from Heb. šûr, “to bind”; in 1 Sam. 2:10, rîb, “to strive.” In the NT we have antikeimenos, hupenantios, “one who opposes”; and antidikos, “opponent in law.” In Isa. 50:8 the expression Baal mispāt, means “he who has a judicial cause or lawsuit against me”; just as in Roman law dominus lilit is distinguished from the procurator, i.e., from the person who represents him in court (Delitzsch, Com.). Specifically (Heb. šātān) the devil, as the general enemy of mankind (1 Pet. 5:8).

ADVOCATE (Gk. paraklētos, “paraclete”). One who pleads the cause of another.

The term is applied by Jesus to the Holy Spirit (John 14:16; 15:26; 16:7), where it is rendered Helper; and by John to Christ Himself (1 John 2:1). The word advocate (Lat. advocatus) might designate a consulting lawyer or one who presents his client’s case in open court; or one who, in times of trial or hardship, sympathizes with the afflicted and administers suitable direction and support. See also Helper; Holy Spirit.

AENE´AS (e-nē´as). A paralytic of Lydda cured by Peter (Acts 9:33–34).

AE´NON (ē´non; “springs”). The place “near Salim” where John baptized (John 3:23). Site uncertain.

AE´ON (ē´on; Gk. aiōn, “age”). A human lifetime, life itself (according to Homer, Herodotus, and others); an unbroken age, perpetuity of time, eternity. With this signification the Hebrew and rabbinic idea of the word ʿōlām, “concealed,” combines in the biblical and ecclesiastical writers. Hence in the NT aeon is used in the following ways:

1. In the phrases eis tōn aiōna, i.e., forever (John 6:51, 58; 14:16; Heb. 5:6; 6:20; Jude 13; with a negative, never (John 4:14; 8:51; 10:28; 11:26); unto the ages, i.e., as long as time shall be, forever (Luke 1:33; Rom. 1:25; 9:5; 11:36). In the expression unto the ages of the ages (Gal. 1:5; 2 Tim. 4:18; 1 Pet. 4:11; Rev. 1:6, 18) the endless future is divided up into various periods, the shorter of which are comprehended in the longer. From the age is used in the sense of from the most ancient time, from of old (Luke 1:70; Acts 3:21; 15:18).

2. As the Jews distinguished the time before the Messiah and the time after the Messiah, so most of the NT writers distinguish this age (and similar expressions), the time before the appointed return or truly messianic advent of Christ, and aiōn mellōn, the future age (Matt. 12:32; Eph. 1:21) or Millennium.

Figurative. The container is used for the contained, and hoi aiōnes denotes “the worlds,” the universe, i.e., the aggregate of things contained in time (Heb. 11:3; cf. 1:2).

AFFLICTION (usually Heb. ʿōnē, “depressed”; Gk. thlipsis, “pressure”). Other Heb. and Gk. words are used, and if they were all literally rendered we should have iniquity, straitness, lowered, evil, breach, suffering. This last word expresses its meaning in common use. The English word comes from the Lat. adflictus, a striking, as one thing against another; pain; grief; distress of body or mind.

Respecting the well-known and often quoted passage which begins “For momentary, light affliction is producing for us” (2 Cor. 4:17), we quote from Meyer, Com., Notes by American Editor: “The Revision of 1881 gives this weighty and impressive verse in a rendering which is exact, and yet faithful to our English idiom. The verse contains the whole philosophy of the Christian view of affliction. It does not deny the reality of earthly sorrows or underrate their power, as did the Stoics; but after allowing them all their force, calmly says that they dwindle into insignificance when compared with the exceeding and eternal glory to which they lead. But this applies only to believers, as appears by the next verse, ‘while we look,’ etc. Afflictions have a salutary operation, provided that we look at the things which are eternal.”

AFTERNOON (Heb. nōtôt hayyôm, “the day’s declining,” Judg. 19:8). According to the Jewish reckoning, the fifth of the six divisions of the day. See Time.

AG'ABUS (ag'a-bus). A prophet, supposed to have been one of the seventy disciples of Christ. He came with others from Jerusalem to Antioch while Paul and Barnabas were there and predicted an approaching famine, which actually occurred the following year. The expression "all over the world" (Acts 11:28) was probably used in a national sense, and by it Judea was doubtless meant, and the words must be understood to apply to that famine which, in the fourth year of Claudius, spread throughout Palestine. The poor Jews in general were then relieved by the queen of Adiabne, who sent to Egypt to purchase corn for them (Josephus Ant. 20.2.5; 5.2). For the relief of the Christians in Judea contributions were raised by their brethren in Antioch and taken to Jerusalem by Paul and Barnabas (Acts 11:28–30). Many years after, this same Agabus met Paul at Caesarea and warned him of the sufferings that awaited him if he continued his journey to Jerusalem (21:10–12). Agabus took Paul's belt and fastened it around his own hands and feet and said, "This is what the Holy Spirit says: 'In this way the Jews at Jerusalem will bind the man who owns this belt and deliver him into the hands of the Gentiles.'"

A'GAG (ā'gag). Probably a common name of all the Amalekite kings, like pharaoh in Egypt.

1. The king, apparently, of one of the hostile neighboring nations at the time of the Exodus, 1441 B.C. He is referred to by Balaam (Num. 24:7) in a manner implying that the king of the Amalekites was, then at least, a great monarch, and his people a greater people, than is commonly imagined.

2. The king of the Amalekites, who, being taken prisoner by Saul, was spared by him, contrary to the solemn vow of devotion to destruction whereby the nation, as such, had of old precluded itself from giving any quarter to that people (Ex. 17:14; Deut. 25:19). When Samuel came to the camp of Saul he chided him, told him of his rejection, and ordered Agag to be brought to him. Agag came "cheerfully," i.e., in a joyous state of mind, thinking that his life would still be spared (K. & D., Com.). But the prophet ordered him to be cut in pieces, and in the expression which he employed—"As your sword has made women childless, so shall your mother be childless among women"—indicates that, apart from the obligations of the vow, some such example of retributive justice was intended as had been exercised in the case of Adoni-bezek (which see). Perhaps Agag had treated prisoners in the same way he was now treated by Samuel (1 Sam. 15:8–33), about 1020 B.C.

A'GAGITE (ā'ga-gīt). Found (Esther 3:1, 10; 8:3, 5; 9:24) in connection with Haman, the enemy of Mordecai. Josephus (Ant. 11.6.5) explains it as a synonym of Amalek, and so it possibly was.

AG'APE (ag'a-pē), pl. Agapae (Gk. agapē, "love"). A simple meal of brotherly love celebrated daily in the apostolic times in connection with the Eucharist, the two being spoken of together as the Lord's Supper. At this meal the Christians, in connection with their common Redeemer, ignored all distinctions of rank, wealth, and culture, and met as members of one family. At the feast the bishop (or presbyter) presided, the food having been prepared at home, or at the place of meeting, according to circumstances. Before eating, the guests washed their hands, prayer was offered, and the Scriptures were read. After the meal a collection was taken for widows and orphans, the kiss of charity was given, and communications from other congregations were read and answered.

The Agape was never enjoined by divine command, and gradually, losing its peculiar feature of childlike unity, it led to all sorts of abuses, such as we find rebuked by the apostle Paul. Another cause for its discontinuance was that the Third Council of Carthage (A.D. 391) decreed that the Eucharist should be taken while fasting. Later several councils forbade its being held in the church buildings. Vestiges of the practice remained as late as the Council of Basle, in the fifteenth century. See Lord's Supper.

Apparently the Lord's Supper and the Agape were originally one (1 Cor. 11:17–34). The common conservative view unites a simple repast with the Lord's Supper on the general plan of the Last Supper. A. Arnold maintains this view and traces the beginning of the separation of the two in the Didache 9.11 (cf. Didascalia Apostolorum, Martyrdom of Polycarp 18; Justin Martyr Apologia 65–67; A. Arnold, Der Ursprung des christlichen Abendmahls, 1937). The view that the Lord's Supper was once connected with the Agape was taken by J. F. Keating at the beginning of the century. Following the conservative view, Keating maintained that the excesses narrated in the Pauline epistles were the first reasons for the gradual separation of the Lord's Supper and the Agape Feast (The Agape, 1901). The thesis that the Lord's Supper constituted the sacramental portion of a meal, which was later differentiated from the common repast, was espoused by J. Hoffmann (Das Abendmahl im Urchristentum, 1903). Both Keating's and Hoffmann's views clashed with the view of a number of German scholars of the nineteenth century that the Agape meal was first, and the Lord's Supper grew out of this common repast. Pierre Batiffol, on the other hand, was of the opinion that the Agape was connected with the Lord's Supper only by way of excess (Etudes, 1907). E. Baumgartner likewise distinguished between the Agape and the Supper. The results of his research were that the Lord's Supper was a midnight or early Sunday morning ritual and that the Agape was a separate Sunday evening function going back to ancient Jewish practices (cf. E. Baumgartner, Eucharistic und Agape im Urchristentum, 1901). A. J. McLean (Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics, 1908) posited a Jewish pagan origin of the Agape. This view is reflected in R. L. Cole (Love-Feasts, 1916). Another scholar who saw a Jewish origin for the Agape was W. O. E. Oesterley in his The Jewish Background of the Christian Liturgy, 1925. Hans Lietzmann, while positing a Jewish influence, sees less of this than Oesterley or Baumgartner. Karl Voelker argues a Gnostic beginning in the latter part of the second century (Mysterium und Agape, 1927). The Agape was related to the funeral banquet by H. Leclercq (Catholic Encyclopedia, 1907). See also G. Kittel and G. Friedrich, eds., Theological Dictionary of the New Testament (1966–1976), vol. 1, s.v. "agape." M.F.U.

AG'EE (ag'ē; "fugitive"). A Hararite, father of Shammah, who was one of David's chief warriors (2 Sam. 23:11).

AGONY (Gk. agōnia, "struggle"). Used both in classical and NT Gk. of severe mental struggles and emotions; our anguish. The Gk. word is used in the NT only by Luke (22:44) to describe the fearful struggle through which our Lord passed in the Garden of Gethsemane. The circumstances of this mysterious transaction are recorded in Matt. 26:36–46; Mark 14:32–42; and Heb. 5:7–8. Luke alone notices the agony, the bloody sweat, and the appearance of the strengthening angel. All agree that He prayed for the removal of "this cup" and are careful to note that He qualified this petition by a preference of His Father's will to His own. The question is, What did He mean by "this cup"? What was the cause of this sorrow unto death?

In answer we quote Edersheim: "Not fear, either of bodily or mental suffering: but death. Man's nature, created of God immortal, shrinks (by the law of its nature) from the dissolution of the bond that binds body to soul. Yet to fallen man death is not by any means fully death, for he is born with the taste of it in his soul. Not so Christ. It was the unfallen Man dying; it was He, who had no experience of it, tasting death, and that not for Himself but for every man, emptying the cup to its bitter dregs. It was the Christ undergoing death by man and for man; the incarnate God, the God-man, submitting Himself vicariously to the deepest humiliation, and paying the utmost penalty: death—all death. No one could know what death was (not dying, which men dread, but Christ dreaded not); no one could taste its bitterness as He. His going into death was His final conflict with Satan for man, and on his behalf. By submitting to it He took away the power of death. He disarmed Death by burying his shaft in His own heart. And beyond this lies the deep, unutterable mystery of Christ bearing the penalty due to our sin, bearing our death, bearing the penalty of the broken law, the accumulated guilt of humanity, and the holy wrath of the righteous Judge upon them" (Life of Jesus, 2:538–39).

AG'ORA (ag'o-ra). The marketplace or public square of a Greek city, where men assembled to debate or transact civic business. In the agora at Athens the apostle Paul met daily and disputed with those who were there (Acts 17:17). The Athenian marketplace has been completely excavated by the American School of Classical Studies (in the 1930s and to completion since 1946). Remains of this famous area include the round Tholos, where standard measures and weights were kept; the Metreon, where archives were deposited; the Bouleuterion or council chamber; and several stoas (including the great Stoa of Attalos). The entire complex of agora structures was dominated by the temple of Hephaesteion, the god of metal craftsmen. In addition to buildings many small finds have been made such as Mycaenean urns (fourteenth century B.C.), ostraca, pottery, jewelry, and objets d'art. Paul was also familiar with the agora at Corinth and other Greek cities. The Greek agora corresponds to the forum of Roman cities. M.F.U.

AGRAPHIA (Gk. agraphos, "unwritten"). A term applied to the sayings of our Lord not recorded in the gospels. Naturally, there would be many of these, and this fact is recorded (John 21:25). The sources of our knowledge of these sayings are fivefold.

1. The first and surest is to be found in the books of the NT itself. An unquestionable example is given in Acts 20:35: "Remember the words of the Lord Jesus, that He Himself said, 'It is more blessed to give than to receive.'" Mayor, in his comments on James 1:12, "He will receive the crown of life, which the Lord has promised to those who love Him," thinks these words a semiquotation of some saying of Christ.

2. The next source, both in amount and authority, is supplied by some manuscripts of the NT, among them the well-known addition in Codex Bezae to Luke 6:4. "On the same day, beholding one working on the Sabbath, He said unto him. 'Man, if thou knowest what thou doest, blessed art thou; but if thou knowest not, accursed art thou and a transgressor of the law.'"

3. Quotations in early Christian writers and in lost gospels. The quotations of these sayings ceased almost entirely after the fourth century, when the current gospel text had won its way to acceptance. Of these unrecorded sayings Resch has collected 74 that he regards as genuine, and 103 apocryphal. In the main, these sayings neither have historical settings nor do they affect the truth of our Lord's life. They do, however, often illustrate His teaching and express it perhaps in a terser, more remarkable form than is found elsewhere. The following are two of the most remarkable of these sayings: "He that is near me is near the fire; he that is far from me is far from the kingdom"; "that which is weak shall be saved by that which is strong."

4. "The Logia, or Sayings of our Lord," found in Oxyrhynchus, 120 miles S of Cairo, Egypt, by B. F. Grenfell and Arthur S. Hunt, 1896.

Logion 1. "... and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote that is in the brother's eye."

Logion 2. "Jesus saith, Except ye fast to the world, ye shall in no wise find the kingdom of God; and except ye keep the sabbath, ye shall not see the Father."

Logion 3. "Jesus saith, I stood in the midst of the world, and in the flesh was I seen of them, and I found all men drunken, and none found I athirst among them; and my soul grieveth over the sons of men, because they are blind in their heart...."

Logion 4. Undecipherable.

Logion 5. "Jesus saith, Wherever there are ... and there is one ... alone, I am with him. Raise the stone and there thou shalt find me; cleave the wood, and there am I."

Logion 6. "Jesus saith, A prophet is not acceptable in his own country, neither doth a physician work cures upon them that know him."

Logion 7. "Jesus saith, A city built upon the top of a high hill, and stablished, can neither fall nor be hid."

Logion 8. Undecipherable.

5. Near Nag Hammadi in Upper Egypt about 1945 a Gnostic library of thirteen volumes was found. In volume 3 appears The Gospel According to Thomas, a Coptic text that dates to the fourth or fifth century and is a translation or adaptation of a Gk. text that must have been produced in the second century A.D. This work has numerous sayings attributed to Christ but bearing a Gnostic bias. H.F.V.

AGRICULTURE. The cultivation of the soil dates back to Adam, to whom God assigned the occupation of cultivating and keeping the garden (Gen. 2:15). We are told that "Cain was a tiller of the ground" (4:2). The ancestors of the Hebrews in Mesopotamia followed pastoral pursuits, which were kept up by Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, whose sons settled as shepherds on the fruitful pasturelands of Goshen (chap. 47). During their four hundred years' residence in Egypt the Israelites engaged in the pursuit of agriculture (Deut. 11:10), so that they were prepared to make the cultivation of the soil their principal employment, and in this sense the Mosaic state was founded on agriculture. As the soil could not be alienated, but reverted to the owner in the year of Jubilee, each family had a stake in the soil, and its culture was held in high esteem (1 Sam. 11:5; 1 Kings 19:19; 2 Chron. 26:10). As the pastoral life of Israel had kept it from mixture and local attachment, especially while in Egypt, so agriculture in Canaan tended to check a nomadic life of plunder.

Irrigation. In all countries climate and soil have much to do with the methods of agriculture and sorts of crops. In Eastern countries generally, the heat and dryness of the greater portion of the year make irrigation by canals and aqueducts indispensable. This is true to a considerable extent of Palestine, although its rains are more frequent than in Egypt or Assyria. There is reference, however, to natural irrigation by conduits palfgê-mayim, "water-partings, canals" (Job 38:25; Prov. 21:1). These were well known to the Israelites in Egypt (Deut. 11:10).

Care of Soil. The several portions of the land were carefully marked off (1 Sam. 114:14; Prov. 22:28); divided for the various products of the soil (Isa. 28:25); secured against injury from wild animals by hedges and walls (Isa. 5:5; Num. 22:24); and the soil fertilized by manuring (Ps. 83:10). The preparation of manure from straw trodden in the manure pile appears from Isa. 25:10. The dung, the carcasses, and the blood of animals were used to enrich the soil (2 Kings 9:37; Ps. 83:10; Jer. 9:22). Salt, either by itself or mixed in the manure pile in order to promote putrefaction, is specifically mentioned as a compost (Matt. 5:13; Luke 14:34–35). The land was burned over to destroy the seed of noxious herbs (Prov. 24:31; Isa. 32:13) and was then enriched with ashes. The cultivation of hillsides in terraces cannot be proved from any clear statement of Scripture, but the nature of its soil makes it necessary. Terraces are still seen on the mountain slopes, rising above one another, frequently to the number of sixty or eighty, and on them fields, gardens, and plantations.

The soil was broken up by the plow (which see), a crude affair, probably similar to those used in Egypt. Early in the year the ground was cleared of stones and thorns (Isa. 5:2), sowing or gathering from among thorns being a proverb for slovenly husbandry (Job 5:5; Prov. 24:30–31). New land was plowed a second time. The plow was followed by men using hoes to break the clods (Isa. 28:24), but in later times a harrow was employed. This appears to have been then, as now, merely a thick block of wood pressed down by the weight of a stone or a man (Job 39:10; Isa. 28:24). The seed appears to have been sowed and harrowed at the same time, although sometimes the seed was plowed in by a cross furrow.

Crops. The principal crops of Palestine were, undoubtedly, wheat and barley, from which was derived the common bread of the country. Mention is also made of spelt, millet, lentils, flax, cucumbers, melons, beans, cummin, and so forth. Hay was not in use, and, therefore, barley with chopped straw was fed to cattle (Gen. 24:25, 32; Judg. 19:19).

The sowing began after the feast of Tabernacles (the end of October and in November), in the time when the autumn rains come gradually, thus leaving the farmer time to sow his wheat and barley. Summer fruits (millet, beans, and so forth) were sown in January and February. Harvest began with barley (2 Sam. 21:9; Ruth 2:23), which ripens in Palestine from two to three weeks before wheat, and was begun by law on the 16th Nisan with the presentation of the first barley sheaf. Lentils were ready at the same time as barley. Then came wheat and spelt, so that the chief part of the grain harvest closed about Pentecost.

The OT gives little information regarding the cultivation of flax and cotton. The Israelites probably learned the working of these in Egypt (Ex. 9:31), and they seem to have grown them in Palestine, for according to Hos. 2:9 and Prov. 31:13, flax and wool were to be found in every house. Cotton must have been introduced into Israel shortly after the captivity (c. 525 B.C.) and into Assyria and Egypt about 700 B.C., and cultivated early by the Israelites, for in 1 Chron. 4:21 among the ancient households of Judah is named a family of workers in linen.

Harvest. Grain was cut with a sickle (Deut. 16:9). The reapers lived on parched grain and bread dipped in vinegar (Ruth 2:14). It is probable, however, that the modern custom of pulling up by the roots prevailed to a considerable extent in ancient times. This was done to save all the straw, as it grew very short. When cut it was gathered on the arms (Ps. 129:7), bound in sheaves, and laid in heaps (song of Sol. 7:2; Ruth 3:7) to be threshed. Threshing floors were placed in the open air, leveled and tramped hard, generally on elevated ground, so that in winnowing the wind might carry away the chaff (Hos. 13:3; Jer. 4:11). Threshing was done by oxen driven over the grain to tread out the kernels with their hoofs (Hos. 10:11); by machines made either of planks with stones or bits of iron fastened to the lower surface to make it rough, and rendered heavy by some weight upon it; or by small wagons with low cylindrical wheels like saws (Isa. 28:27; 41:15).

Flails were used for threshing tender cereals or small quantities of grain (Ruth 2:17; Isa. 28:27). Winnowing was done with a broad shovel or a wooden fork with bent prongs. The mass of chaff, straw, and grain was thrown against the wind so that the chaff might be blown away. This was usually done in the evening, when there was generally a breeze (Ruth 3:2; see Jer. 4:11; 51:2). The chaff and stubble were burned (Isa. 5:24; Matt. 3:12). Finally, the grain was sifted (Amos 9:9).

Israel owed its possession of Palestine and its fertility to Jehovah; hence its cultivation was put under obedience to the Lord's commands. The Sabbath rest was to be observed (Lev. 19:3), for the soil was to lie fallow in the sabbatic (25:3–5) and jubilee years (25:11). The Israelites were forbidden to yoke an ox and donkey together (Deut. 22:10), the one being a clean and the other an unclean animal; to sow with mingled seed (Lev. 19:19; Deut. 22:9); or to sow moistened seed on which the carcass of an unclean animal had fallen (Lev. 11:37–38). The corners of the fields were not reaped, and the gleanings of the fields were left for the poor (19:9; Deut. 24:19; cf. Ruth 2:2).

Israelites passing along in the path were allowed to pluck the heads of ripened grain left in the field (Deut. 23:25; Matt. 12:1; Luke 6:1). The firstfruits of all kinds of planting belonged to Jehovah, in recognition of His being the giver of all good things. The fruit of the orchard the first three years was considered uncircumcised (unclean) and not to be eaten. All of the fourth year's yield was consecrated to Jehovah. The first eating by men was to be that of the fifth year (Lev. 19:23–25). For cultivation of the vine and the olive, see under respective words.

AGRIP'PA (a-grip'a). The name of two members of the Herodian family. See Herod.

AGUE. See Diseases: Fever.

A'GUR (a'gūr; “gathered”). The author of the sayings contained in Prov. 30, which the inscription describes as being composed of the precepts delivered by “Agur the son of Jakeh.” Beyond this, everything that has been stated of him, and of the time in which he lived, is pure conjecture.

AH- (“brother of”). The former part of many Heb. words, signifying relationship or property.

A'HAB (ā'hab; “father's brother”). The name of two biblical personages.

1. The son of the seventh king of Israel, Omri, and second of the dynasty of Omri. He succeeded his father in the thirty-eighth year of Asa, king of Judah, and reigned twenty-two years in Samaria, 874–853 B.C. His wife was Jezebel, a heathen princess, daughter of Ethbaal, king of Sidon.

Jezebel was a decided and energetic character, and soon acquired complete control over her husband, so that he eventually established the worship of the Phoenician idols, and especially of the storm god Baal-Melcarth. Ahab built him a temple and an altar in Samaria and made a grove for the impure orgies of the goddess Asherah (1 Kings 16:29–33). So strong was the tide of corruption that it appeared as if the knowledge of the true God would be lost among the Israelites. But a man suited to this emergency was raised up in the person of Elijah (chap. 18), who opposed the royal power and succeeded in retaining many of his countrymen in the worship of the true God. See Elijah.

Ahab had a taste for splendid architecture, which he indulged by building an ivory house and several cities (22:39). He erected his royal residence at Jezreel, in the Plain of Esdraelon, still keeping Samaria as capital of his kingdom.

Refused a neighboring vineyard, which he desired to add to his pleasure grounds, Ahab, through the influence of Jezebel, caused its proprietor, Naboth, to be put to death on a false charge of blasphemy. For this crime Elijah prophesied the total extinction of the house of Ahab. The execution of the sentence was delayed in consequence of Ahab's repentance (1 Kings 21).

Ahab undertook three campaigns against Ben-hadad I, king of Damascus, two defensive and one offensive. In the first, Ben-hadad had laid siege to Samaria, and Ahab, encouraged by God's prophets, made a sudden attack upon him while at a banquet and totally routed the Syrians. Ben-hadad was again defeated the next year by Ahab, who spared his life and released him on the condition of restoring the cities of Israel he had held and of allowing Ahab certain commercial and political privileges (1 Kings 20:34). For three years Ahab enjoyed peace, when, with Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, he attacked Ramoth-gilead. Micaiah told Ahab that the expedition would fail. The prophet was imprisoned for giving this warning, but Ahab was so impressed that he took the precaution of disguising himself when he went into battle.

He was slain by a man who "drew a bow at random," and although he stayed up in his chariot for a time he died at evening, and his army was dispersed (1 Kings 22). When he was brought to be buried in Samaria the dogs licked up his blood as a servant was washing his chariot, thus fulfilling the prophecy of Elijah (21:19).

Ahab appears prominently on the Assyrian monuments of the great conqueror Shalmaneser III (859–824 B.C.). The Monolith Inscription, now in the British Museum, recounts the clash of Assyrian arms in 853 B.C. with a Syrian coalition of kings at Qarqar N of Hamath, a fortress guarding the approaches to all lower Syria. Conspicuously mentioned among those who successfully withstood Assyria's advance is "Ahab, the Israelite." The Israelite ruler's prominence is indicated by the large number of chariots he is said to have thrown into the battle—2,000 as compared with the next largest number of 1,200 supplied by Hadadezer of Damascus. Ahab ran a close race with the Damascene state as heading the foremost power in central and lower Syria in the middle of the ninth century B.C., as is represented by the Bible and proved by the monuments. M.F.U.

2. A false prophet who deceived the Israelites at Babylon and was threatened by Jeremiah, who foretold that he should be put to death by the king of Babylon in the presence of those whom he had beguiled, and that in following times it should become a common malediction to say, "May the Lord make you like Zedekiah and like Ahab, whom the king of Babylon roasted in the fire" (Jer. 29:21–22).

AHAR'AH (a-har'āh). The third son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:1). Elsewhere he is called Ehi (Gen. 46:21), Ahiram (Num. 26:38), and Aher (1 Chron. 7:12).

AHAR'HEL (a-har'hel). A son of Harum whose families are named among the lineage of Koz, a descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 4:8).

AHAS'BAI (a-has'bi). A Maacathite and the father of Eliphelet, one of David's warriors (2 Sam. 23:34). In 1 Chron. 11:35, he is apparently called Ur (which see).

AHASUE'RUS (a-haz-ū-ē'rus). The Heb. form of the name representing the Persian Khshayarsha of which the Gk. form is Xerxes (so NIV), and appearing as the title of two Median and Persian monarchs mentioned in the Bible.

1. The Persian king mentioned in the book of Esther and in Ezra 4:6. He is probably identical with Xerxes, whose regal state and affairs tally with all that is here said of Ahasuerus. His kingdom was extensive, extending from India to Ethiopia (Esther 1:1).

In the third year of his reign he made a sumptuous banquet for his nobility. On that occasion, being partially intoxicated, he ordered Vashti, his wife, to be brought before him, that he might exhibit her beauty to his courtiers. She, however, refused to appear, for it was contrary to Persian etiquette as well as to female propriety. Thereupon Ahasuerus indignantly divorced her and published a royal decree asserting the superiority of husbands over their wives.

In the seventh year of his reign (2:16) he married Esther, the beautiful Jewess, who, however, concealed her parentage. His prime minister, Haman, was enraged with Mordecai, the Jew, because he did not give him reverence and, in the twelfth year of the king's reign, offered him ten thousand talents of silver for the privilege of ordering a general massacre of the Jews in the kingdom on an appointed day. The king refused the money but granted the request. Couriers were dispatched to the most distant parts of the realm to order the execution of the decree. Mordecai immediately sent word to Esther of the impending danger and through her intercession the decree was so far annulled as to empower the Jews to defend themselves against their enemies. Ahasuerus disgraced and hanged Haman and his ten sons (7:10; 9:14) and made Mordecai his prime minister (10:3).

Xerxes (486–465 B.C.), the son of Darius I the Great, is undoubtedly the Ahasuerus of the book of Esther and in Ezra 4:6. The third year of his reign in which he held a great feast and assembly at Susa (Shushan), the palace, corresponds identically to the third year of the reign of Xerxes when he arranged the Grecian war. In the seventh year of his reign Xerxes returned defeated from Greece and consoled himself in the pleasures of his palace. It was then that Ahasuerus sought “beautiful young virgins” and replaced Vashti by marrying Esther. An important historical inscription of Xerxes discovered at Persepolis lists the numerous subject nations over which he ruled, and fully corroborates Esther 1:1, that he ruled “from India to Ethiopia.”

2. The father of Darius the Mede (Dan. 9:1). It is generally agreed that the person referred to here is the Astyages of secular history, but some identify him with Cyaxares.

AHA'VA (a-hā'va). The river itself or a place beside the river, where the Jewish exiles who were to return from Babylon to Jerusalem gathered (Ezra 8:21).

A'HAZ (ā'haz; “possessor”).

1. The twelfth king of the separate kingdom of Judah, being the son and successor of Jotham. He reigned sixteen years (according to some authorities, two years as viceroy), 735–715 B.C.

In 2 Kings 16:2 the age of Ahaz, at his accession, is given as twenty years. This probably refers to some earlier viceroyship, otherwise he would have been only eleven years old at the birth of his son Hezekiah (cf. 2 Kings 16:2, 20; 18:2). In the latter passage his age is given as twenty-five years.

At the time of his accession, Pekah, king of Israel, and Rezin, king of Syria, were in league against Judah. They proceeded to lay siege to Jerusalem, intending to place on the throne Ben-Tabeel, probably a Syrian noble (Isa. 7:6). Isaiah hastened to announce to him the destruction of the allied monarchs, who failed in their attack upon Jerusalem, although they inflicted serious damage on him elsewhere. Rezin, king of Syria, captured Elath (2 Kings 16:6); Zichri, an Ephraimite, slew the king's son, the ruler of his house, and his prime minister; and Pekah, king of Israel, gained a great advantage over him in a battle in Judah, killing 120,000 men and taking captive 200,000 of his people. These, however, were returned through the remonstrance of the prophet Oded (2 Chron. 28:3–15).

In his extremity Ahaz applied to Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, for assistance, who freed him from his most formidable enemies by invading Syria, taking Damascus, and killing Rezin. He purchased this help at great cost, becoming tributary to Tiglath-pileser. He sent him the treasures of the Temple and of his own palace, and even appeared before him at Damascus as his vassal.

While he was there his idolatrous propensities induced him to take the pattern of a heathen altar and have one like it built in Jerusalem. Upon his return he offered upon the altar, closed the Temple, removed its sacred utensils, and raised shrines to heathen deities everywhere.

He died unlamented, and his body was not deposited in the sacred sepulchers (vv. 16–27).

In an inscription of the famous Assyrian emperor Tiglath-pileser III (744–727 B.C.), referred to as Pul (Pulu) in 2 Kings 15:19, occurs the name of Ahaz. In an account of the payment of tribute by various vassal states of Syria-Palestine including the kings of Hamath, Arvad, Moab, Gaza, Ashkelon, Edom, and others, occurs "Iauhazi [Jehoahaz, i.e., Ahaz] of Judah." Tribute is mentioned as consisting of "gold, silver, lead, iron, tin, brightly colored woolen garments, linen, the purple garments of their lands ... all kinds of costly things, the products of the sea and the dry land ... the royal treasure, horses, mules, broken to the yoke ... (D. D. Luckenbill, Ancient Records of Assyria and Babylonia, vol. 1, sec. 801). M.F.U.

2. A great-grandson of Jonathan, son of King Saul, being one of the four sons of Micah and the father of Jehoaddah or Jarah (1 Chron. 8:35–36; 9:42; in the NIV Jarah is replaced by Jadah).

AHAZI'AH (ā-ha-zī'a; "has grasped Jehovah").

1. The son of Ahab, king of Israel, whom he succeeded in every sense, being as completely under the control of Jezebel and idolatry as was his father (1 Kings 22:51–53). He was the ninth king of Israel and reigned two years, 853–852 B.C. The single most public event of his reign was the revolt of the vassal king of the Moabites, who took the opportunity of the defeat and death of Ahab to discontinue the tribute that he had paid to the Israelites, consisting of one hundred thousand lambs and as many rams with their wool (2 Kings 1:1; 3:4–5). Ahaziah became a party with Jehoshaphat to revive the maritime traffic of the Red Sea. Because of this alliance God was displeased with Jehoshaphat and the vessels were destroyed (2 Chron. 20:35–37). Soon after Ahaziah was injured by falling from the roof gallery of his palace in Samaria (the "lattice" of the text probably meaning a balustrade to keep persons from falling). He sent to inquire of Baal-zebub, the idol of Ekron, what should be the result of his injury. But the messengers were met and sent back by Elijah, who announced that he should rise no more from the bed upon which he lay (2 Kings 1:2–4). He died shortly after and was succeeded by his brother Jehoram (1:17; 3:1).

2. The son of Jehoram by Athaliah and sixth king of Judah, 841 B.C. He is also called Jehoahaz (2 Chron. 21:17; 25:23) and Ahaziah (22:6). He followed the example of his father-in-law, Ahab, and was given to idolatry (2 Kings 8:25–27; 2 Chron. 22:1–4). He joined his uncle, Joram, of Israel, in an expedition against Hazael, king of Syria, which proved disastrous. The king of Israel was wounded, and Ahaziah visited him in Jezreel. During this visit Jehu was secretly anointed king of Israel and conspired against Joram. The two kings rode out in their chariots to meet Jehu, and when Joram was shot through the heart Ahaziah attempted to escape but was pursued as far as the pass of Gur and, being mortally wounded there, only had strength to reach Megiddo, where he died. His body was conveyed by his servants to Jerusalem for burial (2 Kings 9:1–28).

AH'BAN (a'bān; “brother of the wise”). The first named of the two sons of Abishur by Abihail, of the descendants of Judah (1 Chron. 2:29).

A'HER (a'hēr; “another”). A descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:12); probably the same person as Ahiram (Num. 26:38).

A'HI (a'hī; “brotherly”).

1. A son of Abdiel, and head of the tribe of Gad, resident in Bashan (1 Chron. 5:15).

2. The first named of the four sons of Shemer (Shomer, NIV), a leader of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:34).

AHI'AH (a-hī'a; “little brother”). Another mode of anglicizing the name of Ahijah. The term is variously rendered in the KJV, NIV, and NASB. In 1 Sam. 14:3, 18; 1 Kings 4:3; and 1 Chron. 8:7, the term is given as Ahiah in the KJV and Ahijah (which see) in the NASB and NIV. In Neh. 10:26, where the term refers to one of those who subscribed the covenant, drawn up by Nehemiah, to serve the Lord, 445 B.C., the KJV renders Ahijah and the NASB and NIV render Ahiah.

AHI'AM (a-hī'am; perhaps for Achiab, “father's brother”). A son of Sharar, the Hararite, and one of David's thirty heroes (2 Sam. 23:33; 1 Chron. 11:35), 1000 B.C.

AHI'AN (a-hī'an; “brotherly”). The first named of the four sons of Shemidah, of the tribe of Manasseh (1 Chron. 7:19).

AHIE'ZER (a-hī-ē'zēr; “brother of help,” i.e., “helpful”).

1. The son of Ammishaddai and the head of the tribe of Dan when the people were numbered at Sinai (Num. 1:12), about 1438 B.C. He made an offering for the service of the Tabernacle, like the other leaders (Num. 7:66).

2. The chief of the Benjamite warriors who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:3), before 1000 B.C.

AHI'HUD. The English form of two similar Heb. names.

1. Heb. ʾAḥîḥûd, “brother of renown,” refers to the son of Shelomi and head of the tribe of Asher (Num. 34:27). He was one of those appointed by Moses to oversee the partition of Canaan, about 1401 B.C.

2. Heb. ʾAḥîḥûd, “brother of a riddle,” i.e., “mysterious,” refers to the second named of the two later sons of Ehud, the son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:7).

AHI'JAH (ā-hī-jā; “brother of Jehovah”).

1. The son of Phinehas's son Ahitub, and high priest in the reign of Saul (1 Sam. 14:3, 18), about 1020 B.C. He is here described as "the priest of the Lord at Shiloh [and] wearing an ephod." In 14:18 it appears that the Ark was under his care. There is some difficulty in reconciling this with the statement in 1 Chron. 13:3 that they did not seek the Ark in the days of Saul. Some avoid the difficulty by inserting "ephod" for "ark" (K. & D., Com., ad loc.); others, by interpreting ark, in this case, to mean a chest for carrying the ephod. Others apply the expression only to all the latter years of the reign of Saul, when we know that the priestly establishment was at Nob and not at Kiriath-jearim, where the Ark was. But probably the last time that Ahijah inquired of the Lord before the Ark was on the occasion related in 1 Sam. 14:36, when Saul marred his victory over the Philistines by a rash oath, which nearly cost Jonathan his life. But it seems God returned no answer in consequence of Saul's curse. If, as is commonly supposed, Ahijah is the same person as Ahimelech (cf. 1 Sam. 14:3; 22:16; 24:3), this failure to obtain an answer may have led to an estrangement between the king and the high priest, and predisposed the king to suspect Ahimelech's loyalty and to take that terrible revenge upon him for his favor to David. Gesenius supposes (Thesaurus Heb., p. 65) that Ahimelech may have been a brother to Ahijah, and that they officiated simultaneously, the one at Gibeah, or Kiriath-jearim, and the other at Nob.

2. Son of Shisha and a secretary of King Solomon (1 Kings 4:3), about 960 B.C.

3. A prophet of Shiloh (1 Kings 14:2) and hence called the Shilonite (11:29).

There are two remarkable prophecies of Ahijah extant. The one in 1 Kings 11:31–40 is addressed to Jeroboam, about 940 B.C. In this he foretold the rending of the kingdom of Solomon in punishment for his idolatries and the transference of ten tribes after his death to Jeroboam. Solomon, hearing of this prophecy, sought to kill Jeroboam, who fled to Shishak, king of Egypt, and remained there until Solomon's death. The other prophecy (1 Kings 14:6–16) was delivered to the wife of Jeroboam, who came to him in disguise to inquire concerning the king's son, who was sick. In this he foretold the death of the son, the destruction of Jeroboam's house on account of the images he had set up, and the captivity of Israel. In 2 Chron. 9:29 reference is made to a record of the events of Solomon's reign contained in the "prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite."

4. An Israelite of the tribe of Issachar and the father of Baasha, king of Israel (1 Kings 15:27), before 911 B.C.

5. The last named of the five sons of Jerahmeel by his first wife (1 Chron. 2:25).

6. One of the sons of Bela, son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:7), elsewhere (v. 4) called Ahoah (which see).

7. A Pelonite, one of David's famous heroes (1 Chron. 11:36), apparently the same called Eliam (which see), the son of Ahithophel the Gilonite in the parallel passage (2 Sam. 23:34).

8. A Levite appointed, in the arrangement by David, over the sacred treasure of dedicated gifts at the Temple (1 Chron. 26:20; see marg.), 1000 B.C.

9. In the KJV of Neh. 10:26, one of those who subscribed the covenant, drawn up by Nehemiah, to serve the Lord. Rendered Ahiah in the NASB and NIV.

AHI´KAM (a-hi´kam; “my brother has risen”). One of the four persons sent by King Josiah to inquire of the prophetess Huldah concerning the proper course to be pursued in relation to the acknowledged violations of the newly discovered book of the law (2 Kings 22:12–14; 2 Chron. 34:20–22), 624 B.C. He afterward protected the prophet Jeremiah from the persecuting jury of Jehoiakim (Jer. 26:24), about 609 B.C. His son, Gedaliah, showed Jeremiah a like kindness (Jer. 39:14). He was the son of Shaphan and the father of Gedaliah, who was appointed over Judea after the capture of Jerusalem by the Babylonians (2 Kings 25:22; Jer. 40:5–16).

AHI´LUD (a-hi´lud; “brother’s child”). The father of Jehoshaphat, recorder under David and Solomon (2 Sam. 8:16; 20:24; 2 Kings 4:3), and also of Baana, one of Solomon’s deputies (1 Kings 4:12), 960 B.C.

AHIM´AAZ (a-him´a-az; “brother of anger”).

1. The father of Ahinoam, wife of King Saul (1 Sam. 14:50), about 1020 B.C.

2. The son and successor of Zadok (1 Chron. 6:8, 53) in the high priesthood.

When Absalom revolted, David refused to allow the Ark to be removed from Jerusalem, believing that God would bring him back to the city. The high priests, Zadok and Abiathar, necessarily remained in attendance upon it; but their sons, Ahimaaz and Jonathan, concealed themselves outside the city to be in readiness to relate to David any important movements and designs of Absalom that they might receive from within. When, therefore, Hushai informed the priests that Absalom had preferred his own counsel to that of Ahithophel, they sent word to Ahimaaz and Jonathan by a girl, doubtless to avoid suspicion. A lad saw the transaction and informed Absalom, who dispatched servants after them. They were hid by a woman in a dry well, the mouth of which was covered and strewn over with grain. She told the pursuers that the messengers had passed on in haste, and when all was safe she released them, and they made their way to David (2 Sam. 15:24–27; 17:15–22), 967 B.C. After the death of Absalom, Ahimaaz prevailed upon Joab to let him run after the Cushite who had been sent to inform David. He outstripped him, being doubtless swift of foot and taking another route, and proceeded to break the news gently to David, telling him at first only of the victory. While he spoke the Cushite entered and bluntly revealed the truth. The estimate in which he was held by David is shown in his answer to the watchman who announced his coming: “This is a good man and comes with good news” (2 Sam. 18:19–32).

3. Solomon’s deputy in Naphtali, who married Basemath, daughter of Solomon (1 Kings 4:15), about 950 B.C.

AHI´MAN (a-hi´man; “generous” [?]).

1. One of the three famous giants of the race of Anak, who dwelt at Hebron when the Hebrew spies explored the land (Num. 13:22), about 1440 B.C., and who (or their descendants) were afterward expelled by Caleb (Josh. 15:14) and eventually slain by the Judaites (Judg. 1:10).

2. A Levite who was one of the gatekeepers of the Temple (1 Chron. 9:17).

AHIM´ELECH (a-him´e-lek; “brother of the king”).

1. High priest of the Jews and the son of Ahitub (1 Sam. 22:11) and father of Abiathar (v. 20); he was probably the same as Ahijah (which see). He was a descendant of the line of Ithamar through Eli (1 Chron. 24:3, 6; Josephus Ant. 5.11.5; 8.1.3). When David fled from Saul (about 1010 B.C.) he went to Nob, where the Tabernacle then was. His unexpected appearance alarmed Ahimelech, whose anxious inquiry was answered by David’s falsehood, “The king has commissioned me with a matter” (1 Sam. 21:2). Under this pretext Ahimelech was induced to give him bread and the sword of Goliath (21:3–9). A servant of Saul, Doeg, an Edomite, witnessed the transaction, and informed King Saul, who immediately sent for Ahimelech and the other priests then at Nob, and charged them with treason. But they declared their ignorance of any hostile designs on the part of David. This, however, availed them nothing, for the king ordered his guards to slay them. Upon their refusing to do so he commanded Doeg, who slew the priests, eighty-five in number. He then marched to Nob and put to the sword everything it contained (1 Sam. 22:9–20). The only priest that escaped was Abiathar, Ahimelech’s son, who fled to David, and who afterward became high priest (23:6; 30:7). The names in 2 Sam. 8:17 and 1 Chron. 24:6 are commonly regarded as having been transposed by a copyist. (But see the article Abiathar and also no. 2, below, for another explanation.)

2. A son of Abiathar (2 Sam. 8:17; 1 Chron. 18:16; 24:3, 6, 31).

3. A Hittite, one of David’s warriors, whom David invited to accompany him at night into the camp of Saul in the wilderness of Ziph; but Abishai alone seems to have gone with him (1 Sam. 26:6–7), about 1010 B.C.

AHI’MOTH (a-hī’mōth). One of the sons of Elkanah, a Levite (1 Chron. 6:25). In v. 26 he is called Nahath.

AHIN’ADAB (a-hin’a-dab; “noble brother”). Son of Iddo, and one of the twelve deputies of Solomon. His district was Mahanaim, the southern half of the region beyond Jordan (1 Kings 4:14), about 950 B.C.

AHIN’OAM (a-hin’ō-am; “my brother is pleasantness”).

1. The daughter of Ahimaaz and the wife of King Saul (1 Sam. 14:50), about 1020 B.C.

2. A Jezreelitess and one of David’s wives taken before he was king (1 Sam. 25:43), 1004 B.C. She and his other wife, Abigail, lived with him at the court of Achish (27:3). They were taken prisoners by the Amalekites when they plundered Ziklag (30:5) but were rescued by David (v. 18). She went with him to Hebron and resided with him while he remained there as king of Judah (2 Sam. 2:2). She was mother of his eldest son, Amnon (3:2).

AHI’O (a-hī’ō; “brotherly”).

1. One of the sons of the Levite Abinadab, to whom, with his brother, was entrusted the care of the Ark when David first attempted to move it to Jerusalem. Ahio probably guided the oxen, while his brother Uzzah walked by the cart (2 Sam. 6:3–4; 1 Chron. 13:7), 992 B.C.

2. A Benjamite, one of the sons of Beriah (1 Chron. 8:14).

3. One of the sons of Jeiel, a Gibeonite, by Maacah (1 Chron. 8:31; 9:37).

AHI’RA (a-hī’ra). The son of Enan and the leader of the tribe of Naphtali (Num. 2:29). He was appointed as “head man” of his tribe to assist Moses in numbering the people (1:15) and made his contribution to the sacred service on the twelfth day of offering (7:78, 83; 10:27), c. 1440 B.C.

AHI’RAM (a-hī’ram).

1. A son of Benjamin (Num. 26:38).

2. A Phoenician king of Gebal (later Byblos) whose magnificent sarcophagus inscribed with Phoenician writing (c. eleventh century B.C.) was recovered and forms an important link in the development of the Phoenician alphabet. The sarcophagus and jewels of Ahiram are in the National Museum at Beirut. Ahiram of Byblos, however, is not to be identified with Hiram of Tyre, Solomon's ally, although the names are evidently identical, and they lived perhaps contemporaneously. M.F.U.

AHI'RAMITE (a-hī'ra-mīt). A descendant (Num. 26:38) of the Benjamite Ahiram (which see).

AHIS'AMACH (a-his'a-mach; "my brother helps"). Father of one of the famous workers upon the Tabernacle, Oholiab, the Danite (Ex. 31:6; 35:34; 38:23), c. 1440 B.C.

AHISH'AHAR (a-hish'a-har; "brother of the dawn"). A warrior, last named of the sons of Bilhan, of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:10).

AHI'SHAR (a-hī'shar; "my brother has sung"). The officer who was "over the household" of Solomon (1 Kings 4:6), i.e., steward, or governor of the palace, a place of great importance and influence in the East, 960 B.C.

AHITH'OPHEL (a-hith'o-fel; "brother of folly"). A counselor of David whose wisdom was so highly esteemed that his advice had the authority of a divine word (2 Sam. 16:23). Absalom, when he revolted, sent to Ahithophel, who was at Giloh, his native city, and secured his support. He perhaps thought to wield a greater sway under the prince than he had done under David, and he also resented David's conduct to his granddaughter, Bathsheba (cf. 2 Sam. 11:3 with 23:34). When David heard of Ahithophel's defection, he prayed that God would turn his counsel to "foolishness" (doubtless alluding to his name) and induced Hushai, his friend, to go over to Absalom to defeat the counsels of this now dangerous enemy (15:31–37).

Ahithophel's advice to Absalom was to show that the breach between him and his father was irreparable by publicly taking possession of the royal harem (16:20–23). He also recommended immediate pursuit of David and would probably have succeeded had not Hushai's plausible advice been accepted by the council. When Ahithophel saw that his counsel was rejected for that of Hushai, the far-seeing man gave up the cause of Absalom for lost; and he returned to his home in Giloh, hanged himself, and was buried in the grave of his father (17:1–23), 967 B.C.

AHI'TUB (a-hī'tūb; "good brother").

1. The son of Phinehas and grandson of Eli. He probably succeeded the latter in the high priesthood, his father being slain in battle, 1050 B.C. He was succeeded by his son Ahijah, or Ahimelech (1 Sam. 14:3; 22:9, 11, 20).

2. The son of Amariah and father of Zadok, who was made high priest by Saul after the death of Ahimelech (2 Sam. 8:17; 1 Chron. 6:7). It is not probable that this Ahitub was ever high priest. The coincidence of the names (1 Chron. 6:8, 11, 12) would lead us to infer that by the Ahitub found therein is meant Azariah (2 Chron. 31:10). Of the Ahitub mentioned in 1 Chron. 9:11 and Neh. 11:11 nothing definite is known, save that he was "leader of the house of God" (11:11).

AH'LAB (ah'lāb; "fertile"). A town of Asher, whose inhabitants the Israelites were unable to expel (Judg. 1:31). It has not been identified successfully.

AH'LAI (a'lī; "Oh that!").

1. The "son" of Sheshan, a descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 2:31). In v. 34 we read that Sheshan had "no sons, only daughters," that he gave his Egyptian servant, Jarha, his daughter to be his wife, and that this daughter bore a son named Attai (vv. 34–35).

Some suppose Ahlai to be the name of Jarha's wife, but the masculine form of the word and the use of Ahlai (1 Chron. 2:31; 11:41) for a man is adverse to this conclusion. Others suppose Ahlai to be a clerical error for Attai; still others believe that Ahlai was a name given to Jarha on his incorporation into the family of Sheshan; some conjecture that Ahlai was a son of Shesan, born after the marriage of his daughter.

2. The father of one of David's "valiant men" (1 Chron. 11:41), about 995 B.C.

AHO'AH (a-hō'ah; "brotherly"). The son of Bela, the son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:4); called also Ahijah (v. 7) and perhaps Iri (7:7), probably about 1600 B.C. It is probably he whose descendants are called Ahohites (2 Sam. 23:9, 28).

AHO'HITE (a-hō'hīt). A patronymic applied to Dodo, or Dodai, one of the captains under Solomon (1 Chron. 27:4). His son Eleazar was one of David's three chief warriors (2 Sam. 23:9; 1 Chron. 11:12); and Zalmon, or Ilai, was another bodyguard (2 Sam. 23:28; 1 Chron. 11:29); probably from their descent from Ahoah (which see).

AHO'LAH. See Oholah.

AHO'LIAB. See Oholiab.

AHOL'IBAH. See Oholibah.

AHOLIBA'MAH. See Oholibamah.

AHU'MAI (a-hū'mī; "brother of water"). The son of Jahath, a descendant of Judah, and of the family of the Zorathites (1 Chron. 4:2).

AHU'ZZAM (a-hū'zam; "their possession"). The first named of the four sons of Ashhur ("father of Tekoa") by one of his wives, Naarah; of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:6).

AHUZ'ZATH (a-hūz'zath; "possession"). One of the friends (perhaps "favorite") of the Philistine king Abimelech, who accompanied him on his visit to Isaac (Gen. 26:26), about 2040 B.C.

AH'ZAI (ah'zī; perhaps a prolonged form of Ahaz, "possessor," or contracted form of Ahaziah, "whom Jehovah holds"). A grandson of Immer and one whose descendants dwelt in Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (Neh. 11:13). Gesenius thinks he is the same with Jahzerah (which see), who is made the grandson of Immer (1 Chron. 9:12).

A'I (ā'ī; KJV Hai, "the Ruin"). A city near Bethel where Abraham sojourned upon his arrival in Canaan (Gen. 12:8) and which the conquering Israelites under Joshua are said to have destroyed (Josh. 7:2-5; 8:1-29). The site is commonly identified with Et-Tell, 1½ miles from Bethel and excavated in 1933-35 by Judith Marquet-Krause. The diggings revealed an occupational gap in the history of the mound from 2200 B.C. till after 1200 B.C., so that if Ai is represented by Et-Tell, there was nothing but a ruin there when Joshua and the Israelites are said to have destroyed it. Some critics, like Martin Noth, dismiss the biblical story as an etiological legend, which supposedly explains how the place came to be in ruins and to be called "Ruin," the meaning of Ai in Heb. (Palaestina Jahrbuch [1938]: 7-20). Others, such as W. F. Albright (Bull. Am. Schs. 74: 16ff.), assume that the narrative of Josh. 8 originally referred to the destruction of Bethel in the thirteenth century B.C. but that the etiological interest in the ruins of Ai caused the story to be attached to this site instead of Bethel. But this explanation, besides being objectionable in reflecting upon the historicity of the biblical account, is extremely unlikely because the biblical narrative carefully distinguishes between the two cities (Josh. 8:12), and there is not the slightest evidence of any destruction of Bethel at this time (c. 1401 B.C.). More reasonable is the explanation of Hugues Vincent (Revue Biblique [1937]: 231–66) that the inhabitants of Ai had merely a military outpost at Ai of such modest proportions and temporary nature that it left no remains to give a clue of its existence to the archaeologist, although the narrative clearly indicates an inhabited city.

To deal with the continuing problem of Ai, Professor Joseph A. Callaway of Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, in cooperation with several other institutions, conducted five major archaeological expeditions at Et-Tell (1964, 1966, 1968, 1969, 1970) and two small digs (1971–72). Excavation revealed that the earliest village at the site dated to about 3100 B.C. This was rebuilt several times until its destruction and abandonment about 2200 B.C. A small village was built on the site about 1200 B.C. and lasted until the final abandonment of the place in about 1050 B.C. Callaway tended to assume that Et-Tell was Ai, but there is no solid evidence for the identification; scholars such as J. Simon have argued against the identification. D. Livingston (Westminster Theological Journal 33 [1970]: 20–44) suggested that the true site of Ai lay to the SE near a hill named Et-Tawil, but further work at the site is necessary to confirm this suggestion. AI'AH (ā-ī'āh; “a cry,” often “hawk”).

1. The first named of the two sons of Zibeon the Horite (Gen. 36:24; 1 Chron. 1:40), or rather Hivite (Gen. 36:2).

2. The father of Rizpah, Saul's concubine (2 Sam. 3:7; 21:8, 10–11), about 1053 B.C.

AI'ATH (ā-ī'āth; Isa. 10:28). Another form of the city Ai (which see).

AI'JA (ā-ī'ja; Neh. 11:31). Another form of Ai (which see).

AI'JALON (ā'ja-lon; “place of deer” or “gazelles”).

1. A Levitical city of Dan (Josh. 19:42); a city of refuge (Josh. 21:24; 1 Sam. 14:31; 1 Chron. 6:69). It was with reference to the valley named after this town that Joshua said, “O sun, stand still at Gibeon, and O moon in the valley of Aijalon” (Josh. 10:12). Aijalon is the modern Yalo, fourteen miles from Jerusalem, N of the Jaffa road and mentioned as Aialuna in the Amarna Letters.

2. A city in the tribe of Zebulun (Judg. 12:12). Elon, the judge, was buried there. The modern site is uncertain.

AI'JELETH HASHSHA'HAR. Occurs in the title of Ps. 22; it is probably the name of the tune to which the psalm was set.

A'IN (ā'in). Literally, an eye, and also, in the simple but vivid imagery of the East, a spring or natural burst of living water, always to be distinguished from the well or tank of artificial formation, which is designated by the words Beer and Bor. The term Ain most frequently occurs in combination with other words to form the names of definite localities, as Engedi, En-gannim, and so forth. It occurs alone in two cases:

1. One of the landmarks on the eastern boundary of Palestine, as described by Moses (Num. 34:11). It is probably 'Ain el-'Azy, the main source of the Orontes, a spring remarkable for its force and magnitude.

2. One of the southernmost cities of Judah (Josh. 15:32), afterward allotted to Simeon (Josh. 19:7; 1 Chron. 4:32) and given to the priests (Josh. 21:16). In the list of priests' cities in 1 Chron. 6:59 Ashan takes the place of Ain.

AIR (Gk. aēr, "the air," particularly the lower and denser, as distinguished from the higher and rarer, ho aithēr, "ether"). The atmospheric region (Acts 22:23; 1 Thess. 4:17; Rev. 9:2; 16:17). In Eph. 2:2 "the prince of the power of the air" is the devil, the prince of the demons that fill the realm of the air. It is not to be considered as equivalent to darkness (Gk. skotos). "Beating the air" (1 Cor. 9:26) refers to boxers who miss their aim, and means "to contend in vain." "Speaking into the air" (1 Cor. 14:9, i.e., without effect) is used of those who speak what is not understood by their hearers.

A'JAH. Another form of Aiah (which see).

AJ'ALON. Another form of Aijalon (which see).

A'KAN (ā'kan; "twisted"). The last named of the three sons of Ezer, the son of Seir, the Horite (Gen. 36:27), called also (1 Chron. 1:42) Jaakan.

AKELDAMA. See Aceldama.

AKIM. See Achim.

AKKAD. See Accad.

AK'KUB (ak'kūb; "pursuer").

1. The fourth named of the seven sons of Elioenai, or Esli, a descendant of David (1 Chron. 3:24).

2. One of the Levitical gatekeepers of the Temple after the captivity (1 Chron. 9:17; Neh. 11:19; 12:25), 536 B.C. Perhaps the same who assisted Ezra in expounding the law to the people (8:7). His descendants appear to have succeeded to the office (Ezra 2:42).

3. The head of one of the families of Temple servants that returned from Babylon (Ezra 2:45), 536 B.C.

AKRAB'BIM (a-krab'bim; "scorpions"). A place, as the name suggests, which abounded in scorpions; it is located where the country ascends from the neighborhood of the southern end of the Dead Sea to the level of Palestine, and is called the ascent of Akrabbim (Num. 34:4).

AKRAB'BIM, ASCENT OF (a-krab'bim; "steep of scorpions," i.e., "scorpion hill"). A pass in the SE border of Palestine (Num. 34:4; Josh. 15:3). It is identified with the steep pass of es Sufah.

ALABASTER. See Mineral Kingdom.

AL´AMETH. Another form of Alemeth (which see).

ALAM´MELECH. Another form of Allammelech (which see).

AL´AMOTH (al´a´mōth). A musical term (1 Chron. 15:20; title of Ps. 46).

ALARM (Heb. tṣrûcâ, “a loud noise” or “shout”). The peculiar sound of the silver trumpet of the Hebrews, giving them signals while on their journey (Lev. 23:24; 25:9; Num. 10:5–6; 29:1). In times of peace, when the people or rulers were to be assembled together, the trumpet was blown softly. When the camps were to move forward, or the people march to war, it was sounded with a deeper note. A war note, or call to arms, or other public emergency (Jer. 4:19; 49:2).

AL´EMETH (al´e-meth; “covering”).

1. The last named of the nine sons of Becher (Beker, NIV), the son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:8).

2. The first named of the sons of Jehoaddah, or Jarah, the son of Ahaz, of the posterity of Saul (1 Chron. 8:36; 9:42), about 1030 B.C.

A´LEPH (א) (ā´lef; “ox”). The first letter of the Heb. alphabet, corresponding to Gk.

alpha (α), cf. English “a.” But Heb. aleph is a consonant and has no representative in English. It is transliterated by the apostrophe (´). This letter heads Ps. 119, each of the first eight verses beginning with aleph in the Heb.

ALERT (Gk. grēgoreō, to “keep awake,” to “watch”). To take care lest some destructive calamity suddenly overtake one (Matt. 24:42; 25:13; Mark 13:35; Rev. 16:15, “stay awake”), or lest one fall into sin (1 Cor. 16:13; 1 Thess. 5:6; 1 Pet. 5:8). To keep alert (Col. 4:2) is to employ to most punctilious care.

ALEXAN´DER (ăl-ěx-ăn´dēr; “man-defender”).

1. A man, whose father, Simon, a Cyrenian Jew, was compelled to bear the cross of Jesus (Mark 15:21).

2. A kinsman, probably of the high priest, and one of the chief men in Jerusalem, present at the examination of Peter and John before the Sanhedrin for the cure of the lame man (Acts 4:6), A.D. 30.

3. A Jew of Ephesus, known only from the part he took in the uproar about Artemis, which was raised there by the preaching of Paul (Acts 19:33), A.D. 58. He was probably put forward by the Jews to defend them from any connection with the Christians. His appeal to them for opportunity was in vain; an uproar followed for two hours.

4. A coppersmith or brazier, who, with Hymenaeus and others, apostatized (1 Tim. 1:20). It is not certain, but not at all improbable, that he is the same person as the one mentioned in 2 Tim. 4:14, who seems to have opposed and hindered Paul.

ALEXAN´DRIA. A celebrated city and seaport of Egypt situated on a narrow stretch of land between Lake Mareotis and the Mediterranean, fourteen miles from the Canopic mouth of the Nile. It was named for Alexander the Great, who founded it in 331 B.C. The long, narrow island of Pharos was formed into a breakwater to the port by joining the middle of the island to the mainland by means of a mole, seven stadia in length, and hence called the Hepta-stadium. Upon the island of Pharos the famous lighthouse, which Alexander called after his friend Hephaestion, was constructed, but it was not finished until the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, 284–246 B.C.

The most famous of all the public buildings planned by Ptolemy Soter were a library and museum, or college of philosophy, the professors of which were supported out of the public income. The library soon became the largest in the world, numbering over a half million volumes in the second century B.C.

Alexandria is not named in the OT and only incidentally in the NT (Acts 6:9; 18:24; 27:6; 28:11), and yet it is very important to the history of the Jews. There the Gk. translation of the OT called the Septuagint (LXX) was produced during the third and second centuries B.C. In the third century A.D. the city became an important center of Christianity as a result of the work of Clement and Origen. During the fourth century both the heretical leader Arius and the great orthodox theologian Athanasius came from Alexandria. It was also a great center for the production of copies of Scripture, and several early NT manuscripts evidently were produced there; e.g., Codex Alexandrinus (A). H.F.V.

ALEXAN'DRIAN. An inhabitant of Alexandria in Egypt, particularly a Jewish resident there (Acts 6:9; 18:24). The Jews, being highly valued as citizens, were encouraged to settle in the city and were admitted into the first of its three classes of citizens, having equal rights with the Greek inhabitants. In the reign of Tiberius (A.D. 16), the Jews in Alexandria numbered about one-third of the population. Notwithstanding many persecutions and massacres, they continued to form a large proportion of the population and retained their civil rights until A.D. 415, when forty thousand of them were expelled at the instigation of Cyril, the Christian patriarch. They recovered their strength and appear to have been numerous at the time of the Muslim conquest.

ALGUM TREE, ALMUG TREE, ALGUMWOOD. See Vegetable Kingdom: Algum Tree.

ALI'AH (a-lī'ah). A less correct form of Alvah (which see). The second named of the chiefs of Edom, descended from Esau (1 Chron. 1:51).

ALI'AN (a-lī'an). A less correct form of the name Alvan (which see). This person is the first named of the five sons of Shobal, a descendant of Seir (1 Chron. 1:40), about 1853 B.C.

ALIEN (Heb. gēr., lit., “stranger”; Gk. allogrios, “belonging to another,” i.e., “foreign”). A foreigner, or person born in another country, and thus not entitled to the rights of citizenship in the country in which he lives (Deut. 14:21; Ps. 69:8). See Foreigner.

A LITTLE WAY. “Some distance,” NASB. See Metrology: Linear Measures.

ALLAM'MELECH (a-lam'me-lek; “oak of [the] king”). A town in the territory of Asher (Josh. 19:26).

ALLEGORY (Gk. allegoreō). The term occurs only once (Gal. 4:24), “This is allegorically speaking,” NASB; “these things are an allegory,” KJV; “these things may be taken figuratively,” NIV. “To allegorize” means to express or explain one thing under the image of another. “St. Paul is here declaring, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, that the passage he has cited has a second and deeper meaning than it appears to have: that it has that meaning, then, is a positive, objective, and indisputable truth” (Ellicott, Com.). To say that a history is allegorized is quite different from saying that it is allegory itself. “As Hagar bore children to bondage, so does the Sinaitic covenant produce sons under circumcisonal bondage to the heavy ritual” (Whedon, Com.). Dean Trench says, “The allegory needs not, as the parable, an interpretation to be brought to it from without, since it contains its interpretation within itself.” The real object of the allegory is to convey a moral truth. Every allegory is a kind of parable, containing a statement of a few simple facts followed by the explanation or allegorical interpretation (Luke 8:5–15). The allegories found in Scripture are its parabolical representation, such as, in the OT, Song of Sol., Pss. 45, 80, Isa. 5:1–7, and in the NT the parables of our Lord.

In early times there was an allegorical mode of interpreting the historical portions of the OT, which reached its climax in the writings and school of Origen. It assumed a double or threefold sense of the Scriptures, an obvious literal sense, and a hidden spiritual sense, both being intended by the author. Thus the book of Joshua has been treated as an allegory of the soul’s victory over sin and self. The allegorical interpretation of the Bible arose among the Alexandrian Jews in their attempt to reconcile the Mosaic account with Greek philosophy. Thus the four rivers of paradise were seen as Plato’s four cardinal virtues, and Adam as the lower, sensuous man, and so forth. The early Christian church received allegorical interpretation also from the Jews of Alexandria, wishing to reconcile Christianity with Greek thought. Origen taught a threefold sense of Scripture, corresponding to man’s body, soul, and spirit. As we come to the Middle Ages, four senses were found in Scripture: historical, allegorical, moral, and anagogical; e.g., Jerusalem is, literally, a city of Palestine; allegorically, the church; morally, the believing soul; anagogically, the heavenly Jerusalem.

Swedenborg held that “all and every part of Scripture, even the most minute, not excepting the smallest jot or tittle, signify and involve spiritual and celestial things” (Arcana Coelestia. 2). This mode of interpreting Scripture is fascinating and yet dangerous, because there is a temptation to read into the word one’s imaginings and not to be content with its plain and simple teachings.

ALLELUIA. A Gk. form of Hallelujah (which see).

ALLIANCE. The political or social relations formed between nations by treaty. In Scripture such compacts are known as leagues, covenants, treaties, and so forth. In this article we treat them only as related to the Israelites.

Pre-Mosaic. The patriarchs entered into international relations with the peoples of Canaan for their subsistence in the land of promise, not yet given in actual possession. Abraham was allied with some of the Canaanite princes (Gen. 14:13), and he also entered into an alliance with Abimelech the Philistine king (21:22–24, 32), which was renewed by his son (26:27).

Mosaic. Israel, as the covenant people of Jehovah, was to hold itself aloof from heathen influences and idolaters; and, therefore, when they settled in Palestine, alliance with such nations was strongly prohibited (Lev. 18:3–4; 20:23–24). The Israelites’ country and occupation protected them from mixing with peoples that would have endangered their nationality and mission. But it was by no means intended that they should live without any dealings with other nations; rather they were to cultivate friendly relations with them and seek their good. The Mosaic legislation taught Israel to love and respect strangers (Ex. 22:21; 23:9; Lev. 19:33–34; Deut. 10:18–19). The law commanded Israel to root out the nations of Canaan because of their abominations and to make no covenant with them (Ex. 23:32–33; 34:12–16; Deut. 7:1–4); also the Amalekites were to be destroyed (Ex. 17:14, 16; Deut. 25:17–19) because of their cruel attack upon the Israelites. Yet it forbade them to make war upon the other peoples, the Edomites, Ammonites, and Moabites, or to conquer their land (Deut. 2:4–5, 9, 19). The law, therefore, was not opposed to Israel’s forming friendly and peaceful relations with other peoples, nor was it opposed to Israel’s maintaining peace with them by covenants and treaties.

In Later Times. When the commonwealth of Israel was fully established in Canaan, formal alliances sprang up between it and other nations. Thus David entered into friendly relations with Hiram, king of Tyre (2 Sam. 5:11), and with King Hanun, the Ammonite (10:2); and Solomon made a treaty with Hiram to furnish materials and workmen for the Temple (1 Kings 5:2). In neither case was their theocratic standing falsified or endangered. Solomon also entered into treaty relations with a pharaoh, by which he secured the monopoly of trade in horses and other products (10:28–29). We find Asa, when at war with Baasha, king of Israel, sending an embassy to Ben-hadad, king of Syria, reminding him of a league existing between Israel and Judah (2 Chron. 16:2–3), which ceased in Jehu’s reign. When Pekah, king of Israel, with Rezin, king of Syria, laid siege to Jerusalem, Ahaz formed a league with Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria (2 Kings 16:5–10). Later we find the kings of Judah alternately allying themselves with Egypt and Assyria, according as the one or other of these powers was most likely to aid them.

The prophets, however, rightly denounced the treaties by which Israel, distrusting the help of its God, sought to find support from the invasion of nations by allowing themselves to become entangled in idolatrous practices and licentious habits (Ezek. 16:20–43; Hos. 5).

Respecting the rites by which treaties were ratified, see Covenants.

AL’LON (al’lon; “an oak”).

1. The expression in the KJV of Josh. 19:33, “from Allon to Zaanannim,” is more correctly rendered in the NASB, “from the oak in Zaanannim” (cf. NIV, “the large tree”), which served as a landmark.

2. The son of Jedaiah and father of Shiphai, a chief Simeonite, of the family of those who expelled the Hamites from the valley of Gedor (1 Chron. 4:37).

AL’LON-BAC’UTH (al’lon-bak’ūth; “oak of weeping”). A landmark consisting of a tree marking the spot where Deborah, Rebekah’s nurse, was buried (Gen. 35:8).

ALMIGHTY. The word used in the OT as the translation of the Heb. shadday, “mighty,” as, “I am God Almighty” (Gen. 17:1). In the NT it is the word for the Gk. pantokratōr, “all-powerful.”

ALMO’DAD (al-mō’dad). The son of Joktan, of the family of Shem (Gen. 10–26; 1 Chron. 1:20). He is said to have been the founder of an Arabian tribe, the locality of which is unknown.

AL’MON (al’mōn; “hidden”). The last named of the four priestly cities of Benjamin (Josh. 21:18; Allemeth, 1 Chron. 6:60). It is identified with the mound of Khirbet ‘Almit between Geba and Anathoth.

ALMOND. See Vegetable Kingdom.

ALMOND BLOSSOMS (Heb. shāqad, “the awakening one,” probably from its early blossoming). Cups “shaped like almond blossoms” or flowers are referred to in the NASB and NIV of Ex. 25:33–34; 37:19–20 in connection with the design of the golden lampstand in the Tabernacle. The KJV renders “almond.” See Tabernacle of Israel.

For the almond as a plant, see Vegetable Kingdom.

AL'MON-DIBLATHA'IM (al'mon-dib-lā-tha'im). The fifty-first station of the Israelites in the wilderness E of the Dead Sea (Num. 33:46–47). Perhaps the same with Beth-diblathaim (Jer. 48:22) and Diblah (Ezek 6:14). Identified with Deleilat el-Gharbiyeh, a town commanding three roads, 2½ miles NE of Libb.

ALMS, ALMSDEEDS (Gk. eleēmosunē, “beneficence,” or “benefaction” itself). In Heb. שְׂדֵקָה dāqâ, “righteousness,” is the usual equivalent for alms (Ps. 24:5; Prov. 10:2; 11:4; Mic. 6:5). The word alms is not found in the OT but is met with frequently in the Apocrypha. The great antiquity of almsgiving is shown in Job 29:13–17.

Jewish Almsgiving. The general distribution of property in Israel, and the precautions taken to prevent the alienation of inheritances on the one hand, as well as the undue accumulation of wealth on the other, with the promised blessing of Jehovah in case of obedience, tended to make extreme poverty rare. Still there would arise cases of need. Moses imposed for all time the obligation “Therefore I command you, saying, ‘You shall freely open your hand to your brother, to your needy and poor in your land’” (Deut. 15:11). Specific provisions were made for the regular distribution of alms on a large scale among the poorer members of the commonwealth—the Sabbatical year—“so that the needy of your people may eat” (Ex. 23:11); the gleanings of field and fruit and the forgotten sheaf (Lev. 23:22; Deut. 24:19–22); the tithings laid up in store every third year for the Levite, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow (Deut. 14:28–29); the freeing at Jubilee of the poor (Lev. 25:39–54); the law giving the poor the right to enter a field or vineyard and satisfy hunger (Deut. 23:24–25); interest forbidden on loans to the poor (Ex. 22:25; Lev. 25:35–36); the command to entertain at the annual festivals the Levite, stranger, orphan, and poor (Deut. 16:11–14). It is only as we remember these laws that we can understand the expression righteousness, which the OT uses to express the idea of charity (Deut. 24:13; Prov. 10:2; 11:4). Literally meaning “right” or “acts of right,” or “justice,” שְׂדֵקָה came to mean “charity,” because according to the Mosaic law the poor had an inalienable right to certain produce of the soil. Hence it does not exactly correspond to our term alms but occupies a midway position between deeds of right and love.

Naturally, almsgiving came to be considered a virtue (Ezek. 18:7, 9; Prov. 19:17), and a violation of the statutes regarding it a heinous sin (Isa. 58:6–7). Among the later Jews poverty became quite prevalent, owing to foreign dominion and the oppression of wealthy Israelites. The Mosaic statutes were changed to meet the increasing claims upon the charity and benevolence of the community. Two collections were ordered: (1) a daily collection of food (Heb. tamhû, “alms for the dish”) distributed every morning and (2) a weekly collection of money (quppâ, “alms for the box”) distributed weekly. There was also a chamber in the Temple where alms were deposited for the poor of good families who did not wish to receive charity openly.

Almsgiving came to be associated with merit and was looked upon as a means of conciliating God’s favor and warding off evil (Dan. 4:27). It was among the essential virtues of the godly (Isa. 58:4–7; Ezek. 18:7, 9; Amos 2:6–7). To be reduced to soliciting alms was regarded as a curse from God, and Judaism gave no encouragement to begging as a sacred calling.

Christian. Almsgiving was noticed by Jesus in His warning against following the example of those who gave “to be noticed by” men. He urged His followers to give without ostentation, looking to God alone for reward (Matt. 6:1–4). The Christian spirit of caring for the needy is forcibly expressed (1 John 3:17). Christianity does not encourage indolence and consequent poverty (2 Thess. 3:10), and yet it is emphatic in insisting upon the general duty of ministering to those in distress (Luke 3:11; 6:30; 12:33; Acts 9:36; 10:2, 4). The disposition of the giver is of more account than the amount of the gift (Mark 12:41–44; 2 Cor. 8:12; see also Acts 11:29; Rom. 12:13; Eph. 4:28; 1 Tim. 6:18; Heb. 13:16).

AL´PHA AND O´MEGA (Α, Ω) (Gk. alpha, ōmega). The first and last letters of the Gk. alphabet, used to express the eternity of God (Rev. 1:8; 21:6; 22:13; see also Isa. 44:6).

The early Christians frequently placed the letters Α, alpha, and Ω, omega, on either side of the cruciform monogram, formed from the letters Χ, chi, and Ρ, rho, the first two letters of the name Christ, in Gk. ΧΡΙΣΤΟΣ.

ALPHAE´US (al-fē´us).

1. The putative father of James the Less (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13) and husband of that Mary who, with the mother of Jesus and others, was standing by the cross during the crucifixion (John 19:25). By comparing John 19:25 with Luke 24:18 and Matt. 10:3, it appears that Alphaeus is the Gk., and Cleopas or Clopas, the Heb. or Syr., name of the same person.

2. In the KJV and NIV, the father of the evangelist Levi, or Matthew (Mark 2:14). Rendered Alpheus in the NASB.

ALPHE´US (al-fē´us). The father of the evangelist Levi, or Matthew (Mark 2:14).

ALTAR (from Lat. altus, “high”; ara, “elevation”; Heb. mizbēah; Gk. thusiastērion, “place of sacrifice”).

Early. The altar was originally a simple elevation made of earth, rough stones, or turf. The altars for constant use, especially in temple service, were generally of stone, though they might be of other materials. Thus, in Greece, several were built of the ashes of burnt offerings, as that of Zeus at Olympia; and one at Delos made of goats’ horns. The probability is that some of the ancient monuments of unhewn stones, usually thought to be Druidical remains, were derived from altars of primitive times, as cromlechs, in the form of a table, one large stone being supported in a horizontal position upon other stones.

Another form of altar was a heap of small stones with a large, flat stone placed upon its top. Many of these cairns still remain. In some instances, as at Stonehenge, a circle of stones encloses a central one, somewhat similar in construction to those found in Persia. Two pictures discovered at Herculaneum represent sacred Egyptian ceremonies, probably in honor of Isis. The altars in these pictures have at each corner a rising, which continues square to about one-half its height, gradually sloping off to an edge or point. These are, no doubt, the “horns” of the altar (Ex. 27:2).

Heathen altars generally faced the E, standing one behind the other, and so placed that the images of the gods appeared behind them. Upon them were carved the name of the deity or some appropriate symbols. They were of two kinds, higher and lower: the higher for the celestial gods, and called by the Romans altaria; the lower for terrestrial deities, and called arae. There was a third kind of altar, anclabris, or enclabris, a sort of table on which the sacrificial utensils were placed and the entrails of victims laid. The mensa sacra was a table on which incense was sometimes presented and offerings not intended to be burned. Some altars, as well as temples, were dedicated to more than one god; we even read of some being dedicated to all the gods.

Hebrew. The first altar on record is the one built by Noah after leaving the ark (Gen. 8:20). Mention is made of altars erected by Abraham (12:7; 13:4; 22:9), by Isaac (26:25), by Jacob (33:20; 35:1, 3), and by Moses (Ex. 17:15; 20:24–26). In the Tabernacle and Temple two altars were erected, the one for sacrifices and the other for incense.

The Altar of Burnt Offering (Heb. mizbah hā-ōlâ, Ex. 30:28; “bronze altar,” mizbah hann□hōshet, Ex. 39:39; “table of the Lord,” Mal. 1:7, 12). This altar differed in construction, etc., at different times.

In the Tabernacle (Ex. 27:1–8). Here the altar was a hollow square, five cubits in length and breadth and three cubits high, and was made of acacia wood overlaid with bronze (probably copper). The corners terminated in horns (which see). The altar had a grating, which projected through openings on two sides, and had four rings fastened to it for the poles with which the altar was carried. These poles were made of the same materials as the altar. The priests were forbidden to go up to the altar by steps (20:26); the earth was probably raised about the altar to enable them to serve easily.

The utensils for the altar (Ex. 27:3), made of bronze (copper), were ash pans; shovels, for cleaning the altar; basins, for receiving the blood to be sprinkled on the altar; flesh hooks, i.e., large forks, to handle the pieces of flesh; fire pans (38:3), snuffers (25:38). According to Lev. 6:13, the fire on this altar was never to be allowed to go out.

In Solomon’s Temple. In adapting the instruments of worship to the larger proportions of the Temple, the altar of burnt offering was, naturally, increased in size. It became now a square of twenty cubits, with a height of ten cubits (2 Chron. 4:1), made of bronze (copper). This is the altar that was restored by Asa (15:8), removed by Ahaz, probably to make room for the one erected after a model seen by him in Damascus (2 Kings 16:14); “cleansed” by Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:18); and rebuilt by Manasseh (33:16).

In the Second Temple. This altar was erected before the Temple (Ezra 3:3, 6), and on the place occupied by the former (Josephus Ant. 11.4.1). It was probably made of unhewn stone (Ex. 20:25), for in the account of the Temple service by Judas Maccabaeus it is said, “They took whole stones according to the law, and built a new altar according to the former” (1 Macc. 4:47).

In Herod's Temple. According to Josephus, this altar was a square whose sides were fifty cubits each, with a height of fifteen cubits. It had corners like horns, "and the passage up to it was by [a gradual rise from the south]. It was formed without any iron tool, nor did any iron tool so much as touch it at any time" (Wars 5.5.6). According to the Mishna, it was a square thirty-two cubits at the base, and decreasing at intervals until it was twenty-four cubits. The Mishna states, according to Josephus, that the stones were unhewn, and whitewashed every year at the Passover and the feast of Tabernacles. A pipe connected with the SW horn conveyed the blood of victims by a subterranean passage to the Kidron.

Altar of Incense (Heb. mizbēah miqtar q[ā]tōret, "altar of incensing of incense," cf. Ex. 30:1; called also the "golden altar," mizbah hazzāhāb, cf. Ex. 39:38; Num. 4:11).

In the Tabernacle. This would seem to be the "altar ... of wood," further described as "the table that is before the Lord" (Ezek. 41:22). It was made of acacia wood overlaid with gold, and was one cubit square, with a height of two cubits having horns of the same materials (Lev. 4:7). Running around the sides near the top was a border of gold, beneath which were rings for the staves of acacia wood covered with gold, "with which to carry it" (Ex. 30:1–5). Its place was in front of the veil, midway between the walls (Lev. 16:12; Ex. 30:6). In Ex. 40:5 Moses was commanded to place this altar "before the ark of the testimony," and in Heb. 9:4 it is enumerated among the articles within the second veil, i.e., in the Holy of Holies. The meaning, probably, is that the great typical and symbolical importance of this altar associated it with the Holy of Holies.

In Solomon's Temple. In the Temple Solomon built this altar was similar but made of cedar (1 Kings 6:20; 7:48; 1 Chron. 28:18). Upon this altar incense was burned every morning and evening (Ex. 30:7–8), and the blood of atonement was sprinkled upon it (v. 10). Being placed immediately before the throne of Jehovah (Ark of the Covenant), it was the symbol of believing and acceptable prayer.

This is the only altar that appears in the heavenly Temple (Isa. 6:6; Rev. 8:3). It was the altar at which Zacharias was ministering when the angel appeared to him (Luke 1:11).

Other Altars. Mention is made in Isa. 65:3 of "burning incense on bricks," which may have reference to a Babylonian custom of burning incense on bricks covered with magical formulas or cuneiform inscriptions. An Assyrian-Damascene altar erected by Ahaz from a model seen by him in Damascus is referred to in 2 Kings 16:10–13. In Acts 17:23 Paul observes that he has "found an altar [dedicated] 'TO AN UNKNOWN GOD.'" Reliable authorities assure us that there were several altars in Athens with this inscription. Meyer (Com., ad loc.) says, with reference to the meaning of this inscription, "On important occasions, when the reference to a god known by name was wanting, as in public calamities of which no definite god could be assigned as the author, in order to honor or propitiate the god concerned by sacrifice, without lighting on a wrong one, altars were erected which destined and designated the unknown god."

Typology of the Hebrew Altars. The altar of burnt offering (bronze altar) is commonly thought to be a type of the cross upon which Christ, our whole burnt offering (Lev. 1:1–17), offered Himself without blemish unto God (Heb. 9:14), the brass speaking of divine judgment as in the bronze serpent (Num. 21:9; John 3:14; 12:31–33). The altar of incense is a type of Christ our Intercessor (John 17:1–16; Heb.

7:25), through whom our prayers and praises ascend to God (Heb. 13:15; Rev. 8:3–4) and, in turn, pictures the believer-priest's sacrifice of praise and worship (Heb. 13:15).

AL-TAS'CHITH. See Al-tashheth.

AL-TASH'HETH (al-tash'heth). A term found in the titles of Pss. 57, 58, 59, 75.

A'LUSH (a'lūsh). The place of encampment of Israel in the desert, next to Rephidim, where there was no water (Num. 33:13–14).

AL'VAH (al'vā). The second named of the Edomite chieftains descended from Esau (Gen. 36:40). The name is translated Aliah in some versions of 1 Chron. 1:51.

AL'VAN (al'vān; “tall”). The first named of the five sons of Shobal, the Horite, of Mt. Seir (Gen. 36:23); called also Alian in some versions (1 Chron. 1:40).

A'MAD (ā'mad; “station” [?]). A town near the border of Asher (Josh. 19:26); not identified.

A'MAL (ā'mal; “toil”). The last named of the four sons of Helem, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:35).

AM'ALEK (am'a-lek). The son of Eliphaz (the firstborn of Esau) by his concubine, Timna (Gen. 36:12; 1 Chron. 1:36), and chieftain of an Edomite tribe (Gen. 36:16). This tribe was probably not the same as the Amalekites so often mentioned in Scriptures, for Moses speaks of the Amalekites long before this Amalek was born (Gen. 14:7). See Amalekites.

AM'ALEKITES (am'a-lek-īts; also “Amalek, Amalekite”). An ancient race whose history is thus summed up by Balaam (Num. 24:20): “Amalek was the first of the nations, but his end shall be destruction.” Although this people is prominent in the OT, archaeology has as yet revealed nothing concerning them.

In Abraham's time we find the Amalekites SW of the Dead Sea (Gen. 14:7). In the time of Moses they occupied all the desert of et Tih to the borders of Egypt, and most of the Sinaitic peninsula, with the S country of Palestine. There was also a “hill country of the Amalekites” in Ephraim (Judg. 12:15). Two routes lay through the land of Amalek, one by the Isthmus of Suez to Egypt, the other by the Aelanitic arm of the Red Sea (i.e., the Gulf of Akabah). It has been thought that the expedition noted in Gen. 14 may have been connected with the opening of the latter route.

According to the view that we have taken, Amalek, the “son” of Esau (Gen. 36:12, 16) may have been progenitor of a tribe that was merged with the original Amalekites so as to form part of the great Amalekite race, or he may have taken his name from some connection with the Amalekites, possible as Scipio won his name Africanus, or it may have been a mere coincidence. Historical accounts of Amalekites in southern Arabia will then refer to a time subsequent to their dispossession by the Israelites.

Some have supposed that all the Amalekites were descended from Amalek, “son” of Esau. In that case the language of Gen. 14:7 would mean what was “all the country of the Amalekites.”

The Amalekites were always bitter foes of Israel, sometimes alone, sometimes in conjunction with other tribes. Their first attack was made in time of distress at Rephidim. They were doomed to utter destruction; but though they suffered heavily, especially at the hands of Saul and David, the sentence was so imperfectly executed that there was a remnant to be smitten in the days of Hezekiah (1 Chron. 4:43). This is their last appearance in Bible history. In the Sinaitic peninsula are massive stone buildings averaging seven feet high by eight feet diameter inside, which may perhaps be remains of the Amalekites.

A'MAM (a'mam). A city in the S of Judah (Josh. 15:26), probably in the tract afterward assigned to Simeon (19:1–9).

AMA'NA (ā-man'a; "fixed"). A mountain (song of Sol. 4:8), part of Anti-Libanus, from which the waters of Abana flow.

AMA'NAH (a-mā'na; "constant"). In the NASB of 2 Kings 5:12, the marg. reading of Abanah (which see). The KJV and NIV render Abana.

AMARANTHINE (Gk. amarantinos, "unfading"). The original of KJV "that fadeth not away" (1 Pet. 5:4; cf. 1:4, Gk. amarantos), and "meaning composed of amaranth, a flower so called because it never withers or fades, and when plucked off revives if moistened with water; hence it is a symbol of perpetuity and immortality."

AMARI'AH (am-a-rī'a; "said [i.e., promised] by Jehovah").

1. A person mentioned in 1 Chron. 6:7, 52, in the list of the descendants of Aaron by his eldest son, Eleazar, as the son of Meraioth and father of Ahitub, 1440 B.C. There is no means of determining whether Amariah was ever high priest, but it is probable that he was the last of the high priests of Eleazar's line prior to its transfer to the line of Ithamar in the person of Eli (which see). Josephus calls him Arophaeus and says he lived in private, the pontificate being at the time in the family of Ithamar.

2. A high priest at a later date (probably 740 B.C.), son of another Azariah and father of another Ahitub (1 Chron. 6:11; Ezra 7:3).

3. A Levite, second son of Hebron and grandson of Kohath and of the lineage of Moses (1 Chron. 23:19; 24:23).

4. A chief priest active in the reforms instituted by King Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 19:11), 873–849 B.C.

5. One of the Levites appointed by Hezekiah to superintend the distribution of the Temple dues among the sacerdotal cities (2 Chron. 31:15), 726 B.C.

6. A Jew, son of Bani, who divorced his Gentile wife, whom he had married after the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:42), 456 B.C.

7. One of the priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 11:4), 536 B.C.; and probably the same person who years after (445 B.C.) sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (10:3). He appears to have been identical with the chief priest, the father of Jehohanan (12:13).

8. The son of Shephatiah and father of Zechariah. His descendant Athaiah was one of the Judahite residents in Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 11:4), 445 B.C.

9. The great-grandfather of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph. 1:1).

AMARNA, EL- ("city of the horizon"). The modern name of ancient Akhetaton, the capital city of Amenhotep IV (Akhnaton), who reigned c. 1387–1366 B.C. At this place, located some 190 miles S of present-day Cairo, a peasant woman in 1887 accidentally discovered some three hundred clay tablets in Akkadian cuneiform, the lingua franca of the fifteenth and fourteenth centuries B.C. These constituted the diplomatic correspondence of petty Canaanite princelings with their Egyptian overlords Amenophis III and Amenophis IV (Akhnaton) in the first half of the fourteenth century B.C. Although many difficulties of interpretation remain, this earliest known international diplomatic correspondence seems to portray the general situation in Palestine during the Israelite invasion under Joshua. This is to be expected if the early date of the Exodus (c. 1440) and of the conquest (c. 1440) is accepted; moreover, the evidence in the letters of a large number of city-states owing allegiance to Egypt and yet free to form alliances to deal with local problems tallies with indications in the Joshua narrative. The Habiru, who appear prominently in the letters of Abdi-Hiba, governor of Jerusalem, to Akhnaton asking for Egyptian troops to stem off these invaders, were once thought to have been the invading Hebrews under Joshua. The linguistic equation making Habiru equal to Hebrew is no longer accepted by scholars. R.K.H.; H.F.V.

AM'ASA (am'a-sa; "burden").

1. The son of Abigail, a sister of King David, by Jether, or Jithra (which see), an Ishmaelite (2 Sam. 17:25; 1 Kings 2:5, 32; 1 Chron. 2:17). His paternity probably led David to neglect him in comparison with the more honored sons of David's other sister, Zeruiah. He joined Absalom in his rebellion and was appointed by him commander in chief in the place of Joab, by whom he was totally defeated in the forest of Ephraim (2 Sam. 18:6–7). Afterward David gave him command of his army in place of Joab, who had incurred displeasure by his overbearing conduct and his slaying of Absalom (19:13), after 1000 B.C. On the breaking out of Sheba's rebellion, Amasa was so tardy in his movements (probably from the reluctance of the troops to follow him) that David dispatched Abishai with the household troops in pursuit of Sheba, and Joab joined his brother as a volunteer. Amasa overtook them at the great stone of Gibeon, and Joab, while in the act of saluting him, struck and killed him with his sword, thus ridding himself of a dangerous rival. Joab continued the pursuit of Sheba and, by his popularity with the army, prevented David from removing him from command or calling him to account for his bloody deed (2 Sam. 20:4–13). Whether Amasa be identical with the Amasai who is mentioned among David's commanders (1 Chron. 12:18) is uncertain.

2. A son of Hadlai and chief of Ephraim, who with others vehemently and successfully resisted the retention as prisoners the persons whom Pekah, king of Israel, had taken captive in a campaign against Ahaz, king of Judah (2 Chron. 28:12), about 735 B.C.

AMAS'AI (a-mas'ā-i; "burden bearer").

1. A Levite, son of Elkanah, and father of Mahath, of the ancestry of Samuel (1 Chron. 6:25, 35).

2. One of the chief captains of Judah who, with a considerable body of men from Judah and Benjamin, joined David while an outlaw at Ziklag. He, with others, was made captain of David's band (1 Chron. 12:18), about 1015 B.C. This is the Amasai who is supposed by some to be identical with Amasa.

3. One of the priests appointed to precede the Ark with blowing of trumpets on its removal from the house of Obed-edom to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 15:24).

4. Another Levite, and father of the Mahath who assisted Hezekiah in restoring the worship of God and was active in cleansing the Temple (2 Chron. 29:12), 726 B.C. AMASH'AI. See Amashsai.

AMASH'SAI (a-mash'sā-ī; probably an incorrect form of the name Amasai). The son of Azarel, and one of the priests appointed by Nehemiah to reside at Jerusalem and do the work of the Temple (Neh. 11:13), 445 B.C.

AMASI'AH (am-a-sī'ā; "burden of Jehovah"). The son of Zichri, a chieftain of Judah, who volunteered to assist King Jehoshaphat in his religious reform, with 200,000 chosen troops (2 Chron. 17:16), 872 B.C.

AMAZI'AH (am-a-zī'ā; "Jehovah is mighty").

1. The son and successor of Jehoash, or Joash, and the ninth ruler of Judah. He ascended the throne at the age of twenty-five and reigned twenty-nine years (2 Kings 14:1–2; 2 Chron. 25:1), 796–767 B.C. He began his reign by killing the persons who had murdered his father but spared their children according to the Mosaic injunction (Deut. 24:16). In the twelfth year of his reign he prepared a great expedition for the recovery of Edom, which had revolted from Jehoram. He raised a large army (300,000) of his own and increased it by hiring 100,000 Israelites, the first example of a mercenary army that occurs in the history of the Jews. At the command of the prophet he dismissed these mercenaries, who returned in anger and sacked several of the cities of Judah. The obedience of Amaziah was rewarded by a great victory over the Edomites, ten thousand of whom were slain in battle and ten thousand more dashed to pieces from the rocks of Sela, which Amaziah took and called Joktheel. Among the spoil that he took were the idols of Mt. Seir, in the worship of which Amaziah allowed himself to be engaged. Then began his disasters. A prophet was sent to reprove him, and he resented his faithful admonition. The prophet then foretold his downfall. Urged by arrogance or provoked by the conduct of the disbanded mercenaries, he sent a challenge to the king of Israel to meet him in battle. The king returned him a scornful reply through a parable and advised him to remain at home. Amaziah, still belligerent, was met by Jehoash and by him defeated, taken prisoner, and brought to Jerusalem, his own metropolis. The N city wall was broken down, the Temple and palace despoiled, and hostages taken. Amaziah was allowed to remain on the throne and survived about fifteen years, when a conspiracy was formed against him and he was slain at Lachish. His body was brought "on horses" to Jerusalem and buried in the royal sepulcher (2 Kings 14:1–20; 2 Chron. 25:2–28).

2. The father of Joshah, one of the Simeonite chiefs who expelled the Amalekites from the valley of Gedor in the time of Hezekiah (1 Chron. 4:34), after 726 B.C.

3. The son of Hilkiyah and father of Hashabiah, a Levite of the ancestry of Ethan, a singer of the Temple (1 Chron. 6:45), considerably before 1000 B.C.

4. The priest of the golden calves at Bethel in the time of Jeroboam II, c. 793–753 B.C. He complained to the king of Amos's prophecies of coming evil and urged the prophet to withdraw into the kingdom of Judah and prophesy there. Amos in reply told him of the severe degradation his family should undergo in the approaching captivity of the Northern Kingdom (Amos 7:10–17), c. 770 B.C.

AMBASSADOR (Heb. šîr, one who goes on an "errand"; lûš, "interpreter"; malāk, "messenger"). The isolated position of ancient Israel rendered comparatively unnecessary the employment of ambassadors, although examples are afforded of the employment of such functionaries. They do not seem to have known of “ministers resident” at a foreign court, all the embassies of which we read being “extraordinary.” David sent ambassadors to Hanun, king of the Ammonites, to congratulate him upon his accession to the throne (2 Sam. 10:2), and Hiram sent them to Solomon for a like purpose (1 Kings 5:1). Toi, king of Hamath, sent his son Joram to David “to greet him and bless him” after his victory over Hadadezer (2 Sam. 8:10). Ambassadors were also sent to protest against a wrong (Judg. 11:12), to solicit favors (Num. 20:14), and to contract alliances (Josh. 9:3–6).

Ambassadors were not considered as representing the person of the sovereign according to present thought, but rather as distinguished and privileged messengers, and their dignity was rather that of heralds (2 Sam. 10:1–5). More frequent mention is made of them after Israel came to have relations with Syria, Babylon, etc. They were usually men of high rank. The word occurs once in the NT (2 Cor. 5:20, Gk.

presbeuō, to be a “senior”).

AMBER. See article Glowing Metal.

AMBUSH (Heb. ʾārab, to “lie in wait”). A lying in wait and concealment to attack by surprise. Joshua, at the capture of Ai, shows himself to have been skilled in this method of warfare (Josh. 8). The attempt on the part of Abimelech to surprise Shechem (Judg. 9:30–35) appears to have been unskillful.

AMEN (Heb. āmēn; Gk. amēn, “true, faithful”). A word used to affirm and confirm a statement. Strictly an adjective, meaning firm, metaphorically faithful, it came to be used as an adverb by which something is asserted or confirmed. Used at the beginning of a sentence, it emphasizes what is about to be said. It is frequently so employed by our Lord and is translated “truly.” It is often used to confirm the words of another and adds the wish for success to another’s vows and predictions. “The repetition of the word employed by John alone in his gospel (twenty-five times) has the force of a superlative, most assuredly” (Grimm, Gk. Lex., s.v.).

Among the Jews the liturgical use of the word is illustrated by the response of the woman in the trial by the water of jealousy (Num. 5:22), by that of the people at Mt. Ebal (Deut. 27:15–26; cf. Neh 5:13; see also 1 Chron. 16:36). It was a custom, which passed over from the synagogues into the Christian assemblies, that when he who had read or discoursed had offered up a solemn prayer to God the others in attendance responded Amen, and thus made the substance of what was uttered their own (1 Cor. 14:16). Several of the church Fathers refer to this custom, and Jerome says that at the conclusion of public prayer the united voice of the people sounded like the fall of water or the noise of thunder.

AMETHYST. See Mineral Kingdom.

A'MI (a'mī). One of the servants of Solomon whose descendants went up from Babylon (Ezra 2:57). In Neh. 7:59 he is called Amon.

AMIABLE (Heb. yādîd, “loved”). The word occurs only in Ps. 84:1, KJV, “How amiable are thy tabernacles.” In 127:2 it is rendered “beloved.” Its plural form, signifying “delights,” is found in the title to Ps. 45, “A song of love.”

AMIN'ADAB. A Gk. form (Matt 1:4; Luke 3:33, KJV) of Amminadab (which see).

AMIT'TAI (a-mit'tī; “true”). A native of Gathhepher, of the tribe of Zebulun, and father of the prophet Jonah (2 Kings 14:25; Jonah 1:1), c. 800 B.C.

AM'MAH (am'mā; Heb. ammā, a “cubit”). The place reached by Joab and Abishai at sundown in their pursuit of Abner (2 Sam. 2:24).

AM'MI (am'ī; i.e., as explained in the marg. of the KJV, “my people”). A figurative name applied to the kingdom of Israel in token of God's reconciliation with them, in contrast with the equally significant name Lo-ammi given by the prophet Hosea to his second son by Gomer, the daughter of Diblaim (Hos. 1–9). In the same manner Ruhamah contrasts with Lo-ruhamah.

AM'MIEL (am'i-el; “people of God”).

1. The son of Gemalli, of the tribe of Dan, one of the twelve spies sent by Moses to explore the land of Canaan (Num. 13:12), c. 1439 B.C. He was, of course, one of the ten who perished by the plague for their “very bad report” (Num. 14:37).

2. The father of Machir of Lo-debar, who entertained Mephibosheth until he was befriended by David (2 Sam. 9:4–5; 17:27), before 1000 B.C.

3. The father of Bathsheba, wife of Uriah and afterward of David (1 Chron. 3:5), before 1030 B.C. In 2 Sam. 11:3 he is called Eliam (which see), by the transposition of the first and last syllables.

4. The sixth son of Obed-edom, and one of the gatekeepers of the Temple (1 Chron. 26:5), about 955 B.C.

AMMI'HUD (am-mi'hud; “people of glory”).

1. An Ephraimite, whose son Elishama was appointed head of the tribe at the time of the Exodus (Num. 1:10; 2:18; 7:48, 53; 10:22; 1 Chron. 7:26), before 1210 B.C.

2. The father of Samuel who was the Simeonite leader appointed for the division of the Promised Land (Num. 34:20), before 1452 B.C.

3. A man of the tribe of Naphtali, whose son Pedahel was head of the tribe and was appointed for the division of the land (Num. 34:28), before 1452 B.C.

4. The father of Talmai, king of Geshur, to whom Absalom fled after his murder of Amnon (2 Sam. 13:37), before 1030 B.C.

5. The son of Omri and descendant of Pharez, and father of Uthai, who was one of the first to live at Jerusalem on the return from Babylon (1 Chron. 9:4), before 536 B.C.

AMMIN'ADAB (am-min'ā-dab; “people of liberality”).

1. Son of Ram (Aram, KJV of Matt. 1:4) and father of Nahshon (Naason, KJV of Luke 3:32) who was head of the tribe of Judah at the first numbering of Israel in the second year of the Exodus (Num. 1:7; 2:3), about 1440 B.C. He was the fourth in descent from Judah, the sixth in ascent from David (Ruth 4:19–20; 1 Chron. 2:10), and one of the ancestors of Jesus Christ (Matt. 1:4; Luke 3:33; KJV renders Aminadab). He is probably the same Amminadab whose daughter Elisheba was married to Aaron (Ex. 6:23).

2. A son of Kohath, the second son of Levi (1 Chron. 6:22). In vv. 2 and 18 he seems to be called Izhar (which see).

3. A Levite of the sons of Uzziel, who, with 112 of his relatives was appointed by David to assist in bringing up the Ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 15:10–11), 1000 B.C.

AMMIN'ADIB (am-min'ā-dib; another form of Amminadab, mentioned in the margin of song of Sol. 6:12). A person whose chariots were proverbial for their swiftness from which he appears to have been, like Jehu, one of the most celebrated charioteers of his day.

AMMISHAD'DAI (am-mi-shad'dā-ī; “people of the Almighty”). The father of Ahiezer, head of the tribe of Dan at the time of the Exodus (Num. 1:12; 2:25; 7:66, 71; 10:25), before 1440 B.C.

AMMIZ'ABAD (am-miz'ā-bad; "people of endowment"). The son and subaltern of Benaiah, who was David's captain of the host commanding in the third month (1 Chron. 27:6), 1000 B.C.

AM'MON (am'mon; "inbred," another form of Ben-ammi, which see). The son of Lot by his youngest daughter (Gen. 19:38), about 2000 B.C. His descendants were called Ammonites (Deut. 2:20), sons of Ammon (Gen. 19:38), and sometimes simply Ammon (Neh. 13:23).

AM'MONITES (am'mon-īts). A nomadic race descended from Lot's youngest daughter, as the more civilized Moabites were from the elder one (Gen. 19:36–38). The two tribes were so connected that their names seem sometimes to have been used interchangeably (cf. Deut. 23:3 with Num. 22:2–7; Num. 21:29 with Judg. 11:24; and Judg. 11:13 with Num. 21:26).

Ammon, having dispossessed the Zamzummim (Deut. 2:19–21), dwelt E and N of Moab, from the Arnon to the Jabbok; "Sihon, king of the Amorites" having just before the Exodus taken the land between these streams from "the former king of Moab" (Num. 21:26), "from the wilderness as far as Jordan" (Judg. 11:22), and thus crowded Ammon eastward into the desert.

Although the Israelites were forbidden to molest the Ammonites, Ammon was often in league with other nations against Israel, such as with Moab (Deut. 23:3–4); with Moab and Amalek (Judg. 3:12–13), with the Syrians (2 Sam. 10:1–19), with Gebal and Amalek (Ps. 83:7), and was almost always hostile, both before and after the captivity (Neh. 4:3, etc.; see also Judith, chaps. 5–7; 1 Macc. 6:30–43), till all were swallowed up by Rome. In the time of Justin Martyr (about A.D. 150) the Ammonites were quite numerous, but in the time of Origen (about A.D. 186–254) they were merged with the Arabs.

The Ammonites were governed by a king (1 Sam. 12:12). The national deity was Molech (1 Kings 11:7), often called Milcom (1 Kings 11:5, 33). The capital was Rabbah, or Rabbath Ammon, for a while called Philadelphia from Ptolemy Philadelphus, but now called Amman.

The Ammonites seem to have furnished a small contingent to the Syrian confederacy against Shalmaneser II (854 B.C.), and Budnilu of Ammon was among the twelve kings of the Hatti and of the seacoast who sent ambassadors to Esarhaddon at Nineveh (671 B.C.).

The Ammonite names in the Bible show that the language was akin to that of the Hebrews.

Solomon set an example in marrying Ammonite women, Rehoboam's mother being Naamah, an Ammonitess (1 Kings 14:31), which example Israel was too ready to imitate (Neh. 13:23).

The doom of desolation prophesied against Ammon (Ezek. 25:5, 10; Zeph. 2:9) has been literally fulfilled. "Nothing but ruins are found here by the amazed explorer. Not an inhabited village remains, and not an Ammonite exists on the face of the earth" (Thomson, Land and Book, 3:622).

AM'NON (am'non; "faithful").

1. The eldest son of David by Ahinoam, the Jezreelitess, born in Hebron (2 Sam. 3:2; 1 Chron. 3:1), before 1000 B.C. By the advice and assistance of Jonadab he violated his half sister Tamar, which her brother Absalom avenged two years after by causing him to be assassinated (2 Sam. 13).

2. The first named of the four sons of Shimon, or Shammai, of the children of Ezra, the descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 4:20).

AMOK (A-mok'). One of the priests who returned from exile in Babylonia with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:7, 20). E.H.M.

A'MOMUM (a'mō-mum). The Gk. word ammōmon occurs only in Rev. 18:13, where it is rendered "spice" (see marg.). It is, however, the name of a plant. See Vegetable Kingdom.

A'MON (ā'mon; "faithful").

1. The governor of "the city" (probably Samaria) in the time of Ahab, who was charged to keep Micaiah till the king should return from the siege of Ramoth-gilead (1 Kings 22:26; 2 Chron. 18:25), 850 B.C.

2. The fifteenth king of Judah, who succeeded his father, Manasseh, at the age of twenty-two (642 B.C.) and reigned two years. He followed Manasseh's idolatries without sharing his repentance. When he fell victim to a court conspiracy, the people avenged his death by slaying the conspirators and placing upon the throne his son Josiah, age eight. Amon was buried with his father in the garden of Uzza (2 Kings 21:19–26; 2 Chron. 33:20–25).

3. The head, or ancestor, of one of the families of the Temple servants who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel after the captivity (Neh. 7:59), before 536 B.C.

4. An Egyptian deity (Amon, "the hidden one"). See Gods, False: Amon.

AM'ORITES (am'o-rīts; Heb. always singular, used collectively, hā'ēmōrî, "the Amorite"). A tribe descended from Canaan (Gen. 10:16) and one of the seven whose lands were given to Israel (Deut. 7:1; cf. Gen. 15:16). "The Amorite" means literally "the Westerner," whence the name Amorites is generally supposed to mean "western highlanders" (cf. Num. 13:29; Deut. 1:7–20; Josh. 10:6), or "tall ones" (cf. Amos 2:9; see also Num. 13:33; Deut. 2:10).

The Amorites were so prominent that their name seems sometimes to be used for Canaanites in general (e.g., Josh. 24:8), and in the Amarna Letters Amurri is the name for Palestine-Phoenicia.

In Abraham's day the Amorites lived W of the Dead Sea, in Hazazon-tamar (Gen. 14:7), "that is Engedi" (2 Chron. 20:2), now Ain Jidi, and about Hebron (Gen. 14:13, cf. 13:18). The Israelites found E of the Jordan two Amorite kingdoms: that of Sihon, which lay along the Jordan from the Arnon (Wadi Mojib) to the Jabbok (Wadi Zerka), and from the Jordan to the desert (Judg. 11:21–22); and that of Og, king of Bashan, from the valley of Arnon to Mt. Hermon (Jebel esh Sheik) (Deut. 3:4, 8–9).

As Sihon and Og attempted to act on the offensive, Israel immediately possessed their territories (Deut. 3:8–10). The Israelites' next collision with the Amorites was with the anti-Gibeonite confederacy of the five Amorite kings of Jerusalem, Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, and Eglon (Josh. 10:1–43). Amorites also appear in the northern confederacy that was vanquished near the waters of Merom (11:1–14). This was the last hostile stand of the Amorites. In the days of Samuel they were at peace with Israel

(1 Sam. 7:14). Solomon levied on the remnant of the Amorites and of the other Canaanite nations a tribute of bond service (1 Kings 9:20–21). The other notices of the Amorites after Solomon’s day are mere historical reminiscences.

The Akkadians called the Amorites Amurru, and in the third millennium B.C. Syria-Palestine was called “the land of the Amorites.” The First Dynasty of Babylon (c. 1830–1550 B.C.) was Amorite, and its most important king, Hammurabi the Great (1728–1686 B.C.), conquered the Amorite capital Mari (which see; the site is known today as Tell Hariri) on the Middle Euphrates near present-day Abou Kemal. The dynasty of Babylon fell when the Hittites sacked Babylon c. 1550. Thousands of clay tablets from the archives of an Amorite king at Mari are now in the Louvre Museum in Paris as the result of the excavations of that ancient Amorite center since 1933 by André Parrot. From the palace archives of Zimri-Lim, the last king of Mari, more than 20,000 tablets were recovered, a large number representing diplomatic correspondence of this king with his own ambassadors and with the great Hammurabi himself. The Mari Letters shed remarkable light on the customs recounted in the patriarchal narratives of Genesis.

A`MOS (ā`mos; “burden”).

1. One of the twelve minor prophets and a native of Tekoa, a town about six miles S of Bethlehem. He belonged to the shepherds there and was not trained in any school of the prophets. Yet, without dedicating himself to the calling of a prophet, he was called by the Lord to prophesy concerning Israel in the reigns of Uzziah, king of Judah, and Jeroboam, king of Israel, c. 786–746 B.C., two years before the earthquake (Amos 1:1), about 763 B.C. The exact date of his appearing, or the length of his ministry, cannot be given. The two kingdoms were at the summit of their prosperity. Idleness, luxury, and oppression were general, and idolatry prevalent. It was at such a time as this that the plain shepherd of Tekoa was sent into Israel and prophesied at Bethel. This is almost a solitary instance of a prophet’s being sent from Judah into Israel and, doubtless, attracted considerable attention. His prophetic utterances were directed against Judah as well as Israel, and closed with promises of divine mercy and returning favor to the chosen race. He was charged with a conspiracy against Jeroboam, the king, and threatened by Amaziah, the high priest of Bethel. After fulfilling his mission he probably returned to Judah. The time and manner of his death are unknown.

2. The ninth in the line of ascent from Christ, being the son of Nahum and father of Mattathias (Luke 3:25), about 400 B.C.

AMOS, BOOK OF. The second quarter of the eighth century B.C. in which Amos prophesied was one of great wealth and corruption. As a result of Jeroboam II’s successes against the Moabites and the Aramaeans, the borders of the Northern Kingdom reached their widest extent since the Solomonic era (2 Kings 14:25; Amos 6:14). Fiery denunciation of the luxurious living, idolatry, and moral depravity of Israel were the subject of the rustic prophet from the mountaintop Judean village of Tekoa. But beyond the warning of judgment and final captivity upon the backslidden people, the prophet catches a magnificent glimpse of the yet-future millennial kingdom (9:11–15).

Contents. The book itself falls into three divisions: Part I. Judgments upon surrounding nations—Damascus, Philistia, Phoenicia, Edom, Ammon, Moab (1:1–2:3)—and upon Judah (2:4–5) and Israel herself (2:6–16). Part II. Divine indictment of the whole family of Jacob (3:1–9:10), including three denunciatory sermons (3:1–6:14) and five symbolic visions (7:1–9:10). Part III. Future kingdom blessing of restored Israel (9:11–15), embracing the Messiah’s return and the establishment of the earthly messianic reign (9:11–12), millennial prosperity (9:13), and a restored Jewish nation (9:14–15).

Authenticity. The divine authority of the prophecy is corroborated by the NT. Stephen, in his speech before the Sanhedrin (Acts 7:42–43), quotes Amos 5:25–27. James, addressing the Jerusalem Council (Acts 15:16), cites Amos 9:11.

Criticism. Nearly all critics except the ultra-radical concede the substantial integrity of the prophecy, except for 1:9–10; 1:11–12; 2:4–5; three doxologies 4:13; 5:8; 9:5–6; and the messianic-millennial passage 9:11–15. The assumptions under which these passages are commonly regarded as later additions (glosses), however, are the result of erroneous theories of the development of Israel’s religion. Oesterley and Robinson, for example, regard 9:11–12 as exilic, because it envisions the Tabernacle of David as having fallen (Introduction to the Books of the O.T. [1934], p. 366). But A. Bentzen (Introduction to the O.T. [1949], 2:142) is correct in showing that Amos saw David’s house as fallen “because it had lost the position which it had occupied in David’s own time, not as a consequence of the events of 587, which he had not seen.”

A’MOZ (ā’moz; “strong”). The father of the prophet Isaiah (2 Kings 19:2; Isa. 1:1), before 738 B.C. According to rabbinical tradition, he was also the brother of King Amaziah, and a prophet; but of this there is no proof.

AMPHIP’OLIS (am-fip’o-lis; “a city surrounded,” so called because the Strymon flowed round it). A city of Macedonia through which Paul and Silas passed on their way from Philippi to Thessalonica (Acts 17:1). It was about thirty-three miles from Philippi. The Greek Archaeological Service excavated S of the acropolis of Amphipolis in 1920, uncovering the foundations of an early Christian basilica, and subsequently worked on the site of the necropolis, about a mile NW of the ancient town. The “Lion of Amphipolis,” erected in the early part of the fourth century B.C. to commemorate some unknown victory, was also turned up by the excavators and has been properly mounted once more along the main highway near the town. H.F.V.

AM’PLIAS. See Ampliatus.

AMPLIATUS (am’pli-a-tus). A Christian at Rome, mentioned by Paul as one whom he particularly loved (Rom. 16:8; KJV renders Amplias), A.D. 60.

AM’RAM (am’ram; “high people”).

1. The first named of the sons of Kohath, a Levite. He married his father’s sister Jochebed, and by her became the father of Miriam, Aaron, and Moses (Ex. 6:18, 20; Num. 26:59). He died at 137, probably before the Exodus.

2. One of the sons of Bani, who, after the return from Babylon, separated from his Gentile wife (Ezra 10:34), 456 B.C.

3. A son of Dishon, properly known as Hemdan (which see). He is incorrectly given as Amram in the KJV of 1 Chron. 1:41 (“Hamran,” NASB).

AM’RAMITES (am’ram-īts). Descendants (Num. 3:27; 1 Chron. 26:23) of Amram, no. 1.

AM’RAPHEL (am’ra-fel). A king of Shinar, the alluvial lowland of southern Babylonia, and an ally of Chedorlaomer in the invasion of the W in the time of Abraham, c. 2080 B.C., and formerly generally identified with Hammurabi the Great of the First Dynasty of Babylon (c. 1728–1689). This Amraphel-Hammurabi equation always was difficult linguistically but is now also disproved chronologically. M.F.U.

AMULET (Heb. lāhāshûm, “charms”; Isa. 3:20, KJV, “earrings”). A supposed preservative against sickness, accident, witchcraft, and evil spirits or demons. Amulets consisted of precious stones, gems, gold, and sometimes of parchment written over with some inscription. They have been widely used from antiquity and are still worn in many parts of the world. They were often worn as earrings (which see), as the centerpiece of a necklace, and among the Egyptians frequently consisted of the emblems of various deities. Among the Arabs the figure of an open hand is used, as well as that of a serpent. See also Dress.

Amulets formed part of the trappings that Jacob commanded his household to put away (Gen. 35:4). The most fanciful and superstitious notions have prevailed respecting the marvelous powers of gems. The gem appropriate for a particular month was worn as an amulet during the month and was supposed to exert mysterious control in reference to beauty, health, riches, and so forth. One’s person and house were thought to be protected from malignant influences by holy inscriptions placed upon the door. The existence of such a custom is implied in the attempt of Moses to turn them to a proper use by directing that certain passages of the law should be employed (Ex. 13:9, 16; Deut. 6:9; 11:18), “to look at and remember all the commandments of the Lord, so as to do them” (Num. 15:39). Such written scrolls afterward degenerated into instruments of superstition among the Jews, so that “there was hardly any people ... that more used or were more fond of amulets, charms, mutterings, exorcisms, and all kinds of enchantments” (Lightfoot, Horae Heb., Matt. 24:24). These amulets consisted of little roots, parts of animals, or, more commonly, bits of paper or parchment upon which were written words or characters, and were supposed to have magical power to protect from evil spirits. One of the most frequent of the latter was the cabalistic hexagonal figure known as “the shield of David,” and “the seal of Solomon.”

Many of the Christians of the first century wore amulets marked with a fish as a symbol of the Redeemer, or the pentangle, consisting of three triangles intersected and made of five lines, which could be so set forth with the body of man as to touch and point out the places where our Savior was wounded. Among the Gnostics Abraxas gems were used. At a later period ribbons with sentences of Scripture written on them were hung about the neck. The Council of Trullo ordered the makers of all amulets to be excommunicated and deemed the wearers of them guilty of heathen superstition. See Teraphim.

AM’ZI (am’zī; “strong”).

1. Son of Bani, of the family of Merari, and in the ancestry of Ethan, who was appointed one of the leaders of the Temple music (1 Chron. 6:46).

2. Son of Zechariah and ancestor of Adaiah, who was actively engaged in the building of the second Temple (Neh. 11:12), before 445 B.C.

A'NAB (ā'nab; "grapes"). A place upon the mountains of Judah from which Joshua expelled the Anakim (Num. 13:33; Josh. 11:21; 15:50); now bearing the same name Khirbet 'Anab; about thirteen miles SW of Hebron.

ANAGOGICAL. The spiritual method of biblical interpretation relating to the eternal glory of the believer to which its teachings are supposed to lead; thus the rest of the Sabbath, in an anagogical sense, signifies the repose of the saints in heaven.

A'NAH (a'nāh; "answer"). The son of Zibeon and grandson of Seir. His daughter Oholibamah is the second named of Esau's wives (Gen. 36:2, 14, 25). An Anah is mentioned in 36:20 as one of the sons of Seir and head of an Edomite tribe. Both passages probably refer to the same person, the word sons being used in v. 20 in the larger sense of descendants. While feeding his father's donkeys in the desert, he discovered warm springs, from which circumstance he probably obtained the name Beeri, "the man of the wells" (cf. Gen. 26:34; 36:24).

ANA'HARATH (a-nā'ha-rath; "gorge"). A town within Issachar (Josh. 19:19). Now identified with 'En-na'ûrah.

ANAI'AH (a-nī'a; "Jah has answered"). One of the persons (probably priests) who stood at the right hand of Ezra while he read the law to the people (Neh. 8:4), and perhaps the same as one of the leaders of the people who joined Nehemiah in a sacred covenant (10:22), 445 B.C.

A'NAK (ā'nak; "long-necked," i.e., "a giant"). The son of Arba, the founder of Kiriath-arba. He was the progenitor of a race of giants called Anakim. These Anakim were a terror to the children of Israel (Num. 13:22, 28) but were driven out by Caleb, who came into possession of Hebron (Josh. 15:13–14).

ANAKIM. See Giant.

ANALOGY (Gk. analogia, "proportion").

Works of God. As applied to these, analogy generally leads to the conclusion that (1) a part of a system of which he is the author must, in respect of its leading principles, be similar to the whole of that system; (2) the work of an intelligent and moral being must bear in all its lineaments traces of the character of its author; (3) the revelation of God in Scriptures is in all respects agreeable to what we know of God from the works of nature and the order of the world.

Analogy of Faith. This phrase is derived from the words of the apostle Paul (Rom. 12:6), "If prophecy, according to the proportion of his faith," and signifies the harmony of the different parts of Scripture. The parts of Scripture must be explained according to the tenor of the whole, not bringing any one part so conspicuously into view as to obscure or contradict others. Thus, for example, the exaggerated teaching respecting the dignity of the virgin Mary's relation to our Lord has tended to obscure the doctrines relating to our Lord as the only Mediator. The better to follow the analogy of the faith, one should study the Scriptures with a love of truth for its own sake and not with the purpose of finding proof for opinions already formed.

AN'AMIM (an'a-mim). Descendants of Mizraim (Gen. 10:13; 1 Chron. 1:11) and an Egyptian tribe of which nothing is known.

ANAMITES (NIV). The same as Anamim.

ANAM'MELECH. See Gods, False.

A'NAN (ā'nān; a “cloud”). One of the chief Israelites who sealed the covenant on the return from Babylon (Neh. 10:26), 445 B.C.

ANA'NI (a-nā'ni; “cloudy”). The last named of the seven sons of Elieoenai, a descendant of David, after the captivity (1 Chron. 3:24), about 400 B.C.

ANANI'AH (an-a-nī'a; “protected by Jehovah”).

1. The father of Maaseiah and grandfather of Azariah. The latter repaired a portion of the wall of Jerusalem after the return from exile (Neh. 3:23), about 445 B.C.

2. The name of a town in Benjamin, mentioned as inhabited after the captivity (Neh. 11:32), perhaps Bethany, E of Jerusalem.

ANANI'AS (an-a-nī'as; of Heb. Ananiah, “protected by Jehovah”).

1. A member of the early Christian church at Jerusalem, who, conspiring with his wife, Sapphira, to deceive and defraud the brethren, was overtaken by sudden death and immediately buried (Acts 5:1–5). The members of the Jerusalem church had a common fund, which was divided by the apostles among the poor. Those who carried into full effect the principle that “not one of them claimed that anything belonging to him was his own” sold their lands and houses and laid the price at the apostles' feet (4:32, 34–35). One Joseph, surnamed Barnabas, had done this and, it would seem, had received hearty commendation for it. Probably incited by this and desirous of applause, Ananias and his wife, Sapphira, sold a possession and brought the pretended price to the apostle. Either their covetousness or fear of want influenced them to keep back part of the price—an acted lie. Peter was moved by the Spirit to uncover the deceit; instead of extenuating it because the lie had not been uttered, he passed on all such prevarication the awful sentence, “You have not lied to men, but to God” (5:4). Upon hearing these words Ananias “fell down and breathed his last” and was carried out and buried by the young men present (5:5–6). See Sapphira. The apparent undue severity of the punishment meted out upon Ananias and Sapphira is to be explained as “a sin leading to [physical] death” (1 John 5:16). It was an offense that involved being given over to Satan “for the destruction of his flesh, that his spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus” (1 Cor. 5:5). The ushering in of a new era at Pentecost necessitated that offenders against divine dealing in grace might be made a public example, such as Nadab and Abihu (Lev. 10:1–10) were made a similar warning when they disregarded God's commands at the beginning of the legal age.

The expression “All things were common property to them” (Acts 4:32) should not imply that the first Christians adopted a form of modern Communism, divesting themselves of individual property, and throwing all they had and earned into a common stock. They had a common fund, but that it was not binding upon all to contribute everything to it is evident from what Peter said to Ananias—that he might have kept the land if he had chosen or even have used its price after it was sold. The principle universally accepted was that none should want while any of their brethren had the means of helping them. By becoming Christians the Jewish converts suffered the loss of all things unless they had property independent of the will, favor, or patronage of others, and the proportion of these was few. So deep an offense against Jewish prejudices cast them loose from Jewish charities and involved loss of employment to such as were traders and dismissal from their employments to such as were workmen and servants, producing a state of destitution that rendered extraordinary exertions necessary on the part of the more prosperous brethren. This is illustrated and proved by what we actually see in operation at this day in Jerusalem.

2. A devout and honored Christian of Damascus, to whom the Lord appeared in a vision and bade him go to a street called Straight and inquire at the house of Judas for Saul of Tarsus (Acts 9:10–11). Ananias at first hesitated because of his knowledge of Saul’s former character and conduct. But assured of Saul’s conversion and God’s purpose concerning him, he consented. He “departed and entered the house, and after laying his hands on him said, ‘Brother Saul, the Lord Jesus, who appeared to you on the road by which you were coming, has sent me so that you may regain your sight, and be filled with the Holy Spirit.’ And immediately there fell from his eyes something like scales”; and, recovering his sight which he had lost when the Lord appeared to him on the way to Damascus, Paul, the new convert, arose, was baptized, and preached Jesus in the synagogues (Acts 9:17–20; 22:12–16), A.D. 35 or 36. Tradition makes Ananias to have been afterward bishop of Damascus and to have suffered martyrdom.

3. The high priest before whom Paul was brought previous to being taken to Felix (Acts 23). He was made high priest by Herod, king of Chalcis, who for this purpose removed Joseph, the son of Camydu (Josephus Ant. 20.5.2). Being implicated in the quarrels of the Jews and the Samaritans, he with others was sent to Rome to answer for his conduct before Claudius Caesar (20.6.2). The emperor decided in favor of the accused party, and Ananias returned with credit and remained in office until Agrippa gave it to Ismael (20.8.8). When Paul appeared before Ananias he made the declaration “I have lived my life with a perfectly good conscience before God up to this day” (Acts 23:1). Thereupon the high priest ordered the apostle to be struck in the face. Paul, indignant at so unprovoked an assault, replied, “God is going to strike you, you whitewashed wall.” Being asked, “Do you revile God’s high priest?” Paul said, “I was not aware, brethren, that he was high priest,” perhaps having overlooked in his warmth the honor due him in his official station (Acts 23:2–5). A plot having been formed against Paul, he was sent by Claudius Lysias to Felix, whither he was followed by Ananias (accompanied by the orator Tertullus), who appeared against him (23:23–24:1). Ananias was deposed shortly before Felix quitted his government, and was finally assassinated (Josephus Wars 2.17.9), 67 B.C.

‘ANAT. See Gods, False.

A’NATH (a’nath; an “answer,” i.e., to prayer).

1. The father of Shamgar, the third of the judges of Israel after the death of Joshua (Judg. 3:31; 5:6). Perhaps 1250 B.C.

2. ‘Anat (Anath, āṅnāt), a N Semitic goddess, now well known from the religious epic literature discovered at Ras Shamra (ancient Ugarit) from 1929 to 1937. See also Gods, False: ‘Anat; Asherah; Ashtoreth.

ANATHEMA (Gk. anathema, a “thing laid by”). A votive offering consecrated to a god and hung up in the temple. When used in this general sense, as it often is by classical writers, it is written with a long ē, anathēma (Luke 21:5, “gifts”). The form anathema and its special meaning seem to be peculiar to the Hellenistic dialect, probably from the use made of the word by the Greek Jews. In the LXX anathema is generally the translation of the Heb. word herem, to “consecrate.” The following are its uses:

Old Testament. A type of vow (which see) by which persons and things were irrevocably and irredeemably devoted to the Lord (Lev. 27; Num. 21:2) and in such a way that the persons devoted had to be put to death, while the things fell to the sanctuary or to the priests. But inasmuch as the deliberate killing of anyone, even a slave, was treated as a punishable offense (Ex. 21:20), it is evident that the pronouncing of the anathema could not be left to the pleasure of any individual, since it might be used for impious purposes. The anathema, being a manifestation of the judicial holiness of God, realizing itself in executing righteous judgment upon men, assumed the character of a theocratic penalty. It could, therefore, be inflicted only by God or by the divinely appointed authorities, acting with a view to the glory of God and the upholding and edifying of His kingdom.

It was sometimes a command and not a vow. The only instance in which the anathema is expressly enjoined in the law is the command against those who served other gods (Ex. 22:20), even against whole cities. In such cases the men and cattle were ordered to be put to death by the sword and the houses with their contents to be burned (Deut. 13:12–17). This was carried out, especially in the case of the Canaanites (20:17–18), but in all its severity against Jericho alone (Josh. 6:17–18). In the case of the other cities, only the inhabitants were put to death, the cities themselves being spared (Josh. 10:28–42). Often the cattle were spared and with the rest of the spoil divided among the soldiers (Deut. 2:34–35; 3:6–7; Josh. 8:21–22, 27; 11:11–12, 14). In case anyone retained a part of that which had been anathematized for his own use, he brought upon himself the anathema of death (6:18; 7:11–12; cf. Deut. 13:17).

Among the Later Jews. In later years the ban of the synagogue was the excommunication or exclusion of a Jew (usually for heresy or blasphemy) from the synagogue and the congregation or from familiar communication with other Jews. This modification of the anathema owes its origin to Ezra 10:8, where the herem consisted in the anathematizing of the man's entire possessions and the exclusion of the anathematized individual from the congregation. The later rabbinical writers mention three degrees of anathema: (1) Niddusi, "separation," a temporary suspension from ecclesiastical privileges, which might be pronounced for twenty-four reasons. It lasted thirty days and was pronounced without a curse. The person thus anathematized could enter the Temple only on the left hand, the usual way of departure; if he died while under anathema there was no mourning for him, and a stone on his coffin denoted that he was separated from his people and deserved stoning. (2) Herem, "curse." This was pronounced upon the individual who did not repent at the expiration of thirty days by an assemblage of at least ten persons and was accompanied with curses. The person so excommunicated was cut off from all social and religious privileges; it was unlawful to eat or drink with him (1 Cor. 5:11). The anathema could be removed by three common persons or by one person of dignity. (3) Upon the still impenitent person was inflicted the severer punishment of shammata, "imprecation," a solemn act of expulsion from the congregation, accompanied with fearful curses, including the giving up of the individual to the judgment of God and to final perdition.

In the New Testament. From the above we are prepared to find that the anathema of the NT always implies execration but do not think that the word was employed in the sense of technical excommunication either from the Jewish or Christian church. It occurs only five or six times.

In Acts 23:12 it is recorded that certain Jews "bound themselves under an oath" (lit., anathematized themselves) "that they would neither eat nor drink until they had killed Paul." The probability seems to be that these persons looked upon Paul as unworthy of life and considered it their religious duty to bring about his death. They therefore anathematized, i.e., devoted themselves to destruction, if they drew back from their purpose.

When Peter was charged the third time with being a follower of Jesus he began “to curse and swear” (Matt. 26:74, i.e., “anathematize”). This is thought by some to be a vulgar oath; by others, an imprecation he called down upon himself in case he should be found telling an untruth.

In Rom. 9:3 Paul writes, “I could wish that I myself were accursed [anathema], separated from Christ.” We have no means of knowing exactly what the apostle intended to be understood by the above expression. From the words “accursed ... from Christ” we are hardly warranted in believing that he referred to either (1) the OT anathema or (2) the ban of the synagogue. Nor does it seem to refer to sudden death or a judicial act of the Christian church. Meyer (Com., ad loc.) observes, “Paul sees those who belong to the fellowship of his people advancing to ruin through their unbelief; therefore he would fain wish that he himself were a curse offering, if by means of this sacrifice of his own self he could only save the beloved brethren.” Much of the difficulty of understanding this passage would be obviated if we remember that the apostle does not give expression to a decision formally reached, but rather to a sentiment stirred within him by an unutterable sorrow. He “could wish himself accursed, if the purport of the wish could be realized to the advantage of the Israelites” (Meyer, Com.).

“Let him be accursed” (Gal. 1:8–9) has the probable meaning of, “Let him be execrable and anathema.”

“No one speaking by the Spirit of God says, ‘Jesus is accursed’” (anathema, 1 Cor. 12:3) means, doubtless, the act of any private individual who execrated Christ and accounted Him accursed. The thought appears to be that those who speak by the Spirit do not execrate Jesus, but confess Him as Lord.

In 1 Cor. 16:22 we find the expression “Let him be accursed. Maranatha.” In this the apostle announces his accord with the will of God, that those who are destitute of love to Jesus should be doomed to final perdition. Maranatha is the Aram. phrase for “the Lord comes” and seems to be used in this connection to indicate that the fulfillment of such punishment will be associated with His coming.

Roman Catholic View. “The Church has used the phrase ‘anathema sit’ from the earliest times with reference to those whom she excludes from her communion, either because of moral offenses or because they persist in heresy. In pronouncing anathema against willful heretics the Church does but declare that they are excluded from her communion, and that they must, if they continue obstinate, perish eternally” (Cath Dict.).

ANATHEMATA (from anatithēmi, “to lay up”). In general the term was applied to all kinds of ornaments in churches, these things having been set apart to the service of God. In Luke 21:5 the word is thus used for the gifts and ornaments of the Temple. In a stricter sense the word is used to denote memorials of great favors that men had received from God. Very early a custom, still existing, sprang up of anyone receiving a signal cure presenting to the church what was called his ectypoma, or figure of the member cured, in gold or silver. Anathemata is also a term used to designate the coverings of the altar.

AN’ATHOTH (an’a-thōth; “answers,” i.e., to prayer).

1. One of the sons of Becher, the son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:8), B.C.

2. One of the chief Israelites who sealed the covenant after the return from Babylon (Neh. 10:19), about 445 B.C.

3. A town in the tribe of Benjamin belonging to the priests, also a city of refuge (Josh. 21:18; Jer. 1:1). It is chiefly noted as the birthplace of the prophet Jeremiah, and also his residence (Jer. 1:1; 11:21–23; 29:27). It was a walled town of some strength, seated on a broad ridge of hills and overlooking the valley of the Jordan and the northern part of the Dead Sea. It was three miles NE of Jerusalem. Modern research identifies the present Anata with Anathoth, an hour and a quarter distant from Jerusalem, containing about one hundred inhabitants. See 2 Sam. 23:27; 1 Chron. 12:3; Ezra 2:23; Neh. 7:27.

ANCHOR (Gk. ankura). Very naturally the anchor has been in use from the earliest times. In the heroic times of the Greeks large stones called eunai were used for anchors. The anchors used by the Romans were usually of iron and in shape resembled the modern anchor. The scriptural mention of the use of anchors is in Acts 27:29–30, 40. From this passage it would seem that anchors were used at both the stern and bow of vessels.

Figurative. In Heb. 6:19 the anchor is used metaphorically for a spiritual support in times of trial, in which sense it is still frequently employed. In the early church it was also used with reference to the persecutions which threatened the ship of the church. In some cases, above the transverse bar of the anchor stands the letter E, probably an abbreviation of Elpis, “hope.” Sometimes the anchor was associated with the fish, the symbol of the Savior, the union of the two symbols expressing “hope in Jesus Christ.”

ANCIENT OF DAYS (Aram. “advanced in days”). An expression applied to Jehovah in a vision of Daniel (7:9, 13, 22). “When Daniel represents the true God as an aged man, he does so not in contrast with the recent gods of the heathen which Antiochus Epiphanes wished to introduce, or specially with reference to new gods; for God is not called the old God, but appears only as an old man, because age inspires veneration and conveys the impression of majesty. This impression is heightened by the robe with which He is covered, and by the appearance of the hair of His head, and also by the flames of fire which are seen to go forth from His throne” (Keil, Com., ad loc.).

ANCIENTS (Heb. zāqēn, “old”). The aged either decrepit or vigorous (Gen. 18:12–13; 19:31; 24:1, etc.); elders, i.e., chief men, magistrates (Isa. 3:14; 24:23; Jer. 19:1; Ezek. 7:26; 8:11–12). See Elders.

ANDREW. (Gk. Andreas, “manly”). A native of the city of Bethsaida in Galilee (John 1:44), the son of John (21:15) and brother of Simon Peter (Matt. 4:18; 10:2; John 1:40).

Receives Christ. At first a disciple of John the Baptist, Andrew was led to receive Jesus when John pointed Him out as “the Lamb of God” (John 1:36–40). He then brought his brother Simon to the Master, telling him that he had “found the Messiah” (v. 41). They both returned to their occupation as fishermen on the Sea of Galilee and remained there until, after John the Baptist’s imprisonment, they were called by Jesus to follow Him (Matt. 4:18–20; Mark 1:14–18).

As Apostle. Further mention of him in the gospels includes his being ordained as one of the twelve (Matt. 10:2; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:14); his calling the attention of our Lord to the lad with the loaves and fishes at the feeding of the five thousand (John 6:8–9); his introducing to Jesus certain Greeks who desired to see Him (12:20–22); and his asking, along with his brother Simon and the two sons of Zebedee, for a further explanation of what the Master had said in reference to the destruction of the Temple (Mark 13:3–4). He was one of those who, after the ascension, continued at Jerusalem in the “upper room” (Acts 1:13). Scripture relates nothing of him beyond these scattered notices.

Traditions. The traditions about him are various. Eusebius makes him preach in Scythia; Jerome and Theodoret in Achaia (Greece); Nicephorus in Asia Minor and Thrace. It is supposed that he founded a church in Constantinople and ordained Stachys (which see), named by Paul (Rom. 16:9), as its first bishop. At length, tradition states, he came to Patrae, a city of Achaia, where Aegeas, the proconsul, enraged that he persisted in preaching, commanded him to join in sacrificing to the heathen gods, and upon the apostle’s refusal ordered him to be severely scourged and then crucified. To make his death more lingering, he was fastened to the cross, not with nails, but with cords. Having hung two days, praising God, and exhorting the spectators to embrace, or adhere to, the faith, he is said to have expired on November 30, but in what year is uncertain. The cross is stated to have been of the form called Crux decussata, and commonly known as “St. Andrew’s cross, .” Some ancient writers speak of an apocryphal Acts of Andrew.

ANDRONI´CUS (an-dro-nī´kus; “man-conquer- ing”). A Jewish Christian, kinsman and fellow prisoner of Paul. He was converted before Paul and was of note among the apostles (Rom. 16:7), A.D. 60. According to Hippolytus, he became bishop of Pannonia; according to Dorotheus, of Spain.

A´NEM (a´nem; “two fountains”). A Levitical city in Issachar, assigned to the Gershomites (1 Chron. 6:73). It is called En-gannim (Josh. 19:21; 21:29).

A´NER (a´nēr).

1. A Canaanite chief near Hebron who, with Eschol and Mamre, was confederate with Abraham. He joined in pursuit of Chedorlaomer and shared in the spoil, not following the example of Abraham (Gen. 14:13, 24), about 2060 B.C.

2. A Levitical city assigned to the Kohathites and situated in Manasseh, W of the Jordan (1 Chron. 6:70). It is called Taanach (Josh. 21:25).

AN´ETHOTITE (an´e-tho-tīt). Also Anetothite, less correct forms of anglicizing the word Anathothite. See Anathoth.

ANGEL (Heb. mal´āk; Gk. angelos, both meaning “messenger”). In some cases the word is applied to human beings (Mal. 2:7; Rev. 1:20) or even figuratively to impersonal agents (Ex. 14:19; 2 Sam. 24:16–17; Ps. 104:4). The connection must determine its force. In its most common use in Scripture the word nevertheless designates certain spiritual and superhuman beings who are introduced to us as messengers of God. There are but few books of the Bible—such as Ruth, Nehemiah, Esther, the epistles of John, and James—that make no mention of angels.

With respect to their existence and nature, we find the Scriptures presenting the same progress and development as with many other subjects of revelation. Thus it is that the doctrine of angels becomes more distinct in the later periods of Jewish history and is more full and significant in the NT writings. Angels appear most frequently and conspicuously in connection with the coming and ministry of our Lord. His words concerning the angels are of unmistakable meaning and value. According to His teaching they are personal, sinless, immortal beings, existing in great number, and in close relation not only with individual men but also with the history of God's kingdom (Matt. 13:39; 18:10; 22:30; 25:31; 26:53; Luke 15:10; 16:22).

There is harmony between the teachings of our Lord upon this subject and those of the apostles and other Scripture writers. Many questions that may be raised can receive no answer whatever from the Scriptures. Of the history of the angels we can know but little. It is clear that Satan and the fallen angels (demons) were created sinless and later fell (Isa. 14:12–15; Rev. 12:3–4). Some of their number “did not keep their own domain” but fell under divine displeasure and are reserved “for the judgment of the great day” (Jude 6).

Aside from the teachings of Scripture there is nothing irrational, but quite the opposite, in believing in the existence of creatures superior to man in intelligence, as there are many inferior. But we depend wholly upon the Scriptures for our knowledge. The denial of the existence of angels, as that of a personal devil and demons, springs from the materialistic, unbelieving spirit, which in its most terrible form denies the existence of God.

The revelations of Scripture concerning angels are few, but nevertheless have great value:

1. They furnish a necessary safeguard against narrowness of thought as to the extent and variety of the creations of God.
 2. They help us in acquiring the proper conception of Christ, who is above the angels, and the object of angelic worship.
 3. They give a wonderful attractiveness to our conception of that unseen world to which we are hastening.
 4. They set before us an example of joyous and perfect fulfillment of God's will. “Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven,” i.e., by the angels.
 5. They put to shame the horrible indifference of multitudes of mankind with respect to the great work of conversion. “There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner who repents” (Luke 15:10).
 6. They broaden our view of the manifold mercies of God, whose angels are “sent out to render service for the sake of those who will inherit salvation” (Heb. 1:14; cf. 12:22).
 7. They remind us of our high rank as human beings, and our exalted destiny as Christians. We, who are made but “a little lower than the angels” (KJV, Ps. 8:5; NASB, “lower than God”) may become “like angels in heaven” (Matt. 22:30).

ANGELS, FALLEN. Besides the good, elect, and unfallen angels two classes of fallen angels exist:

1. The angels who are unimprisoned and follow Satan as their leader. These apparently are identical with the demons (which see). During the Great Tribulation war will ensue between “Michael and his angels” and “the dragon and his angels” (Rev. 12:7). The dragon will be cast out of the heavenlies upon the earth and his angels with him (12:8–9). These are remanded to the abyss at the second coming of Christ (20:1–3) and consigned to the lake of fire after their final postmillennial revolt (Matt. 25:41; Rev. 20:10).

2. The angels who are imprisoned are the more wicked spirits that did not maintain their original estate “but abandoned their proper abode,” being “kept in eternal bonds under darkness” awaiting judgment (Jude 6; 2 Pet. 2:4; 1 Cor. 6:3). Many Bible teachers hold that they include the fallen angels that cohabited with mortal women (Gen. 6:1–2) and were imprisoned in the nether world as a special punishment for their crime of breaking through God-ordained orders of being. M.F.U.

ANGER. The emotion of instant displeasure and indignation arising from the feeling of injury done or intended, or from the discovery of offense against law.

The anger attributed to God in the NT is that part of God that stands opposed to man’s disobedience, obstinacy (especially in resisting the gospel), and sin, and manifests itself in punishing the same.

Anger is not evil per se, being, as love, an original susceptibility of our nature. If anger were in itself sinful, how could God Himself be angry? Paul commands the Ephesians (Eph. 4:26) that when angry they are not to sin. “Paul does not forbid the being angry in itself, and could not forbid it, because there is a holy anger, which is the ‘spur to virtue,’ as there is also a divine anger; ... but the being angry is to be without sin” (Meyer, Com., ad loc.).

Anger is sinful when it rises too soon, without reflection; when the injury that awakens it is only apparent; when it is disproportionate to the offense; when it is transferred from the guilty to the innocent; when it is too long protracted and becomes revengeful (Matt. 5:22; Eph. 4:26; Col. 3:8).

ANGLE. See Fishhook.

ANIAM (a-nī’am). The fourth named of the four sons of Shemidah, of the tribe of Manasseh (1 Chron. 7:19). E.H.M.

A’NIM (a’nim; “fountains”). A city in the mountains of Judah (Josh. 15:50), ten miles SW of Hebron, and probably the same as the present Khirbet Ghuwein et Tahta.

ANIMAL. An organized living body, endowed with sensation. In the Heb. there are several terms rendered “creature,” “living thing,” “cattle,” and so forth. The animals in Lev. 11 are divided into four classes: (1) larger terrestrial animals (v. 2); (2) aquatic animals (vv. 9–10); (3) birds (vv. 13–19); (4) smaller animals (vv. 20, 29, 41); and these classes were again distinguished into clean, i.e., eatable, and into unclean, whose flesh was not to be eaten (cf. Lev. 11 and Deut. 14:1–20). The larger terrestrial animals were, moreover, in the OT separated into cattle, i.e., tame domestic animals, and into beasts of the field or wild beasts.

Clean and Unclean. The distinction between clean and unclean animals goes back to the time of primeval man (Gen. 7:2; 8:20), but it did not originate in a dualistic view of creation. According to Bible teaching all the creatures of the earth were created good and pure, as creations of the holy God (1:31). Impurity entered into creation through man’s Fall; and the irrational creature, although not affected by sin, suffered under its consequences. From the lists (Lev. 11:1–31, 46–47; Deut. 14:1–20), the clean animals (i.e., such as could be eaten) were ruminant quadrupeds, which parted the hoof, were cloven-footed, and chewed the cud; aquatic animals with fins and scales; all birds except the nineteen species named; flying insects, having two long legs for leaping, such as the grasshopper.

For Sacrifice. Sacrifices were of (1) the beef kind—a cow, bull, or calf; the ox, having been mutilated, could not have been offered (Lev. 22:24); (2) the goat kind—a he-goat, a she-goat, or a kid; (3) the sheep kind—an ewe, ram, or lamb. See Sacrifice.

These regulations would seem to have been abrogated by our Lord, when He taught that inward purity was the great essential (Matt. 15:11, 17–20). In his vision Peter was taught the essential cleanliness of all God’s creatures (Acts 10:11–16).

Paul speaks decidedly upon this point (Rom. 14; Col. 2:16; Titus 1:15), and yet the apostolic council at Jerusalem placed things “strangled” and “blood” along with things “contaminated by idols and from fornication,” on the list of things prohibited (Acts 15:20).

ANIMAL KINGDOM. The proportion of animals mentioned in the Bible compared with the total number found in Bible lands is far larger than that which occurs in the case of plants. There are 38 mammals, out of perhaps 130, 34 birds out of about 350, 11 reptiles out of nearly 100, and one amphibian out of a considerable number indigenous to these lands. It is a notable fact that not a single species of fish is mentioned by name. Of insects there are 16, out of a number not as yet satisfactorily settled. Scorpions and spiders are mentioned generically. The number of species is considerable. Four only of the large number of mollusks and only one of the worms are specifically named. Coral and sponge are the generic representations of their respective orders. Few even of the mammals, except the domestic animals, are specific. Most of them are generic or family names, to which is often appended “after his kind.”

Adder. See Serpent.

Ant. There are large numbers of species of ants in the East, and innumerable hosts of them make their nests beside the threshing floors and wherever their favorite food is found. In every country in the world the ant is proverbial for industry, so there has never been any controversy with regard to the passage in Prov. 6:6, “Go to the ant, O sluggard.” The habits of the ants of cool climates and of those of the tropical and semitropical countries differ so much that considerable controversy has arisen as to the wisdom and foresight of this insect. Some cite 30:25: “The ants are not a strong folk, but they prepare their food in the summer.” There are, however, certain facts in regard to the ants of the Holy Land that settle this controversy in favor of the rigid accuracy of the author of the Proverbs: (1) The ants of these countries lay up vast stores of grain in their nests. (2) To facilitate this act of providence they place their nests as near as possible to the places where grain is threshed or stored. (3) They certainly eat this grain during the winter season. (4) They encourage certain insects that secrete sweet juices to consort with them and collect and store their eggs with their own, that they may have them at hand for future use when they shall have hatched.

Antelope. An animal referred to in Heb. as $\text{t}\square\text{ô}$ in the NASB and NIV of Deut. 14:5 and Isa. 51:20. In the Gk. versions and the Vulg. the word is translated generally oryx (Antilope leucoryx). This animal is characterized by long, slender, cone-shaped horns and is white with a conspicuous tuft of black hair under its throat. Its habitat is Upper Egypt, Arabia, and Syria. The Targums, however, rendered the Heb. word “wild ox” (so also the RV) but probably had in mind the bubale (Antilope bubalis) of Arabia and Egypt, classified by Arabs with wild oxen. M.F.U.

See also Ibex.

Ape (Heb. qôp, “monkey”). We have no hint as to the kinds of apes that were brought by the merchant navies of Solomon and Hiram, but it is probable that they were numerous. They are distributed in considerable numbers throughout all the countries bordering on the Mediterranean, though they are not indigenous to any except the United Arab Emirates and Gibraltar. The Heb. word qôp (Akkad. uqûpu, and Sanskrit kapi) is rendered “ape” and probably includes apes that are tailless and monkeys that possess tails. If they came from India, they were a species of tailed monkey, common to the area and worshiped there.

Arrowsnake. See Serpent.

Asp. See Serpent.

Ass. See Donkey.

Baboons. See Peacocks.

Badger (Heb. taḥash). See Porpoise. The badger of the KJV is not the same as the rock badger of the NASB, which replaces the KJV coney.

Bald Locust. See Locust.

Bat (Heb. ṣṭallēp). The Hebrew idea of a bat was “a fowl that creeps, going upon all fours.” It was unclean (Lev. 11:19). It is in reality a mammal and not a bird at all; its wings are membranous and destitute of feathers. It lives in caverns, tombs, or ruins (Isa. 2:19–21). The bat is a voracious destroyer of fruit, making it necessary for those who try to raise it in the neighborhood of cities to cover the clusters, or even the whole tree, with a net. There are about fifteen species of bats in the Holy Land.

Bear. The bear is now a somewhat rare animal in Syria, being confined to the higher regions of Lebanon, Anti-Lebanon, and Amanus, and found sparingly in the wilder portions of Bashan, Gilead, and Moab. It is rarely or never seen now in western Palestine. It is known in science as Ursus Syriacus, Ehr. and differs from the brown bear of Europe by its grayish fur. It was once abundant in Palestine (1 Sam. 17:36; 2 Kings 2:24). The Scripture alludes to the cunning of the bear (Lam. 3:10), to the ferocity of the she bear robbed of her cubs (2 Sam. 17:8; Prov. 17:12; Hos. 13:8), to the danger of the bear to man (1 Sam. 17:34, 36; Amos 5:19). The bear feeds principally on roots, fruits, and other vegetable products but does not fail to avail itself of the chance to devour any animal that may come in its way. Hence the significance of the picture of the peaceful reign of Christ (Isa. 11:7).

Beast. In the Bible, used in three distinctive ways:

1. Of a mammal, not man, as distinguished from creeping things and birds of the heavens (Gen. 1:29–30). Wild beasts in Scripture are differentiated from domesticated animals (Lev. 26:22; Isa. 13:21–22; Jer. 50:39; Mark 1:13).

2. Of the inferior animals, including birds and reptiles, as differentiated from human beings (Ps. 147:9–10; Eccles. 3:19; Acts 28:5).

3. Figuratively, of a fierce, destructive political power, as for example, the four successive world powers—Babylon, Media-Persia, Greece, and Rome of Dan. 7:1–7. In Rev. 13:1–10 the composite beast represents the final Antichrist, whereas a beast with lamb’s horns portrays the false prophet of the end times (13:11–18).

Unregenerate man’s (i.e., Gentile) civilization and government in its outward manifestation is brilliant and dazzling (cf. the shining metallic colossus of Dan. 2:31–45), but internally it is evil and cruel, like so many wild beasts (7:1–7). M.F.U.

See also Behemoth; Wild Beasts.

Bees. In the Holy Land, although bees occasionally make their hives in trees, as in other countries (1 Sam. 14:25–26), they generally resort to clefts in the rocks, almost always inaccessible to man. There are several allusions to the rocky homes of the bees (Deut. 32:13; Ps. 81:16). They are especially abundant in the wilderness of Judea (Matt. 3:4), and they resent with great fury any interference by man with their retreats (Deut. 1:44; Ps. 118:12).

The number of wild bees at present in Palestine would not justify the expression “a land flowing with milk and honey.” It is, however, probable that they were far more numerous at the time when the Israelites entered Canaan.

Honey is used not only in its separate state, but fruit is preserved in it, and it is used as a sauce for a variety of confections and pastries. It was a standard article of commerce (Ezek. 27:17). Stores of it were collected at Mizpah (Jer. 41:6–8). It was not allowed to be used in burnt offerings (Lev. 2:11). The honey in the carcass of the lion (Judg. 14:8) is best explained by the rapidity with which a carcass is denuded by wild beasts and ants in this hot climate and then dried in the blazing sun.

According to the author of Proverbs (24:13), it is good to eat honey but (25:16, 27) not to indulge to surfeit. Other references to honey convey various moral lessons (Ezek. 3:3; Ps. 19:10; Prov. 16:24).

Beetle. See Cricket; Locust.

Beeves. See Cattle; Ox.

Behemoth (be-hē-mōth; “colossal beast”). The plural of the Heb. word for beast, used in Job 40:15–24 of the hippopotamus, only excelled by “leviathan.” The description of the behemoth is the climax of the passage begun in chap. 38 and carried upward until it culminates in the exclamation at the end of chap. 41: “He looks on everything that is high; he is king over all the sons of pride” (41:34). The hippopotamus is a pachyderm, the largest except for the elephant and the rhinoceros, amphibious in habits, living on vegetable food, and corresponding well with the description in Job 40. It is found in the upper Nile and was common in the lower in ancient times. It may have been found in the Jordan (40:23), although poetic license would make it quite possible that the mention of that river should have reference only to its aquatic habits and its courage, not to its geographical range. Indeed, “a river” of the first member of the parallelism can only mean the Nile, and the mention of the Jordan in the second would seem to be simply to strengthen the hyperbole.

Bird. A number of Heb. words are rendered bird, as barbūr, ṣōp, šippōr. However, the barbūr is the lark-heeled cuckoo, a delicacy served on Solomon’s table (1 Kings 4:23). See Cock. The ṣōp is a generic word for bird. The šippōr is the lowly sparrow.

In the NT “birds” (KJV, “fowls”) is the rendering most frequently of Gk. ta peteina.

1. Birds were divided into clean and unclean, the latter including the carrion birds, fish hunters, and some others, as the hoopoe. Domestic fowl are mentioned, but it is nowhere said that they were eaten. It is, nevertheless, extremely probable that they were so used.

2. The allusions to birds' nests in the Bible are frequent and forcible. They were made in the sanctuary (Ps. 84:3), rocks (Job 39:27; cf. Num. 24:21; Jer. 49:16), trees (Ps. 104:17; Jer. 22:23; Ezek. 31:6). Nests were concealed in ruins (Isa. 34:15) and holes (Jer. 48:28). The NT nests (Matt. 8:20; Luke 9:58) were mere roosts.

3. Eggs are frequently alluded to (Deut. 22:6; Job 39:14; Isa. 10:14). They were well-known articles of food (Luke 11:12).

4. Migration of birds (song of Sol. 2:11–12; Jer. 8:7), their singing (Eccles. 12:4; Ps. 104:12), flight (Ex. 19:4), care of young (Deut. 32:11–12), voracity (Matt. 13:4), and many other characteristics are alluded to.

Bittern. A KJV term replaced in the NASB by Hedgehog (which see).

Black Kite. See Kite.

Boar. See Swine.

Bull, Bullock. See Ox.

Buzzard (Heb. cozniyyâ; the “fish eagle,” Pandion halioetus, L; KJV, “osprey”; NIV “black vulture”). An unclean bird (Lev. 11:13; Deut. 14:12) that fishes along the coasts of the Holy Land and in Hûleh.

Calf. See Ox.

Camel (Heb. gāmāl; Gk. kamēlos). One of the most useful of the domestic animals of the East. With the exception of the elephant it is the largest animal used by man. It is often eight feet or more in height and possesses great strength and endurance. It has a broad foot, which enables it to walk over sandy wastes without sinking deeply beneath the surface. It has a provision in its stomach that enables it to store enough water to travel for days without drinking. It is capable of subsisting on the coarsest and bitterest of herbage and can take into its horny mouth the most obdurate thorns, which it grinds up with its powerful teeth and digests with its ostrich-like stomach. To offset its great height it is formed to kneel, so that it can be loaded as easily as a donkey and then rise with its burden of five hundred pounds and plod on through the hottest day and the most inhospitable waste of the deserts, in which it finds its congenial home. The hump on its back is not only a help to retaining its pack saddle but also a storehouse of fat, in reserve against its long fasts. The flesh, although forbidden to the Israelites, is eaten by the Arabs and sold in the markets of all oriental cities. Its skin is used in making sandals and its hair in the weaving of the coarse cloth of which their tents and outer garments are made. Its milk and the products made from it are a prime element in the diet of the Bedouin.

The allusions to the camel in the Scripture are so numerous that it is unnecessary to point them out.

Archaeological discoveries show the effective domestication of the camel at least as early as 1200–1000 B.C., so that swarms of camel-riding Midianites in Gideon's time (c. 1155–1148 B.C.), as recounted in Judg. 6–7, and later the wealthy camel caravan of Solomon's royal visitor the queen of Sheba (1 Kings 10:1–2), about 950 B.C., offer no difficulties historically. Apparently the earliest known art depiction of a Near-Eastern camel (one-humped) is a late Hurrian work from Tell Halaf, now in the Walters Art Gallery of Baltimore, dating about 1,000 B.C. However, references to domesticated camels in Abraham's time (c. 2000 B.C.) have been set aside by such writers as T. E. Peet, Egypt and the Old Testament (1924) p. 60, R. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the O.T. (1941), p. 154, and others. This idea seems to be presumptuous in the light of such evidence as camel statuettes, bones, and other references that appear in archaeological materials beginning about 3,000 B.C. (cf. J. P. Free, "Abraham's Camels," Journal of Near Eastern Studies [July 1944]: 187–93). Free's research concerned the use of camels in Egypt. In recent years numerous indications of the domestication and use of camels in Mesopotamia and Syria during the patriarchal period have come to light. K. A. Kitchen has collected some of this information (see Ancient Orient and Old Testament [1966], pp. 79–80; "Camel," Illustrated Bible Dictionary [1980], 1:228–30). H.F.V.

Since wild camels were known from earliest times, there is no credible reason why such an indispensable animal in desert and semi-arid lands should not have been sporadically domesticated in patriarchal times and even earlier. Large scale domestication after the twelfth century B.C., however, greatly expanded desert trade as a result of the advantages of camel nomadism over donkey nomadism, enabling camel traders to travel much greater distances on this animal specially adapted to desert conditions.

Figurative. In two passages (Matt. 19:24; 23:24) the size of the camel is made the basis of comparison. There is not a particle of evidence in favor of the statement that the needle's eye, in the former passage, refers to the smaller gate cut through the panel of the city gates of the East or that such a gate is, or ever was, called a needle's eye. The whole force of the comparison in both passages is found in the hyperbole. Moreover, no camel could ever be forced through one of these small gates.

See also the bibliography that follows the last entry under Animal Kingdom.

Cankerworm. See Locust.

Carrion Vulture. See Vulture.

Cat. The cat is not alluded to in the Bible except in the Apocrypha (Epistle of Jer. 21). It is not mentioned in classical authors except when treating Egyptian history. This seems the stranger as there are two species of wild cats in Palestine, and the domestic cat is exceedingly common now all through the East.

Caterpillar. See Locust.

Cattle (the rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words). Cattle were of prime importance to the Hebrews, whose first employment was the care of flocks and herds. On their arrival in Egypt they were assigned to the land of Goshen, on account of its pastoral facilities. They then became herdsmen and shepherds to Pharaoh. One of the words, miqneh, translated "cattle," signifies "possessions." It includes horned cattle, horses, donkeys, sheep, and goats. The specific word for animals of the bovine species, and for sheep and goats, is also occasionally rendered cattle. Also bēhēmâ, which means, primarily, "beast" in general.

Chameleon (Heb. kōah, KJV; but Heb. tinshemet, NASB, NIV). There is no possibility of determining with certainty the animal intended by this Heb. word in the list of creeping things (Lev. 11:30). It was probably a lizard and more likely to have been the Nile monitor than the chameleon. The NASB renders it land crocodile; the NIV, monitor lizard. The Nile monitor attains a length of five to six feet, and the chameleon four to five. On the authority of the LXX and the Vulg. the KJV has rendered it "chameleon."

On the other hand the NASB and NIV have rendered tinshemet, at the end of the verse, "chameleon," instead of "mole" of the KJV. This is based on the fact that tinshemet is derived from a root signifying "to breathe" and that the ancients believed that the chameleon lived on air. This somewhat fanciful idea is hardly probable enough to do away with the authority of the LXX and the Vulg., which render the word “mole.” The reference, however, is not to the true mole but to the mole rat, Spalax typhlus, which is abundant in Bible lands. If the above views are correct, chameleon should be dropped from the biblical fauna.

Chamois. See Mountain Sheep.

Chicken. See Cock.

Chicks. See Cock.

Cock. The only mention of domestic fowl in the OT is in connection with the daily provision for Solomon’s table (1 Kings 4:23). The Heb. word barbūr has been rendered “swans,” “geese,” “guinea fowls,” “capons,” and “fatted fish,” as well as the “fatted fowl” of the KJV and the RV. However, the delicacy referred to is the lark-heeled cuckoo (Centropus aegyptius Shelley), a dainty morsel even to the present day in Italy and Greece.

In the NT the cock crowing is mentioned as a measure of time in connection with Peter’s denial of Christ (Matt. 26:34, 74; Mark 14:30; Luke 22:34; John 18:27). Cocks are not regular in their times of crowing, sometimes crowing twice, and at other times irregularly through the night or before the dawn (Mark 13:35).

The hen is alluded to but once in the Scripture (Luke 13:34).

Cockatrice. A KJV term appearing in Isa. 11:8; 14:29; 59:5; Jer. 8:17. See Serpent.

Cockow, Cuckoo. See Sea Gull.

Colt. See Donkey; Horse.

Coney. See Rock Badger.

Coral (Heb. rāmâ, “high” in value). It is uncertain what substance is intended by the word rāmôt, rendered “coral” by the KJV, NASB, and NIV. As coral, however, is a precious commodity, and highly suitable for the requirements of the only two passages in which the word occurs, we may rest contented with this translation (Job 28:18; Ezek. 27:16). This substance is the skeleton of microscopic zoophytes. It is of a great variety of colors, shapes, and consistency, the most valuable being red. Many of the branches of coral are extremely beautiful. The Red Sea was probably named on account of the red coral growing in its waters. The best coral is brought from Persia and the Red Sea, but a good quality is also found in the Mediterranean. Fine specimens of the best colors may bring $50 an ounce. Coral was highly valued among the ancients and the Arabs for making beads and other ornaments.

Cormorant. In the list of unclean birds (Lev. 11:17; Deut. 14:17) the word cormorant is probably the correct rendering of the Heb. shālāk. It is abundant in the Holy Land, and it is a large black bird that subsists by fishing. Its scientific name is Phalacrocorax carbo. In the KJV the term cormorant appears also in Isa. 34:11; Zeph. 2:14, but in those verses it should be pelican, that being the true rendering of the Heb. original, qābat, “vomiting.” See Pelican.

Cow. See Ox.

Crane. The word occurs twice in the KJV (Isa. 38:14; Jer. 8:7) and once in the NASB (Isa. 38:14) and should be rendered “twittering,” or “twitterer,” as applied to the swallow or some similar bird. Notwithstanding the opinion of the KJV, the RV, and the NASB, we think that the crane ought to be dropped from the list of biblical birds.

Creeping Locust. See Locust.

Cricket. The rendering of the NASB, NIV, and RV, of the Heb. word ḥargōl in Lev. 11:22. This is the corrected translation of “beetle” of the KJV. The word cricket also appears in NASB Deut. 28:42, but as the rendering of a different Heb. word, which the KJV renders “locust” (which see). The creature referred to belongs with the locust and the grasshopper, since it is winged and leaps rather than creeps. The chief leaping insects belong to three families of Orthoptera (the grasshoppers, the locusts, and the crickets). The ḥargōl undoubtedly belongs to one of the three, though to which now cannot be determined. The KJV rendering of ḥargōl by “beetle” does not take into account that the most typical species of the Coleoptera (beetle order) do not leap.

Crocodile (marg. Job 41:1). A well-known saurian, found in ancient times in Lower as well as Upper Egypt but now confined to the upper waters of the Nile. It was probably abundant in the Kishon in Bible days. It is said to be still found there. It is the creature intended by “monster” (Ezek. 29:3; 32:2).

See also Chameleon; Dragon; Jackal; Leviathan.

Cuckoo, Cuckow. See Sea Gull.

Deer. An animal, Cervus dama, L., once found in Palestine but now probably extinct S of Amanus. The KJV translates Heb. ṣāyyāl as “hart,” whereas the NASB and NIV translate it as “deer” (Deut. 12:15, 22; 14:5; 15:22; 1 Kings 4:23; Ps. 42:1; Isa. 35:6), “young stag” (song of Sol. 2:9, 17; 8:14), and “bucks,” or “deer” (Lam. 1:6) in the NASB and NIV respectively.

The “fallow deer” in the KJV of Deut. 14:5; 1 Kings 4:23 is a mistranslation of Heb. yahmûr. It is correctly rendered “roebuck” in the NASB and NIV.

The female deer, or hind (Heb. ṣayalâh), appears always as “hind” in the KJV. In the NASB it is rendered by “hind” (2 Sam. 22:34; Ps. 18:33; Prov. 5:19; song of Sol. 2:7; 3:5), “doe” (Gen. 49:21; Jer. 14:5), and “deer” (Job. 39:1; Ps. 29:9). In the NIV it is rendered “deer” (2 Sam. 22:34; Ps. 18:33; Prov. 5:19), “doe” (Gen. 49:21; Job 39:1; Prov. 5:19; Jer. 14:5), and “gazelle” (song of Sol. 2:7; 3:5).

See also Doe for a reference to the female mountain goat.

Desert Owl. See Owl; Peacocks.

Doe. In one place (Prov. 5:19; Heb. ya-ălâ; KJV, “roe”) doe should be wild she-goat. Elsewhere it refers to the female deer (which see). KJV “roe” is normally rendered “gazelle” (which see) in the NASB. See Goat, Wild.

Dog (Heb. keleb; Gk. kuōn, “dog”). The dog referred to in the Scriptures is invariably the unclean animal so familiar in the streets of all oriental cities. He is a cowardly, lazy, despised creature. He eats garbage, dead animals (Ex. 22:31), human flesh (1 Kings 14:11), and blood (22:38). His is the lowest type of vileness (2 Sam. 3:8; Isa. 66:3). Dogs wander through the streets (Ps. 59:6, 14). With all their cowardice they are treacherous and violent (22:16, 20). The only good thing said of them is that they watch the flocks (Job 30:1; Isa. 56:10–11). Christ compares the Gentiles to them (Matt. 15:26), and those who are shut out of heaven are called dogs (Rev. 22:15). The price of a dog (Deut. 23:18) probably refers to sodomy. The return of a fool to his folly is compared to one of the most disgusting of the many filthy habits of the dog (Prov. 26:11; 2 Pet. 2:22).

Doleful Creatures. A KJV term that appears in Isa. 13:21; the NASB and NIV render “owl,” with a marginal reading in NASB of “howling creatures.” The point of the allusion is the fact that such creatures resort to ruins and deserted dwellings, and it indicates the desolation that has overtaken them.

Donkey (Heb. ḥāmôr, the “male donkey”; ātôn, “female donkey”; Gk. onos, “donkey”; hupozugion, “under the yoke”). The donkey is one of the earliest and most frequently mentioned animals alluded to in the Bible. They are spoken of in connection with the history of Pharaoh (Gen. 12:16), Abraham (22:3), Jacob (32:5), Moses (Ex. 4:20), Balaam (Num. 22:21–33), and in fact most of the notable persons mentioned in the OT. There was nothing in any sense degrading in the idea of riding on a donkey, as might perhaps be inferred from Zech. 9:9 (cf. Matt. 21:7). It was the sign of the peaceful mission of Christ. Kings, high priests, judges, and the richest people of ancient and modern times have ridden on donkeys. Many of the donkeys of Damascus, Baghdad, Aleppo, Cairo, Cyprus, and other parts of the East are beautiful animals, easy in gait, and perfectly surefooted. They often cost high prices and are adorned with magnificent trappings.

They have also been used from earliest times as beasts of burden. Special breeds of them are raised for this purpose. Some of them are small and cheap, whereas others are but little smaller than a mule and carry burdens of greater weight in proportion to their size than any other animal. The pack saddle differs according to the use to which it is put. The familiar crosstree is employed for firewood. Abraham doubtless loaded the wood for the sacrifice in this way (Gen. 22:3). When sheaves of grain are to be loaded a kind of cradle is suspended to this or to the flat saddle. This latter, called in Arabic a jebâl, is composed of an under layer of thick felt and an upper of strong haircloth, with a padding between, about six inches in thickness, of straw or sedges. This saddle is flat on top and bent down over each side of the animal, so as to protect his ribs from the pressure of the load. Over such a saddle as this, sacks of grain or cut straw are thrown and tied fast by a rope passing under the breast. The sons of Jacob probably used this sort (42:26–27). If sand is to be carried, small panniers are slung over the saddle, and hang down on either side without touching the body. If bread or other provisions, not liable to be injured by pressure, are taken, larger panniers are used. In something similar to this Jesse and Abigail may have sent their presents (1 Sam. 16:20; 25:18). If fruit is to be carried, two boxes are slung in a similar manner. Children are often carried in this way in larger boxes. Probably Moses’ wife sat on a jebâl, with her children in boxes on either side of her, when going down to Egypt (Ex. 4:20). Sacks of grain or straw are often slung across the bare back of a donkey.

Donkeys were also used for plowing (Isa. 30:24; 32:20).

The Israelites were not allowed to yoke an ox and a donkey together (Deut. 22:10). They were not allowed to eat its flesh, yet in the stress of hunger during the siege of Samaria they violated this law (2 Kings 6:25).

The female donkey is the one intended in a number of places not indicated in our translations (Num. 22:21–33; 1 Sam. 9:3; 2 Kings 4:22, 24). David had an officer to take care of his female donkeys (1 Chron. 27:30).

Donkey colts (Gen. 49:11) are also called foals (Job 11:12), young donkeys (Isa. 30:6), and colt (Zech. 9:9). They are all translated from the same Heb. word, ayir.

Wild donkeys are frequently mentioned, two Heb. words (pere, “running” wild; ārôd, “lonesome”) being so translated. Both are found together in one parallelism (Job 39:5) but rendered by the single expression “wild donkey.” We have no means of knowing whether they refer to the same or different species. The wild donkey is found in the deserts nearest to Palestine.

Dove. (Heb. yōnâ; Gk. peristera). Four species of wild pigeons are found in Bible lands, the ring dove, or wood pigeon, the stock dove, the rock dove, and the ash-rumped rock dove. They are all known by the Arab. name of hamâm. They make their nests in the clefts and holes of the rocks (song of Sol. 2:14; Jer. 48:28; Ezek. 7:16). They also nest in trees. They are unresisting (Matt. 10:16) and therefore suitable for sacrifice (Gen. 15:9; Lev. 12:6–8; Mark 11:15; Luke 2:24; John 2:14–16). They are timid (Hos. 11:11); they fly great distances in their migrations (Ps. 55:6–8); they are gentle (song of Sol. 1:15; 4:1; etc.). Therefore a dove was the form in which the Holy Spirit descended on Jesus Christ (Matt. 3:16). See Turtle, Turtledove.

Wild doves are numerous in some parts of the Holy Land. There are also vast numbers of tame pigeons in all the cities and villages. They have been kept from the earliest times. Being acceptable for sacrifices, they were also clean and used as food.

Dove’s Dung. Several theories have been formulated to explain the difficulty in regard to this material as an article of food (2 Kings 6:25): (1) That it was a kind of plant, such as one known by that name to the Arabs. But it is unlikely that any plant would have been found in any quantity in a place in the last extremity of famine. (2) That it was in reality dung but used as a fertilizer, to promote the quick growth of vegetables for food. This is fanciful and not supported by the context. (3) That the people, in the depth of their despair and starvation, actually ate this disgusting material. This seems the most probable view and is supported by the fact that a similar occurrence took place in the English army in 1316.

Dragon (Heb. tannîm). The word dragon (Heb. tannîm; Gk. drakôn) appears much more frequently in the KJV than in the NASB and NIV, where it is sometimes replaced by the word jackal from Heb. tan (see also Whale, for another translation of tan and tannîm).

In the NASB the word appears three times in the OT: in connection with Leviathan (which see; Isa. 27:1); as an example of the strength of the Lord, who “pierced the dragon” (51:9); and as the name of a spring (Nah. 2:3). It does not appear at all in the NIV in the OT. In the NT (Rev. 12:3–4, 7, 9, 13, 16, 17; 13:2, 4, 11; 16:13; 20:2) it refers to a mythical monster, which is variously described and figured in the legends of all nations. This monster is used as a lively figure of Satan (which see).

In the KJV OT “dragon” is used with several meanings:

1. In connection with desert animals and in those cases best translated by “wolf,” although the NASB and NIV use “jackal” repeatedly (Job 30:29; Ps. 44:19; Isa. 13:22; 34:13; 35:7; 43:20; Jer. 9:11; 10:22; 14:6; 49:33; 51:34, 37). The feminine form, Heb. tannâ, is found in Mal. 1:3.

2. As a reference to a sea monster (Pss. 74:13; 148:7, which give “sea monster,” or “sea creature,” in the NASB and NIV; Isa. 27:1, which renders “dragon” in both the NASB and KJV but “monster of the sea” in NIV).

3. As a reference to serpents, even of the smaller sorts (cf. KJV, NASB, and NIV of Deut. 32:33; Ps. 91:13; see also Ex. 7:9–10, 12).

4. As a reference to a crocodile or monster (cf. KJV, NASB, and NIV of Jer. 51:34; Ezek. 29:3; 32:2).

Dromedary. The references to the dromedary in the KJV of Isa. 60:6; Jer. 2:23 should be rendered “young camel” (Heb. bikrâ; cf. NASB and NIV readings). In the NASB of 1 Kings 4:28; Esther 8:10, the Heb. terms are given as “swift steeds” and “steeds.” The NIV renders “horses” and “fast horses.” See also Camel.

The dromedary is the Arabian camel (Camelus dromedarius) and is native to India, the Near East, and the northern part of Africa. It has one large hump on the back, unlike the Bactrian camel (C. bactrianus), which has two.

Eagle. The word eagle in the KJV includes both the eagles proper and the vultures. There are no less than four of the former and eight of the latter in the Holy Land. The most common of the vultures are the griffon and the Egyptian vulture, commonly known as Pharaoh's chicken. Of the eagles the most common is the short-toed eagle, Circoetus Gallicus, Gmel. All of these birds are swift (Deut. 28:49), soar high (Prov. 23:5), nest in inaccessible rocks (Job 39:27–30), and sight their prey from afar (Job 39:29). Besides the above references the habits of eagles and vultures are alluded to in numerous passages (Num. 24:21; Job 9:26; Prov. 30:17–19; Jer. 49:16; Ezek. 17:3; Obad. 4; Hab. 1:8; Matt. 24:28; Luke 17:37). The tenderness of the eagle to its young is also graphically set forth (Ex. 19:4; Deut. 32:11), and its great age is noted (Ps. 103:5, Isa. 40:31).

Eagle Owl. See Owl.

Eggs. See Bird.

Elephant. An animal whose tusks furnished ivory (1 Kings 10:22, KJV marg. 2 Chron. 9:21, marg.). The animal is mentioned in 1 Macc. 1:17; 3:34 in connection with its later use in war, each beast being manipulated by an Indian driver and supporting on its broad back a tower from which as many as four soldiers fought (1 Macc. 6:37, where 32 is obviously erroneous). Before combat, elephants were often inflamed by the smell or taste of wine (1 Macc. 6:34; 3 Macc. 5:2). Two extant species of this huge animal are the Elephas indicus (Indian elephant) and the Elephas africanus (African variety), with several other types now extinct.

Ewe. See Sheep.

Falcon. A “bird of prey” known for its keen eyesight (Job 28:7). See also Kite; Vulture.

Fallow Deer. See Roebuck.

Ferret. See Gecko.

Fish. The Gk. language has more than four hundred names of fish. The Heb., as we have it in the Bible, has not even one. Nevertheless, fish are mentioned frequently in the Scriptures. They are classified as clean, having fins and scales, and unclean, those not so furnished. Whales, seals, dugongs, and other creatures, now known to be lung breathers, were regarded by the Hebrews as fish. There are forty-five species in the inland waters and large numbers in the Mediterranean Sea. Dagon, the god of the Philistines, had a man's body and a fish's tail. There are many allusions to fishing in the Bible.

Flea (Heb. parōsh). A most annoying and unfortunately common insect in the East. David compares himself to a flea in order to discredit Saul (1 Sam. 24:14). The similar reference (1 Sam. 26:20) is considered by some as an error in the text.

Fly (Heb. זבוב). The immense number of flies in the East is one of its most striking characteristics. The number of species is also large. The Heb. זבוב, which is part of the name of the god of Ekron, Baal-zebub, is generic, but as the housefly is the most familiar representative it would be most frequently thought of in connection with this name. It is uncertain whether the plague of flies, ארוב, refers to the swarming of a single species (NASB, Ps. 78:45, “swarms of flies”) or a multiplication of such noxious insects (KJV, “divers sorts of flies”). “Devoured them” can hardly mean ate them up bodily, nor bit them, but destroyed their food and overwhelmed them with their nastiness.

Foal. See Donkey; Horse.

Fowl. See Bird.

Fox. In several places it is uncertain whether Heb. שׁוֹאֵל; Gk. alōpēs, signifies “fox” or “jackal” (Lam. 5:18; Ezek. 13:4; song of Sol. 2:15). In others it doubtless means “jackals” (Judg. 15:4; Ps. 63:10). The difficulty in regard to the number of jackals that Samson turned loose into the fields of the Philistines disappears if we consider that he probably collected them, doubtless with the aid of his companions, over a wide district of the Philistine plain, and set them loose in pairs, at perhaps as many as 150 centers, so as to burn up as much as possible of the “shocks and the standing grain, along with the vineyards and groves” (Judg. 15:5). In only one place is it more probable that fox is intended (Neh. 4:3); Gk. alōpēs in the NT can mean nothing but “fox.” The Syrian fox is identical with the common European fox, Vulpes vulgaris, L.

Frog (Heb. שׁפָּרְדֵּא). The frog of the Egyptian plague (Ex. 8:2–14) is Rana esculenta, L., an amphibian, common everywhere in Egypt and the Holy Land (see Wisd. of Sol. 19:10).

Gazelle. The correct rendering of שׁבִּי (‘‘beauty’’), translated ‘‘roe’’ and ‘‘roebuck’’ in the KJV (Deut. 12:15, 22; 14:5; 15:22; 2 Sam. 2:18; 1 Kings 4:23; 1 Chron. 12:8; Prov. 6:5; song of Sol. 2:7, 9, 17; 3:5; 4:5; 7:3; 8:14; Isa. 13:14). Note that ‘‘fallow deer,’’ Heb. yaḥmûr, in the KJV of Deut. 14:5; 1 Kings 4:23, is properly ‘‘roebuck’’ and is so translated in the NASB (‘‘roedeer’’ in NIV of Deut. 14:5). The gazelle is the smallest of the antelopes in the Holy Land. It is abundant in the wildest portions of the country, and its beauty and speed are often alluded to in sacred and profane poetry. Its scientific name is Gazella Dorcas, L.

See also Deer.

Gecko (Heb. אֲנָקָא, ‘‘wail,’’ NASB and NIV, Lev. 11:30, for KJV, ‘‘ferret’’). This lizard is named from the plaintive wail that it emits. Its scientific name is Ptyodactylus Hasselquistii, Schneid. It is frequently found in houses. It runs with great rapidity and clings to walls and ceilings by the suckers with which its feet are furnished. It is in no way probable that the Heb. original of this word signifies the ‘‘ferret,’’ which is a weasel-like animal in modern times kept for hunting rabbits and rats.

Gier Eagle. A KJV term of indefinite meaning, referring to the soaring of birds of prey. For KJV ‘‘gier eagle’’ (Heb. רָחָם), Deut. 14:17, the NASB renders ‘‘carrion vulture,’’ and the NIV, ‘‘osprey.’’ See Vulture for a discussion of Heb. peres, rendered ‘‘gier eagle’’ in the RV but ‘‘vulture’’ in the NASB.

Glede. An old name for kite (which see). The NASB and NIV of Deut. 14:3 render “red kite” in place of KJV “glede.”

Gnat (Gk. kōnōps). The wine gnat or midge used in fermenting and evaporating wine. Gnats or mosquitoes are irritating pests in all parts of the East and are common in the low-lying marshy lands of Palestine and Egypt. The term may refer to any small bloodsucking insect and the more minute creatures, whether bloodsuckers or not, which torment man and beast.

Figurative. Among the Jews, the custom of filtering wine was founded on the prohibition of “winged insects” being used for food, excepting saltatorii (see Lev. 11:22–23).

The saying of our Lord “You blind guides, who strain out a gnat and swallow a camel” (Matt. 23:24) was doubtless taken from this custom. The contrast between the smallest insect and the largest animal is used to illustrate the inconsistency of those who are superstitiously anxious in avoiding small faults, yet do not scruple to commit the greatest sins.

Gnawing Locust. See Locust.

Goat (Heb. ʾaqqô, “slender”; yā-ēl, “climbing”; ʿēz, “strong”; ʿattûd, “prepared,” and so “leader”; šā-îr, “shaggy”; Gk. eriphion, tragos). An animal often associated with sheep and mentioned with them in many places in Scripture, once in sharp contrast (Matt. 25:32–33). Owing to the unlovely disposition of the goat it was used less often for ordinary sacrifices. Nevertheless it was an allowable animal (Lev. 3:12; 4:24; 9:15; 10:16; chap. 16, passim; Num. 15:27; 28:22). Goats were only second in importance to sheep as a source and investment of wealth.

Figurative. In Matt. 25:32–33, sheep and goats are used to represent the righteous and the wicked respectively. “The wicked are here conceived of under the figure of goats, not on account of the wantonness and stench of the latter (Grotius), or in consequence of their stubbornness (Lange), but generally because these animals were considered to be comparatively worthless (Luke 15:29); and hence, in v. 33, we have the diminutive ta ʿeriphia for the purpose of expressing contempt” (Meyer, Com. on Matt. 25:32–33).

Grasshopper. See Locust.

Great Lizard (NASB, RV, Lev. 11:29; KJV, “tortoise”). The Heb. šāb is the cognate of the Arab. dabb, which is the term applied to the land monitor, Psammosaurus scincus, an animal often six feet long, and to another lizard, Uromastix spinipes, which attains a length of two feet, and has a short rounded head, and a tail surrounded by rings of spines. Although there are land and sea tortoises in the Holy Land and its adjacent sea, šāb does not refer to any of them; hence the NASB and NIV translation, “great lizard.”

See also Lizard.

Great Owl. See Owl.

Greyhound, a translation of Heb. zarzîr matnayim, “girt in the loins” (Prov. 30:31, marg.). The greyhound, portrayed on Assyrian monuments, may be intended. The word, on the other hand, may denote the “war-horse” (RV marg.), decorated with trappings around the loins, or the starling, as the cognate word in Arab., Syr., and postbiblical Heb. suggests. The NASB renders “the strutting cock.” M.F.U.

Hare. See Rabbit.

Hart. See Deer.

Hawk (Heb. nēš, Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15; Job 39:26; taḥmās, Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15). There are eighteen species of the hawk “in its kind,” ranging in size from the little sparrow hawk to the buzzard. These are exclusive of the kites and gledes. See also Night Hawk.

Hawk, Night. See Night Hawk.

He Ass. See Donkey.

Hedgehog. A hedgehog may be “any of a genus Erinaceus of Old World nocturnal insectivorous mammals having both hair and spines that they present outwardly by rolling themselves up,” or it may be “any of several spiny mammals (as a porcupine)” (Webster’s). NASB hedgehog (Isa. 34:11) replaces KJV bittern, but the modern bittern refers to a type of heron (which see). The NIV reads “owl,” or “screech owl.”

Heifer. See Ox.

Hen. See Cock.

Heron. There are six species of herons in the Holy Land. As the Heb. ʾānāphā (Lev. 11:19; Deut. 14:18) is associated with the stork and accompanied by the qualifying phrase “in their kinds,” it is reasonable to accept “heron” rather than eagle, parrot, swallow, or ibis, all of which have been suggested in its place.

Hind. Another word used for female deer (which see).

Hippopotamus. See Behemoth.

Honey. See Bee.

Hoopoe. Probably the correct translation of Heb. dūkîpat, Lev. 11:19; Deut. 14:18; KJV, “lapwing.” It is a migratory bird, Upupa epops, L., which spends the summer in the Holy Land and the winter in more southerly districts. Its head is often figured on the Egyptian monuments. If it is the bird intended by dūkîpat, it was unclean.

Hornet (Heb. šîrʿâ, “stinging”). An insect with a formidable sting. It is found in considerable abundance in the Holy Land. Commentators are at variance as to whether the intention of the passages in which it is mentioned (Ex. 23:28; Deut. 7:20; Josh. 24:12) is literal or figurative. There are several species of hornets in the Holy Land.

Horse. Indo-European nomads E of the Black Sea domesticated the horse early. War horses and horse-drawn chariots were introduced in Asia Minor and Syria between 1900 and 1800 B.C., and the patriarchal narratives make mention of horses at the time of Jacob (Gen. 49:17). The horse was found in Egypt, where it was introduced by the Hyksos, who began to infiltrate as early as about 1900 B.C. When the Exodus took place (c. 1440 B.C.) Pharaoh’s pursuing army was furnished with horses and chariots (Ex. 14:9; 15:19). Horses were also found in the host of Sisera at the time of Deborah (c. 1195–1155 B.C.; Judg. 4–5). M.F.U.

The Hebrews were at first forbidden to retain the horses they captured (Deut. 17:16) and accordingly disabled most of those which they took (Josh. 11:4–9). But they soon ceased to regard this restriction and accumulated large studs of cavalry and chariot horses, mostly from Egypt and Assyria. Solomon had twelve thousand cavalry and four thousand chariot horses. Riding a horse was usually a sign of military rank. Many high functionaries, however, rode donkeys, mules, and camels. For a more detailed discussion of the horse, see articles Horse; Horses, Horsemen. For the use of the term horses in Esther 8:10 (NIV), see Dromedary.

Horseleech. See Leech.

Howler. See Owl, no. 3.

Hyena (Heb. ṣabûa, “speckled”). The hyena is common throughout the Holy Land and would be one of the beasts of the field to devour the carrion (cf. NASB and NIV, Isa. 13:22). The place name Zeboim (1 Sam. 13:18; Neh. 11:34) means “hyena.” It may be referred to in the “beasts” of KJV Isa. 3:18. See Jackal. R.K.H.

Ibex (Heb. dîshôn, “leaper”; KJV, “pygarg”). Probably the addax, Antelope addax, Licht., an animal found in the Syrian and Arabian deserts (but note that in the NASB and NIV of Deut. 14:5 “antelope” is distinct from the ibex and replaces KJV “wild ox”). The ibex is mentioned in only one of the two lists of clean animals (Deut. 14:5). There seems to be no authority for KJV marg., “bison.” See also Antelope.

Jackal (NASB, Heb. tan, “monster”; KJV, Heb. tannûm, “monster”). In the NASB and NIV “jackal” from Heb. tan sometimes appears in place of KJV “dragon” or “sea monster,” from Heb. tannûm (Job 30:29; Ps. 44:19; Isa. 13:22; 34:13; 35:7; 43:20; Jer. 9:11; 10:22; 14:6; 49:33; 51:37; Mic. 1:8). See Dragon. It would be better rendered wolf (which see). In the RV the marg. reading for Jer. 14:6 is “crocodile,” whereas “jackal” is the reading in the NKJV and NIV of the verse. We believe this also should be rendered “wolf.” On the other hand “wild beasts of the islands” (KJV, Jer. 50:39) should be “jackals,” and is so rendered in the NASB. The NIV renders “hyenas” here. “Jackal” should in some cases be substituted for “fox,” as the translation of shûcāl. See Fox. The jackal, a familiar nocturnal animal with a peculiar howl, feeds on live prey and carrion.

Kine. See Ox.

Kite. A bird of prey belonging to the falcon family with long pointed wings and forked tail. Kites are of various sorts (Deut. 14:13). The black kite appears in Palestine in March and feeds on offal. The word kite in the RV renders Heb. dāâ and dayyâ (Lev. 11:14; Deut. 14:13; in KJV “vulture”) and twice this name is employed in the KJV to render ayyâ (Lev. 11:14; Deut. 14:13; in NASB, “falcon”; in NIV, “black kite”). See also Gier Eagle; Glede; Vulture. Lapwing. See Hoopoe.

Leech (Heb. ālûqâ, “sucking,” Prov. 30:15). Either one of the leeches, Hirudo medicinalis, Sav., or Hoemopsis sanguisorba, Sav., found in stagnant waters throughout the land.

Leopard (Heb. nāmēr, “spotted”; Gk. pardalis, Felis leopardus, L.) a wily, active, ferocious beast (Isa. 11:6; Jer. 5:6; Dan. 7:6; Hab. 1:8; Rev. 13:2). Next to the bear it is the largest of the existing carnivora in the Holy Land. It has a beautiful spotted skin (Jer. 13:23), which is highly admired and is used for rugs and saddle covers; one is sometimes hung over the back by religious mendicants. The cheetah or hunting leopard, Felis jubata, Schreb., is probably included under the Heb. generic name nāmēr.

Leviathan (Heb. liwāyātān). A word signifying an animal writhing or gathering itself into folds; used for the “crocodile” (Job 3:8, “Leviathan,” NASB, NIV, but “their mourning,” KJV; 41:1, “leviathan,” or “Leviathan,” NASB, NIV, KJV, with marg. “crocodile,” NASB, NIV; also Ps. 74:14); for a “serpent” (Isa. 27:1); for some “sea monster” (Ps. 104:26), possibly the whale. However, leviathan may be purely a mythical concept adapted to biblical usage (as dragon used to prefigure Satan). Since the discovery of the Ras Shamra religious texts in Syria on the site of ancient Ugarit, it has become evident that there is a parallel between the seven-headed Canaanite monster Lotan of prevailing mythology, 1700–1400 B.C., and the biblical leviathan. Isaiah seems to employ this ancient mythological idea of the destroyed leviathan poetically (Isa. 27:1) to symbolize the Judgment Day when God will triumph over the threatening evil of this world system.

Lice. Notwithstanding the authority of the RV (marg., Ex. 8:16; Ps. 105:31) “sandflies” or “fleas” for Heb. kēn and its derivatives, and the NASB and NIV rendering “gnats,” the weight of evidence is in favor of the KJV translation “lice.” These filthy insects are an endemic pest of the first magnitude in the East. What it must have been when they became universal is beyond the power of our imagination to conceive. The Muslims shave their heads and use means to cause hair to fall out by the roots in other parts of their bodies to escape this pest. This is the inheritance of an ancient custom of the Egyptian priests and other inhabitants.

Lion. The well-known king of beasts, formerly abundant in Palestine (Judg. 14:5; 1 Sam. 17:34; 2 Kings 17:25; Jer. 49:19, etc.) and not extinct there until the end of the twelfth century. Seven words, aryēh, kāpūr, gūr, lābî, layish, shaḥal, and shāḥāḥ, are used to denote the lion in general or at different ages and in different states. Four words shāag, nāar, nāham, and hagâ, express his voice in varying moods, as the “roar,” “yell,” or “growl.” Six words denote his attitudes and movements in quest of prey, rābaṣ, shāḥaḥ, yāshab, ārab, rāmaś, zinnēq, as “prowling,” “crouching,” and “ambushing.”

Figurative. The Scriptures abound in allusions to the strength, courage, cruelty, and rapacity of this beast. His royal attributes made him an emblem of Christ (Rev. 5:5).

Little Owl. See Owl.

Lizard (Heb. lāṭāʾ), a family term, occurring in a list (Lev. 11:30) of six, all of which are rendered by names denoting lizards. A considerable number of the lizard family are found in the Holy Land, and several of them are common about houses, especially the wall lizard, Zootica muralis, Laur.; the sand lizard, Lacerta agilis, L.; and the green lizard, L. viridis, L.

Lizard, Great. See Great Lizard.

Locust (Heb. arbeh, generic term). The devastations that the locust is capable of producing made it a fitting instrument of one of the ten memorable plagues of Egypt. Two species, Aedipoda migratoria and Acridium peregrinum, are the most common. They are always to be found in the southeastern deserts but, from time to time, multiply in vast numbers and spread over the whole country, carrying ruin and despair everywhere. The poetical and prophetic books abound in vivid descriptions of their destructiveness and the powerlessness of man to resist them. Eight Heb. words seem to refer to locusts, some of them probably to various stages in their development. It is, however, impossible to determine the exact meaning of each. Locusts were undoubtedly eaten (Matt. 3:4).

Jahn (Biblical Archaeology, sec. 23, s.v.) gives a vivid description of locusts: "Vast bodies of migrating locusts, called by the orientals the armies of God, lay waste the country. They observe as regular order, when they march, as an army. At evening they descend from their flight, and form, as it were, their camps. In the morning, when the sun has risen considerably, they ascend again, if they do not find food, and fly in the direction of the wind (Prov. 30:27; Nah. 3:16–17). They go in immense numbers (Jer. 46:23), and occupy a space of ten or twelve miles in length, and four or five in breadth, and are so deep that the sun cannot penetrate through them; so that they convert the day into night, and bring a temporary darkness on the land (Ex. 10:14–15; Joel 2:2, 10). The sound of their wings is terrible (Joel 2:5). When they descend upon the earth, they cover a vast track a foot and a half high; if the air is cold and moist, or if they be wet with the dew, they remain ... till they are dried and warmed by the sun (Nah. 3:17). Nothing stops them. They fill the ditches which are dug to stop them with their bodies, and extinguish by their numbers the fires which are kindled. They pass over walls and enter the doors and windows of houses (Joel 2:7–9). They devour everything which is green, strip off the bark of trees, and even break them to pieces by their weight (Ex. 10:12–19; Joel 1:4, 7, 10, 12, 16, 18, 20; 2:3)."

The palmerworm (Heb. gāzām, "devouring") does not appear in the NASB or NIV but is instead rendered as "gnawing locust," or "locust swarm" (Joel 1:4; 2:25) or "caterpillar" (Amos 4:9). Nor does cankerworm appear, being replaced by "creeping locust," or "young locust" (Joel 1:4; 2:25). The bald locust of KJV Lev. 11:22 is replaced in the NASB by "devastating locust," and by the NIV as "katydid." The cricket appears in the NASB for Deut. 28:42 and Lev. 11:22 but as the translation of two separate Heb. terms (rendered as "locust" in Deut. 28:42 and "beetle" in Lev. 11:22). The NIV translates "cricket" in Lev. 11:22 but "swarms of locusts" in Deut. 28:42. See also Cricket.

Locusts, grasshoppers, and caterpillars appear in the KJV, NASB, and NIV, but the relationship of these terms to one another and to the underlying Heb. is complex, as a study of concordances for the KJV, NASB, and NIV readily indicates.

See also the bibliography that appears at the end of the article on the Animal Kingdom.

Mice. See Mouse.

Migration of Birds. See Birds.

Mole. No true mole exists in the Holy Land. The mole rat, Spalax typhlus, Pall., may be the animal intended by Heb. tinshemet (Lev. 11:30, NASB and NIV, "chameleon," which see).

Another Heb. term, hāpōr pērôt, is translated "moles" in Isa. 2:20. It would perhaps better be translated "burrowing rats," or "mice," being understood as generic for all the numerous burrowers found in waste places. The mole rat is a rodent (which is the NIV translation), whereas the mole is one of the insectivora, which comprise the shrews, hedgehogs, and moles.

A third Heb. word, ḥōled, is translated “mole” in the NASB of Lev. 11:29, and “weasel” in the KJV and NIV of that verse. The cognative Arab. of the term, huld, refers to the mole rat, Spalax typhus, and the term must be understood in a family sense for all the Mustelidae, as the marten, ichneumon, genet, and polecat.

Monitor Lizard. See Chameleon.

Moth. Several species of the family Tineidae that infest woolen goods and furs. It is almost impossible to guard against them in the Eastern climate. The people wrap up their carpets and clothes with pepper grains, tobacco, pride of India leaves, and other substances. The scriptural and apocryphal allusions to moths are a significant reference to their subtle and noxious abilities (Job 4:19; Hos. 5:12; Matt. 6:19–20; Luke 12:33; Sir. 19:3; 42:13).

Mountain Sheep (Heb. zemer; KJV, “chamois”). The mountain sheep was almost certainly known to the Israelites by its Heb. name zemer. It was within the reach of them, as it was spoken of as an animal they might eat. The mountain sheep of Egypt and Arabia is known as the aoudad and the kebsh. It is probable that it was abundant in the Sinai, where it is to be found even now. It is distinguished from the other animals of its group by the long hair on its throat and breast, extending like a ruffle to its foreknee. Its horns resemble those of the beden, or mountain goat.

Mouse. The number of species of mouselike animals in the Holy Land is about forty. Probably all of them are included in the generic prohibition (Lev. 11:29). One species was eaten by the rebellious Israelites, along with swine’s flesh (Isa. 66:17). We cannot be sure what species it was. It may have been the hamster, which is said to be eaten by the Arabs.

Mule. Mules were not allowed according to the Mosaic law (Lev. 19:19). Yet they were used early in the period of the kings (2 Sam. 13:29; 18:9; 1 Kings 1:33, etc.). They were imported from Beth-togarmah (Ezek. 27:14). The Heb. term pered undoubtedly refers to the mule.

Nest. See Bird.

Night Creature. See Owl, no. 3.

Night Hawk. The Heb. taḥmās is uncertain in meaning. Some have rendered it “ostrich,” others “owl.” As the owl is mentioned in the list (Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15), and at least one other word exists for the ostrich, the RV has done well in transliterating in the marg. “tahmas,” with the gloss “of uncertain meaning.” See also Hawk; Owl.

Night Monster. See Owl.

Onycha (onī-ka), a substance mentioned as an ingredient of the holy perfume (Ex. 30:34). It is the operculum of shells of Strombi and is prepared for use by roasting, which evolves the oil on which its aromatic properties depend.

Osprey. See Buzzard; Gier Eagle; Vulture, no. 4.

Ossifrage. See Vulture.

Ostrich (Heb. r□nānim, “birds of piercing cries,” Job 39:13, NASB and NIV; elsewhere ya:ānā). The KJV translates ya:ānā or bat ya:ānā as “owl,” sometimes with a marginal reading “ostrich.” The RV, NASB, and NIV correctly and uniformly render it “ostrich.” The ostrich is a well-known bird, found in the deserts of Africa and Arabia. Its renown for voracity is due to the large size of the pebbles, bits of glass, or other objects that it swallows, as fowls swallow gravel, to assist in the subdivision of their food in the gizzard. The female ostrich makes a shallow nest and lays so many eggs that some of them are left uncovered and therefore not incubated. She does, however, cover most of them with sand and, while leaving them to the influence of the sun’s rays by day, incubates them by night. The ostrich, when pursued, runs against the wind and in large circles, a fact that enables the hunter to lie in wait for it and thus partially neutralize the advantage of its great speed. It is not true that it hides its head in the sand on the approach of danger. When compared with some other birds, as the partridge, noted for their cunning in concealing their eggs and young and escaping from their enemies, the ostrich, which runs away from eggs and chicks in the frantic desire to escape by its great speed, seems open to the charge of stupidity (Job 39:14–17).

Ostrich plumes graced ancient royal courts as fans. An ivory-handled fan of King Tutankhamen still retains its lovely ostrich plumes in the National Museum at Cairo after more than three thousand years. See also Owl.

Owl. The rendering of several Heb. words of which perhaps only two actually refer to this broad-headed, large-eyed bird.

1. Heb. bat yaʿānâ (Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15; Isa. 13:21; 34:13; 43:20; Jer. 50:39; Mic. 1:8) is certainly the ostrich (which see), and is so rendered in the NASB. The NIV translates “owl” in all these passages.

2. Heb. lîlîṭ (Isa. 34:14) is a nocturnal specter or more precisely a night demon, not a “screech owl” (KJV). NASB reads “night monster,” and the NIV, “night creature.”

3. Heb. qippôz (Isa. 34:15) is perhaps the dart snake (RV), not the “great owl” (KJV). The NASB reads “tree snake,” and NIV, “owl.”

4. Heb. tinshemet (Lev. 11:18) is rendered “swan” (KJV and Vulg.), “water hen” (RSV), or “white owl” (NASB and NIV). See also Swan. Note that in Lev. 11:30 tinshemet is translated “mole” in the KJV and “chameleon” in the NASB and NIV.

5. Heb. yanshōp (Lev. 11:17; Deut. 14:16; Isa. 34:11) is rendered “ibis” (LXX and Vulg.), “owl” (Targums and Peshitta), and “great owl” (KJV, NASB, and NIV). The species may, however, be the Egyptian eagle owl (Bubo ascalaphus), living in caves and ruins about Beersheba and Petra.

6. Heb. kôś, “a cup” (Lev. 11:17; Deut. 14:16; Ps. 102:6). The Heb. term is rendered “little owl” (NASB, NIV, and KJV), “owl of the waste places” (NASB), and “owl of the desert” (KJV). The reference is probably to the little owl, Athene glaux, commonly seen in Palestine at twilight. The Athenians considered this bird wise and associated it with their patron deity, stamping its image on their silver money.

7. Heb. tahmās is rendered “owl” in the NASB and “night hawk” in the KJV.

8. Heb. .ōah, a “howler” (Isa. 13:21, marg., “Ochim”) is rendered “doleful creatures” in the KJV but “owl” in the NASB, and “jackals” in the NIV.

Ox.

1. The translation of Heb. shôr. The cognate Arab. thaur (Gk. tauros; Lat. taurus) refer to the male. Shôr, however, is generic for both sexes and all ages. Though generally translated “ox,” it is sometimes rendered “bull.”

2. Cow. The rendering of Heb. bāqār, which is also generic for bovines; b□qarâ, with the feminine ending, signifies the “cow.”

3. Bull. The equivalent of Heb. par, or pār. The feminine pārâ is once used (Num. 19:2) for “heifer.” Sometimes the term abbîr, “strong one,” is used metaphorically for “bull” (Ps. 22:12; Isa. 34:7), but it is also used in the same sense for the “horse” (Jer. 8:16; 47:3).

4. Calf, Heifer. The rendering of Heb. ēgel and ēglâ. Once “heifer” is used as the equivalent of pārâ (Num. 19:2).

5. Wild Ox. The translation of Heb. t□ô (Deut. 14:5, KJV). Wild Bull is the rendering of Heb. tô (Isa. 51:20, KJV). The NASB, NIV, and RV correctly render “antelope” (which see). “Unicorn” of the KJV is rendered “wild ox” in NASB, NIV, and RV (Num. 23:22; 24:8; Job 39:9–10; Ps. 29:6; 92:10). See also Wild Ox. M.F.U.

Ox, Wild. See Wild Ox, below.

Palmerworm. See Locust.

Partridge (Heb. gōrē, a “caller,” from its “cry”). There are two species of partridges in the Holy Land, Caccabis chukar, C. R. Gray, the red-legged partridge, and Ammoperdix Heyi, Temm., the sand partridge. The former is generally found in the middle and upper mountain regions and the Syrian desert. The latter is peculiar to the Dead Sea and Jordan Valley. This may be the one alluded to by David (1 Sam. 26:20). The passage Jer. 17:11, in which RV has adopted the KJV marginal rendering, “gathereth young which she hath not brought forth,” is obscure. It may refer to pirating a nest, after the manner of the cuckoo, or decoying away the chicks of another bird. Although no modern authority has witnessed such theft, some of the ancients believed that the partridge was guilty of it.

Peacocks. In one place where KJV has given “peacock” (Job 39:13) the original is Heb. r□nānâ, which is undoubtedly a name for the ostrich, as in NASB, NKJV, and NIV. In the other two passages where “peacocks” occurs in NASB, KJV, and RV (1 Kings 10:22; 2 Chron. 9:21), the reference is unquestionably to this lordly bird. The Heb. tūkkî survives in a similar word tokei, which is the Tamil name of the bird. Since it is now known that the words for the ivory and apes that Solomon imported are of Indian origin, the equation tūkkî = “peacock” may be defended as it finds a satisfactory origin in Malabar togai, toghai (Old Tamil tokei, togu), a peacock. The peacock (Pavo cristatus) is native to India where it is unmolested and common. However, another rendering of tūkkî is possible as a result of evidence from Egypt, where it may be equated with t.ky (monkey), the letter t (feminine particle) indicating two varieties of monkeys. This interpretation would suggest an African origin of the animal as well as an African location for the enigmatic Ophir. Thus the NIV renders it “baboon” in 1 Kings 10:22 and 2 Chron. 9:21.

Pelican. Probably the correct translation of Heb. qāat, “the vomiter.” The NIV renders it “desert owl” throughout. It was an unclean bird (Lev. 11:18; Deut. 14:17). It was found in desolate places (Ps. 102:6) and ruins (Isa. 34:11; Zeph. 2:14, KJV, “cormorant,” marg., “pelican”). Two species are found in the Holy Land, Pelecanus onocrotalus, L. and P. crispus, Brush. The pelican lives on fish that it catches with its long beak and stores in the capacious pouch beneath it. When gorged with food it flies away to some lonely place and, pressing its pouch against its breast, stands in this attitude for hours or days, until it is hungry again, when it resumes its fishing. If qā-at does in fact refer to the pelican, this attitude would well suit the melancholy inactivity to which David alludes when comparing himself with the “pelican of the wilderness.”

Pigeon. See Dove.

Porpoise. (Heb. taḥash). This member of the dolphin family occurs in the coastal waters of Africa and Asia. Although its skin has been suggested as suitable for an outer covering of the Tabernacle (Ex. 25:5; 26:14; NIV, “sea cows”), this is actually incorrect. Dolphins have fins, but they do not have scales, and therefore they would be abhorrent and unclean to the Israelites (Lev. 11:10). It is thus inconceivable that the skin from such unclean carcasses should adorn Israel’s most holy shrine. The identity of the taḥash is unknown, and to argue from the cognate Arab. tahas to an identification with the dugong or any other marine mammal that would have been ceremonially unclean for the Hebrews is therefore fruitless. R.K.H.

Pygarg. See Ibez.

Quail (Heb. śīlāw). A heavy-bodied, terrestrial bird, Coturnix vulgaris, L., more or less resident in Egypt and the Holy Land, but also passing through them on its migrations northward in March and southward in September. The quails pass over narrow portions of the sea but arrive greatly exhausted. Many of them perish in transit. Those which the Israelites captured (Ex. 16:13; Num. 11:31–32) were on their way N. Tristram has pointed out their course up the Red Sea, across the mouth of the Gulf of Akabah and Suez, to the Sinaitic peninsula, and so blown by a sea wind over the camp of the Israelites.

Rabbit (Heb. arnebet, Lev. 11:6; Deut. 14:7). A rodent of which there are four species in the Holy Land, of which Lepus Syriacus, Hempr. et Ehr., is generally diffused. The others, L. Sinaiticus, Hempr. et Ehr., L. Aegyptius, Geoffr., and L. Isabellinus, Rüpp., are desert species.

Ram. See Sheep.

Raven. The raven, Corvus corax, L., is the first bird named (Gen. 8:7). It feeds in part on seeds and fruit. To this fact our Savior alludes (Luke 12:24; Gk. korax). It also captures small creatures alive, but it loves carrion (Prov. 30:17) and so was unclean. Orientals, as well as occidentals, look upon it as a bird of evil omen (Isa. 34:11). The Heb. word ōrēb, of which raven is the translation, doubtless includes the crows, jays, and choughs, as is implied in the expression “in its kind” (Lev. 11:15; Deut. 14:14).

Rock Badger (Heb. shāpān). A small pachydermatous animal, with teeth and feet resembling those of the hippopotamus. It is as large as a rabbit, but is not to be confused with the rabbit of England. Common in Sinai, around the Dead Sea area and in N Palestine, it is called a “coney” in KJV. It has a plump body and short ears and tail. Its scientific name is Hyrax Syriacus. It does not really chew the cud but has a motion of the jaws that resembles that function. If it had a divided hoof, it would undoubtedly have been admitted into the list of animals allowed to the Hebrews for food (Lev. 11:5; Deut. 14:7).

The rock badger lives in holes and clefts of the rocks (Ps. 104:18). It is found throughout the whole length of Sinai, Palestine, and Lebanon.

In the NASB “rock badger” replaces KJV “coney” and is to be distinguished from KJV “badger,” rendered “porpoise” in the NASB.

Roe. See Doe; Gazelle; Roebuck. The NIV retains “coney” in all three texts.

Roebuck. A term appearing in the KJV, NIV, and NASB, though of different Heb. words. Except in the case of Prov. 5:19, where “roe” of the KJV refers to Heb. ya-ālâ and is more properly translated “doe” (so NASB and NIV), KJV “roe” and “roebuck” are mistranslations of Heb. š[]bî, which signifies the gazelle (which see). In the NASB and NIV “roebuck,” Cervus capreolus, L., is the proper translation of Heb. yahmûr (Deut. 14:5; 1 Kings 4:23; KJV wrongly, “fallow deer”). The roebuck must have been abundant in the days of Solomon. It is now found on rare occasion in northern Galilee and Carmel and in the woods of Gilead. It is still known E of the Jordan.

Roedeer. See Gazelle.

Sand Flies. See Lice.

Sand Lizard. See Snail; Lizard.

Satyr. The equivalent of šā-âîr, which means a “he-goat,” and is usually so translated; in NASB it is translated “shaggy goats” (marg., “goat demons”; Isa. 13:21), or in 34:14, “hairy goat.” The NIV translates “wild goats” in both passages. The same word is rendered in KJV (Lev. 17:7; 2 Chron. 11:15) “devils,” RV, “he-goats,” marg., “satyrs.” Grotesque creatures, half man and half goat, figure in the Greek and Roman mythologies under the name of satyrs and fauns, but the OT representations are rather demonic conceptions.

See also Gods, False: Shaggy Goat.

Scorpion. A generic term for about a dozen species of the Arachnidoe, which inhabit the Holy Land. The poison is in the sting at the end of the tail. The scorpion is an emblem of torture and wrath. Some of the species of southern Palestine are six inches long.

Screech Owl. See Owl.

Sea Gull (Heb. shāḥap; KJV, “cuckoo”; Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15). The Heb. term can refer to gulls, terns, and petrels, all of which are common on the seashore and lakes of Palestine. It was listed among the unclean birds (Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15).

Sea Cows. See Porpoise.

Sea Monster. See Dragon; Whale.

Serpent. It is impossible to unravel the tangle in which the translators, ancient and modern, have involved the eight words used in the Heb. for serpents. Only one of them (Heb. sh[]pîpôn) can be identified with any degree of certainty. This is in all probability Cerastes Hasselquistii, Strauch, the “horned cerastes” of the desert. It is reasonably probable that peten refers to the “cobra.” Şepa- and şip-onî and ep-eh are uncertain. Heb. tannîm is usually translated “dragon,” and if it refers to a snake in the story of the controversy between Moses and Pharaoh we have no means of guessing the species. Heb. nāḥāsh is a general term, corresponding exactly to the English “serpent” or “snake.” Heb. sārap means “fiery” and is therefore only a term to characterize the venomousness of the unknown species intended.

The serpents of Egypt, Sinai, and the Holy Land are numerous. Of the venomous ones the principal are Daboia zanthina, Gray, Cerastes Hasselquistii, Strauch, Naja haje, L., Echis arenicola, Boie, Vipera Euphratica, Martin, and V. ammodytes, L. The English names of snakes mentioned are “adder,” “arrowsnake,” “asp,” “basilisk” (fictitious), “cockatrice” (fictitious), “fiery flying serpent,” “viper,” and the generic term “serpent.” Besides these the following terms are used: “crooked,” “crossing like a bar,” “fleeing,” “gliding,” “piercing,” “swift,” “winding,” as adjectives to the serpent, but seeming to refer to the “crocodile” under the name “leviathan” (Isa. 27:1).

Almost all the allusions to the serpent in the Scriptures are to its malignity and venom. Probably the Hebrews regarded most or all snakes as poisonous. Only once (Matt. 10:16) is there a doubtful commendation of the serpent on account of its wisdom. Its habits, even to being oviparous (Isa. 59:5), were minutely noted. The devil is the “old serpent.”

See also Dragon.

She Ass. See Donkey.

Sheep. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words. This animal is mentioned about five hundred times in the Bible. The broadtailed variety is the one which is, and probably has been from ancient times, the one raised in the East. Allusion is made to its fat tail (“rump,” KJV; Ex. 29:22; Lev. 3:9; NASB, NKJV, NIV, “fat tail”). The number of sheep raised in ancient times was prodigious. We read of the tribute of 200,000 fleeces from the king of Moab (2 Kings 3:4). Reuben took 250,000 sheep from the children of Ishmael (1 Chron. 5:21). Lambs were offered in immense numbers in sacrifice, usually males, in one case a female (Lev. 14:10). Solomon offered 120,000 on occasion of the consecration of the Temple (1 Kings 8:63). Sheep’s milk and wool were and are of immense importance for food and clothing and as articles of commerce. Rams’ skins were used in the structure of the Tabernacle.

Shepherds in Bible lands have the same personal knowledge and exhaustive care of their flocks as in ancient times. Their offices were chosen as emblems of those of Christ and His ministers in the care of the believers committed to their charge.

The interest of the sheep to Christians culminates in the fact that Christ is the atoning, illuminating, life-giving, reigning Lamb of God.

She Goat. See Goat.

Skink. See Snail.

Slug. See Snail.

Snail. The Heb. word ḥōmeṭ, rendered (KJV, Lev. 11:30) “snail,” is generic for “lizard” (NASB, “sand reptile;” RV, “sand lizard,” which rendering is, however, only conjectural); NIV, “skink.” Another word, shablûl (Ps. 58:8), is probably generic for “snail,” although neither the LXX nor Vulg. supports the rendering. The NIV identifies it as “slug.” The surface of rocks, walls, and tree trunks in this land is often covered with a thin film, looking like a coating of collodion or gelatin. This is caused by the passing and repassing of snails, which always leave a slimy track behind them. This is the “melting” of the snail, alluded to in the above passage. If a snail remains attached to a place in the hot sun it will dry up and be stuck fast to its resting place by this thick mucilaginous fluid. The number of species of snails in Bible lands is large.

Sow. See Swine.

Sparrow. One rendering of Heb. šippôr, which, like ûsfur in Arab., is generic for small birds. Šippôr is more frequently rendered “bird” and “fowl.” The NT strouthion probably refers to the house sparrow (Matt. 10:29; Luke 12:6–7).

Speckled Bird. See Hyena.

Spider. Two Heb. words are translated by KJV “spider.”

1. Heb. šmāmîṭ (Prov. 30:28), from a root signifying “to be poisonous.” The NASB and NIV give “lizard.” Both the spider and several varieties of lizards frequent houses.

2. Heb. akkābîsh (Job 8:14; Isa. 59:5) is generic for “spiders,” of which there are a large number in the Holy Land.

Sponge (Gk. spongos). A porous body, produced in the sea, composed of tubules and cells and lined with an amoeboid substance. The vital action of these protozoa keeps up a steady circulation of water through the channels. Commercial sponges consist only of the skeleton, out of which the lining and investing amoeboid substance has been cleaned. The only mention of the sponge is in connection with the crucifixion of our Savior (Matt. 27:48; etc.).

Stork (Heb. ḥāšdâ). Two species, Ciconia alba L., the white stork, and C. nigra, L., the black stork, are found in the Holy Land. It was an unclean bird. Although its usual nesting place is in ruins, it also, especially the black species, resorts to trees (Ps. 104:17). It is a migratory bird, going to northern Europe in the summer, flying high in the heaven (Jer. 8:7), and making a rushing noise (“the wind in their wings,” Zech. 5:9). Their affection for their young is proverbial.

Swallow. The only Heb. words properly translated “swallow” are dfrôr (Ps. 84:3; Prov. 26:2) and sûs (Isa. 38:14). The NIV translates sûs “swift” in Isa. 38:14. In the latter agûr signifies “twitterer” instead of “swallow,” as in KJV, or “crane,” as in RV. The swallows, swifts, and martins are numerous in Bible lands. Their shrill cries, as they skim the ground and sweep through the air with incredible rapidity, are among the most characteristic features of oriental towns.

Swan. A KJV term. It appears there as the rendering of Heb. tinshemet (Lev. 11:18; Deut. 14:16; RV, “horned owl,” marg., “swan”; NASB and NIV, “white owl”). The Heb. would refer to the purple gallinule, Porphyrio coeruleus, Vandelli, or one of the ibises, Ibis religiosa, L., or I. falcinella, L., and not to the swan, which is hardly found in the Holy Land and would not have been regarded as unclean. See Chameleon; Owl for other renderings of Heb. tinshemet.

Swarming Locust. See Locust.

Swift. See Swallow.

Swine (Heb. ḥāzîr; Gk. choiros). The hog is regarded by Muslims with no less loathing than by Jews. Many oriental Christians share this feeling, while others raise swine and eat freely of its flesh. The Jews in Christ’s time had come to ignore their own law on this subject (Matt. 8:30–34), as had some of their ancestors who ate pork (Isa. 66:17).

Tortoise. See Lizard, Great.

Tree Snake. See Owl; Snake.

Turtle, Turtledove (Heb. tôr), one of the best-known birds of the Holy Land. It was used by the poor for sacrifices (Lev. 5:11; etc.). Its peculiar note and gentle disposition (Ps. 74:19) made it a type of Christ. There are three species in the Holy Land, Turtur auritus, L., the common turtledove; T. risorius, L., the collared turtledove; and T. Senegalensis, L., the palm or Egyptian turtle.

Unicorn. See Wild Ox.

Viper. See Serpent.

Vulture. Several vultures are referred to in Scripture, the Heb. or Gk. being rendered by various English terms.

1. Heb. ayyâ is given as “kite” (Lev. 11:14; Deut. 14:13) or “red kite” (Deut. 14:13) in the NASB and NIV. The KJV rendering is “vulture” (for “kite”) and “glede” (for “red kite”).

2. Heb. dayyâ appears in Isa. 34:15 as “hawks” in the NASB, “falcons” in the NIV, and “vultures” in the KJV. It is present also in the KJV of Deut. 14:15 (“vultures”) but not in the NASB, which uses Heb. dāâ (“kite”) instead.

3. Heb. ayyâ appears in Lev. 11:14; Deut. 14:13; and Job 28:7. In Lev. 11:14 and Deut. 14:13 the Heb. term is rendered “falcon” in the NASB and NIV and “kite” in the KJV. In the passage in Job “falcon” appears in the NASB and NIV and “vulture” in the KJV.

4. Heb. rāhām is rendered “carrion vulture” in the NASB and “osprey” in the NIV of Lev. 11:18 and Deut. 14:17, but “gier eagle” in the KJV of those verses. The Heb. term refers to Pharaoh’s chicken, Neophron Percnopterus, Sav.

5. Heb. peres, the lamergeier, Gypoetus barbatus, L., is the “ossifrage” of KJV Lev. 11:13 and Deut. 14:12, but “vulture” in the NASB and NIV. This bird is the largest of the vultures in the Holy Land. As it is a familiar bird in Europe, its habits are well known. It kills its prey but also does not disdain carrion. Hence it is unclean (Lev. 11:13; Deut. 14:12). The RV renders “gier eagle.”

6. Gk. aetos is given as “vultures” in the NASB of Matt. 24:28 and Luke 17:37, but as “eagles” in the KJV.

See also Buzzard; Eagle.

Wasp. The reference in an apocryphal passage, the only place in which this insect is mentioned (Wisd. of Sol. 12:8), is doubtless to the common yellow jacket, Vespa vulgaris, L. It is very common throughout the Holy Land, especially so in the vineyards during vintage, about the grape presses, and about the fruit shops in towns.

Weasel. See Mole.

Whale (Heb. tan, or tannîm; a “monster”). The “great whales” (KJV, Gen. 1:21; NASB, “sea monsters”; Job 7:12; Ezek. 32:2) are to be understood as all aquatic creatures not considered fish. Jonah’s whale (kētos, Matt. 12:40, from the LXX, Jonah 1:17) was a “great fish.” It might have been a spermaceti whale, had one wandered into the Mediterranean, or a large shark, of which that sea contains many large enough to have swallowed Jonah.

White Owl. See Owl.

Wild Ass. See Donkey.

Wild Beasts. The significance of beasts in many places, and of wild beasts in all, has to do with beasts of prey. The context will always settle the meaning. There are no longer any lions in Syria and Palestine. They were, however, numerous in Bible times. Bears are still found in considerable numbers in Anti-Lebanon, and a few still linger in Lebanon. They become more abundant in Amanus and the Taurus. Wolves are common throughout. Leopards are occasionally seen in Lebanon, more frequently in Anti-Lebanon and E of the Jordan, and in the neighborhood of the Dead Sea. Jackals are common everywhere. Foxes are also numerous. Hyenas haunt ruins and waste places. Badgers, martens, polecats, mongooses, and genets are also found. Among the wild beasts that are not carnivorous are the deer, the gazelle, the antelope, wild donkey, the beden (wild goat), and swine.

Hunting, except for deer and gazelles, is not common. A few bears are shot every year. Wolves are killed by the shepherds. Foxes are occasionally trapped or shot. Hyenas are caught in steel traps or shot, and rarely a leopard is killed in the more lonely parts of the mountains. Rabbits are shot in the winter and brought to the markets of the large cities. The allusions to wild beasts in the Bible are numerous (2 Kings 14:9; Job 39:15; Ps. 80:13; Hos. 13:8; etc.).

Wild Donkey. See Donkey.

Wild Goat. A graceful animal, Capra beden, L., with semicircular horns two and a half to three feet long. It is found in the more inaccessible mountains and deserts. Of the two Heb. words ya-āllā and ʾaqqô (Deut. 14:5), the first certainly, and the second probably, refer to this species. See also Satyr.

Wild Ox (Heb. rûēm, KJV, “unicorn”). Probably Bos primigenius, L., the true “aurochs.” This animal is now extinct but certainly existed in Germany in the time of Caesar and probably did not become extinct in Europe until the Middle Ages. Caesar describes it as immense in size, of great strength (cf. Num. 23:22; 24:8), speed (Ps. 29:6), and ferocity, untamable (Job 39:9–10), associated with bulls (Isa. 34:7; KJV marg., “rhinoceroses”) (Coes., Bell. Gall., iv, 29). It cannot be the Arab. rim, which is doubtless Antilope leucoryx (see Antelope), nor Bison bonasus, which is called by the modern Germans “aurochs,” but which is an animal with short horns, quite unsuitable for “horns of the unicorns” (KJV, Ps. 22:21). Still less can it be the intention to speak of a fictitious creature like the traditional unicorn, with the single horn springing from the center of the forehead. The rûēm had more than one horn (Deut. 33:17). The Heb. word most certainly denotes the “wild ox,” for the cognate word in Akkad. rimu has this meaning. Representations of it by ancient Assyrian artists picture it as the aurochs. Tiglath-pileser I (c. 1115–1102 B.C.) hunted it as game in Hittite country in the Lebanon Mountains. It became extinct early in Syria-Palestine, and its name transferred to its descendant, the common ox. But the extinct species was notorious for its flatter forehead, colossal strength and ferocity, and its powerful horns of double curvature. Tristram offered independent corroboration of its previous occurrence in the Lebanon Mountains by recovering its teeth in the bone caves of the region. M.F.U.

Wolf (Heb. zûēb; Gk. lukos). We believe it also to be the proper rendering of tannîm, translated, KJV, “dragons”; NASB, NIV, “jackals” (Job 30:29; Ps. 44:19; Isa. 13:22; 34:13; 43:20; Jer. 9:11; 10:22; 14:6); RV marg., “the crocodile” (49:33; 51:37; Mic. 1:8). The wolf is the terror of sheep but usually flees from the shepherd. Wolves are numerous in all the sheep walks of this land. The emblematic references to the ferocity and bloodthirstiness of the wolf are numerous and forcible (Isa. 65:25; Matt. 7:15; 10:16).

Worm. The only worms alluded to in Scripture are the larvae of insects, such as the grub of the moth (Isa. 51:8); rimmâ, maggots bred in decaying vegetable and animal substances (Ex. 16:24; Job 7:5, etc.), and tôlâ-îm, also maggots similar to the last. Tôlâc and tôlacat, from the same root, refer to the cochineal insect. Earthworms are not mentioned in the Bible. The worms that devoured Herod (Acts 12:23) were maggots, bred in a wound or sore or, more probably, intestinal worms.

ANIMAL, WORSHIP OF. This is of great antiquity, its origin involved in much obscurity. Zoolatria (animal worship) is said to have been introduced into Egypt under the Second Dynasty (c. 2750 B.C.). The gods of the Egyptian, Indian, Greek, and Teutonic mythologies were the “powers” of nature; the principal sacred animals and reptiles were worshiped as their incarnations or servants. Many of them were carefully tended while living and when dead were buried with great pomp. To cause the death of any of these creatures by design was punishable with death; if anyone caused the death of a cat, hawk, or ibis, with or without intent, he had to die.

The Israelites often degraded themselves by an imitation of this kind of worship (Ex. 32), for which they were severely punished.

ANISE. See Vegetable Kingdom: Dill.

ANKLET (Heb. ekes, KJV, “tinkling ornaments”). The ornament mentioned in the description given of female attire (Isa. 3:18). It was a ring of gold, silver, or ivory worn around the ankles. The anklet was widely used by the ancients, nor has its use ceased in the East. The Egyptian monuments show them to have been worn by both sexes. The practice was forbidden in the Koran (24:31), though the prohibition may refer rather to the small bells worn around the ankles, especially by dancing girls. See also ankle chains in the article Dress.

AN`NA (an`a). The Gk. form of Hannah, the prophetess, and daughter of Phanel, of the tribe of Asher. Married in early life, after seven years she lost her husband. From that time she devoted herself to attendance upon the Temple services and probably by reason of her great piety was allowed to reside in one of the chambers of the women’s court. Anna was eighty-four years old when the infant Jesus was presented to the Lord. Entering as Simeon was thanking God, Anna also broke forth in praise for the fulfillment of the divine promises (Luke 2:36).

ANNALS (an`nals). See Chronicles.

AN`NAS (an`as; a contracted form of Ananias). A high priest of the Jews. Josephus calls him Ananus, the son of Seth. He was first appointed high priest by Quirinius, proconsul of Syria, about A.D. 7 but was removed after seven years (Kitto says fifteen years) by Valerius Gratus, procurator of Judea (Josephus Ant. 18.2.1–2). Annas is mentioned in Luke 3:2 as being high priest along with Caiaphas. Our Lord’s first hearing was before Annas (John 18:13), who sent Him bound to Caiaphas (v. 24). In Acts 4:6 he is plainly called high priest. He had four sons who filled that office, besides his son-in-law, Caiaphas. There have been several theories advanced to reconcile the application of high priest to Annas and Caiaphas at the same time. Kitto thinks that Annas was regarded as being high priest jure divino and having authority in spiritual matters, whereas Caiaphas was the pontiff recognized by the government. The probability is that his great age, abilities, and influence, and his being the father-in-law of Caiaphas made him practically the high priest, although his son-in-law held the office.

ANOINTING. Anointing the body with oil was an ancient and widespread custom common among Egyptians, Hebrews, and inhabitants of the Far East, as well as among Greeks and Romans. The purpose was, doubtless, to keep the skin supple and to moderate the evaporation that is so great in hot climates. In Scripture the usual Heb. word for anointing is māshah; the Gk. term is chriō, to “rub.” See the second article Anointing (below).

Cleansing. The allusions to anointing as part of ordinary washing are numerous, both in the OT and NT (Ruth 3:3); as expressive of joy (Ps. 23:5; Heb. 1:9); its disuse indicative of grief (2 Sam. 14:2; Ps. 92:10; Dan. 10:3). It was reckoned among the civilities extended to guests (Luke 7:46), although the ointments used on such occasions seem to have been perfumes rather than oils. It was also used medicinally (Isa. 1:6; Mark 6:13; James 5:14). See Oil.

The practice of anointing the bodies of the dead is referred to in Mark 14:8 and Luke 23:56. This ceremony was performed after the washing of the body and was doubtless intended to check decay. See Embalming.

Consecration. The first instance of the religious use of oil is the anointing of the stone by Jacob (Gen. 28:18; 35:14), evidently designed to be a formal consecration of the stone, or spot, to a sacred purpose. Under the Mosaic law persons and things set apart for sacred purposes were anointed with the “holy anointing oil” (Ex. 30:23–25, 30–33). See Priesthood, Hebrew.

Coronation. It was a custom among the Jews to anoint with oil those set apart as kings, which custom was adopted by the Christian church.

Figurative. The anointing with oil was a symbol of endowment with the Spirit of God (1 Sam. 10:1, 6; 16:13; Isa. 61:1) for the duties of the office to which a person was consecrated (Lev. 8). See King; Priest.

ANOINTING (Gk. chrisma, “ointment,” “anointing”). The gift of the Holy Spirit as an efficient aid in getting a knowledge of the truth (1 John 2:20). Not that the work of Jesus was imperfect, but the Spirit helps us to understand the truth He taught and thus to glorify Him (John 16:14) in whom the full revelation of God had been given (v. 15).

ANSWER (Heb. ānā, to “testify,” Gk. apokrinomai, to “respond”). In Scripture this term has other meanings than the usual one of “reply.”

1. Miriam is said to have “answered,” i.e., taken up the strain of victory sung by Moses and the men (Ex. 15:21; see 1 Sam. 18:7; 29:5; cf. Num. 21:17).

2. To respond to requests or entreaties (1 Sam. 4:17; Ps. 3:4; 18:41; 27:7); to announce future events (1 Sam. 14:37; 28:6).

3. In a forensic sense: of a judge investigating (Acts 24:25) or giving sentence (Ex. 23:2); of a witness answering inquiries of a judge, hence to testify, bear witness (Deut. 19:16; Job 16:8); to accuse or defend in court (Deut. 31:21; Gen. 30:33).

4. To “answer” is also used for the commencement of a discourse when no reply to any question or objection is expected (Job 3:2; song of Sol. 2:10; Matt. 11:25; 12:38; etc.).

ANT. See Animal Kingdom.

ANTEDILUVIANS. The people who lived before the Flood. Of this period we have little authentic information (Gen. 4:16–6:8), although additional knowledge may be gathered from the history of Noah and the first men after the Deluge. In Scripture we find few indications of savagery among these people, and it need not be held that they gradually civilized themselves.

It is the opinion of some that the antediluvians were acquainted with astronomy, from the fact that the ages of Seth and his descendants were recorded (Gen. 5:6–32); and they appear to have been familiar with botany, from the mention of the vine, olive, etc. (6:14; 8:11); mineralogy (2:12); music (4:21); architecture, from the fact that Cain built a city (4:17); metallurgy, so far as forging and tempering are concerned (4:22). Agriculture was evidently the first employment of Adam (2:15; 3:17–18); afterward of Cain (4:2) and of Noah, who planted a vineyard (9:20). The slight intimations to be found respecting government favor the notion that the particular governments were patriarchal and subject to general theocratic control. Respecting religion, sacrifices are mentioned (4:4); some think that the Sabbath was observed; mention is made that “men began to call upon the name of the Lord” (4:26). We have here an account of the commencement of that worship of God that consists in prayer, praise, and thanksgiving, or in the acknowledgment and celebration of the mercy and help of Jehovah. Noah seemed to have been familiar with the distinction between clean and unclean beasts (Gen. 7:2).

ANTELOPE. See Animal Kingdom.

ANTHOTHIAH (an-thō-thījah). The ninth son of Shashak, a Benjamite (1 Chron. 8:24). E.H.M.

ANTHROPOPATHISM (from Gk. anthropatheia, “with human feelings”), the attributing of human emotions, such as anger, grief, joy, etc., to God. Traces of this are found in Scripture (Gen. 6:6; 8:21; 11:5, and many other passages). If we understand such expressions to be the imperfect approximating expression of eternal truth, then they become the means of a better knowledge of God.

ANTICHRIST (Gk. antichristos, “against Christ”; some, “instead of Christ”). A word used only by the apostle John (epistles 1 and 2).

Meaning. The Gk. preposition anti in composition sometimes denotes substitution, taking the place of another; hence, “false Christ.” The connection in which the word is used appears to import opposition, covert rather than avowed, with a professed friendliness.

Antichrists. John seems to make a distinction between “antichrist” and “antichrists” (1 John 2:18), for he declares that “even now many antichrists have arisen,” but “that antichrist is coming.” An antichrist is one who opposes Christ, whether he opposes the doctrine of His deity or His humanity; or whether he sets himself against Him in respect to His priestly office, by substituting other methods of atoning for sin and finding acceptance with God; His kingly office, by claiming authority to exact laws in His church contrary to His laws or to dispense with His commandments; or His prophetical office, by claiming authority to add to, alter, or take away from the revelation that He has given in His holy Word. This is agreeable to the description of an antichrist (2:22; 4:3; 2 John 7). In a general sense an antichrist is a person who is opposed to the authority of Christ as head of the church and creation.

The Antichrist. From early times the opinion has prevailed that the antichrists referred to were the forerunners of an evil rather than the evil itself. Some individual would arise who, by way of eminence, would be fitly called the Antichrist; and who, before being destroyed by Christ, would utter horrid blasphemies against the Most High and practice great enormities upon the saints. This view is scriptural and came from connecting the passages in John's epistles with the descriptions in Daniel and the Apocalypse of the great God-opposing power that would persecute the saints of the Most High; and of the apostle Paul's "man of lawlessness" (2 Thess. 2:3–10).

See also our Lord's own prediction respecting the last age of the world (Matt. 24:24) and the description of such an Antichrist (Rev. 13:1–8).

Identification. Early Christians looked for Antichrist as a person and not a polity or system. The general opinion of those who closely followed the Scriptures was that he would be a man in whom Satan would dwell utterly and bodily, and who would be armed with satanic and demonic powers. In the OT he is prefigured under the "king of Babylon" (Isa. 14:4); the little "horn" (Dan. 7:8; 8:9); the king "insolent and skilled in intrigue" (8:23); "the prince who is to come" (9:26); the willful king (11:36). In the NT he is called "the man of lawlessness," "the son of destruction" (2 Thess. 2:3–8); "antichrist" (1 John 2:18); and "the beast" (Rev. 13:1–10). This sinister, demon-inspired leader will rise to dominate the world in the end-time, persecute the saints, seek to destroy the Jew and banish the name of God and His Christ from the earth, and thus take over. This would mean the thwarting of God's plan for the messianic millennial kingdom, which involves the restoration of Israel (Acts 1:6) and universal peace. He is destroyed by the second advent of Christ (Rev. 19:11–16), who sets up the earthly kingdom (Rev. 20:1–3). This is the premillennial view. Amillennialism rejects an earthly kingdom in favor of Christ's ushering in the eternal state, rather than His establishing another era in time. Views that identify the Antichrist with Muhammad (Innocent III in 1213) or with the papal church (Protestantism) can scarcely be called scriptural.

ANTICHRISTIANISM. A convenient term used to designate in a collective manner the various forms of hostility to Christianity. It is equivalent to the "spirit of the antichrist" (1 John 4:3). It was this that Enoch and Noah denounced in their preaching (Jude 14; 2 Pet. 2:5–7) and that "tormented" the righteous soul of Lot. It is the mind "hostile toward God" and opposed to Him (Rom. 8:7); the "mystery of lawlessness" foreseen by Paul (2 Thess. 2:7). Since the days of persecution it has been chiefly confined to intellectual modes of opposition, known as Infidelity, Deism, Rationalism, etc.

AN'TIOCH (an'ti-ok, from Antiochus, a Syrian king).

1. In Syria, on the left bank of the Orontes, 16½ miles from the Mediterranean and three hundred miles N of Jerusalem, between the Lebanon and Taurus mountain ranges. It was founded about 300 B.C. by Seleucus Nicator and called Epidaphne (near Daphne), or "on the Orontes," to distinguish it from fifteen other Antiochs. The city was destroyed several times by earthquakes, one of which, A.D. 526, killed 250,000 persons. It was luxurious. Its main street, four miles in length, was lined with magnificent mansions. It was highly cultured, but its social life was debased, sensual, and shocking. Jews formed a large portion of the population, having been brought there by Seleucus Nicator. It became the third city in the Roman Empire, having a population of 500,000. Pompey made it the seat of the legate of Syria, 64 B.C., and a free city.

Antioch was associated early with Christian effort. It was there that the persecuted disciples fled after the demise of Stephen (Acts 11:19–20). The name Christian was first applied to followers of Jesus there, and all three of Paul's missionary journeys began in Antioch. The most flourishing period in the history of the Christian church in Antioch was in the time of Chrysostom, who was born there in 347. In 635 it was taken by Muslim Arabs, by the Turks in 1084, and by Crusaders in 1098. It gradually declined under early Arab and Ottoman rule, but modern Turkish Antakya is a growing city in excess of 75,000 inhabitants.

Princeton University and the National Museum of France excavated at Antioch for six seasons during the years 1932–39. A street plan of a large part of the ancient city has been established; and numerous significant mosaic pavements were uncovered in churches, villas, and other public buildings of the city. A few of them may be seen in the Louvre in Paris, and there is a significant collection in the Antakya museum.

The Chalice of Antioch is a controversial art object found at Antioch in 1910 and now in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York. The chalice is of two parts: a plain inner cup of silver, about seven and a half inches high and six inches in diameter, and an outer gilded silver holder with twelve figures displayed on the outside. Much has been written about the chalice, and it has even been identified as the Holy Grail used by Christ at the Last Supper. Perhaps the best that can be said about this chalice is that it is an early piece of Christian art of some century later than the first and that Christ or some of the disciples may be intended by the artistic representations.

2. Antioch in Pisidia, also founded by Seleucus I Nicator (312–280 B.C.), was a commercial center commanding the great trade route between Ephesus and the Cilician Gates. Paul's success here is recounted in Acts 13:14–52, and he revisited this important city on his first missionary tour (14:21). A University of Michigan team under the direction of David Robinson excavated at Antioch in 1924. They were able to show that life at Antioch in Paul's day centered on two paved squares, the Square of Tiberius (built during the emperor's reign, A.D. 14–37) and the Square of Augustus (constructed just before the birth of Christ). From the lower square, twelve steps some seventy feet long led into the Square of Augustus through a magnificent triple-arched gateway. The squares were at least partly faced with shops and houses. Unfortunately, nearly all the stone uncovered by excavators has been carried off by local inhabitants; so the ancient magnificence of the place can only be imagined today. H.F.V.

Syrian Antioch: G. Downey, A History of Antioch in Syria from Seleucus to the Arab Conquest (1961).

AN'TIPAS (an'ti-pas).

1. Herod Antipas was the son of Herod the Great by Malthace, a Samaritan. Of his father's dominions he inherited Galilee and Perea. He was the Herod who executed John the Baptist. See Herod.

2. A “faithful” martyr mentioned in Rev. 2:13, A.D. before 100. He is said to have been one of our Savior’s first disciples and a bishop of Pergamum, and to have been put to death in a tumult there by the priests of Aesculapius, who had a celebrated health center and temple in that city.

AN’TIPA’TER. The father of Herod the Great. See Herod.

ANTIP’ATRIS (an-tip’a-tris; “instead of his father”). A city built by Herod the Great in honor of his father, Antipater. It is the modern Ras-el-Ain. It lay on the road built by the Romans, leading from Caesarea to Jerusalem, thirty-eight miles from the former place. Paul was taken to it by night as a prisoner (Acts 23:31). In OT times it was called Aphék (which see).

Definitive excavations at the site began in 1972 under the auspices of Tel Aviv University and the municipality of Peta Tikva, with the cooperation of New Orleans Baptist Theological Seminary and with Moshe Kochavi and George Kelm as directors. In the several seasons of excavation that have been conducted since, discoveries have been made that date to periods extending from about 3000 B.C. to the sixteenth century A.D. Typical Philistine pottery was uncovered in the eleventh-century B.C. level, when Philistines used the site as a base of operations for the battle in which they succeeded in taking the Ark (1 Sam. 4:1, 11). Of special interest are findings in the level dating to the reign of Herod the Great. The main street was twenty-six feet wide; its center was paved with diagonally laid flagstones. Shops, workshops, and elevated sidewalks flanked both sides of the street. Dominating the site today is a Turkish fort built in 1571. H.F.V.

ANTITYPE (Gk. antitupon, a “counterpart”; Heb. 9:24). That which is represented or prefigured by a type. The type may be considered a rough draft, while the antitype is the perfect image. The type is a figure, and antitype is the reality that the type prefigured, as Christ is the antitype of the Paschal Lamb.

ANTO’NIA (an-tō’ni-a). A strong fortress built and named by Herod in honor of Antonius, or Mark Antony, situated to the NW of the Temple area in Jerusalem, partly surrounded by a deep ditch 165 feet wide. It was garrisoned with Roman soldiers, whose watchfulness preserved order in the Temple courts. Spoken of as the barracks (Acts 21:37), here Paul made an address (22:1–21). Herod constructed a secret passage from the fortress to the Temple.

APE. See Animal Kingdom.

APEL’LES (a-pel’ēz). A Christian in Rome, whom Paul salutes in his epistle to the church there (Rom. 16:10) and calls “approved in Christ,” A.D. 60. According to the old church traditions, Apelles was one of the seventy disciples and bishop either of Smyrna or Heracleia. The Greeks observe this festival on October 31.

A’PHEK (a’fek; “strength, fortress”).

1. A city mentioned in Josh. 13:4, apparently N of Sidon and accordingly commonly identified with Afga, ancient Aphaca, some twenty-three miles N of Beirut.

2. Aphék (Aphik) was also an Asherite city not conquered by the Israelites (Josh. 19:30; Judg. 1:31). A. Alt located it at Tell Kurdaneh about six miles SE of Acco (Ptolemais).

3. A town in the plain of Sharon about eleven miles NE of Joppa (modern Ras el-Ain). It was evidently here the Philistines camped on their way to Shiloh to attack Israel at Ebenezer (1 Sam. 4:1). See also Antipatris.

4. A town beyond the Jordan about four miles E of the Sea of Galilee on the highway between Damascus and the plain of Esdraelon, fortress city of Bethshan, modern Afik (Fik). Cf. 1 Kings 20:26, 30; 2 Kings 13:17. However, another village between Shunem and Jezreel seems required by the narratives of the Philistine wars in 1 Sam. 28:4; 29:1, 11; 31:1. M.F.U.

APHE´KAH (a-fē'ka; “fortress”). A city in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:53). Its site has not been discovered.

APHI´AH (a-fi'a). The father of Becorath, a Benjamite and ancestor of Saul (1 Sam. 9:1).

A´PHIK. See Aphek, no. 2.

APOCRYPHA. The name given by Jerome to a number of books that in the LXX are placed among the canonical books of the Bible but which, for evident reasons, do not belong to the sacred canon. The term itself, a Gk. adjective in the neuter plural (from apokruphos, “hidden, concealed”) denotes strictly “things concealed.” But almost certainly the noun biblia is understood, so that the real implication of the expression is “apocryphal books” or “writings.”

Old Testament Apocrypha. In its final quasi-technical meaning of “noncanonical,” in common use since the Reformation, the term specifically refers to the fourteen books written after the OT canon was closed and which, being the least remote from the canonical books, laid strongest claim to canonicity. The OT apocryphal books have an unquestioned historical and literary value but have been rejected as inspired for the following reasons:

1. They abound in historical and geographical inaccuracies and anachronisms.
2. They teach doctrines that are false and foster practices that are at variance with inspired Scripture.
3. They resort to literary types and display an artificiality of subject matter and styling out of keeping with inspired Scripture.
4. They lack the distinctive elements that give genuine Scripture its divine character, such as prophetic power and poetic and religious feeling.

The OT apocryphal books are fourteen in number, classified as follows:

Didactic or Wisdom Literature (2 books).

The Wisdom of Solomon. This is an ethical treatise in commendation of wisdom and righteousness and a denunciation of iniquity and idolatry, written under the name of Solomon. The writer wrote in Gk. and was apparently an Alexandrian Jew who seems to have lived between 150 B.C. and 50 B.C. Swete calls this work “the solitary survival from the wreck of the earlier works of the philosophical school at Alexandria which culminated in Philo, the contemporary of our Lord.”

Ecclesiasticus. Called also The Wisdom of Jesus, Son of Sirach. This long and valuable ethical treatise contains an extensive range of instruction in general morality and practical godliness. It follows the model of Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Job. It was written originally in Heb. about 180 B.C. and translated into Gk. about 132 B.C. by a grandson of the original author. About two-thirds of the Heb. is now extant.

Historical Literature (3 books).

First Esdras. Esdras is the Gk. for Ezra. The book narrates in Gk. the declension and fall of Judah from Josiah's reign, the destruction of Jerusalem, the Babylonian Exile, the return of the exiles, and the share taken by Ezra in the restored community.

The book consists of an independent and somewhat free version of portions of 2 Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah broken by an extended context that has no parallel in the Heb. Bible (1 Esdras 3:1–5:6). Swete calls this “perhaps the most interesting of the contributions made by the Greek Bible to the legendary history of the captivity and the return” (Introduction to the O.T. in Gk. [1902], p. 266).

First Maccabees. This valuable historical treatise covers a period of about forty years from the accession of Antiochus Epiphanes (175 B.C.) to the death of Simon Maccabees (135 B.C. or a little later). The book is of first-rate importance as a source for the interbiblical period and gives a full and worthy account of the important Maccabean wars and the noble struggle for Jewish independence.

Second Maccabees. This much less historically accurate book covers a part of the same period as the first (175–160 B.C.) but offers a striking contrast to it. Swete (op. cit., p. 378) calls it “a partially independent but rhetorical and inaccurate and, to some extent, a mythical panegyric of patriotic revolt.”

Religious Romance (2 books).

Tobit. This is a tale of a pious Naphtalite named Tobit, who has a son named Tobias. The father loses his eyesight. The son is dispatched to obtain payment of a debt to a certain Rages in Media. On the way an angel guides him to Ecbatana, where he makes a romantic marriage with a widow who still remained a virgin despite the fact that she had been married to seven husbands, all of whom had been killed by a demon named Asmodeus on their marriage day. Encouraged by the angel to become the eighth husband, Tobias escapes death by burning the inner parts of a fish, the smoke of which exorcises the evil spirit. Thereupon he cures his father’s blindness by anointing the sightless eyes with the gall of the fish that had already proved so efficacious. The book was probably written as moral fiction toward the close of the third century B.C.

Judith. Judith, a rich, beautiful, and devout Jewish widow, is the heroine of the romance with a pseudo-historical background. At the time of the Babylonian invasion of Judah she disguises herself as a traitress and succeeds in beguiling and slaying the Babylonian general Holofernes, thus saving her city. The narrative is apparently intended as religious fiction. It is immoral, since it teaches that the end justifies the means. The book dates from Maccabean times and was almost certainly written in Heb. according to R. H. Ottley (Handbook to the Septuagint [1929], p. 138).

Prophetic Literature (2 books).

Baruch (with The Epistle of Jeremiah). This consists of prayers and confessions of Jews in exile with promises of restoration reportedly written by Baruch, the scribe, in imitation of Jeremiah’s language and style. The first five chapters are made nominally to emanate from Baruch, while the sixth was entitled The Epistle of Jeremy, i.e., Jeremiah. Although Baruch and the epistle appear in lists that otherwise rigorously excluded noncanonical books, this work never was included in the Heb. Scriptures and is unquestionably uncanonical.

Second Esdras. This is a religious treatise, apocalyptic in character. Chapters 3–14 purport to record seven revelations granted to Ezra in Babylon, several of which took the form of visions. The book, according to Ottley, is supposed to have been written about A.D. 100. The RV contains seventy additional verses in chap. 7 that were discovered in 1875.

Legendary Additions (5 books).

Prayer of Manasseh. This is supposed to be a deeply penitential prayer of Manasseh, the wicked king of Judah, when he was carried away as a prisoner to Babylon by the Assyrians. It was thought to follow 2 Chron. 33:18–19, which outlines Manasseh’s wicked reign and his repentance. Its date is uncertain.

The Rest of Esther. Composed in Gk., this writing consists of passages that were interpolated throughout the canonical Esther of the LXX in the form of visions, letters, and prayers intended to explain supposed difficulties and show the hand of God in the narrative.

Song of the Three Hebrew Children. This, the first of three unauthenticated additions to the canonical book of Daniel, was inserted after 3:23, and consists of a petition of Azariah in the furnace and an account of the miraculous deliverance, together with an ode of praise of the three.

The History of Susanna. This amplification of the book of Daniel is in the form of a religious romance, narrating how the godly wife of a wealthy Jew in Babylon is exonerated of the false charges of two immoral men through the agency of Daniel’s wisdom. In the LXX the narrative is placed before the book of Daniel; in the Vulg. it is placed as Dan. 13.

Bel and the Dragon. This final spurious addition to Daniel tells in melodramatic fashion how Daniel destroys two objects of Babylonian worship, Bel and the Dragon, and escapes from the lion’s den.

New Testament Apocrypha. The apocryphal books of the NT, unlike those of the OT, have never claimed the faith of the Christian church, except in a few isolated instances. There are more than one hundred of them, and it is doubtful whether one of them appeared before the second century of our era. Most of them portray a much later date. They are valuable as an indication of the growth of thought and the rise of heresy in the age just subsequent to that of the apostles. None of them ever received the sanction of any ecclesiastical council.

APOLLOŃIA (ap-o-lō’ni-a; Gk. “belonging to Apollo”). The name of several towns in the Mediterranean world, so called in honor of the Greek sun-god, Apollo. Paul visited the famous biblical city by this name on his second missionary journey (Acts 17:1). It was located on the well-known Roman road called the Egnatian Way, twenty-eight miles W of Amphipolis in Macedonia. M.F.U.

APOLŃLOS (a-pol’los). A learned, “eloquent” Jew of Alexandria, well acquainted with the Scriptures and the Jewish religion (Acts 18:24). About A.D. 56 he came to Ephesus, where he began to teach in the synagogue “the things concerning Jesus, being acquainted only with the baptism of John” (v. 25). Here he met Aquila and Priscilla, who “explained to him the way of God more accurately,” and Apollos preached Christ with great zeal and power (v. 26). After this he preached in Achaia and especially at Corinth (18:27–28; 19:1), having been recommended by the brethren in Ephesus (18:27). On his arrival at Corinth he was useful in watering the seed that Paul had sown (1 Cor. 3:6). Many of the Corinthians became so attached to him that a schism was produced in the church, some saying, “I am of Paul”; others, “I am of Apollos” (3:4–7). That this party feeling was not encouraged by Apollos is evident from the manner in which Paul speaks of him and his unwillingness to return to Corinth (1 Cor. 16:12). Apollos was, doubtless, at this time with Paul in Ephesus.

Paul again mentions Apollos kindly in Titus 3:13 and recommends him and Zenas the lawyer to the attention of Titus, knowing that they planned to visit Crete, where Titus was. Jerome thinks that Apollos remained there until he heard that the divisions in the church at Corinth had been healed by Paul's letter and then returned and became bishop of that city. Other authorities make him bishop of Duras, of Colophon, of Iconium (in Phrygia), and of Caesarea.

APOL'LYON (a-pol'yun; "destroyer"). The Gk. equivalent (Rev. 9:11) of Abaddon (which see).

APOSTASY. A "falling away." The common classical use of the word has to do with a political defection (Gen. 14:4, LXX; 2 Chron. 13:6, LXX; Acts 5:37). In the NT its more usual meaning is that of a religious defection (21:21; 1 Tim. 4:1; Heb. 3:12). This is called "apostasy from the faith" (apostasia a fide): a secession from the church, and a disowning of the name of Christ. Some of its peculiar characteristics are mentioned, such as seducing spirits, doctrines of demons, hypocritical lying, a seared conscience, forbidding of marriage and of meats, a form of godliness without the power (1 Tim. 4:1; 2 Tim. 3:5). The grave nature of apostasy is shown by such passages as Heb. 10:26–29, 2 Pet. 2:15–21, and John 15:22. Apostasy as the act of a professed Christian, who knowingly and deliberately rejects revealed truth regarding the deity of Christ (1 John 4:1–3) and redemption through His atoning sacrifice (Phil. 3:18; 2 Pet. 2:1) is different from error, which may be the result of ignorance (Acts 19:1–6), or heresy, which may be the result of falling into the snare of Satan (2 Tim. 2:25–26). Both error and heresy may accordingly be consistent with true faith. On the other hand, apostasy departs from the faith but not from the outward profession of it (2 Tim. 3:5). Apostasy, whether among the angels (Isa. 14:12–14; Ezek. 28:15; Jude 6), in Israel (Isa. 1:1–6; 5:5–7), or in the church (Rev. 3:14–16) is irremediable and awaits judgment. Mankind's apostasy in Adam (Gen. 3:6–7) is curable only through the sacrifice of Christ. Apostates apparently can only be professors and not actual possessors of true salvation, otherwise their defection would incur severe chastening or, if this failed to restore them, untimely (physical) death (1 Cor. 5:5; 11:32; 1 John 5:16). M.F.U.

APOSTLE (Gk. apostolos, a "delegate"). One sent with a special message or commission. In this sense the word is used in the LXX (1 Kings 14:6; Isa. 18:2), and in the NT: John 13:16, "Neither is one who is sent [apostle] greater than the one who sent him"; 2 Cor. 8:23; Phil. 2:25, where persons sent out by churches on special errands are called their apostles, or messengers. In Heb. 3:1 Jesus is called "the Apostle and High Priest of our confession."

Hebrew. The Jews, it is said, called the collector of the half shekel, which every Israelite paid annually to the Temple, an apostle; also those who carried about encyclical letters from their rulers. Paul may have used the word in this sense when he declared himself "an apostle, not sent from men, nor through the agency of man" (Gal. 1:1), plainly indicating that his commission was directly from Christ. (See also Rom. 1:1; 1 Cor. 15:1.)

Christian. The official name of those twelve of the disciples chosen by our Lord to be with Him during His ministry and to whom He entrusted the organization of His church. These He chose early in His ministry and ordained “that they might be with Him.” The number twelve was, doubtless, with reference to the twelve tribes of Israel and was fixed, so that the apostles were often called simply “the twelve” (Matt. 26:14; John 6:67; 20:24; 1 Cor. 15:5). Their names were (1) Simon Peter (Cephas, Barjona); (2) Andrew; (3) John; (4) Philip; (5) James; (6) Bartholomew (perhaps same as Nathanael); (7) Thomas (Didymus); (8) Matthew (Levi); (9) Simon the Zealot; (10) Jude (Thaddaeus); (11) James the Less; (12) Judas Iscariot. The original qualification of an apostle, as stated by Peter (Acts 1:21–22), was that he should have been personally acquainted with our Lord’s ministry, from His baptism by John to His ascension. By this close personal relation with Him they were peculiarly fitted to give testimony to the facts of redemption. Shortly after their ordination “He gave to them authority over unclean spirits, to cast them out, and to heal every kind of disease and every kind of sickness”; “and sent them out in pairs” to preach (Matt. 10:1–6; Mark 3:14; 6:17; Luke 6:1, 13; 9:1). They accompanied our Lord on His journeys, saw His wonderful works, heard His discourses to the people (Matt. 5:1; Luke 6:13–49) and those addressed to the learned Jews (Matt. 19:3–12; Luke 10:25–37). They sometimes worked miracles (Mark 6:13; Luke 9:6) and sometimes attempted to do so without success (Matt. 17:16). They recognized Jesus as “the Christ of God” (16:16; Luke 9:20) and ascribed supernatural power to Him (9:54), but did not have a high understanding of His spiritual mission (Matt. 15:16; 16:22; 17:20; Luke 9:54; 24:25; John 16:12) and acknowledged the weakness of their faith (Luke 17:5). Jesus taught them to understand the spiritual meaning of His parables (Mark 4:10–34; Luke 8:9–18), and yet when He was removed from the earth their knowledge of His kingdom was limited (Luke 24:21; John 16:12). Apparently loyal at heart, when He was arrested they all forsook Him and fled (Matt. 26:56). Before His death our Lord promised to the apostles the Holy Spirit, to fit them to be founders and rulers of the Christian church (John 14:16–17, 26; 15:26–27; 16:7–15), and after His resurrection He confirmed their call and commissioned them to “preach the gospel to all creation” (John 20:21–23; Matt. 28:18–20; Mark 16:15). Shortly after Christ’s ascension they, under divine guidance, chose Matthias to be the successor of Judas Iscariot (Acts 1:26). On the Day of Pentecost the Holy Spirit descended upon the church (Acts 2), and the apostles became altogether different men, testifying with power of the life and death and resurrection of Jesus (Luke 24:48; Acts 1:22; 2:32; 3:15; 5:32; 13:31). Their first work was the building up of the church in Jerusalem (Acts 3–7), and then they carried the gospel into Samaria (Acts 8:5–25). With this ends the first period of the apostles’ ministry, with its center at Jerusalem and Peter as its prominent figure. In this age Peter represents Jewish Christianity, Paul Gentile Christianity, and John the union of the two. The center of the second period of the apostolic agency is Antioch, where a church was soon built up, consisting of Jews and Gentiles. Of this and the subsequent period Paul was the central figure and labored with the other apostles (Acts 11:19–30; 13:1–5). In the third period the twelve almost entirely disappear from the sacred narrative, and we have only bits of personal history, which will be found under their respective names.

The Apostolic Office. As regards the apostolic office, it seems to have been preeminently that of founding the churches and upholding them by supernatural power specially bestowed for that purpose. It ceased, as a matter of course, with its first holders, all continuation of it, from the very conditions of its existence (cf. 1 Cor. 9:1), being impossible. The bishops of the ancient churches coexisted with, and did not in any sense succeed, the apostles, and when it is claimed for bishops or any church officers that they are their successors it can be understood only chronologically and not officially.

In a lower sense the term apostle was applied to all the more eminent Christian teachers, e.g., to Andronicus and Junias (Rom. 16:7).

APOSTOLIC, APOSTOLICAL. Belonging or relating to or traceable to the apostles, such as apostolical age, apostolical doctrine, etc. The title, as one of honor, and likely also implying authority, has been falsely assumed in various ways. The pretended succession of bishops in some churches is called apostolical succession. So the Roman church calls itself the apostolical church, and the see of Rome the apostolical see, the bishop of Rome styling himself apostolical bishop. In the early church all bishops' sees were called apostolical, but at length some of the popes declared that the title "apostolical" was their right as successors of the apostle Peter, and the Council of Rheims (1049) declared the pope to be the sole apostolical primate of the universal church.

APOSTOLIC AGE. That period of church history covering the time between the Day of Pentecost and the death of John, the last apostle. The apostolic age lasted as long as the churches were under the immediate guidance of an apostle. The arrangements made by the apostles can be ascribed to our Lord so far as relates to the principle but not to the details of execution. The form of worship seems to have been simple, much being left to the choice of individuals and churches. Its principal features, however, with regard to the Sabbath, church festivals, and the sacraments were fixed. There were many pious customs among these Christians, partly new and partly derived from Judaism. The apostolic age is commonly divided into three periods: (1) From Pentecost until the second appearance of Paul (about A.D. 41). (2) Until the death of Paul (about 67). (3) The Johannine period (about 100).

APOSTOLIC COUNCIL. The assembly of the apostles and elders, held in Jerusalem (A.D. 50), an account of which is given in Acts 15. At Antioch, under the labors of Paul and Barnabas, many uncircumcised persons had been gathered into the church. Some Jewish Christians on a visit from Jerusalem contended that circumcision was necessary to salvation. Paul and Barnabas, with others, were deputed to lay the matter before a general meeting of the church in Jerusalem.

A preliminary meeting appears to have been held, at which some converts from among the Pharisees showed such opposition (Acts 15:5–6; Gal. 2) that it was thought best to submit the matter to the whole body. After much dispute Peter told of his experience with Cornelius and was followed by Barnabas and Paul, who told of their great success among the Gentiles. Then James, as president of the council, summed up the debate and pronounced in favor of releasing Gentile converts from the necessity of circumcision and other observances of the Mosaic ceremonial law. The conclusion being agreed upon, a letter was drawn up and sent to Antioch by two delegates chosen to accompany Paul and Barnabas (see Acts 15:22–30ff.). When read at Antioch, the letter gave great cheer to the Gentile converts.

APOTHECARY. See Handicrafts: Perfumer; Oil and Ointment; Perfume.

AP'PAIM (ap'pa-yim; “nostrils”). The second named of the sons of Nadab and the father of Ishi, of the posterity of Jerahmeel, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:30).

APPAREL (Heb. beqed, “dress,” or some form of Aram. □bish, “clothing”). See Dress.

APPEAL (Gk. epikaleomai, to “invoke” for aid, Acts 25:11–12, 21, 25).

Jewish. In patriarchal times the head of the tribe administered justice, and, having no superior, there was no appeal from his decisions. In the condemnation of Tamar (Gen. 38:24) Judah exercised this power over the women of his family. Had the case been between man and man it would, doubtless, have been referred to Jacob. After the Exodus, Moses at first adjudged all cases himself, but at the suggestion of Jethro he arranged for a number of inferior judges, with evident right of appeal to himself (Ex. 18:13, 26). Later on the judges of the different towns were to bring all difficult cases that they were unable to decide before the Levitical priests and judges at the place of the sanctuary for a final decision (Deut. 17:8–11).

According to the above regulation the appeal lay in the time of the Judges to the judge (Judg. 4:5) and under the monarchy to the king, who appears to have designated certain persons to inquire into the facts of the case and record his decision (2 Sam. 15:3). Jehoshaphat delegated his judicial authority to a court permanently established for the purpose (2 Chron. 19:8). These courts were reestablished by Ezra (Ezra 7:25). After the institution of the Sanhedrin the final appeal lay to them.

Roman. A Roman citizen under the Republic had the right to appeal in criminal cases from the decision of a magistrate to the people, and as the emperor succeeded to the power of the people there was an appeal to him in the last resort. The apostle Paul, as a Roman citizen, exercised a right of appeal from the jurisdiction of the local court at Jerusalem to the emperor (Acts 25:11). But as no decision had been given there could be no appeal, properly speaking, in his case; the language used (25:9) implies the right on the part of the accused of electing either to be tried by the provincial magistrate or by the emperor. Since the procedure in the Jewish courts at that period was of a mixed and undefined character, the Roman and Jewish authorities coexisting and carrying on the course of justice between them, Paul availed himself of his undoubted privilege to be tried by the pure Roman law.

Ecclesiastical. In the early church all ecclesiastical matters were determined by the bishop with his court, an appeal being allowed to the provincial synod. Appeal to the pope was first formally recognized by the Council of Sardica (A.D. 343), where it was agreed that a condemned bishop had the right of appeal to the pope, who should either confirm the verdict of the synod or appoint new judges. The decision of the council was not at first generally accepted, yet within the next half century the opinion prevailed that in all important cases an appeal could be made not only by a bishop but by anyone aggrieved. Thus it came to pass that during the medieval period the pope became, ex officio, the ecclesiastical judge of highest resort for all the nations whose churches acknowledged obedience to him. The first instance in England of an appeal occurred in the reign of Stephen, but the concession was withdrawn under Henry II when one of the Constitutions of Clarendon decided that no appeals should be made to the pope without the king's consent. In Germany the first reaction against papal usurpation appeared in the “Golden Bull,” which forbade appeals to Rome from a civil court. The Concordatum Constant (1418) and the decree of the thirty-first sitting of the Council of Basel, determined that appeals to the pope should not be decided in Rome by the curia but by judices in partibus, chosen first by provincial or diocesan synods, and afterward by the bishops and chapters. The following is from the Catholic Dictionary (s. v.): “The object of appeals is the redress of injustice, whether knowingly or ignorantly committed. Appeal can be made from any judge recognizing a superior; thus no appeal is possible in secular matters from the decision of the sovereign power, or the highest secular tribunal, in any country; for these, in such matters, recognize no superior. There can be no appeal from the pope, for he, as the vicar of Christ, recognizes no superior on earth.... Nor can an appeal be made from a general council legitimately convened and approved, because it, being in union with the Roman pontiff who approved it, represents the whole Church, from the sentence of which there can be no appeal.” In the Methodist, the Presbyterian, and most of the Protestant churches the right of appeal is recognized and modes of procedure provided for in their various books of discipline.

APPEARANCE. A term usually applied to the interviews granted to the disciples by Jesus after His resurrection. From the several accounts we see that our Lord’s body had undergone a change, having extraordinary powers of locomotion, of becoming invisible and visible at pleasure, while it still retained characteristics of matter and was capable of taking food in the ordinary way. The following appearances are recorded: to Mary Magdalene (Mark 16:9–10; John 20:11–18); to other women (Matt. 28:9–10); to Simon Peter (Luke 24:34; 1 Cor. 15:5); to the two going to Emmaus (Luke 24:13–31); to the apostles (Mark 16:14; John 20:19); to apostles, including Thomas (20:26–29); to seven disciples at the Sea of Galilee (21:1–14); to five hundred (1 Cor. 15:6); to James, then to all apostles, giving them a commission (Luke 24:44–49; Acts 1:3–8); at the ascension (Mark 16:19–20; Luke 24:50–53; Acts 1:9–12).

APPEARING of our Lord (1 Tim. 6:14; 2 Tim. 1:10; 4:1, 8; etc.). See Millennium.

APPHIA (af’i-a). The name of a woman affectionately saluted by Paul (A.D. 64) as a Christian at Colossae (Philem. 2), supposed by Chrysostom and Theodoret to have been the wife of Philemon, with whom, according to tradition, she suffered martyrdom. See Philemon.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J. B. Lightfoot, St. Paul’s Epistles to the Colossians and Philemon (1968), pp. 304–6.

AP’PII FO’RUM (ap-ī-ī fō’rum). The marketplace of Appius. A town or station located forty miles from Rome, upon the Appian Way, over which Paul passed on his way to the capital (Acts 28:15). Three Inns was a village about ten miles nearer Rome. Scholars now locate the town about three miles from modern Cisterna. “Taverns” almost certainly denotes inns for travelers in this instance.

APPIUS (ap’pi-us). See Appii Forum.

APPLE. See Vegetable Kingdom.

APRON. See Dress.

A’QABA (a’ka-ba), Gulf of. The northern arm of the Red Sea, at the head of which lay Solomon’s seaport of Ezion-geber (which see; 1 Kings 9:26).

AQUEDUCT (ak’wē-duct). See Conduit.

AQ’UILA (ak’wi-la; “eagle”). A Jew and a native of Pontus, and by occupation a tentmaker. Fleeing from Rome in consequence of an order of Claudius commanding all Jews to leave that city, he went to Corinth, where he was living when Paul found him, and, being of the same handicraft, lived with him. Some time after, being opposed by the Jews and perhaps to remove any obstacle to his acceptance by the Gentiles, Paul left the house of Aquila and dwelt with one Titius Justus. It is not certain when Aquila and his wife, Priscilla, were converted to Christianity, but it was before Paul left Corinth, for they accompanied him to Ephesus. While there they instructed Apollos in “the way of God more accurately” (Acts 18) and appear to have been zealous promoters of the Christian cause in that city (1 Cor. 16:19). At the time of Paul’s writing to Corinth, Aquila and his wife were still at Ephesus (16:19), but in Rom. 16:3–5 we find them again at Rome and their house a place of assemblage for Christians. Some years after they appear to have returned to Ephesus, for Paul sends salutations to them during his second imprisonment at Rome (2 Tim. 4:19), as being with Timothy. Nothing further concerning them is known.

AR (ar; “city”). The same as Ar Moab (Num. 21:15, 28; Deut. 2:9, 18, 29), on the border of the Arnon (Num. 22:36).

A’RA (a’ra). The last named of the three sons of Jether, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:38).

A’RAB (a’rab; “ambush”). A city in the mountains of Judah, and given to that tribe (Josh. 15:52). It is located at modern er-Rabiyeh, a ruin E of Dumah.

AR’ABAH (ar’a-bā; “desert,” Josh. 18:18). The Arabah (KJV, “the plain”) is applied (Deut. 1:1; 2:8; 3:17; 4:49; Josh. 3:16; 12:1, 3; 2 Kings 14:25; Amos 6:14) to the valley between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of Aqaba. The valley is about one hundred miles in length and is somewhat wider in the N than in the S. The southern third of the Arabah is only about six miles wide and is formed by Nubian sandstone on the W and granite on the E. The valley floor rises to its highest point, 650 feet above sea level, in about the middle of the Arabah and then descends to the Gulf of Aqaba. Everywhere the Arabah is desert, though there are several wadi bottoms in the northern Arabah. Some oases stand there today, and in Nabatean times these were marked by forts and cultivated fields. About a quarter of the way down the Arabah from the Dead Sea were the copper mines of Punon (modern Feinan), a source of Edomite and Nabatean wealth. Here water was available, which made it possible to work the mines. H.F.V.

ARA’BIA (a-rā’bi-a; “desert”). In the Bible Arabia does not denote the whole peninsula between the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf, but only the northern part contiguous to Palestine (Isa. 21:13; Jer. 25:24; Ezek. 27:21); and in the same manner “the Arab” (Isa. 13:20; Jer. 3:2) does not denote the Arab in general, but only the inhabitant of the northern region. Only in the later books of the OT, as, for instance, 2 Chron. 21:16, where the Arabians are spoken of together with the Ethiopians, or in Neh. 2:19; 6:1, and in the NT (Acts 2:11; Gal. 1:17; 4:25) does the name seem to have obtained a more general signification.

Arabia is an area of about one million square miles, with just over twenty-four million inhabitants. It is the world’s largest peninsula, consisting of a desert area close to one-third the size of the United States. Its ancient divisions were Arabia Petraea

(the NW section, including the Sinai, which became a Roman province), Arabia Felix (the main part of the peninsula), and Arabia Deserta (the northern part between Syria and Mesopotamia). The political divisions of this area today are Saudi Arabia, North Yemen, South Yemen, Oman, Kuwait, United Arab Emirates, Qatar, and Bahrain.

The part of Arabia that holds special interest for the Bible student is the SW region, from which the queen of Sheba came to see Solomon. This area derived much of its wealth and significance from its position on the trade routes between Ethiopia and lands to the N. In fact, it has been suggested that the queen of Sheba made the long journey to see Solomon not primarily because of his wisdom or even his wealth but because the activities of his merchant marine were cutting into her sphere of mercantile influence.

Sometime during the second millennium B.C. Semitic tribes from the N came into the area of Yemen and established settlements that later were to become the kingdoms of Saba' (Sheba), Ma'in (Minaeans) and Qataban. Excavations in the area have been few. The first excavations in the region of Saba' were conducted by C. Rathjens and H. von Wissman in 1928. Among other things, they found a temple dedicated to the sun-goddess about fourteen miles NNW of San'a and in use for several centuries B.C. An American expedition in 1951–52 found an eighth-century B.C. temple SE of Marib. They recovered more than three hundred Sabean texts at the site. The Americans also worked at Timna', capital of the Qatabanian kingdom, and its necropolis. They investigated the remains in the nearby Wadi Beihan of an irrigation system dated to about 1500 B.C. Although some approach to a pottery chronology of the region has now been developed, nothing has been found that throws much light on the civilization of the region in the days of Solomon in the tenth century B.C. A'RAD (a'rad; "fugitive").

1. In the KJV of Num. 21:1, "king Arad" should read "king of Arad."
2. One of the "sons" of Beriah, of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:15).
3. A Canaanite city on the southernmost borders of Palestine, whose inhabitants drove back the Israelites while trying to enter Canaan from Kadesh (Num. 21:1; 33:40) but were finally subdued by Joshua (Josh. 12:14; Judg. 1:16). It lay about seventeen miles S of Hebron and is now called Tell Arad.

Yohanan Aharoni and Ruth Amiran excavated at Arad from 1962 to 1967 and since 1971 on behalf of the Hebrew University, the Israel Department of Antiquities, and the Israel Exploration Society. They found that a Canaanite village existed there from about 3200 to 2900 B.C. and was followed by a city of some twenty-two acres surrounded by a stone wall dating from 2900 to 2700. Thereafter the site was unoccupied until the eleventh century. A strong citadel was built there in the tenth century, probably in Solomon's reign. Of special interest is the Israelite temple built inside the tenth-century citadel and measuring sixty-five by forty-five feet. Apparently this was destroyed during King Josiah's reform in the seventh century B.C. Since Tell Arad was uninhabited during the days of Moses and Joshua, that Arad must be located elsewhere. That there were two Arads is supported by the fact that Pharaoh Shishak of Egypt in 926 claimed to have captured two Arads in the Negev: Arad the Great and Arad of the House of Yeroham. H.F.V.

A'RAH (a'ra; "wayfaring").

1. The first named of the three sons of Ulla, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:39).

2. An Israelite, whose posterity (variously stated as 775 and 652 in number) returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:5; Neh. 7:10), 536 B.C. He is probably the same as the Arah whose son, Shecaniah, was father-in-law of Tobiah (6:18).

A'RAM (a'ram). A son of Shem, progenitor of the Aramaean peoples (Gen. 10:22–23), who spread widely in Syria and Mesopotamia from the Lebanon Mountains. to beyond the Euphrates and from the Taurus Range on the N to Damascus and northern Palestine on the S. Contacts of the Aramaeans in the Balikh-Habur region (“Paddan-aram,” Gen. 28:5) with the Hebrews go back to the patriarchal age (31:47, marg.). The maternal ancestry of Jacob’s children was Aramaic (Deut. 26:5). During the long period of Israel’s sojourn in Egypt, their wanderings in the Sinaitic Wilderness, and the extended period of the Judges in Canaan, the Aramaeans were multiplying and extending in every direction, particularly southward. At the time of Saul (c. 1020 B.C.), Aramaic expansion was beginning to clash with Israelite strength, and by this time several Aramaean districts appear prominently in the OT narratives.

Aram-Naharaim, “Aram of the (Two) Rivers,” was the country between the Tigris and Euphrates (Gk., Mesopotamia), or more probably the territory between the Euphrates and the Habur. This was the region of Haran where the Aramaeans had settled in patriarchal times, where Abraham sojourned, and from which Aramaean power spread.

Aram-Damascus emerged from a petty S Syrian state when a man named Rezon seized the city at the time David conquered Zobah (1 Kings 11:23–24) and founded a strong Aramaean kingdom there. This power was the inveterate foe of the Northern Kingdom for more than a century and a half under such powerful Aramaean rulers as Hezion, Tabrimmon, the Ben-hadads, Hazael, and Rezon. The Aramaic kingdom of Damascus did not come to an end until destroyed by Assyria in 732 B.C.

Aram-Zobah was a powerful Aramaean kingdom that flourished N of Hamath and reached its zenith under Saul and the early years of David’s reign. David conquered it and incorporated it into his realm (2 Sam. 8; cf. vv. 10, 12–13, marg.).

Aram-Maachah was an Aramaean principality that lay E of the Jordan near Mt. Hermon (Josh. 12:5; 13:11) and extended at least as far W as the Jordan. See also Maacah, no. 3.

Geshur was a small Aramaic principality E of the Jordan and the Sea of Galilee and S of Maachah within Manasseh’s territory (Deut. 3:14; 2 Sam. 13:37; 15:8).

Aram-Beth-rehob is in the general vicinity of Geshur. If identical with the place mentioned in Num. 13:21 and Judg. 13:28, it was near Maacah and Dan.

Tob was an Aramaic principality E of the Jordan and is probably identifiable with et-Taiyibeh, ten miles S of Gadara. It was there that Hanun, king of Ammon, drew soldiers to war against David (2 Sam. 10:6). David was bound to clash with these Aramaean kingdoms at his back door. He conquered them and incorporated them into his kingdom, making possible the empire of Solomon.

ARAMA'IC (ar-a-mā'ik). A NW Semitic dialect. It was formerly inaccurately called Chaldee (Chaldaic) because it was spoken by the Chaldeans of the book of Daniel (2:4–7:28). But since the Chaldeans are known to have generally spoken Akkad., the term Chaldee has been abandoned. Numerous references to the Aramaeans (Arimi, Ahlâme) occur in Assyrian records from the fourteenth century B.C. onward.

Monumental inscriptions in Aram. also are found, such as the votive stela of Benhadad II set up about 850 B.C. and discovered in 1941 just N of Aleppo in Syria. These monuments inscribed in Aram. extend into the Persian Period, when Aram. became the lingua franca of all SW Asia as the result of the traffic of Aramaean merchants; business documents, weights, measures, etc., are found in Aram. dating in the eighth to the fifth century B.C. The main source of Aram., however, is the deposit of Aram. papyri from Elephantine in Upper Egypt dating from 500 to 400 B.C. (see article Amarna, el-).

Our Lord spoke Galilean Aram., and Aram. portions of the OT include Dan. 2:4–7:28; Ezra 4:8–6:18; 7:12–26; Jer. 10:11 (gloss?). The Greeks called Aram Syria; consequently the language is called “Syriac” (Dan. 2:4, KJV). This designation is now confined to the Aram. dialect spoken at Edessa, which became the language of the Christian churches of Syria and Mesopotamia.

ARAN (a’ran). The second son of Dishan, a descendant of Seir the Horite (Gen. 36:28; 1 Chron. 1:42). E.H.M.

AR’ARAT (ar’a-rat; Gen. 8:4; Jer. 51:27). This name, applied to the country between the Tigris and the Caucasus Mountains, known as Armenia and called in the Assyrian inscription Urartu, came to apply to the mountain range there. The highest of these mountains, Ağri Dağ, on the Russian border in eastern Turkey, is usually seized on as the place where Noah’s ark landed because it is the highest mountain (16,946 feet) in the chain and in the entire Near East. But ancient traditions point to at least six other landing places, and it is not possible to be dogmatic about the site. Numerous expeditions have explored the traditional Mt. Ararat, without any definitive results. The Mesopotamian flood account says that its flood hero landed on Mt. Nisir, usually identified with Pir Omar Gudrum, a nine-thousand-foot peak considerably S of the Ararat chain and about four hundred miles N of the Persian Gulf and E of the Tigris River. H.F.V.

ARAU’NAH (a-rā’na). A Jebusite who had a threshing floor on Mt. Moriah, which he sold to David as a site for an altar to Jehovah. The angel of pestilence, sent to punish King David for taking a census of the people, was stayed in the work of death near this plot of ground. When David desired to purchase it, Aruanah liberally offered the ground to him as a free gift. David insisted upon paying for it, giving him, according to 2 Sam. 24:24, fifty shekels of silver and, according to 1 Chron. 21:25, six hundred shekels of gold. (Many efforts have been made to reconcile this difference, some saying that the fifty shekels were given for the oxen and the six hundred shekels for the land; others, that the fifty shekels were for the threshing floor and oxen and the six hundred shekels for additional ground.)

This land was the site of the Temple (2 Chron. 3:1). Araunah’s name is sometimes written Ornan. See Chronicles.

AR’BA (ar’ba; “four”). A giant, father of Anak. From him Hebron derived its early name of Kiriath-arba, i.e., “city of Arba” (Gen. 35:37; Josh. 14:15; 15:13; 21:11).

AR’BITE (ar’bīt). Paarai the Arbite was one of David’s guards (2 Sam. 23:35). The word signifies a native of Arab in the hill country of Judah. In 1 Chron. 11:37 the name is given as Naarai.

ARCHAEOLOGY (Gk. archaiologia, “science of ancient things”). General archaeology is a study based on the excavation, decipherment, and critical evaluation of records of the ancient past.

Biblical Archaeology. Biblical archaeology is a more restricted field than general archaeology and deals with the excavation, decipherment, and critical evaluation of ancient records of the past that touch either directly or indirectly upon the Bible and its message.

Interest and Importance. Biblical archaeology, shedding light upon the historical background and the contemporary life out of which the Holy Scriptures came and illuminating and illustrating its pages with its truly remarkable discoveries, borrows much of the great interest that is attached to it from its connection with the Bible. It is accordingly attracting larger and larger numbers of enthusiastic investigators, students, and Bible readers in general. In fact, no field of research offers greater challenge and promise than biblical (particularly OT) archaeology. This appears from the simple fact that up to about 1800 exceedingly little was known of OT times except what appeared on the pages of the Scriptures themselves or what happened to be preserved in the writings of classical antiquity. This was considerable for the NT era but was practically nil insofar as the OT was concerned, since Greek and Latin historians cataloged little information prior to 400 B.C. As a consequence, knowledge of the OT period was confined to the Bible itself, and this, from the point of view of contemporary history, was sparse indeed. The result was that before the advent of modern archaeology at about 1800, there was practically nothing available to illustrate OT history and literature.

Discoveries. Modern archaeology may be said to have had its beginning in 1798 when the rich antiquities of the Nile Valley were opened up to scientific study by Napoleon’s expedition. Toward the middle of the next century the treasures of Assyria and Babylonia were uncovered as a result of the work of Paul Botta, A. H. Layard, H. C. Rawlinson, and others. With the decipherment of the Rosetta Stone, which unlocked Egyptian hieroglyphics, and the reading of the Behistun Inscription, which furnished the key to Assyrian and Babylonian cuneiform, a vast mass of material bearing on the OT was released. The finding of the Moabite Stone in 1868 created a veritable sensation because of its close connection with OT history, and it aroused widespread enthusiasm in Palestinian excavations.

However, many of the most notable discoveries affecting the Bible (particularly the OT) were not made until within approximately the last eighty years, such as the Code of Hammurabi (1901), the Elephantine Papyri (1903), the Hittite Monuments at Boghazkeui (1906), the tomb of Tutankhamen (1922), the sarcophagus of Ahiiram of Byblus (1923), the Ras Shamra religious epic literature (1929–37), the Mari Letters and the Lachish Ostraca (1935–38), the Dead Sea Scrolls (1947–67), and the remarkable finds at Ebla (since 1964). The discoveries at Ebla (Tell Mardikh) in Syria have demonstrated a well-developed written language c. 2500 B.C., but the interpretation of these tablets is controversial.

Contributions. Although archaeological findings in the hands of the purely technical scholar, who has little proper understanding or appreciation of the unique message and meaning of the Bible, are continually in peril of being misinterpreted and misapplied and made the basis of unsound theories, archaeology in the hands of the scientist who is at the same time a devout believer yields vast and far-reaching results for good. Legitimately handled, the contributions of archaeology to biblical studies are tremendous.

Archaeology Authenticates the Bible. Although there is genuine benefit of archaeological research in Bible lands, especially in dealing with extreme liberalism and the many vagaries of higher criticism, yet its subordinate nature appears from several considerations. In the first place, the Bible does not need to be “proved” either by archaeology, geology, or any other science. As God’s revelation to man, its own message and meaning, its own claims of inspiration and internal evidence, its own fruits and results in the life of humanity are its best proof of authenticity. It demonstrates itself to be what it claims to be to those who believe its message. Since God has made the realization of the spiritual life dependent on faith and not sight (2 Cor. 5:7; Heb. 11:6), whatever contributions archaeology or any other science might make in attesting to the reliability of the Bible can never supplant faith. Scientific authentication may act as a help to faith, but God has established simple trust that honors Him as the medium of receiving His salvation and understanding His revealed ways with man. Despite the truth of these facts, archaeology has an important role in authenticating the Bible both generally and specifically. Generally, scientific archaeology has exploded many extreme theories and false assumptions that used to be paraded in scholarly circles as settled facts. No longer can higher criticism dismiss the Hebrew patriarchs as mere legendary figures, or deny that Moses could write, or assert that the Mosaic legislation is completely anachronistic for such an early age. These and other extreme opinions have been shown to be completely untenable by archaeological research. Other examples of general confirmation of the Bible are the results of excavations at Jerusalem, Gibeah of Saul, Megiddo, Samaria, and numerous other Palestinian cities. Cases of specific confirmation, although of course less numerous, are striking. The historicity of Belshazzar (Dan. 5), the authentication of the name Sargon (Isa. 20:1), and the corroboration of Jehoiachin’s captivity in Babylon (2 Kings 25:27–30) by the actual finding of the name of the king on cuneiform tablets there, are but a few examples of specific attestations.

Archaeology Illustrates and Explains the Bible. This is by far the most important contribution of archaeological research in Bible lands, and its ramifications are practically endless. It is no exaggeration to say that insofar as its background is concerned, the Bible is a whole new book as a result of the marvelous contributions of archaeology toward illuminating and illustrating it. Examples are numberless. Whether it is the longevity of the antediluvian patriarchs, Abraham’s hometown of Ur, the conquest of Jericho, Jeroboam’s golden calves at Bethel, Jonah’s preaching in Nineveh, the Temple of Herod, the ministry of Paul in Ephesus, everywhere archaeology sheds light on the sacred page and makes its message and meaning more understandable to our present day.

Archaeology Supplements the Bible. The human authors of the Bible, writing under divine inspiration, were not interested in profane history, geography, ethnology, and other fields of human knowledge, except incidentally as they chanced to touch upon the history of redemption. It is, therefore, natural from the modern scholar’s view that there should be great gaps in the Bible in these branches of learning; whereas from the divine side and insofar as the spiritual comprehension of the divine message is concerned, there was no need for further knowledge of these and kindred subjects. Yet from a human standpoint light from these spheres of research is of incalculable value in extending biblical horizons, increasing knowledge of biblical backgrounds, and giving a fuller comprehension of the message of the Bible. Examples of supplementation are numerous, such as the destruction of Shiloh, which is nowhere recounted in Scripture but is assumed by Jeremiah (Jer. 7:12–15; 26:6–7). Excavations at the site of Israel’s ancient sanctuary by the Danish Expedition uncovered pottery and other evidence showing that this destruction took place 1050 B.C., presumably at the hands of the Philistines (see H. Kjaer, Journal of Palestine Oriental Society [1930]: 87–114). Other examples occur in excavations at Bethshan, the Esdraelon fortress, destroyed not long after Shiloh, and evidently at the hands of David as a punishment for the ignominious treatment of the deceased king Saul (1 Sam. 31:10, 12; 2 Sam. 21:12). Striking supplementation is common in the Assyrian period. The Israelite kings Omri, Ahab, Jehu, Menahem, and Hoshea and the Judean kings Ahaz, Hezekiah, Manasseh, Josiah, and Jehoiachin are all much better known by the supplementary material gleaned from the cuneiform records of the great Assyrian emperors Shalmaneser III, Tiglath-pileser III, Sargon II, Sennacherib, Esarhaddon, and Ashurbanipal. Archaeology has thus yielded momentous results up to the present and gives fair promise of even greater contributions in the future as research in Bible lands progresses. M.F.U.

ARCHANGEL. See Michael.

ARCHELA'US (ar-ki-lā'us; "ruler of the people"). Son of Herod the Great by a Samaritan woman, Malthace (Josephus Wars 1.28.4), and brought up, with his brother Antipas, at Rome (Josephus Wars 1.31.1). Upon his father's death, Caesar divided his kingdom, giving to Archelaus (4 B.C.) Edom, Judea, and Samaria, with the important cities Caesarea, Sebaste, Joppa, and Jerusalem. His share of the kingdom brought him a yearly income of six hundred talents. He was made ethnarch, with promise of becoming king if he ruled virtuously (Josephus Ant. 17.11.4). After Herod's death, and previous to going to Rome to receive the government, Archelaus ordered his soldiers to attack the Jews, who were becoming tumultuous, at the Temple. The attack resulted in the death of about three thousand Jews. On his going to Rome the Jews sent a deputation of the principal citizens protesting against his cruelty and asking to be permitted to live according to their own laws, under a Roman governor. Some have thought that our Lord alludes to this circumstance in Luke 19:21–27. Archelaus returned to Judea, and, under pretense that he had countenanced the seditions against him, he deprived Joazar of the high priesthood and gave that dignity to his brother Eleazar. He governed Judea with so much violence that in the tenth (ninth according to Dio Cassius) year of his reign he was dethroned, deprived of his property, and banished to Vienna, in Gaul (Josephus Ant. 17.13.2). His cruelty was manifested toward Samaritans as well as Jews. The parents of our Lord turned aside, from fear of him, on their way back from Egypt and went to Nazareth in Galilee, in the domain of his more gentle brother Antipas (Matt. 2:22). See also article Herod.

ARCHERS (Heb. qashshāt, "bowman," Gen. 21:20; ba'al hēs, "arrow man," Gen. 49:23; ēnōsh baqqeshet, "bowman," 1 Sam. 31:3; also "shooter with the bow," 1 Chron. 10:3; "one bending the bow," Jer. 51:3). The bow and arrow are weapons of ancient origin (Gen. 48:22; 49:24; cf. Gen. 9:14–15). Archers were numerous among the Hebrews, especially in the tribes of Benjamin and Ephraim (Ps. 76:3; 1 Chron. 8:40; 2 Chron. 14:8; 17:17). Archers are frequently found on Egyptian monuments and Assyrian sculptures. Reference is made to the Philistine archers in 1 Sam. 31:3, and the Persians were famous for their archers (Isa. 13:18; Jer. 49:35; 50:29). See Armor.

ARCHIP'PUS (ar-kip'us; "master of the horse"). A Christian minister at Colossae, to whom Paul sends a salutation, calling him "our fellow soldier" (Philem. 2), and whom he exhorts to increased activity (Col. 4:17), A.D. 61. In the epistle to Philemon he is addressed jointly with Philemon and Apphia, from which it has been inferred that he was a member of Philemon's family. Tradition states that he was one of Jesus' seventy disciples and suffered martyrdom at Chonae, near Laodicea.

ARCHITECTURE. Today hundreds of architectural works built in Bible times and known to Bible characters have been dug up and may now be seen. However, the architectural beauty that the Hebrews knew was largely the result of Egyptian, Babylonian, Assyrian, Phoenician, Greek, or Roman influence.

Egyptian. Egyptian art and architecture were splendid almost from the time of Menes of the First Dynasty, c. 2900–2700 B.C. Abraham, Jacob, and their descendants gazed upon the gigantic pyramids that were already centuries old by Abraham's time (c. 2000 B.C.) and belong to the Old Kingdom (Dynasties III–VI), c. 2700–2200 B.C. Djoser, first king of the Third Dynasty, had an architect who constructed for him the famous Step Pyramid at Saqqara. Khufu, founder of the Fourth Dynasty, built the greatest of the pyramids at Gizeh, whose base covers thirteen acres, required 2,300,000 2½-ton blocks of yellow limestone to erect, and towered originally 481 feet in height. Khafre, the successor of Khufu, built the even more spectacular Second Pyramid at Gizeh, 447½ feet high. Khafre himself is represented in the head of the Sphinx, which stands to the E of the Second Pyramid and which was carved out of a spur of natural rock and built up with blocks of stone at the same time the pyramid of Khafre was constructed. Kings of the Fifth and Sixth Dynasties carved the famous pyramid texts on the walls of the inner chambers of their pyramids. Remarkable temples, tombs, etc., were part of Egypt's long and brilliant history. But in the New Kingdom (Dynasties XVIII–XX), c. 1570–1150 B.C., when Egypt ruled the East, many architectural wonders appeared such as the exquisite Mortuary temple of Queen Hatshepsut (c. 1520 B.C.) at Deir-el-Bahri, near Thebes, a beautiful structure of white limestone built in colonnaded terraces. Another outstanding builder was Rameses II (c. 1301–1234 B.C.). His mortuary temple, the Ramesseum at Thebes, is exquisite. Moreover, he added to the temple at Luxor and constructed the enormous hypostyle hall of the Karnak temple, consisting of 134 tremendous columns the highest of which rose seventy feet in the air; this hall was part of the largest temple ever built by man. At Abu Simbel above the First Cataract of the Nile, Rameses II hewed out a complete temple in the sandstone cliff overlooking the Nile and carved four great statues of himself from the rock in front of it.

Mesopotamian. The OT refers a number of times to palaces and other types of Mesopotamian architecture (Isa. 39:7; 2 Kings 20:18). At Erech (Uruk, Warka, Gen. 10:10), some fifty miles NW of Ur, the Deutsche Orientgesellschaft under Adolph Koldewey discovered (besides the first cylinder seals and earliest known writing) monumental architecture including temples, remains of the huge mud-brick Tower of Eanna (c. 2500 B.C.) and first evidences of the Babylonian stage tower, or ziggurat (cf. Gen. 11:1–6). At ancient Ur (Abraham's birthplace) in numerous campaigns Sir Leonard Woolley recovered abundant evidences of Sumerian art, complexes of temples, palaces, city streets, and the remains of one of the best-preserved ancient ziggurats (cf. 11:28, 31; 15:7; Neh. 9:7). At Asshur on the Tigris River S of Nineveh, the German expedition under Walter Andrae before World War I uncovered an archaic temple of Ishtar, a fine temple of Asshur (native god of Assyria), stout city walls, gates, and landmarks revealing the architectural splendor of the ancient city going back to c. 3000 B.C. At Babylon on the Euphrates N of Kish a German expedition under Robert Koldewey laid bare the magnificent ancient city of Nebuchadnezzar and an utterly bewildering group of palaces, public buildings, famous streets, including the Processional, temples, and a tower identified by many as the tower of Babel (Gen. 10:10; 11:9; 2 Kings 17:24, 30; etc.). At Calah (Nimrud, Gen. 10:10), some twenty miles SE of Nineveh, Austin Layard, and later M. E. L. Mallowan, found palaces of Assyrian kings of the eighth century B.C. with man-headed lions and colossal reliefs. At ancient Kish, some eight miles E of Babylon, the Oxford University and the Field Museum of Natural History expedition located an ancient palace of the kings of Kish and a temple of Ishtar. At Nineveh, on the Upper Tigris N of Asshur, A. H. Layard, M. E. Mallowan, H. Rassam, and others recovered remains of ornate Assyrian palaces, including the magnificent palace of Sennacherib (c. 704–681 B.C.) containing no less than seventy-one rooms with almost ten thousand feet of walls lined with sculptured slabs. Besides this, Nineveh yielded the superb library of Ashurbanipal (669–633 B.C.; cf. Gen. 10:11–12; 2 Kings 19:36; Isa. 37:37; Jonah 1:2; Nah. 1:1–3:19; Matt. 12:41). At Khorsabad (Dur Sharrukin) Paul Emile Botta dug up the famous palace of Sargon II (721–705 B.C.) containing splendid reliefs and enameled tile paintings. At Mari (Tell el Hariri), on the Middle Euphrates near Abou Kemal, the Musée du Louvre under André Parrot uncovered a huge palace of Amorite rulers, a temple of Ishtar, and a ziggurat. The palace at Mari is most notable, being a tremendous structure covering more than fifteen acres, with royal apartments, offices, school for scribes, etc., besides containing archives yielding twenty thousand clay tablets.

Persian. The most impressive evidence of the height to which Persian art and architecture attained is furnished by the ruins of Persepolis, twenty-five miles SW of Pasargadae. The magnificent complex at Persepolis was especially the creation of Darius I the Great (522–486 B.C.). Archaeological excavations at Persepolis by the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago, under the direction of Ernst Herzfeld and Erich Schmidt, have uncovered ruins that are mute but eloquent testimony to the splendor that was ancient Persia's. Among the famous buildings are the palace of Darius (known as the Tachara), the Tripylon (reception hall), the Apadana (the huge audience hall of Darius and Xerxes), the Hall of One Hundred Columns, the Gate of Xerxes, with colossal bulls guarding it as in Assyrian palaces, the Harem of Darius and Xerxes, the residence of Xerxes (486–465 B.C.), and the royal treasury, which contains fine reliefs of Darius and Xerxes like those in the Tripylon.

Susa (Shushan, KJV, Neh. 1:1; Esther 1:2) in ancient Elam, excavated by a French expedition under Jacques de Morgan, revealed the palace of Darius I, enlarged and beautified by later kings, as its greatest monument of the Persian period. Panels of beautifully colored glazed brick decorated the interior of the palace, many of the designs being executed in relief, including winged bulls, winged griffins, and the famous spearmen of the guard.

Greek. The architectural glory of Greece is best illustrated by Athens (which see). In the fifth century B.C. the ancient hill became a religious center with superb temples, the most important of which were dedicated to Athena, the city's patron goddess. Outstripping all were the world-famous architectural wonders of the Erechtheum, the Parthenon, and the temple of the Wingless Victory. Famous structures located elsewhere in Athens were the Odeion (Music Hall), the Stoa of Eumenes II, the Theseion, the temple of Zeus, and the marketplace (see agora). Besides extensively excavating at Athens, the American School of Classical Studies has conducted thirty seasons of work at Corinth, uncovering a vast agora, a theater, temple of Apollo, the Sanctuary of Aesculapius, a basilica, and other buildings. The following Greek orders of architecture appear:

Doric. The Doric column consists of: (1) The shaft, which increases in diameter almost invisibly up to about one-quarter of its height and diminishes slightly after that point. It has no base, but rests immediately on the stylobate. It is surrounded by semicircular flutings meeting each other at a sharp angle. (2) The capital, consisting of three parts: the hypotrachelion, or neck of the column, a continuation of the shaft but separated by an indentation from the other drums; the echinus, a circular molding, or cushion, which widens greatly toward the top; the abax, or abacus, a square slab supporting the architrave, or epistylion. The architrave is the quadrangular stone reaching from pillar to pillar. Above this is the frieze (zophoros), surmounted by the cornice.

The style known as the Tuscan is a degenerate form of the Doric. The column has a smooth shaft, tapering up to three-quarters of its lower dimensions. Its base consists of two parts, a circular plinth and a cushion of equal height.

Ionic. This column is loftier than the Doric; the enlargement of the lower part is less than the Doric, the distance between the columns is greater, and the flutings deeper and separated by flat surfaces. The Ionic column has a base consisting of a square slab and several cushionlike supports separated by grooves. The capital again is more artistically developed, resembling a ram's horn or scroll, while the architrave is divided into three bands, projecting one above the other, and upon it rises, in an uninterrupted surface, the frieze, adorned with reliefs along its whole length, and, finally, the cornice is composed of different parts.

Corinthian. The base and shaft are identical with the Ionic, but the capital takes the form of an open calix formed of acanthus leaves, from between which grow stalks with small leaves, rounded into the form of volutes. On this rests a small abacus widening toward the top, and on this rests the entablature, its style borrowed from the Ionic order.

Etruscan and Roman. The Etruscans united wonderful activity and inventiveness with a passion for covering their buildings with rich ornamental carvings. Almost none of their temples remain, for they built the upper parts of wood; but we have evidences of their activity in walls and tombs. Some old gateways, such as those at Volterra and Perugia, exhibit the true arch of wedge-shaped stones. The most imposing monument of ancient Italian arch-building is to be seen in the sewers of Rome, laid in the sixth century B.C.

The Roman architects kept alive the Etruscan method of building the arch, which they developed and completed by the invention of the cross arch and the dome. With the arch they combined, as a decorative element, the columns of the Greek order. They also introduced building with brick. A vigorous advance was made from the opening of the third century B.C., when the Romans began making great military roads and aqueducts.

In the last decades of the Republic, simplicity gradually disappeared, and a princely pomp was displayed in public and private buildings; witness the first stone theater erected by Pompey as early as 55 B.C. All that had gone before was eclipsed by the works undertaken by Caesar—the theater, the amphitheater, circus, Basilica Julia, and the Forum Caesaris. These were finished by Augustus, under whom Roman architecture seems to have reached its culminating point. The greatest monument of that age, and one of the loftiest creations of Roman art in general, is the Pantheon, built by Agrippa. Of the luxurious grandeur of private buildings we have ocular proof in the dwelling houses of Pompeii, a paltry country town in comparison with Rome. The progress made under the Flavian emperors is evidenced by Vespasian's amphitheater (the Coliseum), the baths of Titus, and his triumphal arch. All previous forums were surpassed in size and splendor when Trajan's architect, Apollodorus of Damascus, raised the Forum Traianum, with its huge Basilica Ulpia and the still surviving Column of Trajan.

Hebrew. The Israelites of the patriarchal period were shepherds and, by habit, dwellers in tents. They accordingly had originally no architecture. It was likely in connection with Egypt that the Hebrews first became builders of cities, being compelled to labor in the vast building enterprises of the pharaohs. From the time of their entrance into Canaan they became dwellers in towns and houses of stone (Lev. 14:34; 1 Kings 7:1–8), which, however, in most cases were not built by themselves (Deut. 6:10; Num. 13:19).

Early Hebrew Architecture. Hebrew architecture, in the proper sense of the word, did not exist until the time of the kings. Evidently few if any Israelites before the time of Saul had either time or money to indulge in architectural fancies. However, Israel's first king (c. 1020–1000 B.C.) made attempts in this direction as revealed by his fortress city at Gibeah (Tell el Ful), excavated by W. F. Albright (1922 and 1933). But the principal buildings from Saul's era, with massive stone construction and deep walls, were like a dungeon rather than a royal residence in comparison to the Canaanite masonry with which Solomon later graced Jerusalem. "Saul was only a rustic chieftain, as far as architecture and the amenities of life were concerned" (W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity [1940], p. 224). Moreover, what was true of Saul was in a general way culturally true of all the Israelite tribes up to the efflorescence of industry and the arts and sciences in the prosperous Davidic-Solomonic era. Israelite poverty and rusticity of life in the premonarchic period have been fully demonstrated by Palestinian excavation.

Architecture Under David and Solomon. David, as a result of rapid conquest, soon had wealth and some leisure to think about building. His first "palace" at Hebron, where he reigned seven years, was perhaps just a flat-roofed stone house, but when he captured the Jebusite stronghold, he built himself "a house of cedar" (2 Sam. 7:2) in the SE corner of what became Jerusalem. He also began to fortify and build the city itself. But the peaceful reign and vast wealth of his son Solomon gave great impulse to architecture and development. For his palace and the magnificent Temple that he constructed, Solomon drew heavily upon Phoenician skill. It is now known that the plan of the latter edifice was characteristically Phoenician, which was to be expected, since it was built by a Tyrian architect (1 Kings 7:13–15). Similar ground plans of sanctuaries of the general period 1200–900 B.C. have been excavated in northern Syria at Tell Tainat in 1936 by the University of Chicago, and the findings have demonstrated that the specifications of the Solomonic structure are pre-Greek and authentic for the tenth century B.C. The pillars, Jachin and Boaz (gigantic cressets or fire altars), the proto-Aeolic pilaster, the motifs of lilies, palmettes, and cherubim, and the furnishings are all authentically early and show Phoenician or early Semitic genuineness. Archaeological excavations at Megiddo, Hazor, and Gezer give evidence of Solomon's building operations there of "chariot cities" (1 Kings 4:26; 10:26).

Later Hebrew Architecture. Other kings of Israel and Judah recorded as builders were Asa (1 Kings 15:23), Baasha (15:17), Omri (16:23–24), and Ahab (16:33) (confirmed by the excavations at Samaria), Hezekiah (2 Chron. 32:29; confirmed by the Siloam Inscription; which see) and Jehoahaz (Jer. 22:14). After the captivity, the poverty of the Jewish community made only modest repairs of walls and construction of a Temple possible (Ezra 3:8; 5:8; Neh. 2:8). Later the reigns of Herod and his successor were especially remarkable for their architectural works—the Temple (Matt. 24:1–2), Samaria (Sebaste), Caesarea, etc., all of which show heavy Greco-Roman influence.

Christian. The early Christians held their services in synagogues, private houses, the fields, the catacombs—indeed, wherever opportunity afforded. As early as in the third century buildings erected by them existed, but they were neither substantial nor costly. Christian architecture did not become an art until the time of Constantine, when it appeared in two entirely different forms, the Basilican and the Byzantine.

Basilican. When Christianity became the religion of the state and ancient basilicas, or halls of justice, were turned into churches, this style became prevalent throughout the Western countries and lasted until the eleventh century. The lower floor was used by the men, and the galleries reserved for the women. Specimens of this style of architecture still existing and in good repair are S. Paolo fuori le mura, S. Clemente in Rome, S. Apollinaire in Classe in Ravenna, etc.

Byzantine. The principal feature of this style is the dome, which was frequently used in Roman tombs. In Persia the problem was first solved by placing the cupola on a square substructure, forming an octagon in the interior of the square by means of a huge pillar in each angle. The Latin cross was abandoned for the Greek cross, whose branches are of equal length. The objection to images obliged the architects to seek some means other than sculpture for enriching the churches, hence the profusion of mosaic work. The masterpieces of this style are St. Mark's at Venice, St. Vitale at Ravenna, and St. Sophia at Constantinople. Still later the Greek cross was combined with the square, and the number of cupolas was increased to nine—one at the end of each arm, one over the crossing, and one in each corner of the square.

Romanesque. This resulted from a union of the two previous styles, the basilica and the dome. The ground plan and the interior and exterior of the old basilica were materially changed. An important feature was the transept, with fixed proportions, the cross being invariably produced by repeating the square, chosen as a unit, three times to the W, and one time respectively to the N, E, and S. Other features were apses for the side altars; the raised choir, to allow for the crypt; a belfry, first one and, as an independent building, then two, and connected with the western termination of the building; small arched galleries running a round parts or the whole of the church within and without. The exterior was covered with numerous well-disposed arches, pilasters, and other ornaments, and the richly decorated doorways and windows drew the eye to the central part of the facade. The result was that the whole external had a dignity not to be found in any other style of church architecture. Among the finest examples of this style are the cathedrals of Pisa, Vercelli, Parma, Modena, and Lucca (in Italy), of Worms, Bonn, Mayence, and St. Gereon and St. Apostoli in Cologne. To this style belong the peculiar churches and round towers of Ireland, and the round tower of Newport, R.I.

Gothic. This style retains the ground plan and general arrangement of the Romanesque but substitutes the pointed for the round arch. The pointed arch was probably brought to Europe by the Crusaders from Asia, where it was used by the Muslims. The use of the pointed arch requires, for harmony, a corresponding upward tendency in all parts of the structure and, by obliterating the idea of a mechanical contrivance, produces the impression of organic growth. This style arose in the twelfth century, reaching its culmination in the thirteenth, which is known as the “golden period of Gothic architecture.” The earliest fully developed example of this style is the cathedral of St. Denis, consecrated in 1144. In northern France it is seen in highest perfection in the cathedrals of Notre Dame, Paris (1163–1312), Chartres (1195–1260), Rheims (begun 1212), and Amiens (1220–1288). In England examples are seen at Canterbury (1174), Westminster Abbey, London (1245–69), Salisbury (1220–58), and Exeter (1327–69).

Renaissance. The Gothic style had never taken such deep root in Italy as in the other countries of Europe. The revival of classical studies resulted in a return to classical forms of architecture. It began with eclecticism, the adoption of the round arch, the cupola, the column in its classical proportions and signification. It ended, however, in servile copying of ancient temples. The chief monument of this style is St. Peter’s at Rome.

Respecting modern architecture it can be said that it is marked by no style such as is followed by all builders of the period. Sometimes there is a mixing together of several styles, sometimes a renunciation of style altogether. M.F.U.

ARC'TURUS. See Bear.

ARD (ard). See Ardite.

ARD'TE (ard'it). A descendant of Ard, or Addar, the grandson of Benjamin (Num. 26:40).

AR'DON (ar'don). The last named of the three sons of Caleb, but whether by Azubah or Jerioth is uncertain (1 Chron. 2:18).

ARE'LI (a-rē'li). The last named of the seven sons of Gad, and founder of the family of Arelites (Gen. 46:16; Num. 26:17).

ARE'LITES (a-rē'līts; Heb. same as Areli, Num. 26:17). The descendants of Areli (which see), the last of the seven sons of Gad (Gen. 46:16).

AREOP'AGITE (ar-e-op'a-gīt; Acts 17:34). A member of the court of Areopagus (which see).

AREOP'AGUS (ar-e-op'a-gus). The Hill of Ares, the Greek god of war, equivalent to Roman Mars. Mars' Hill is thus the Lat. form of Areopagus. It is the name of a bare rocky place, some 377 feet high, immediately NW of the acropolis of Athens and separated from it by a narrow declivity. Steps cut in the rock lead to the summit, where benches, rough and rock hewn, can still be seen. In ancient times the Areopagus court assembled at this spot. The word Areopagus in Acts 17:19, 22 may refer either to the hill or to the court that met there. In either case, Paul's speech was in all likelihood on this hill as the customary meeting place of the court. This court was composed of city fathers and in early times exercised supreme authority in political as well as religious matters. Although largely a criminal court in the age of Pericles, in Roman times it had reverted once more to interest in educational and religious matters. It is quite understandable, therefore, that this court took hold of Paul and brought him to its judges in session, saying, “May we know what this new teaching is which you are proclaiming?” (Acts 17:19). The Areopagus court, it is true, met at intervals in the Stoa Basileios, or Royal Stoa. If this happened to be the case when Paul was in Athens, then the famous apostle gave his address (Acts 17:22–31) in the stoa. This stoa was excavated at the N end of the agora in the 1960s.

ARĒTAS (ar'ê-tas). A name common to many of the kings of Arabia Petrea; the fourth king of that name was the father-in-law of Herod Antipas (which see). Herod afterward married the wife of his brother Philip, and in consequence of this the daughter of Aretas returned to her father. Enraged at the conduct of Herod, Aretas instituted hostilities against him and destroyed his army. When complaint was made to the emperor Tiberius, he sent Vitellius to punish Aretas; but while on the march he received news of the death of Tiberius, and the Roman army was withdrawn. It is probable that Caligula gave Damascus to Aretas as a free gift (A.D. 38), and he is mentioned as the king of that city who tried to arrest the apostle Paul (2 Cor. 11:32).

ARĠGOB (ar'gob).

1. Either an accomplice of Pekah in the murder of Pekahiah, or, with Arieah, a prince of Pekahiah, whose influence Pekah feared and whom he therefore slew with the king (2 Kings 15:25), 759 B.C.

2. An elevated district or tableland in Bashan, an island in form, some twenty by thirty miles in extent; elsewhere (Luke 3:1) called Trachonitis. It was allotted to the half tribe of Manasseh. The statement (Deut. 3:4) of there being sixty cities in this region is confirmed by recent discoveries. "The sixty walled cities are still traceable in a space of three hundred and eight square miles. The architecture is ponderous and massive: solid walls, four feet thick, and stones on one another without cement; the roofs, enormous slabs of basaltic rock like iron; the doors and gates are of stone eighteen inches thick, secured by ponderous bars. The land bears still the appearance of having been called 'the land of giants under the giant Og'" (Porter, Giant Cities of Bashan).

ARIDĀI (a-rid'a-ī). The ninth of the ten sons of Haman, slain by the Jews in Babylonia (Esther 9:9).

ARIDĀTHA (a-rid'a-tha). The sixth son of Haman, slain by the Jews (Esther 9:8).

ARIĒH (ar-ya'; "the lion"). Either one of the accomplices of Pekah in his conspiracy against Pekahiah, king of Israel, or one of the princes of Pekahiah, who was put to death with him (2 Kings 15:25), 737 B.C.

ARĪEL (ar'i-el; "lion of God"). One of the "leading men" sent by Ezra to Iddo at Casiphia to bring ministers for the house of God to go with the people to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:16–17), about 457 B.C.

In commenting upon Isa. 29:1–11, Delitzsch understands Ariel to mean the "hearth of God," as a figurative name given to Jerusalem. He argues this from the fact of Ezekiel's giving (43:15–16, marg.) this name to the altar of burnt offering in the new Temple, and that Isaiah could not say anything more characteristic of Jerusalem than that Jehovah had a fire and a hearth there (31:9, "furnace"). "By the fact that David fixed his headquarters in Jerusalem, and then brought the sacred ark thither, Jerusalem became a hearth of God."

ARIMATHEA (a-ri-ma-thî-a). The birthplace and sepulcher of Joseph in Judea. Here the body of Jesus was buried (Matt. 27:57; Mark 15:43; Luke 23:51; John 19:38). G. Dalman, Sacred Sites and Ways (1935) identifies it with the present Rentis (Jerome, Remphtis), once most probably Ramathaim, which was the home of Samuel, situated NW of Jerusalem in the hill country of Ephraim.

ARĪOCH (ar'i-ok). Perhaps Sumerian êri-aku, "servant of the moon god."

1. The king of Ellasar (Larsa, Senkereh, a city-state in S Babylonia), who was in alliance with Chedorlaomer in his invasion of the Jordan Valley (Gen. 14:1, 9). Some connect this name with Warad-Sin (c. 1836–1824 B.C.) or Rim-Sin (c. 1824–1763 B.C.), sons of Kudur-Mabug of Larsa. The chronology of this era, however, has not been definitely established. The events of Gen. 14 date c. 2080 B.C. in the biblical chronological notices of Abraham's life.

2. Captain of the royal guard at Babylon under Nebuchadnezzar II (c. 605–562 B.C.). The name is perhaps the title of the official who, with others in authority, had power to execute sentences of death (Dan. 2:14–15, 24).

ARIS'AI (a-ris'ī). The eighth of the ten sons of Haman, slain by the Jews in Babylonia (Esther 9:9), about 480 B.C.

ARISTAR'CHUS (a-ris-tar'kus; "the best ruler"). A native of Thessalonica and a faithful adherent of the apostle Paul in his labors. He became the companion of Paul on his third missionary tour, accompanying him to Ephesus, where he was seized and nearly killed in the tumult raised by the silversmiths under Demetrius (Acts 19:29), A.D. 59. He left that city accompanying Paul to Greece, then to Asia (20:4), and subsequently to Rome (27:2), to which he was sent as a prisoner, or he became one while there (Philem. 24), for Paul calls him his "fellow prisoner" (Col. 4:10). Tradition makes him to have suffered martyrdom in the time of Nero.

ARISTOBU'LUS (a-ris-to-bū'lus; "best counselor"). A person to whose household at Rome Paul sends salutation (Rom. 16:10), A.D. 60. Tradition represents him as a brother of Barnabas, ordained a bishop by Barnabas or Paul, and as laboring and dying in Britain. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 353) identifies Aristobulus as a son of Herod the Great.

ARK. The name given to three vessels mentioned in the Bible.

Noah's Ark (Heb. tēbâ, a "chest"). The vessel in which Noah and his family were saved during the Deluge. It was made of gopher (i.e., cypress) wood, which on account of its lightness and durability was employed by the Phoenicians for shipbuilding. A covering of pitch (bitumen) was laid on the inside and outside to make it watertight and, perhaps, as a protection against marine animals. The ark consisted of a number of "nests," or small compartments, arranged in three tiers, one above another—"with lower, second, and third decks" (Gen. 6:14–16).

The ark was three hundred cubits long, fifty broad, and thirty high; and appears to have been built in the form of a chest, with flat bottom and flat (or slightly sloping) roof, being intended not for sailing but merely to float upon the water. Light and air were furnished through a window, the construction of which we do not have sufficient data to form an intelligent idea. The phrase "finish it a cubit from the top" seems to imply either that it was a cubit wide and ran the whole length of the ark, or that it was placed within a cubit of the roof. The most probable conclusion is that the window was on the side. Some place the window on the roof, covering it with transparent (or translucent) material. The ark had a door in the side.

In addition to Noah and his family, eight persons in all (Gen. 7:7; 2 Pet. 2:5), one pair of all "unclean" animals, seven pairs of all that were "clean," and seven pairs of birds, with a contingent of "everything that creeps on the ground," were to be sheltered in the ark. As to the possibility of housing the animals, we must consider the extent of the Flood, etc. See Flood.

The Ark of Bulrushes (Heb. same as above). In Ex. 2:3 (KJV) it is recorded that when the mother of Moses could no longer hide him, she placed him among the reeds of the Nile in an ark (boat or “basket,” NASB) of bulrushes, daubed with slime and pitch. This ark was made from the papyrus reed, which grows in the marshy places of Egypt. Pliny says that “from the plant itself they weave boats; and boats of this material were noted for their swiftness.” They are alluded to in Isa. 18:2.

Sargon of Akkad, founder of a Semitic Empire in Babylonia c. 2400–2200 B.C., was similarly set afloat and rescued from death.

Ark of the Covenant (Heb. אַרֹן, the common name for a “chest” or “coffer”).

Names. It was called the “ark of the covenant” (Num. 10:33; Deut. 31:26; Heb. 9:4; etc.), because in it were deposited the two tablets of stone upon which were written the Ten Commandments, the terms of God’s covenant with Israel; “the ark of the testimony” (Ex. 25:16, 22), the commandments being God’s testimony respecting His own holiness, and the people’s sin; “the ark of God” (1 Sam. 3:3; 4:11), as the throne of the divine presence. For full description, see Tabernacle.

History. The history of the Ark is in accordance with its intensely moral character. As the symbol of the Lord’s presence, it was borne by the priests in advance of the host (Num. 10:33; Deut. 1:33; see also Ps. 132:8). At its presence the waters of the Jordan separated; only when it was carried to the farther shore did the waters resume their usual course (Josh. 3:11–17; 4:7, 11, 18). The Ark was carried about Jericho at the time of its downfall (6:4–12). Very naturally, the neighboring nations, ignorant of spiritual worship, looked upon the Ark as the god of Israel (1 Sam. 4:6–7), a delusion that may have been strengthened by the figures of the cherubim upon it.

The Ark remained at Shiloh until the time of Eli, when it was carried along with the army, in the hope that it would secure victory for the Israelites against the Philistines. The latter were not only victorious but also captured the Ark (1 Sam. 4:3–11); but they were glad to return it after seven months (5:7). It was taken to Kiriath-jearim (7:2), where it remained until the time of David. Its removal to Jerusalem was delayed three months by the death of Uzzah while carelessly handling it. Meanwhile it rested in the house of Obed-edom, from which it was taken, with greatest rejoicing, to Mt. Zion (2 Sam. 6:1–19).

When the Temple was completed, the Ark was deposited in the sanctuary (1 Kings 8:6–9). In 2 Chron. 35:3 the Levites were directed to restore it to the Holy Place. It may have been moved to make room for the “carved image” that Manasseh placed “in the house of God” (33:7), or possibly on account of the purification and repairs of the Temple by Josiah. When the Temple was destroyed by the Babylonians the Ark was probably removed or destroyed (2 Esd. 10:21–22). Sacred chests were in use among other peoples of antiquity, and served as receptacles for the idol, or the symbol of the idol, and for sacred relics.

ARK'TE (ark'īt). Of Gen. 10:17; 1 Chron. 1:15, represents the inhabitants of present-day Tell Arka, some eighty miles N of Sidon at the foot of Lebanon. Arkantu, mentioned by the great Egyptian conqueror Thutmose III (fifteenth century B.C.) is evidently the same place. It was called Irkata in the Amarna Letters and was taken by Tiglath-pileser III of Assyria in 738 B.C.

ARM. The common instrument of strength and agency, the arm is often used in Scripture as the emblem of power. The “arm” of God is only another expression for His might (Ps. 89:13; Isa. 53:1). Hence “an outstretched arm,” and “the Lord has bared His holy arm,” signifies His power and promptness to protect or punish (Ex. 6:6; Deut. 4:34; Isa. 52:10), a figure taken from the attitude of ancient warriors.

ARMAGED'DON (ar-ma-ged'on; Gk. Armageddon, from Heb. har Mēgiddō, “hill or city of Megiddo,” Rev. 16:16, see marg.). Megiddo occupied a marked position on the southern rim of the plain of Esdraelon (which see), the great battlefield of Palestine. It was famous for two great victories: of Barak over the Canaanites (Judg. 4:15) and of Gideon over the Midianites (chap. 7); and for two great disasters: the deaths of Saul (1 Sam. 31:8) and Josiah (2 Kings 23:29–30; 2 Chron. 35:22). Armageddon became a poetical expression for terrible and final conflict.

To John the Revelator the ancient plain of Megiddo, the battleground of the centuries, furnished a type of the great battle in which the Lord, at His advent of glory, will deliver the Jewish remnant besieged by the Gentile world powers under the Beast (Rev. 13:1–10) and the false prophet (13:11–18). Apparently the besieging hosts, whose advance upon Jerusalem is typically set forth in Isa. 10:28–32 and who are demon-energized (Rev. 16:13–16; Zech. 12:1–9), have retreated to Megiddo after the events of Zech. 14:2. There their decimation commences and is completed in Moab and Edom (Isa. 63:1–3). This last grand battle of “the times of the Gentiles” and of this present age finds fulfillment in the striking-stone prophecy of Dan. 2:35 and ushers in “the day of the Lord,” when God actively and visibly manifests His glorious power to the discomfiture and utter destruction of His enemies.

ARME'NIA (ar-mē'ni-a). Heb. ā'rārāt, for Akkad. Urartu, which occurs frequently in the Assyrian monuments. Sennacherib's sons escaped there after murdering their father (2 Kings 19:37). On one of the mountains of this region the ark of Noah rested (Gen. 8:4). The country extends from the Black Sea to the Caspian Sea and from the Caucasus Mountains to the Taurus Mountains. It was N of the Assyrian Empire.

ARMLET. This word is not used in the KJV or NASB, being rendered in 2 Sam. 1:10 by the expression, “the bracelet which was on his arm.” It does appear in the NIV in Num. 31:50. See Bracelet.

ARMO'NI (ar-mō'ni). The first named of the two sons of Saul by Rizpah, who were given up by David to be hanged by the Gibeonites. He was slain with six of his brothers in the beginning of the barley harvest (2 Sam. 21:8–14).

ARMOR, ARMS. The weapons of the nations mentioned in the Bible were essentially the same, with modifications according to age and country. Offensive weapons (arms) included the battle-axe, sword, spear, bow and arrow, sling, and battering ram. Defensive weapons (armor) included the shield, helmet, breastplate, greaves, and girdle.

Offensive Weapons.

Battle-axe and Mace. The most primitive of weapons were the club and the throwing bat. The club at first consisted of a heavy piece of wood, of various shapes, used in hand-to-hand fighting. The “mace” (Heb. barzel) was of wood bound with bronze, about two and one-half feet long, with an angular piece of metal projecting from the handle, perhaps intended as a guard. At the striking end it was sometimes furnished with a ball. Maces were borne by the heavy infantry, and each charioteer was furnished with one. The Egyptian battle-axe was about two or two and one-half feet long, with a single blade secured by bronze pins and the handle bound in that part to prevent splitting. The blade was shaped like the segment of a circle and made of bronze or iron. The poleaxe was about three feet in length, with a large metal ball, to which the blade was fixed. Allusions to these weapons are supposed to occur in Ps. 2:9; 35:3; Prov. 25:18. The throwstick is the same weapon seen figured on Egyptian and Assyrian monuments. “Axes” (Ezek. 26:9), literally irons, is used figuratively for weapons or instruments of war.

Sword (Heb. hereb). The Egyptian sword was short and straight, from two and one-half to three feet in length, usually double-edged and tapering to a point, and was used to cut and thrust. The king’s sword was worn in his girdle and was frequently surmounted by one or two heads of a hawk, the symbol of the sun. The sword thus worn was really a dagger, a common Egyptian weapon. It was from seven to ten inches in length, tapering gradually to a point, the blade, made of bronze, being thicker in the middle than at the edges. Assyrian swords were often richly decorated, the hilt embossed with lions’ heads so arranged as to form both handle and crossbar. The sword of the Greeks and Romans generally had a straight two-edged blade, rather broad, and of nearly equal width from hilt to point. It was worn on the left side.

The sword of the Hebrew resembled that of other oriental nations and appears to have been short. That of Ehud was only a cubit (from eighteen to twenty-two inches) long. It was carried in a sheath held by the girdle (1 Sam. 17:39; 2 Sam. 20:8); hence the expression “to gird one’s self” with a sword means to commence war; and “to loose the sword,” to finish it (1 Kings 20:11).

Figurative. The sword itself is the symbol of war and slaughter (Lev. 26:25; Isa. 34:5, etc.), of divine judgment (Deut. 32:41; Ps. 17:13; Jer. 12:12; Rev. 1:16), and of power and authority (Rom. 13:4). The Word of God is called “the sword of the Spirit” (Eph. 6:17). The sword is used in Scripture as illustrative of the Word of God (Eph. 6:17; Heb. 4:12); Christ (Isa. 49:2; Rev. 1:16); the justice of God (Deut. 32:41; Zech. 13:7); the protection of God (Deut. 33:29); severe calamities (Ezek. 5:2, 17; 14:17; 21:9); deep mental affliction (Luke 2:35); the wicked (Ps. 17:13); their tongue (57:4; 64:3; Prov. 12:18); their persecuting spirit (Ps. 37:14); their end (Prov. 5:4); false witnesses (25:18); judicial authority (Rom. 13:4). Drawing of sword is figurative of war and destruction (Lev. 26:33; Ezek. 21:3–5); sheathing it, of peace and friendship (Jer. 47:6); living by it, of plunder (Gen. 27:40); not departing, of perpetual calamity (2 Sam. 12:10).

The Spear, Javelin, Dart. The spear is a weapon common to all nations of antiquity. That of the Egyptians was of wood, from five to six feet long, with the head of bronze or iron, usually with a double edge like that of the Greeks. The javelin was similar to the spear, but lighter and shorter, the upper extremity of the shaft terminating with a bronze knob surmounted by a ball. It was sometimes used as a spear for thrusting, and sometimes it was darted, the knob of the extremity keeping it from escaping the warrior’s hand. The spear of the Assyrian infantry was short, scarcely exceeding the height of a man; that of the cavalry was longer. Several kinds of spears are mentioned in Scripture, but how the several terms used are to be understood is somewhat uncertain. (1) The ḥānūt, a “spear” of the largest kind, was the weapon of Goliath (1 Sam. 17:7, 45; 2 Sam. 21:19; 1 Chron. 20:5) and also of other giants (2 Sam. 23:21; 1 Chron. 11:23) and mighty warriors (2 Sam. 2:23; 23:18; 1 Chron. 11:11, 20). It was the habitual companion of King Saul, and it was this heavy weapon, not the lighter “javelin,” that he cast at David (1 Sam. 18:10–11; 19:9–10) and at Jonathan (20:33). (2) Apparently lighter than the preceding was the kīdôn (“javelin”). When not in action, the javelin was carried on the back of the warrior (1 Sam. 17:6, KJV, “target”). (3) Another kind of spear was rōmah. In the historical books it occurs in Num. 25:7 and 1 Kings 18:28 and frequently in the later books, as in 1 Chron. 12:8 (“buckler,” KJV); 2 Chron. 11:12. (4) The shelah was probably a lighter missile, or “dart” (see KJV, 2 Chron. 23:10; 32:5, “darts”; Neh. 4:17, 23, see marg.; Job 33:18; 36:12; Joel 2:8). (5) shēbet, a “rod,” or “staff,” is used only once to denote a weapon (2 Sam. 18:14).

Figurative. The spear is used figuratively of the bitterness of the wicked (Ps. 57:4); the instruments and effects of God’s wrath (Hab. 3:11).

Bow and Arrow. The bow was the principal weapon of offense among the Egyptians, Assyrians, and Hebrews. That of the Egyptians was a round piece of wood, from five to five and one-half feet long, either straight or bending in the middle when unstrung. The string was made of hide, catgut, or string. The Assyrian archer was equipped in all respects as the Egyptian, the bow being either long and slightly curved or short and almost angular. Among the Hebrews the bow (Heb. qeshet) and arrow (hēṣ) are met with early in their history, both for the chase (Gen. 21:20; 27:3) and war (48:22). In later times archers accompanied the armies of the Philistines (1 Sam. 31:3; 1 Chron. 10:3) and of the Syrians (1 Kings 22:34). Among the Hebrews captains high in rank (2 Kings 9:24), and even kings’ sons (1 Sam. 18:4), carried the bow and were expert in its use (2 Sam. 1:22). The tribe of Benjamin seems to have been especially addicted to archery (1 Chron. 8:40; 12:2; 2 Chron. 14:8; 17:17); but there were also bowmen among Reuben, Gad, Manasseh (1 Chron. 5:18), and Ephraim (Ps. 78:9). Of the form of the bow we can gather almost nothing. It seems to have been bent by the aid of the foot (1 Chron. 5:18; 8:40; 2 Chron. 14:8; Ps. 7:12; Isa. 5:28; etc.). Bows of bronze are mentioned as if specially strong (2 Sam. 22:35; Job 20:24). It is possible that in 1 Chron. 12:2 a kind of bow for shooting bullets or stones is alluded to (Wisd. of Sol. 5:22, “stone-bow”). The arrows were carried in quivers (Heb. tālī) hung on the shoulder or at the left side. They were probably of reed and mostly tipped with flint points; others were of wood tipped with metal, about thirty inches long and winged with three rows of feathers. They were sometimes poisoned (Job 6:4) or tipped with combustible materials (“flaming missiles,” those set on fire, Eph. 6:16).

Figurative. This word is frequently used as the symbol of calamity or disease sent by God (Job 6:4; 34:6, marg.; Ps. 38:2), the metaphor deriving propriety and force from the popular belief that all diseases were immediate and special inflictions from heaven. Lightning is described as the arrows of God (18:14; 144:6; Hab. 3:11). “The arrow that flies by day” (Ps. 91:5) denotes some sudden danger. The arrow is also figurative of anything injurious, as a deceitful tongue (Jer. 9:8), a bitter word (Ps. 64:3), a false witness (Prov. 25:18). A good use of “arrow” is in Ps. 127:4–5, where children are compared to “arrows in the hand of a warrior”; i.e., instruments of power and action. The word is also used to denote the efficiency of God's Word (45:5). The "bow of battle" is figurative for weapons of war and military power (Zech. 9:10; 10:4).

The Sling (Heb. qelac). This may be justly reckoned as among the most ancient instruments of warfare (Job 41:28). This weapon was common among the Egyptians, Assyrians, and Hebrews. Later the Greek and Roman armies contained large numbers of slingers. The weapon was simple, being made of a couple of strings of sinew, leather, or rope, with a leather receptacle in the middle to receive the stone. After being swung once or twice around the head it was discharged by letting go of one of the strings. Besides stones, plummets of lead shaped like an acorn were used and could be thrown to the distance of six hundred feet. The stones were selected for their smoothness (1 Sam. 17:40) and were considered as munitions of war. In action they were either carried in a bag (17:40) or lay in a heap at the feet of the slinger. Among the Hebrews the Benjamites were especially expert slingers (Judg. 20:16; cf. 1 Chron. 12:2).

Figurative. The rejection of one by Jehovah is represented by the expression "the lives of your enemies He will sling out as from the hollow of a sling" (1 Sam. 25:29); in Zechariah (9:15) sling stones represent the enemies of God.

Engine, Battering Ram. Two machines are in view. (1) Heb. hishshābôn, "contrivance." The engines that went by this name (2 Chron. 26:15) were the balista, used for throwing stones, and the catapulta, for arrows, an enormous stationary bow. Both of these engines were of various throwing power, stones being thrown weighing from fifty to three hundred pounds. Darts varied from small beams to large arrows, and their range exceeded one-quarter mile. All these engines were constructed on the principle of the string, the bow, or spring. (2) Heb. māhî, "stroke," Ezek. 26:9, the battering ram, so rendered, 4:2; 21:22; Heb. kar, "butting." This instrument was well known both to the Egyptians and the Assyrians. The ram was a simple machine consisting of a metal head affixed to a beam, which might be long enough to need one or two hundred men to lift and impel it. When it was still heavier it was hung in a movable tower and became a wonderful engine of war. Its object was to make a breach in the wall of a beleaguered town. See also Chariot.

Defensive Weapons.

The Shield. The ancient soldier's chief defense, his shield, was various in form and material. The shield of the Egyptian was about one-half his height and generally about twice as high as broad. It was probably formed of a wooden frame covered with rawhide, having the hair outward, with one or more rims of metal and metal studs. Its form resembled a funeral tablet, circular at the top and square at the base. A rare form of Egyptian shield was of extraordinary size and pointed at the top. The shields of the Assyrians in the more ancient bas-reliefs are both circular and oblong, sometimes of gold and silver, but more frequently of wickerwork covered with hides. The shield in a siege covered the soldier's whole person and at the top had a curved point or a square projection like a roof at right angles with the body of the shield. This was to defend the combatants against missiles thrown from the walls.

Shield is the rendering of the following words, of which the first two are the most frequent and important: (1) Heb. šinnâ, "protection." This shield was large enough to cover the whole body (Pss. 5:12; 91:4). When not engaged in conflict it was carried by the shield bearer (1 Sam. 17:7, 41). The word is used with "spear" as a formula for weapons generally (1 Chron. 12:24; 2 Chron. 11:12). (2) Heb. māgēn. This was smaller, a buckler or target, probably for hand-to-hand fighting. The difference in size between this and the above-mentioned shield is evident from 1 Kings 10:16–17; 2 Chron. 9:15–16, where twice as much gold is named as being used for the latter as for the former. This shield is usually coupled with light weapons, as the bow (14:8) and darts (32:5, KJV). (3) Heb. shelet. The form of this shield is not well known.

Although by some it is translated “quiver,” and by others “weapons” generally, it is evident that shield is proper by comparing 2 Kings 11:10 with 2 Chron. 23:9; 2 Sam. 8:7; 1 Chron. 18:7–8. The sōhērâ, “buckler,” is found only in Ps. 91:4, KJV, and is used poetically. (4) Finally, we have the Gk. thureos (Eph. 6:16), a large oblong or square shield. The ordinary shield among the Hebrews consisted of a wooden frame covered with leather and could be easily burned (Ezek. 39:9). Some shields were covered with brass or copper and when shone upon by the sun caused the redness mentioned in Nah. 2:3. Shields were rubbed with oil to render the leather smooth and slippery and to prevent its being injured by the wet (2 Sam. 1:21–22; Isa. 21:5), as well as to keep the metal from rusting. Except in actual conflict, the shield was kept covered (22:6). The golden shields mentioned in connection with the equipment of armies (1 Macc. 6:39) were most probably only gilt; on the contrary, those of the generals of Hadadezer (2 Sam. 8:7) and those Solomon made (1 Kings 10:16–17; 14:26) are to be regarded as ornamental pieces of massive gold, such as were later sent to Rome as gifts (1 Macc. 14:24; 15:18). Bronze shields also occur only in connection with leaders and royal guards (1 Sam. 17:6; 1 Kings 14:27).

Figurative. The shield is illustrative of God’s protection (Gen. 15:1; Deut. 33:29; 2 Sam. 22:3; Pss. 3:3; 5:12; 28:7; 33:20; 59:11; 84:9, 11; 115:9–11; 119:114; 144:2); truth of God (91:4); salvation of God (2 Sam. 22:36; Ps. 18:35); of faith (Eph. 6:16).

The Helmet. The helmet of the Egyptians was usually of quilted linen cloth that served as an effectual protection to the head, without the inconvenience of metal in a hot climate. The Assyrian helmet assumed different shapes in different ages, but its earliest form was a cap of iron terminating in a point and sometimes furnished with flaps, covered with metal scales, protecting the ears and neck and falling over the shoulders.

We find several references to the “helmet” (Heb. kôbaç) as being in use among the Hebrews. They seem to have been commonly of bronze (1 Sam. 17:38).

Figurative. In Isa. 59:17 Jehovah is represented as arming Himself for the defense of man, and among other articles He puts on is “a helmet of salvation,” seeming to teach that salvation is the crowning act of God. The helmet as a part of the Christian’s armor represents salvation (Eph. 6:17), “the hope” of salvation (1 Thess. 5:8).

The Breastplate, or Cuirass. The earliest material used to protect the body was probably the skins of beasts, which were soon abandoned for coats of mail. The cuirass of the Egyptians consisted of about eleven horizontal rows of metal plates, well secured by brass pins, with narrower rows forming a protection for the throat and neck. Each plate, or scale, was about an inch in width. In length the cuirass may have been a little less than two and one-half feet, covering the thigh nearly to the knee; in order to prevent its pressing too heavily on the shoulder it was bound with a girdle about the waist. Usually, however, that part of the body below the girdle was protected by a kind of kilt, detached from the girdle. Such was the covering of the heavy-armed troops. With the light-armed infantry, and, indeed, among the Asiatic nations in general, the quilted linen cuirass was in much demand.

The Assyrians used coats of scale armor and embroidered tunics, both of felt and leather. Among the Hebrews we have two types of protective garment for the torso. (1) The breastplate (Heb. shiryôn, “glittering”) is enumerated in the description of the arms of Goliath, “scale armor,” literally, a “breastplate of scales” (1 Sam. 17:5), and further (v. 38), where shiryôn alone is rendered “armor.” It may be noticed that this passage contains the most complete inventory of the dress of a warrior to be found in the whole of the sacred history. Shiryôn also occurs in 1 Kings 22:34 and 2 Chron. 18:33. The last passage is obscure; the meaning is probably “between the joints of the breastplate.” (2) The tahrâ is mentioned but twice—in reference to the gown of the high priest (Ex. 28:32; 39:23). Like the English “habergeon,” it was probably a quilted shirt or doublet put on over the head.

Figurative. Being an efficient means of protection for the body, it is used metaphorically for defense: “the breastplate of righteousness” (Eph. 6:14) and “the breastplate of faith and love” (1 Thess. 5:8).

Greaves (Heb. miṣḥâ, lit., “a facing”). Coverings for the leg, made of brass and widely known among the ancients, are mentioned only in the case of Goliath (1 Sam. 17:6), and the warrior’s “boot” (Heb. s□ôṯn), a sort of half boot made of leather, studded with strong nails, only in Isa. 9:5 (lit., “every shoe”). We infer, therefore, that they did not belong to the common armor of the Hebrews.

Girdle (Heb. ēzôr). The sword was suspended from the girdle, and the girdle is frequently mentioned among the articles of military dress (Job 12:18; Eph. 6:14). It was of leather, studded with metal plates. When the armor was light the girdle was broad and girt about the hips; otherwise it supported the sword scarfwise from the shoulder. See Girdle.

ARMOR BEARER (Heb. nāśā k□lî, “one carrying weapons”). A person selected by prominent officers to bear their armor, to stand by them in danger, and to carry out their orders, somewhat as adjutants in modern service (Judg. 9:54; 1 Sam. 14:6; 16:21; 31:4).

ARMORER. See Handicrafts.

ARMORY. The place in which armor was deposited. In Neh. 3:19 mention is made of “the armory at the Angle” in Jerusalem; probably the arsenal, which Hezekiah showed with so much pride to the Babylonian ambassadors (Isa. 39:2, Heb. nesheq).

A poetical allusion is made to armory in song of Sol. 4:4, see marg. (Heb. talpîyyâ).

In Jer. 50:25 God is said to have “opened His armory” (Heb. ôṣār).

ARMY. The English term is represented in Scriptures by several Heb. and Gk. names.

Jewish. Although Israel was not to be a conquering people, yet it had to defend itself against hostile attacks, at first in the wilderness and afterward in the Promised Land. Hence Israel marched out of Egypt (Ex. 12:41; 13:18), as the host of Jehovah, armed. As such, the people were arranged according to their tribes and divisions of tribes (Num. 1–4), and every man above twenty years of age was enrolled for military service (1:2–19; 26:2) with the exception of the Levites (2:33). Up to what age military duty lasted is not given. Josephus states (Ant. 3.12.4) that it was to the fiftieth year.

In time of war the number of fighting men needed was collected from the different tribes under the direction of inspectors (Heb. shōt-rîm, Deut. 20:5; 2 Kings 25:19), by whom also the commanders were appointed (Deut. 20:9). The principle on which these levies were made is not known to us. The law provided that anyone having built a new house not yet consecrated, having planted a vineyard and not having as yet enjoyed its fruit, or having betrothed but not yet married a wife should not go to battle (20:5–7). The fainthearted were also dismissed, in order that they not discourage their brethren (20:8). The army thus constituted was divided into companies of thousands, hundreds, and fifties under their respective officers (Num. 31:14), and still further into families (2:34; 2 Chron. 25:5; 26:12); each father's house probably formed a detachment, led by the most valiant among them. The provisioning of the army was laid on each tribe (Judg. 20:10; 1 Sam. 17:17–18). From the time of Moses to that of David the army of Israel consisted of foot soldiers (15:4), and from the time Israel entered into Canaan until the establishment of the kingdom little progress was made in military affairs.

Soon after the establishment of the kingdom a standing army was set up, the nucleus of which was the band of three thousand men selected by Saul (1 Sam. 13:2; 24:2) and to which he constantly added men (14:52). Before David became king he had a band of six hundred men, gathered in his wars with Saul (23:13, 25:13), from whom his most noted captains were chosen (2 Sam. 23:8–11, 18–39). To these he added the Cherethites and Pelethites (8:18; 15:18; 20:7). Moreover, he organized a national militia in twelve divisions, each consisting of 24,000, and responsible for a month's service every year (1 Chron. 27:1). At the head of the army when in active service was a commander in chief ("captain of his army," 1 Sam. 14:50).

The army hitherto had consisted entirely of infantry (1 Sam. 4:10; 15:4), the use of horses having been prohibited (Deut. 17:16). David had reserved a hundred chariots from the spoil of the Syrians (2 Sam. 8:4), which probably served as the foundation of the force that Solomon enlarged through his alliance with Egypt (1 Kings 10:26, 28–29).

The army, with the exception of a regularly maintained bodyguard (1 Kings 14:28; 2 Kings 11:4, 11), was, strictly speaking, only a national militia, not in constant service but in time of peace at home engaged in agriculture, and without pay. Even in war their pay probably consisted only of supplies and a fixed portion of the spoil. These arrangements were kept up by his successors, and by some of them the military power was greatly strengthened by foot and horse (2 Chron. 14:8; 17:14; 25:5; etc.). Sometimes foreign troops were hired as auxiliaries (25:6).

With regard to the arrangement and maneuvering of the army in the field, little is known. A division into three bodies is frequently mentioned (Judg. 7:16; 9:43; 1 Sam. 11:11). Jehoshaphat divided his army into five bodies but retained the threefold principle of division, the heavy-armed troops of Judah being considered the proper army and the two divisions of light-armed men of the tribe of Benjamin an appendage (2 Chron. 17:14–18). It is difficult to ascertain the numerical strength of the Jewish army, the numbers given in the text being manifestly corrupted. The discipline and arrangement of the army was gradually assimilated to that of the Romans, and the titles of officers borrowed from it.

Roman. The Roman army was divided into legions, the number of soldiers in a legion varying at different times; but its full strength was to be 6,000. These legions were commanded by six tribuni ("commander," Acts 21:31), who commanded by turns. The tenth part of a legion, containing six hundred men, was called a cohors, (“cohort,” Acts 10:1); the cohort was divided into three maniples, and the manipule into two centuries, originally containing one hundred men but later varying according to the strength of the legion. These centuries were under the command of centurions (10:1, 22; Matt. 8:5; 27:54). There were in addition to the legionary cohorts independent cohorts of volunteers. One of these was called the Italian (Acts 10:1), consisting of volunteers from Italy. There is a cohort named Augustus (Acts 27:1), which Meyer (Com., ad loc.) thinks to mean “the imperial cohort, one of the five cohorts stationed at Caesarea, and regarded as bodyguard of the emperor, employed here on special service affecting the emperor.”

See War.

AR'NAN (ar'nān; Heb. from Arab., “quick, lively”). Probably the great-grandson of Zerubbabel, in the line of David's descendants (1 Chron. 3:21); perhaps the same as Joanan (Luke 3:27), an ancestor of Jesus.

AR'NON (ar'nōn; “rushing torrent”). A river rising in the mountains of Gilead, E of the Jordan, and reaching the Dead Sea through a stony and precipitous chasm of red and yellow sandstone. “The name is also applied to the valley, or valleys, now known as ‘Wady Mojib,’ an enormous trench across the plateau of Moab. It is about seventeen hundred feet deep, and two miles broad from edge to edge of the cliffs which bound it, but the floor of the valley over which the stream winds is only forty yards wide. About thirteen miles from the Dead Sea the trench divides into two branches, one running NE, the other SSE, and each of them again dividing into two.... Properly all the country from Jabbok to Arnon belonged northward to Ammon, southward to Moab. But shortly before Israel's arrival, Sihon (which see), an Amorite king from western Palestine, had crossed the Jordan and, driving Moab southward over Arnon and Ammon eastward to the sources of the Jabbok, had founded a kingdom for himself between the two rivers” (Smith, Hist. Geog., p. 558). Afterward it was taken possession of by Israel on its way to Palestine, and Arnon became the boundary between Israel and Moab (Num. 21:13, 26; Josh. 12:1; Judg. 11:22; Isa. 16:2; Jer. 48:20).

A'ROD (a'rod; “humpbacked”). The sixth son of Gad (Num. 26:17), whose descendants were called Arodites, about 1700 B.C. He is called Arodi (Gen. 46:16).

AR'ODI, A'RODITE. See Arod.

AR'OER (ar'ō-er; “nudity”).

1. A town on the northern bank of the Arnon (Deut. 2:36; 3:12; 4:48; Josh. 12:2; 13:9, 16; Judg. 11:26, 33; 1 Chron. 5:8). As the southernmost town of Israel E of the Jordan, it has been called “the Beersheba of the East.” It was fortified by Mesha as mentioned on the Moabite Stone (which see). Now called Arair, thirteen miles E of the Dead Sea.

2. A town built by the Gadites (Num. 32:34; Josh. 13:25; 2 Sam. 24:5), connected with the history of Jephthah.

3. A city twelve miles SE of Beersheba, associated with David and his warriors (1 Sam. 30:26–28; 1 Chron. 11:44), now called Ararah.

AR'OERITE (ar'ō-er-īt). An inhabitant of Aroer (which see above; no. 3), probably in the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 11:44).

AROMA. A term used in several ways in Scripture.

1. Sweet smell (Heb. nîḥôah; “restful,” Lev. 26:31; “fragrant incense,” Dan 2:46).

2. In the general sense of fragrance (which see), as from spices (which see), see 2 Chron. 16:14; Esther 2:12; Jer. 34:5; John 12:3. In Phil. 4:18 the expression is “a fragrant aroma.” The word “savor(s)” (Heb. rêah, “odor”) is used in some versions to describe the pleasing effect that sacrifices offered according to ritual requirements had upon Jehovah (Ex. 29:18; Lev. 1:9, 13, 17; etc., but contrast Jer. 48:11).

Figurative. The rendering of the Gk. mōrainō, “is more flat or tasteless.” In 2 Cor. 2:14, 16 (Gk. osmē), “the knowledge of God” is symbolized as “an odor that God everywhere makes manifest through the apostolic working, inasmuch as He by that means brings to pass that the knowledge of Christ everywhere exhibits and communicates its nature and efficacy” (Meyer, Com., ad loc.). Christ’s sacrifice is described as a “fragrant aroma” to God, and one that we are to imitate (Eph. 5:2). R.K.H.

ARPACH'SHAD (ar-pax'shad). The first postdiluvian patriarch, son of Shem, and father of Shelah, born two years after the Deluge and died aged four hundred thirty-eight years (Gen. 11:10–13; 1 Chron. 1:17–18). Arpachshad has been frequently identified with the mountainous country on the Upper Zab River N and NE of Nineveh, the Arrapachitis of the Greek geographers.

AR'PAD (ar'pad). Rendered Ar'phad (ar'fad) twice in the KJV, Arpad is identified as Tell Erfad, twenty-five miles N of Aleppo. Arpad was a place of considerable importance in Assyrian times, being overrun by Adadnirari in 806 B.C., Ashurninari in 754 B.C., besieged and captured by Tiglath-pileser (742–740 B.C.), and included in an uprising that was suppressed by Sargon in 720 B.C. It is commonly associated with the city-state of Hamath in OT references, being not far distant (2 Kings 18:34; 19:13; Isa. 10:9; 36:19; 37:13). Arpad was excavated by the Czechoslovakian archaeologist Hrozny in 1924, and a British team has been working there since 1960.

ARPHAX'AD. See Arpachshad.

ARROGANT, ARROGANCE.

1. Gk. hyperogkos, a “swelling,” “immoderate, extravagant,” as in “arrogant words” (2 Pet. 2:18; Jude 16).

2. Gk. phusiōsis, a “puffing up of soul,” “loftiness, pride” (2 Cor. 12:20).

ARROW. See Armor: Bow and Arrow.

ARROWSNAKE. See Animal Kingdom: Serpent.

ARSENAL (ar'se-nal). See Armory.

ARTAXERXES (ar-ta-zerk'sez).

Artaxerxes I Longimanus, who reigned over Persia forty years, 464–424 B.C. In the seventh year of his reign he commissioned Ezra to return to Jerusalem, granting large privileges to him and those accompanying him (Ezra 7:11–26), 457 B.C. About thirteen years later (445 B.C.) he granted permission to Nehemiah to assume control of the civil affairs at Jerusalem (Neh. 2:1–8).

ARTEMAS (ar'ti-mas, contraction of Gk. Artemidoros, “gift of Artemis,” i.e., Diana).

1. The name of a disciple mentioned in connection with Tychicus, one of whom Paul wished to send into Crete to supply the place of Titus when he invited the latter to visit him at Nicopolis (Titus 3:12), A.D. 65. Traditionally, he was bishop of Lystra.

2. See Gods, False: Artemis.

ARTEMIS. One of the Greek goddesses, a huntress. The Roman name and KJV rendering is Diana. See Gods, False.

ARTILLERY (Heb. kāhî, “prepared”). Used in the KJV of 1 Sam. 20:40 to refer to Jonathan’s weapons (cf. NASB).

ARTISAN (Heb. hōrēsh, or hārāsh). A fabricator of any material, such as a carpenter, smith, or engraver (Isa. 3:3). See also Handicrafts.

ARTS. See Handicrafts.

ARUBBOTH (ar’u-both); a city or district. Mentioned (1 Kings 4:10) as the district belonging to the son of Heshai. Probably to be identified with Arrabeh near Dothan.

ARUMAH (a-ru’ma; “height”). A place in the neighborhood of Shechem where Abimelech, the son of Gideon, dwelt (Judg. 9:41).

ARVAD (ar’vad). A rocky island off the coast of Syria, two miles from the shore, and peopled by marines and soldiers (Ezek. 27:8, 11). It is modern Rouad, a little more than two miles from the shore to the S of Tartus. On that small island are Phoenician remains; there “the family” of the Arvadites settled.

ARVADITE (ar’va-dīt; Gen. 10:18; 1 Chron. 1:16). An inhabitant of the island of Aradus, or Arvad (which see). The Arvadites were descended from the sons of Canaan (Gen. 10:18). They appear to have been in some dependence upon Tyre, as we find them furnishing a contingent of mariners to that city (Ezek. 27:8, 11). They took their full share in Phoenician maritime affairs, particularly after Tyre and Sidon fell under the dominion of the Greco-Syrian kings.

ARZA (ar’za; “earthiness”). A steward over the house of Elah, king of Israel, in whose house, at Tirzah, Zimri, the captain of half of his chariots, conspired against Elah (which see), and killed him during a drunken debauch (1 Kings 16:8–10).

ASA (ā’sa; “healing”). Cf. Arab. asa, “to heal”; Aram. āssā, a “physician.”

1. The son and successor of Abijah, king of Judah, who reigned forty-one years, c. 910–869 B.C. On assuming the reins of government, Asa was conspicuous for his support of the worship of God and opposition to idolatry. Even his grandmother Maacah was deposed from the rank of “queen mother” because she had set up an idol, which Asa overthrew and burned by the brook Kidron (1 Kings 15:13). Still, the old hill sanctuaries were retained as places of worship. He placed in the Temple gifts dedicated by his father and rich offerings of his own, and renewed the altar, which had apparently been desecrated (2 Chron. 15:8).

The first ten years of his reign his kingdom enjoyed peace, which Asa utilized in fortifying his frontier cities and raising an army, which numbered at the beginning of hostilities 580,000 men (2 Chron. 14:8), though this number has been thought an exaggeration of the copyist. In the eleventh year of his reign Zerah, the Ethiopian, invaded Judah with an army of a million men. Asa besought God for help and, marching against Zerah, met and defeated him at Mareshah. He returned to Jerusalem with the spoil of the cities around Gerar and with innumerable sheep and cattle (14:9–

5). The prophet Azariah met Asa on his return and encouraged him and the people to continue their trust in God.

Asa carried on his reforms; a gathering of the people was held at Jerusalem, sacrifices were offered, and a covenant was made with Jehovah. To these ceremonies there came many from the kingdom of Israel, believing that God was with Asa (2 Chron. 15). In the thirty-sixth year (according to some the twenty-sixth) of his reign hostilities were begun by Baasha, king of Israel, who fortified Ramah to prevent his subjects from going over to Asa.

The good king then committed the great error of his life. He resorted to an alliance with Ben-hadad I, of Damascus, purchasing his assistance with treasures from the Temple and the king's house. Ben-hadad made a diversion in Asa's favor by invading northern Israel, whereupon Baasha left Ramah. Asa took the material found there and built Geba and Mizpah. His lack of faith was reproved by the seer Hanani, who told him that he had lost the honor of conquering the Syrians because of this alliance, and also prophesied war for the rest of his days. Asa, angered at Hanani, put him in prison and oppressed some of the people at the same time (2 Chron. 16:1–10).

Sickness and Death. In the thirty-ninth year of his reign he was afflicted with a disease in his feet and “did not seek the Lord,” but depended upon the physicians. The disease proved fatal in the forty-first year of his reign. He died greatly beloved and was honored with a magnificent burial (2 Chron. 16:12–14).

2. A Levite, son of Elkanah and father of Berechiah, who resided in one of the villages of the Netophathites after the return from Babylon (1 Chron. 9:16), after 536 B.C.

AS'AHHEL (as'a-hel; “God's creature”).

1. The son of David's sister, Zeruah, and brother of Joab and Abishai (2 Sam. 2:18; 1 Chron. 2:16). He was an early adherent of David, being one of the famous thirty (2 Sam. 23:24) and, with his son Zebadiah, was commander of the fourth division of the royal army (1 Chron. 27:7). He was renowned for his swiftness of foot, and after the battle of Gibeon he pursued and overtook Abner, who reluctantly, and in order to save his own life, slew Asahel with a back thrust of his spear (2 Sam. 2:18–23), about 1000 B.C. Joab, to revenge Asahel's death, slew Abner some years after at Hebron (3:26–27).

2. One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat into Judah to teach the law of the Lord (2 Chron. 17:8), after 875 B.C.

3. One of the Levites appointed by Hezekiah as overseer of the contributions to the house of the Lord (2 Chron. 31:13), about 700 B.C.

4. The father of Jonathan, who was one of the elders that assisted Ezra in putting away the foreign wives of the Jews on the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:15), 457 B.C.

ASAI'AH (a-sa-ī'a; “whom Jehovah made).

1. An officer of Josiah who was sent with others to consult Huldah the prophetess concerning the book of the law found in the Temple (2 Kings 22:12–14; 2 Chron. 34:20), 624 B.C. His name is given as Asahiah in the KJV of 2 Kings 22:12–4.

2. A leader of one of the families of the tribe of Simeon who, in the time of Hezekiah, drove out the Hamite shepherds from the rich pastures near Gedor (1 Chron. 4:36), about 700 B.C.

3. The son of Haggiah (1 Chron. 6:30) and head of the 220 Levites of the family of Merari, appointed by David to remove the Ark from the house of Obed-edom (1 Chron. 15:6, 11), after 1000 B.C.

4. The “first-born” of the Shilonites who returned to Jerusalem after the captivity (1 Chron. 9:5), about 536 B.C.

ASAHĪ’AH. See Asaiah.

A’SAPH (a-saf; “collector”).

1. The father (or ancestor) of Joah, who was “recorder” in the time of Hezekiah (2 Kings 18:18, 37; Isa. 36:3, 22), about 710 B.C.

2. A Levite, son of Berechiah, of the family of Gershom (1 Chron. 6:39; 15:17), eminent as a musician and appointed by David to preside over the sacred choral services (16:5), after 1000 B.C. The “sons of Asaph” are afterward mentioned as musicians of the Temple (1 Chron. 25:1–2; 2 Chron. 20:14, and elsewhere), and this office appears to have been made hereditary in the family (1 Chron. 25:1–2). Asaph was celebrated in later times as a prophet and “seer” (2 Chron. 29:30; Neh. 12:46), and the titles of twelve of the psalms (50, 73–83) bear his name, though in some of these (74, 75, 79) the “sons of Asaph” rather than Asaph himself should be understood, as matters of late occurrence are referred to (Kitto, s. v.).

3. A “keeper of the king’s forest,” probably in Lebanon. Nehemiah requested Artaxerxes to give him an order on Asaph for timber to be used in the rebuilding of the Temple (Neh. 2:8), about 445 B.C.

ASAR’EL (a-sar’el). The last named of the four sons of Jehallelel, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:16).

ASARE’LAH. See Ashare’lah.

ASCENSION OF CHRIST. His glorious withdrawal, as to His bodily presence, from the earth; and entrance, as the God-man and mediatorial King, into heaven.

The Fact. The ascension was from the Mount of Olives forty days after the resurrection. (1) Predicted in Pss. 68:18; 110:1; then interpreted (Eph. 4:8–10; Heb. 1:13); also by Christ Himself (John 6:62; 20:17). (2) Recorded (Mark 16:19; Luke 24:50–51; Acts 1:9–11). (3) Recognized by the apostle John (passages above cited) and by other NT writers who based doctrines upon it (2 Cor. 13:4; Eph. 2:6; 4:8–10; 1 Pet. 3:22; 1 Tim. 3:16; Heb. 1:13; 6:20). (4) Certified by the disciples who were eyewitnesses, by the words of the two angels, by Stephen and Paul and John, who saw Christ in His ascended state (Acts 1:9–11; 7:55–56; 9:3–5; Rev. 1:9–18). (5) Demonstrated by the descent of the Holy Spirit on the Day of Pentecost (Matt. 3:11; Luke 24:49; Acts 2:1–4, 33) and by the manifold gifts bestowed by the ascended Lord upon His church (Eph. 4:11–12).

Doctrinal and Ethical Significance. The visible ascension of Christ was the necessary sequel and seal of His resurrection (Rom. 6:9). It was the appropriate connecting link between His humiliation and glorification (Phil. 2:5–11). As consequences of the ascension the NT writers particularly note: (1) The removal of His bodily, but not His spiritual, presence from the earth; Christ “has passed through the heavens,” but invisibly He is always near at hand (Heb. 4:14; Matt. 28:20; Acts 23:11; 2 Tim. 4:17). (2) The investiture of Christ with power and dominion in heaven and earth. He is “at the right hand of the throne of God” (Matt. 28:18; Phil. 2:10; Heb. 12:2). (3) The perpetual intercession of Christ, as our great High Priest (Rom. 8:34; Heb. 5:10; 7:25). (4) The sending forth of the Holy Spirit, and the bestowal of other gifts upon the church (Acts 2:33; Eph. 4:11–12).

Of practical import, accordingly, the ascension of Christ is closely related to the peace and sanctification and hope of believers. (1) He is their heavenly Advocate (1 John 2:1). (2) He is still interceding for their perfection (John 17:20–24). (3) They are then encouraged to fidelity and to confident prayer (Heb. 4:14–16). (4) He powerfully attracts them to things above (Col. 3:1–4). (5) He has gone to prepare a place for them (John 14:2). (6) He awaits His perfect triumph over all His foes (Heb. 10:13). (7) He shall come again to judge the world (Acts 1:11; Matt. 25:31–32).

ASCENTS, SONG OF (“song of steps”). A title given to each of the fifteen psalms from 120 to 134. Four of them are attributed to David, one is ascribed to the pen of Solomon, and the other ten give no indication of their author.

The opinion held by Rosenmüller, Herder, and others is that some of the psalms were written before the Babylonian captivity, some by exiles returning to Palestine, and a few at a later date; but that all were incorporated into one collection because they had one and the same character. With respect to the term rendered in the NASB and NIV “ascents” (KJV, “degrees”), a great diversity of opinion prevails among biblical critics. According to some it refers to the melody to which the psalm was to be chanted. Others, including Gesenius, derive the word from the poetical composition of the song and from the circumstance that the concluding words of the preceding sentence are often repeated at the commencement of the next verse (cf. 121:4–5, and 124:1–2 and 3–4).

A good instance of the “step” style is found in the KJV rendering of Ps. 121: “I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help. My help cometh from the Lord, which made heaven and earth.”

Iben-Ezra quotes an ancient authority that maintains that the ascents or degrees allude to the fifteen steps which, in the Temple of Jerusalem, led from the court of the women to that of the men, and on each of which steps one of the fifteen songs of ascents was chanted. The generally accredited opinion, however, is that they were pilgrim songs sung by the people as they went up to Jerusalem.

AS'ENATH (as'e-nath; “who belongs to Neith,” i.e., the Egyptian Minerva). The daughter of Potipherah, priest of On, whom the king of Egypt gave in marriage to Joseph (Gen. 41:45), 1715 B.C. She became the mother of Ephraim and Manasseh (46:20). Beyond this nothing is known concerning her.

ASH. See Vegetable Kingdom: Fir.

A'SHAN (a'shan; “smoke”). A Levitical city (1 Chron. 6:59) in the low country of Judah, assigned first to Judah (Josh. 15:42) and again to Simeon (19:7; 1 Chron. 4:32; this last passage giving it as a priests' village). Ain instead of Ashan is used in Josh. 21:16. Ashan is identified with Khirbet Ashan about five miles NW of Beersheba.

ASHARE'LAH (ash-a-re'la). One of the sons of the Levite Asaph, who was appointed by David to be in charge of the Temple music (1 Chron. 25:2). He is probably the same as Jesharelah (1 Chron. 25:14) and, if so, was in the seventh of the (twenty-four) divisions, after 1000 B.C.

ASH'BEA (ash'be-a). In the KJV, the head of a family mentioned as working in fine linen (1 Chron. 4:21). The NASB and NIV interpret the Heb. to be part of the name of a village, Beth-ashbea (which see).

ASH'BEL (ash'bel). The second son of Benjamin (Gen. 46:21; 1 Chron. 8:1). His descendants were called Ashbelites (Num. 26:38).

ASH'BELITE. See Ashbel.

ASHCHE'NAZ (ash-ke'-naz). See Ashkenaz.

ASH'DOD (ash'dod). One of the five principal cities of the Philistines. Together with Gaza, Gath, Ekron, and Ashkelon it formed what is known as the Philistine Pentapolis. These cities were at the zenith of their power at the time of Saul (c. 1020 B.C.) and continued to be important after the ascendancy of the Hebrew monarchy under the Davidic dynasty (c. 1000–587 B.C.). Ashdod was situated between Ashkelon, a seaport, and Ekron, inland on the caravan route E to Lydda and W to Joppa. Sargon besieged and took the city (Isa. 20:1) despite its commanding position on a hill, which made it the envy of Israel. The Ark of God was carried by the Philistines to Ashdod after their victory at Ebenezer (c. 1050 B.C.) and carried into the temple of Dagon, an ancient Canaanite deity associated with agriculture, who was worshiped there (1 Sam. 5). It was later carried to Gath and Ekron with similar disastrous results as at Ashdod. Mentioned some twenty-one times in the OT, its palaces and temples (Amos 3:9) preserve its memory as a city of importance. Nehemiah in his day protested against Israelite men marrying wives from Ashdod and rearing children who could not speak “the language of Judah” (Neh. 13:23–25).

A joint expedition of the Pittsburgh Carnegie Museum, the Pittsburgh Theological Seminary, and the Israel Department of Antiquities excavated Ashdod in 1962, 1963, 1965, and from 1968 to 1972. M. Dothan served as director of excavations. The site encompasses an acropolis of about seventeen acres and a lower city of perhaps ninety acres. Excavations revealed twenty-two strata of settlement extending from the seventeenth century B.C. to the Byzantine period. A fragment of a basalt stela of Sargon II came to light, mentioning some of his conquests and confirming the fact that Sargon took the town (Isa. 20:1). The excavators also uncovered evidence of Hezekiah's conquest and learned that the Philistines took the city early in the twelfth century B.C. H.F.V.

ASH'DODITES (ash'do-dīts; Josh. 13:3; Neh. 4:7). Inhabitants of Ashdod (which see).

ASH'DOTHITES. See Ashdodites.

ASH'ER (ash'er; “happiness”). The eighth son of Jacob and second of Zilpah, the maid of Leah (Gen. 30:13).

Personal History. Of this we have no record.

The Tribe of Asher. Asher had four sons and one daughter. Upon quitting Egypt the tribe numbered 41,500, ranking ninth; and at the second census the number had increased to 53,400 men of war, ranking fifth in population.

Position. During the march through the desert Asher's place was between Dan and Naphtali, on the N side of the Tabernacle (Num. 2:27).

Territory. The general position of the tribe was on the seashore from Carmel northward, with Manasseh on the S, Zebulun and Issachar on the SE, and Naphtali on the NE. The boundaries and towns are given in Josh. 19:24–31; 17:10–11; Judg. 1:31–32.

Subsequent History. The richness of the soil and the tribe's proximity to the Phoenicians may have contributed to its degeneracy (Judg. 1:31; 5:17). In the reign of David the tribe had become so insignificant that its name is altogether omitted from the list of the chief rulers (1 Chron. 27:16–22). With the exception of Simeon, Asher is the only tribe W of the Jordan that furnished no judge or hero to the nation. Anna, daughter of Phanuel, who was of the tribe of Asher, as a prophetess and a godly woman, recognized the infant Jesus as the Messiah (Luke 2:36–38).

ASHE'RAH (a-she'ra). A Canaanite goddess appearing as “Lady of the Sea” in the Ras Shamra literature of the fourteenth century B.C. See Gods, False.

ASH'ERITES (ash'er-its). Descendants of Asher (which see) and members of his tribe (Judg. 1:32).

ASHES.

1. The ashes on the altar of burnt offering were removed each morning by a priest clad in linen (his official dress) and were then carried by him, attired in unofficial dress, to a clean place outside the camp (Lev. 6:10–11). According to the Mishna, the priest who was to remove the ashes was chosen by lot. The ashes of the red heifer (see Purification) had the ceremonial efficacy of purifying the unclean (Heb. 9:13) but of polluting the clean.

Figurative. It has been the custom in all ages to burn captured cities; and so, to reduce a place to ashes is a well-understood expression for effecting a complete destruction (Ezek. 28:18; 2 Pet. 2:6). A frequent figurative employment of the word is derived from the practice of sitting among ashes, or scattering them upon one's person, as a symbol of grief and mourning (Job 2:8; 42:6; Isa. 58:5; Jer. 6:26; Matt. 11:21; etc.). In Ezek. 27:30 it is declared of the mourning Tyrians that “they will wallow in the ashes,” expressive of great and bitter lamentation. Eating ashes is expressive of the deepest misery and degradation (Ps. 102:9; Isa. 44:20). Ashes are also used to represent things easily scattered, perishable, and, therefore, worthless. Thus Abraham speaks of himself as “dust and ashes” (Gen. 18:27), and to the righteous the wicked are said to be “ashes under the soles of your feet” (Mal. 4:3).

2. The early Christians naturally adopted a ceremony that had acquired so much significance. Tertullian speaks of the “substitution of sackcloth and ashes for a man's usual habit” as a regular ceremony of public confession and penance in the second century. Penitents under excommunication used to sprinkle ashes upon their heads and, standing at the doors of the churches, ask the prayers of those entering, that they might be readmitted to Communion.

ASH'HUR (ash'hur). A posthumous son of Hezron (grandson of Judah, Gen. 46:12), by his wife Abijah (1 Chron. 2:24). He had two wives, Helah and Naarah, each of whom bore him several sons (1 Chron. 4:5), and through these he is called the “father” (founder) of Tekoa, which appears to have been the place of their eventual settlement.

ASH'IMA (ash'i-ma). The god of the people of Hamath (2 Kings 17:30). See Gods, False.

ASH'KELON (ash'ke-lon; Askalon, Askelon, Ascalon in NT times). One of the five principal cities of Philistia, located on the fertile Maritime Plain some dozen miles N of Gaza. It probably derived its name from the escallot (scallion) that grew there. It has been excavated and shows stratigraphic layers of occupation from late Arab at the summit, through the Crusader and NT periods down to an early Canaanite town that came to an end around 2000 B.C. In Samson's time Philistines occupied it (Judg. 14:19). Both Zephaniah (2:4) and Zechariah (9:5) foretold its destruction. Ashkelon was Herod the Great's birthplace and the residence of his sister Salome. Consequently, he took an interest in the place, beautifying it with impressive colonnaded courts. The site was prominent in the period of the Crusades, but its chief interest is in the biblical period. David mentions the city in his lament over Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. 1:20). Excavations at the 160-acre site were carried on in 1920 and 1921 by W. J. Phythian-Adams and John Garstang on behalf of the Palestine Exploration Fund. Among other things, the excavators found Hyksos fortifications and a council house (110 meters long) dating to the Roman period. In 1967 V. Tsferis uncovered a Christian basilica with a mosaic pavement. H.F.V.

ASH'KELONITE (ash'ke-lon-it). The designation (Josh. 13:3) of an inhabitant of Ashkelon (which see).

ASHKENAZ' (ash-ke-nas'). The first named of the sons of Gomer son of Japheth (Gen. 10:3) and equivalent to Assyrian Ashkuz, “the Scythians” (W. F. Albright, O.T. Commentary [1948], p. 138). In the time of Jeremiah they dwelt in the neighborhood of Ararat and Minni (the Mannai of the Assyrian inscriptions) SE of Lake Van. They were rude and retarded in civilization and periodically overran extensive territory, so that their name came to be tantamount to barbarians. M.F.U.

ASH'NAH (ash'na). The name of two cities, both in the tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:33, 43). Neither of them has been positively identified.

ASH'PENAZ (ash'pe-naz). The chief of the officials (or eunuchs, Dan. 1:3, see marg.), a chamberlain of Nebuchadnezzar, after 604 B.C., who was commanded to select certain Jewish captives to be instructed in the “literature and language of the Chaldeans” (1:4). Among those he selected were Daniel and his three companions, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, whose Heb. names he changed to Babylonian (1:7). The request of Daniel, that he might not be compelled to eat the provisions sent from the king's table, filled Ashpenaz with apprehension. But God had brought Daniel into favor with Ashpenaz, and he did not use constraint toward him, and this kindness the prophet gratefully records (1:16).

ASH'RIEL. See Asriel.

ASH'TAROTH (ash'ta-rōth).

1. An ancient city of Bashan, E of the Jordan (Deut. 1:4; Josh. 9:10; 12:4; 3:12, 31) in the half tribe of Manasseh. The inhabitants, including King Og, were giants. The town was the seat of the lewd worship of Astarte and was the capital of Og. By the time of Israel's entrance into the land, the iniquity of the inhabitants was full (Gen. 15:16), and God commanded the conquering Israelites to utterly exterminate them (Deut. 3:2–6). The site of the ancient city is identified with Tell Ashtarab, twenty-one miles E of the Sea of Galilee, the hill being surrounded by a well-watered plain.

2. The plural form of the god Ashtoreth (Astarte). See Gods, False. M.F.U.

ASH'TEROTH KAR'NAIM (ash'te-rōth kar-na'im; “Ashteroth of the two horns,” Gen. 14:5). This was probably distinct from Ashtaroth. The Rephaim dwelt in Ashteroth Karnaim, a place probably at or near Tell 'Ashtarab. There was a temple there, dedicated to the principal female divinity of the Phoenicians; both the city, in later Hebrew times called Carnaim, and the temple are mentioned in Maccabees, and the reference seems to be the same place.

ASH'UR. See Ash'hur.

ASH'TORETH. One of the names of a Sidonian goddess. See Gods, False.

ASHURBAN'IPAL (a-shūr-ban'i-pal; Assy. "Ashur creates a son"). Called also Osnappar (which see; the name is sometimes given as Asnappar), Ashurbanipal was the grandson of Sennacherib (705–681 B.C.), and the last great Assyrian monarch (669–626 B.C.). His father was the famous Esarhaddon. He is renowned as a scholar and a protector of literature and art. His great library, excavated at Nineveh, has yielded a large quantity of cuneiform literature, numbering about 22,000 religious, literary, and scientific texts. This vast corpus of material furnishes one of the main sources of information extant for the reconstruction of the history and civilization of ancient Assyria. Texts giving the ancient Babylonian versions of the creation and the Flood found in the Nineveh beautified by this king have shed light on the account of these events recorded in Genesis. Ashurbanipal was on the throne of Assyria during a large part of Manasseh's long and wicked reign in Judah (c. 696–642 B.C.). The narrative of 2 Chron. 33 relates how Manasseh was deported to Babylon by the Assyrians (Esarhaddon or Ashurbanipal?). The authenticity of this event is supported by the fact that Assyrian kings of this period did spend part of their time in Babylon. M.F.U.

ASHURI (a-shū'ri). The name of a people in the Transjordan over whom Ish-bosheth was made king following Saul's death (2 Sam. 2:9). E.H.M.

ASHURNA'SIRPAL II (a-shūr-na'zir-pal; 883–859 B.C.). A ruthless conqueror who brought the Assyrian Empire to a place of dread power in all SW Asia. He built up a fighting machine that overran vast sections of the Near Eastern world. He is notorious for his barbarous cruelty. The final edition of his annals was inscribed on the pavement slabs on the entrance of the temple of Ninurta in Calah, an ancient and ruined city (cf. Gen. 10:11; now the Mound of Nimrud) where A. H. Layard began his Assyrian excavations in 1845. At the very beginning the palace of Ashurnasirpal was uncovered. In a nearby small temple a half-life-size statue of the king was found. Inscribed on it was the claim that he had conquered the whole region from the Tigris to the Great Sea (Mediterranean). M. E. L. Mallowan excavated at the site again in 1949 and 1950, concentrating once more at Ashurnasirpal's palace, a new southeastern wing of which was found and excavated. H.F.V.

ASHVATH (ash'vath). The third son of Japhlet of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:33).

A'SIA (ā'sha). A name of doubtful origin that, as a designation along with Europe and Africa, came into use in the fifth century B.C. The Scriptures do not mention Asia as a whole, the several references being to separate nations or parts of the continent. In the NT the word is used in this narrower sense, sometimes for Asia Minor and sometimes for proconsular Asia, the latter of which included Phrygia, Mysia, Caria, and Lydia. Proconsular Asia was governed by a propraetor until the emperor Augustus made it a proconsular province. J. Strong (Cyclopaedia) thinks "Asia" denotes all of Asia Minor in Acts 19:26–27; 21:27; 24:18; 27:2; and that proconsular Asia is referred to in 2:9; 6:9; 16:6; 19:10, 22; 20:4, 16, 18; Rom. 16:5; 1 Cor. 16:19; 2 Cor. 1:8; 2 Tim. 1:15; 1 Pet. 1:1; and contained the seven churches of the Apocalypse (Rev. 1:4, 11). Luke appears to have used the term Asia in a still more restricted sense, counting Phrygia and Mysia as provinces distinct from Asia (Acts 2:9–10; 16:6–7).

A'SIA, CHURCHES OF. See under their respective names.

ASIARCHS (ā'si-arks; “rulers of Asia,” Acts 19:31). The ten superintendents of the public games and religious rites of proconsular Asia, who celebrated at their own expense the games in honor of the gods and emperor. Each city annually, about the time of the autumnal equinox, delegated one of its citizens with a view to this office; out of the entire number ten were elected by the assembly of deputies, and one of the ten, perhaps chosen by the proconsul, presided. It has been disputed whether only the president or the whole of the ten bore the title asiarch. From 19:31 it would appear that all bore the title and also that through courtesy it was extended to those who had held the office previously.

A'SIEL (a'si-el; “created by God”). The father of Seraiah, and progenitor of one of the Simeonite leaders that expelled the Hamites from the valley of Gedor in the time of Hezekiah (1 Chron. 4:35), before 715 B.C.

AS'KELON. See Ashkelon.

AS'NAH (as'na). The head of one of the families of the Temple servants (KJV, Nethinim) that returned from the Babylonian captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:50), about 536 B.C.

ASP. See Animal Kingdom: Serpent.

ASPALATHUS. See Vegetable Kingdom.

ASPATHA (Aspatha'). The third son of Homan, a ruler of Persia under Ahasuerus (Xerxes, NIV; Esther 9:7). E.H.M.

ASPHALT. Asphalt was extensively procured from the Dead Sea in ancient times, which was one of the major sources of this building material. The Nabataeans controlled the Dead Sea bitumen industry in the Greco-Roman period (Diodorus Siculus Historia 2. 48; 19. 98–100); F. R. Clapp, “Geology and Bitumen of the Dead Sea Area, Palestine and Transjordan,” American Association of Petroleum Geologists 20, no. 7 (1936): 901; The Biblical Archaeologist 22, no. 2 (1959): 40–48. See Mineral Kingdom: Tar.

AS'RIEL (as-ri-el'). The head of a family that belonged to the half tribe of Manasseh (Num. 26:31; Josh. 17:2; 1 Chron. 7:14).

ASS. See Animal Kingdom: Donkey.

ASSEMBLY. The term used for several Heb. words, elsewhere translated “Congregation” (which see). It is also the representative of the following: (1) āṣārâ, a “coming together,” especially for a festal occasion (Lev. 23:36; Num. 29:35; Deut. 16:8). (2) miqrâ, something “called,” a public meeting (Isa. 1:13; 4:5). (3) “general assembly” (Gk. panēguris, “a festal gathering of all the people” (Heb. 12:23), commonly believed to be the same as the church. (4) ekklēsia, a term in use among the Greeks from the time of Thucydides for “an assemblage of the people for the purpose of deliberating” (Acts 19:39).

ASSEMBLY, MOUNT OF (Heb. har mō:ēd). A mountain in the farthest N referred to in Isa. 14:13 in connection with the fall of Satan (Lucifer). The reference is illustrated by the common concept among the Babylonians that the gods assembled on a mountain of the N. Some suppose that Mt. Moriah as the site of the Temple is intended, but Zion was neither a northern point of the earth nor was it situated on the N of Jerusalem. “The prophet makes the king of Babylon speak after the general notion of his people, who placed the seat of the Deity on the summit of the northern mountains, which were lost in the clouds” (Delitzsch, Com.).

AS'SHUR (ash-ur; a “step”). The second named of the sons of Shem (Gen. 10:22; 1 Chron. 1:17). His descendants peopled the land of Assyria. The name also appears in the KJV of Gen. 10:11, but the verse should be rendered, “From that land he went forth into Assyria” (so NASB and NIV).

AS'SIR (as'sir; “prisoner”).

1. A Levite, son of Korah (Ex. 6:24; 1 Chron. 6:22). His descendants constituted one of the Korhite families.

2. Son of Ebiasaph, great-grandson of the preceding, and father of Tahath (1 Chron. 6:23, 37). There is some suspicion, however, that the name here has crept in by repetition from the preceding.

3. In the KJV of 1 Chron. 3:17, the son of Jeconiah, a descendant of David. The NASB and NIV render “Jeconiah, the prisoner,” referring to the captivity of that prince in Babylon.

ASSOCIATE. The rendering of Heb. āmîṭ, “neighbor,” in that remarkable passage “Awake, O sword, against My Shepherd, and against the man, My Associate” (Zech. 13:7). The expression “man, who is my nearest one” implies much more than unity or community of vocation, or that he had to feed the flock as Jehovah. The idea of nearest one (or associate) involves not only similarity in vocation, but community of physical or spiritual descent, according to which He whom God calls His neighbor cannot be a mere man but can only be one who participates in the divine nature or is essentially divine. This passage is quoted and applied to Himself by our Lord (Matt. 26:31).

AS'SOS (as'os). A seaport town in Mysia, on the northern shore of the Gulf of Adramyttium and about thirty miles from Troas by sea, opposite Lesbos. Paul came to it on foot from Troas to embark for Mitylene (Acts 20:13–14). Assos was excavated by an American expedition directed by J. T. Clarke and F. H. Bacon (1881–83). At the site may be seen remains of a city wall (fourth century B.C.), a temple of Athena (sixth century B.C.), an agora (third-second century B.C.), a gymnasium (second century B.C.), and a theater (third century B.C.).

ASSURANCE. A term brought into theology from the Scriptures, sometimes used broadly by theologians as referring to certitude respecting the validity of Christian revelation; most commonly employed to denote the firm persuasion of one's own salvation. The latter must of course include the former. In experience the two are closely connected. In both senses assurance is a product of the Holy Spirit (Col. 2:2; Heb. 6:11; 10:22). See also other passages expressing “confidence,” “boldness.”

As to the assurance of personal salvation it must be emphasized that this must not be confused with the eternal security of a genuine believer. The latter is a fact due to God’s faithfulness whether it is realized by the believer or not, whereas the former is that which one believes is true respecting himself at any given moment.

1. Assurance has been held, chiefly by Calvinists, to relate not only to present but also to final salvation. This is the logical outcome of the doctrine of unconditional election. It must stand or fall with that doctrine. Others, who regard mankind as in a state of probation, limit the assurance to present acceptance with God.

2. Is assurance the common privilege of believers? This the doctrine of the Roman Catholic church answers in the negative “since no one can certainly and infallibly know that he has obtained the grace of God” (Council of Trent, sess. 6, chap. 9, “De Justificatione”). Luther and Melancthon and many other Reformers held strongly to the affirmative and even made assurance the criterion of saving faith. Calvinistic doctrine has regarded assurance (implying not only present but also final salvation) as a special gift of grace possessed by relatively few believers, though, theoretically at least, within the privilege and duty of all. Methodist theology has given strong emphasis to assurance as the common privilege of all who truly believe in Christ, presenting not the doubting and desponding type but the confident and joyous type of religious experience as the one that is normal and scriptural.

3. As to whether assurance is of the essence of, or a necessary element in, saving faith the first Protestant Confession (Augsburg) held that it is involved therein in accordance with Luther’s declaration that “he who hath not assurance spews faith out.” Other and later utterances of the Reformed doctrine discriminated between the act of justifying and saving faith and the assurance that comes as its result. The Westminster Assembly was the first Protestant synod, however, that formally declared assurance not to be of the essence of saving faith. Wesley, although seeming at times to teach the opposite view, nevertheless clearly held and taught that assurance is not involved in justifying faith or necessarily connected with it. “The assertion, ‘Justifying faith is a sense of pardon,’” he says, “is contrary to reason; it is flatly absurd. For, how can a sense of pardon be the condition of our receiving it?” For a most discriminating presentation of his views as to the relation of assurance to faith, see his Works, 11:109–10.

4. As to the grounds of assurance, opinions have also varied, especially as to their order and relative importance. Calvinists are rather disposed to lay stress upon the external grounds of confidence instead of those that are internal; i.e., the truths and promises of Scripture are dwelt upon more largely and strongly than the fruits of the Spirit and the “witness of the Spirit.” Wesley and other Methodist theologians emphasize chiefly the “witness of the Spirit,” though they by no means undervalue the confidence that comes from the recognition of the validity of the truth and promises of God and that which comes from finding in one’s self the graces that surely proclaim the fact of personal salvation. The “witness of the Spirit” brings faith to its full development, so that, uplifted to a joyous experience of the new life, we become possessed more abundantly of the fruits of the Spirit, and the faith in God’s Word that was intellectual, rational, and dim or wavering becomes spiritual, living, and certain. Thus is realized “the full assurance of faith” and “of hope” and “understanding.” See Westminster Con., art. 18, “Of the Assurance of Grace and Salvation”; Hodge’s Systematic Theology; Pope’s Compendium of Christian Theology; Dorner’s System of Christian Doctrines, introductory chapter, “The Doctrine of Faith”; Watson’s

ASSYRIA (a-sir'ī-ya). The name of a country and the mighty empire that dominated the ancient biblical world from the ninth to the seventh century B.C.

The Land. Assyria lay along the middle Tigris between the Kurdish Taurus Mountains and Jebel Hamrin and formed an area about the size of the state of Connecticut. On the W bank of the Tigris lay a single plain, while on the E bank the country was divided into three sections: the area between the mountains and the Great Zab, the sector between the Great and Lesser Zab rivers, and the region between the Lesser Zab and the mountain Jebel Hamrin. The land is fertile and undulating and has enough rainfall to support dry farming. Assyria had abundant supplies of limestone and alabaster and some marble.

The major cities were Ashur on the W bank of the Tigris and Arrapkha, Erbil, Nineveh, and Calah to the E of the Tigris. Most of the population lived in country towns. In time the Assyrians were able to build a sizable empire that stretched from Egypt on the W to Persia on the E and from the Persian Gulf on the S to Anatolia on the N.

The People. The people who inhabited Assyria belonged to the great Semitic race. They had come originally, so it appears, from Babylonia to settle as colonists. They were not a pure race, for there had already been an intermixture of blood with the Sumerian people, who were the original inhabitants of the land. After this immigration the Babylonians continued the process of intermixture with successive invading peoples from Elam, Arabia, and elsewhere, but the Assyrians intermarried little with neighboring peoples and held it a subject for much boasting that they were of purer blood than the Babylonians. However, during the height of the Assyrian Empire (c. 725–635), the Assyrians deported large numbers of people from conquered lands and settled them in their homeland, with the result that by the fall of Nineveh in 612 the population of Assyria was greatly diluted. In stature the Assyrians were of average modern European height and were well built. Their complexion was dark, the nose prominent, the hair, eyebrows, and beard thick and bushy. They were apparently of cheerful disposition, given to mirth and feasting, but of implacable cruelty. The pages of history are nowhere more bloody than in the records of their wars. It may be argued, however, that the Assyrians were not much more cruel than other peoples of the ancient Near East but merely kept better records. As cases in point, Egyptian monuments occasionally show mounds of body parts, demonstrating that the Egyptians mutilated their enemies; and even the Hebrews were known to have hacked away at those whom they had vanquished (e.g., 1 Sam. 18:25, 27).

Language and Literature. The language of Assyria was closely akin to that of Babylonia and may properly be regarded as practically the same language. It belongs to the Semitic family of languages and is, therefore, akin to Arab., Aramaean, and Heb. Unlike these three kindred languages, the Assyrian never developed an alphabet, though it did develop a few alphabetic characters. During its entire history the Assyrian language was prevailingly ideographic and syllabic. It expressed words by means of signs that represented the idea; thus there was a single sign for sun, another for city, another for wood, another for hand. These are called ideograms and originated in considerable measure out of pictures, or pictographs, of the objects themselves. But besides these ideograms the language also possessed numerous syllabic signs such as ab, ib, ub, ba, bi, bu. By means of these, words could be spelled out. Clumsy though this appears to be, the Assyrians were able to develop it far enough to make it a wonderfully accurate and sufficiently flexible tool. The materials on which they wrote were clay and stone, the use of which had come from Babylonia. In writing upon stone the characters were chiseled deeply into the surface, in regular lines, sometimes over raised figures of gods or kings. Writings thus executed were of monumental character and could not be used for business or literary purposes. The great bulk of Assyrian literature has come down to us upon clay and not upon stone. The clay tablets, as they are called, vary greatly in size. Some are shaped like pillows, two inches in length by an inch and a quarter in width. Others are flat and sometimes reach sixteen inches in length by nine or ten inches in width. The clay is also sometimes shaped like barrels, varying in height from five to nine inches, or like cylinders or prisms, which are found sometimes sixteen inches in height. When the soft clay had been formed into one of these shapes, the characters were formed by pressing into the surface a small metallic tool with a triangularly pointed end. Each pressure formed a wedge-shaped, or cuneiform, depression, and by repeated indentations the characters were made. On these clay tablets the Assyrians wrote a varied literature. We now have in our possession vast stores of this literature, representing widely differing phases. There are historical inscriptions, narrating in annalistic form the deeds of Assyrian monarchs; public documents, royal and private letters and dispatches; lists of taxes; innumerable business documents, such as receipts and bills of sale; religious documents, such as hymns, prayers, incantations, and lists of omens; linguistic documents, such as lists of signs and of words with explanations; astronomical lists of eclipses and the like; tables of square and cube roots; and medical treatises and lists of recipes for the healing of disease. Only a small part of this vast literature has been published in facsimile or made accessible in translations in European languages. When they are made thus accessible they will give an insight into the whole life of these people such as we are able to obtain of very few peoples of antiquity.

Religion. The people of Assyria derived their religious ideas from Babylonia and during all their history had constant contact with the mother country in this matter, as in others. The faith was polytheistic and never shows in any text yet found any approach to monotheism. The god who stood at the head of the Assyrian pantheon was the great god Ashur, always honored as the divine founder of the nation. After him and below him were the gods Anu, Bel, and Ea, the middle of whom, under slightly varying names and with changes of titles, was worshiped in Babylonia and even far westward among other Semitic peoples. Besides this great triad, there was another consisting of the moon god Sin, the sun-god Shamash, whose name appears in royal names so frequently, and Ishtar, the goddess of the crescent moon and the queen of the stars, though her place in this triad is often taken by Ramman, the “thunderer,” god of rain, of tempests, and of storms. These gods are invoked in phrases that seem to raise each in turn to a position of supremacy over the others. Early students of religious texts sometimes mistakenly supposed that these ascriptions of praise and honor were in reality tokens of monotheism. This is now well known to be a false inference. Monotheism was unknown, henotheism seems at times to have been reached, but polytheism was the prevailing, as it was always the popular, belief. Besides these great triads of gods there were large numbers of minor deities, as well as countless spirits of heaven, earth, and sea. See Nergal.

The religious ceremonies of the Assyrians, with their sacrifices morning and evening and their offerings of wine, milk, honey, and cakes, was similar to that of Babylonia but is not yet satisfactorily known, save in outline.

Archaeology. It is clear that the origin of the Assyrian commonwealth is to be found among Babylonian colonists (Gen. 10:11). Archaeology also points to this fact, and the Assyrians themselves looked back to Babylonia as the motherland.

A full account of Assyrian archaeology would fill volumes. There is room here for only a few brief references. Paul Emil Botta began the archaeological history of Assyria in 1842 with significant success at Khorsabad, capital of Sargon II; Victor Place succeeded him there (1851–55). Austen Henry Layard launched English excavations in Assyria, making significant finds at biblical Calah (1846–47) and at Calah and Nineveh (1849–51). At the latter he uncovered much of the great palace of Sennacherib. Layard's associate, Hormuzd Rassam, continued work at Nineveh (1852–54) and had the good fortune to locate Ashurbanipal's palace and the major part of his library. M. E. L. Mallowan led a British School of Archaeology dig at Calah from 1949 to 1961, completing the excavation of Ashurnasirpal's palace and excavating the great fort of Shalmaneser III. R. Campbell Thompson's work at Nineveh (1927–32) was especially responsible for bringing order out of the chronology of the site and establishing the history from its destruction in 612 B.C. back almost to 5000 B.C. Edward Chiera and Henri Frankfort led a University of Chicago excavation at Khorsabad (1929–36) and reexamined the entire palace area and the city. André Parrot of the Louvre excavated at Mari in the middle Euphrates (1933 to 1939 and 1951–56), finding the great royal palace and the archive of more than twenty thousand cuneiform tablets, providing contextual information for biblical studies. And an American Schools of Oriental Research excavation at Nuzi in northeastern Iraq (1925–31) likewise recovered some twenty thousand cuneiform tablets that throw light on patriarchal customs.

History. Under Shamshi-Adad I (c. 1748–1716 B.C.) Assyria began to spread as a great city-state, with strong fortifications and a splendid temple to house its national god, Ashur. As the political powers of Babylonia declined, Assyria entered its Old Kingdom period, c. 1700 to 1100 B.C. By the fourteenth century B.C. Assyria had risen to a position of power comparable to Egypt on the Nile and the Hittite Empire in Asia Minor. Among the Amarna Tablets is a letter written by Ashur-uballit ("Ashur has given life," c. 1362–1327) to Amenhotep IV of Egypt, in which the Assyrian monarch speaks as a royal equal. With Tiglath-pileser I (c. 1114–1076) Assyria entered the period of empire, extending from c. 1100 to 633 B.C. This great conqueror was able to push Assyrian power westward to the Mediterranean Sea and northward to the region of Lake Van and the mountains of Armenia. The next two centuries, however, marked a period of retrogression for Assyria until the rise of Ashurnasirpal II (883–859) who made his land a formidable fighting machine and who swept everything before his ruthless cruelty, as his annals tell. His son Shalmaneser III (858–824) inherited his father's gigantic fighting machine and conducted numerous campaigns against Syria-Palestine, in one of which he fought against Ahab of Israel at Qarqar on the Orontes River in 853 B.C. and in another received tribute from "Jehu, son of Omri." Shalmaneser III called himself "the mighty king, king of the universe, the king without a rival, the autocrat, the powerful one of the four regions of the world, who shatters the might of the princes of the whole world, who has smashed all of his foes as pots" (D. D. Luckenbill, Ancient Records of Assyria and Babylonia, vol. 1, sec. 674). Despite his boasts Shalmaneser III died amid revolts that his son Shamsi-Adad V (823–811) also had to face. Adad-nirari III (810–783) kept Assyrian power aggressive, but under Shalmaneser IV (782–773), Ashur-dan III (772–755), and Ashur-nirari V (754–745) declension set in. Then the throne was seized by a great warrior and statesman, Tiglath-pileser III, who assumed the name of the illustrious conqueror Tiglath-pileser I of the eleventh century B.C. and brought back the empire to its glory, even conquering Babylon, where he was known as Pulu (cf. 2 Kings 15:19). This great warrior overran Israel, took tribute from Menahem, and transported his conquered peoples to distant sections of his empire. Soon after the death of Tiglath-pileser, Hoshea of Israel attempted to revolt against Assyria. The new emperor, Shalmaneser V (726–722), thereupon laid siege to the Israelite capital of Samaria. Before the fall of the city had been fully consummated a new leader had seized the reins of power. He was Sharrukin II or Sargon II (721–705), whose new regime was inaugurated by the fall of the city. Sargon is mentioned but once in Scripture (Isa. 20:1), but as the result of the excavation of his splendid palace at Dur Sharrukin, or Khorsabad, he is now one of the best known of Assyrian emperors. In 704 B.C. he was succeeded by his son Sennacherib, who ruled Assyria until 681 B.C. and was succeeded in turn by his son Esarhaddon (680–669), one of the greatest Assyrian conquerors. He added Egypt to the empire. Esarhaddon's son, Ashurbanipal (668–633), also campaigned in Egypt and seems to have been a great warrior; but he is especially known for his cultural interests. The great royal library, in existence at least since 700 B.C., was especially his creation. He sent scribes all over Mesopotamia to copy texts on a variety of subjects. After Esarhaddon, the Assyrian stranglehold on the ancient world began to give way. In the intervening years till 612 B.C., when Nineveh fell and Assyrian civilization was suddenly snuffed out, there were several undistinguished rulers. The neo-Babylonian Empire arose on the ruins of Assyria, and a new historical epoch dawned. H.F.V.

ASTROLOGY. The ancient art of divination by consulting the planets and stars, which until Kepler's time was inextricably bound up with astronomy. The practice consists in consulting the heavenly bodies, particularly the signs of the zodiac in relation to observed human events, and making deductions and predictions on this basis. This largely unscientific practice is nevertheless an important divinatory practice still in vogue in modern Western civilization—as is evidenced by horoscopes printed regularly in metropolitan newspapers, the existence of popular astrology magazines having large circulation, and astrological services available for those who refuse to make important decisions without first consulting the stars (see Astrologers, Divination, Diviners under Magic: Various Forms). ASTRONOMY (Gk. astronomia, “laws of the stars”). This science probably owes its origin to the Chaldeans, there being evidence that they had conducted astronomical observations from remote antiquity. Callisthenes sent to his uncle, Aristotle, a number of these observations, of which the oldest must have dated back to the middle of 2300 B.C. "The Chaldean priests had been accustomed from an early date to record on their clay tablets the aspect of the heavens and the changes which took place in them night after night, the appearance of the constellations, their comparative brilliance, the precise moments of their rising and setting and culmination, together with the more or less rapid movements of the planets, and their motions toward or from one another." They discovered the revolution and eclipses of the moon and frequently predicted with success eclipses of the sun (Maspero, Dawn of Civilization, p. 775).

The astronomy of China and India dates back to an early period, for we read of two Chinese astronomers, Ho and Hi, being put to death for failing to announce a solar eclipse that took place in 2169 B.C.

The Hebrews do not appear to have devoted much attention to astronomy, perhaps because astrology, highly esteemed among the neighboring nations (Isa. 47:9, 12–13; Jer. 27:9; Dan. 2), was interdicted by the law (Deut. 18:10–11). And yet we find as early as the book of Job that the constellations were distinguished and designated by peculiar and appropriate names (Job 9:9; 38:31; also Isa. 13:10; Amos 5:8).

ASYLUM (Heb. miqlāt). A place of safety where even a criminal might be free from violence from the avenger.

Ancient. From Ex. 21:14; 1 Kings 1:50, we see that the Hebrews, in common with many other nations, held that the altar, as God's abode, afforded protection to those whose lives were in danger. By the law, however, the place of expiation for sins of weakness (Lev. 4:2; 5:15–18; Num. 15:27–31) was prevented from being abused by being made a place of refuge for criminals deserving of death. The Mosaic law also provided cities of refuge (which see). Among the Greeks and Romans, the right of asylum pertained to altars, temples, and all holy shrines. These sanctuaries were exceptionally numerous in Asia. During the time of the Roman Empire the statues of the emperors were used as refuges against momentary acts of violence. Armies in the field used the eagles of the legions for the same purpose.

Christian. In the Christian church the right of asylum was retained and extended from the altar to all ecclesiastical buildings. By act of Theodosius II (A.D. 431), not only the church was to be considered sacred but also the atrium, the garden, bath, and cells. Many abuses crept in, until the custom has either become extinct or greatly reformed.

ASYN'CRITUS (a-sing'kri-tus; "incomparable"). The name of a Christian at Rome to whom Paul sends salutation (Rom. 16:14), A.D. 60.

A'TAD (Heb. ʾāṭād, "a thorn"). It is uncertain whether Atad is the name of a person or a descriptive appellation given to a "thorny" locality. At the threshing floor of Atad, the sons of Jacob and the Egyptians who accompanied them "lamented there with a very great and sorrowful lamentation" for Jacob seven days (Gen. 50:10–11), c. 1871 B.C.

AT'ARAH (Heb. ʾāṭārâ, a "crown"). The second wife of Jerahmeel of the tribe of Judah, and mother of Onam (1 Chron. 2:26).

ATAR'GATIS (a-tar'ga-tis). A Syrian divinity. See Gods, False. M.F.U.

AT'AROTH (Heb. ʾāṭārôt, "crowns").

1. A city near Gilead, E of Jordan, in a fertile grazing district (Num. 32:3). Rebuilt by the Gadites (v. 34).

2. A city on the border of Ephraim and Benjamin, called Ataroth-addar (Josh. 18:13).

3. “Ataroth of the house of Joab,” in the tribe of Judah, a city founded by the descendants of Salma (1 Chron. 2:54, KJV; NASB and NIV render “Atroth-beth-joab”).

ATER (a'ter).

1. The name of a man ninety of whose descendants returned from exile in Babylon (Ezra 2:16; Neh. 7:21; 10:17).

2. The name of a man whose sons were Levitical gatekeepers in the Temple of Zerubbabel following the Exile (Ezra 2:42; Neh. 7:45). E.H.M.

A'THACH (a'thak). A city in Judah to which David sent a present of the spoils recovered from the Amalekites who had sacked Ziklag (1 Sam. 30:30). Its site is Khirbet Attir near Enrimmon.

ATHA'IAH (ath-a'ya; perhaps the same as Asaiah). A son of Uzziah, of the tribe of Judah, who dwelt in Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (Neh. 11:4), 445 B.C.

ATHALI'AH (a-tha-li'ah).

1. The daughter of Ahab, king of Israel, doubtless by his wife Jezebel. She is called (2 Chron. 22:2) the granddaughter of Omri, who was father of Ahab. She was married to Jehoram, king of Judah, who “walked in the way of the kings of Israel, just as the house of Ahab did,” no doubt owing to her influence (2 Chron. 21:6). After the death of Jehoram, Ahaziah came to the throne, and he also walked in the way of Ahab's house, following the wicked counsel of his mother (22:2–3).

Ahaziah reigned one year and was slain by Jehu, whereupon Athaliah resolved to seat herself upon the throne of David. She caused all the male members of the royal family to be put to death, only Joash, the son of Ahaziah, escaping (2 Kings 11:1–2), 841 B.C. Athaliah usurped the throne for six years, 841–835 B.C. Joash, in the meantime, had been concealed in the Temple by his aunt, Jehosheba the wife of Jehoiada the high priest. In the seventh year, Jehoiada resolved to produce the young prince, and, arrangements having been made for defense in case of necessity, Joash was declared king. Athaliah, who was probably worshiping in the house of Baal, was aroused by the shouts of the people and went to the Temple, where her cry of “treason” only secured her own arrest. She was taken beyond the sacred precincts of the Temple and put to death. The only other recorded victim of this revolution was Mattan, the priest of Baal (11:16–18; 2 Chron. 23:14–17).

2. One of the sons of Jeroham, and head of the tribe of Benjamin, who dwelt at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:26).

3. The father of Jeshaiiah, who was one of the “sons” of Elam that returned with seventy dependents from Babylon under Ezra (Ezra 8:7), about 457 B.C.

ATHARIM (a'tha-rim). A place whose precise location is unknown, but somewhere between Mt. Hor and Arad (Num. 21:1). E.H.M.

ATHEISM (Gk. atheos, “without God”). The denial of the existence of God. The term has always been applied according to the popular conception of God. Thus the Greeks considered a man atheos, “atheist,” when he denied the existence of the gods recognized by the state. The pagans called Christians atheists because they would not acknowledge the heathen gods and worship them. In the theological controversies of the early church the opposite parties not infrequently called each other atheists.

The question may be fairly asked, Is true atheism or antitheism possible to the human mind? And the answer must be finally given that it is not. If we appeal to Scripture, and such an appeal should be allowed, we find that through the whole book there is no single allusion to men from whose mind the thought of God is erased. The Bible demonstrates everything about the Deity but His existence. It never descends to argue with an atheist. If it recognizes a man who is a disbeliever in God, it counts him a “fool” (Ps. 53:1). “In Eph. 2:12 the expression, atheoi en tō kosmō, ‘without God in the world,’ the word atheoi, ‘godless,’ may be taken either with the active, neuter, or passive reference, i.e., either denying, ignorant of, or forsaken by God. The last meaning seems best to suit the passive tenor of the passage and to enhance the dreariness and gloom of the picture” (Ellicott, Com., ad loc.).

Atheism proper has mostly sprung from moral causes, and denotes a system of thought that the healthiest instinct of mankind has always abhorred. Even among the heathen the denial of the existence of the gods was proscribed and punished.

ATH'ENS (ath'enz). A city named after the patron goddess Athena, and the capital of the important Greek state of Attica, which became the cultural center of the ancient pre-Christian world. It grew up around the 512-foot-high Acropolis and was connected with its seaport Piraeus by long walls in the days of its glory. Tradition carries the fortunes of the city back beyond the time of the Trojan War in the thirteenth century B.C.

After a great victory over the Persians at Marathon in 490 B.C. and at Salamis in 480 B.C., the Athenians were able to establish a small empire, with Athens as its capital and a substantial fleet as its protector. In the age of Pericles, an enlightened leader, art, literature, drama, and architecture flourished. But before the death of this great leader the Peloponnesian War broke out (431 B.C.), eventuating in the surrender of Athens to Sparta in 404 B.C. Thereafter the city passed through many vicissitudes politically, but the culture and intellectual preeminence of its inhabitants gave them prestige despite varying political fortunes. Four great systems of philosophy flourished there—Platonic, Peripatetic, Epicurean, and Stoic—attracting students from all over the ancient world.

The city was captured by the Romans in 146 B.C. and was under Roman rule when Paul came as a visitor (Acts 17:15). The remark of the sacred historian concerning the inquisitive nature of the Athenians (17:21) is attested by the voice of antiquity. For instance, Demosthenes rebuked his countrymen for their love of constantly going about in the marketplace, asking one another, “What news?” The apostle Paul’s remark upon the “religious” character of the Athenians (17:22) is likewise confirmed by the ancient writers. Thus Pausanias and Philostratus, second-century A.D. writers, record altars dedicated to “the unknown god” as existing along the four-mile road from the port Piraeus to the city and elsewhere in the city itself (cf. v. 23). Pausanias, moreover, says the Athenians surpassed all other states in the attention that they paid to the worship of gods. Hence the city was crowded in every direction with temples, altars, and other sacred buildings. Among pagan temples still standing in the city are the Hephaestion, overlooking the marketplace (agora; which see), the temple of Zeus, and overtopping all, the architectural splendors of the Acropolis (which see)—the temple of the Wingless Victory, the Erechtheum, and the superb Parthenon. The American School of Classical Studies has excavated the agora and outlined the streets and buildings with which Pericles, Phidias, Plato, and Paul were familiar.

Mars' Hill or the Areopagus was at the W approach to the Acropolis. Here Paul preached the gospel of redemption through Christ to the devotees of three current philosophies—Platonism, Stoicism, and Epicureanism. The apostle argued against polytheism and offered salvation in the name of the one God manifested in Christ. Dionysius, an Areopagite, and a few others were converted (17:34), but Paul did not succeed in establishing a church at Athens, as at Corinth, Thessalonica, Philippi, Colossae, and Ephesus.

It was in Athens that Paul manifested evidence of his Hellenistic culture by familiarly quoting a verse taken from an invocation to Zeus, written by a minor Cilician poet, Aratus (312–245 B.C.). Doubtless while in the city the great missionary saw the music hall or Odeion of Pericles (cf. 1 Cor. 13:1) and the great Tower and Waterclock of Andronicus (cf. 5:16). Likewise he may have visited the keramikos, or pottery-making section of the city, which was famous (cf. Rom. 9:21).

Archaeological work in Athens has been extensive. The American School of Classical Studies excavated the agora from 1931 to 1940, from 1946 to 1960, and in the late 1960s. A few hundred feet E of the Greek agora lay the Roman market, built by Julius and Augustus Caesar. Here the Greek Archaeological Society worked intermittently from 1890 until 1931. Greek archaeologists also dug the whole Acropolis area down to bedrock in 1884–91, and the American School of Classical Studies excavated the N slope of the Acropolis in 1931–39. The Greek Archaeological Society worked at the Temple of Zeus in 1886–1901, and the German School conducted a new excavation there in 1922–23. H.F.V.

ATONEMENT (Heb. kaphar, to “cover, cancel”; Gk. katallagē, “exchange, reconciliation”).

Definition. In accordance with the force of these terms of Scripture the atonement is the covering over of sin, the reconciliation between God and man, accomplished by the Lord Jesus Christ. It is that special result of Christ's sacrificial sufferings and death by virtue of which all who exercise proper penitence and faith receive forgiveness of their sins and obtain peace.

Scripture Doctrine—Terms and Methods. In addition to the terms named above there are other words used in the Scriptures that express the idea of atonement or throw special light upon its meaning. Of these may be here cited (1) hilaskomai, translated (Heb. 2:17; Rom. 3:25; 1 John 2:2; 4:10) to “make propitiation”; (2) lutron, translated “ransom,” “redemption” (Matt. 20:28; Mark 10:45; Luke 2:38; Heb. 9:12). By such words and in such passages as these the doctrine is taught that Christ died to effect reconciliation between God and man, to propitiate the divine favor on behalf of sinful men, and to redeem or ransom men from the penalties and the dominion of their sins.

There are also forms of expression in which the idea of substitution, that Christ stands as our substitute in the economy of divine grace, appear with marked emphasis (Rom. 5:6–8; 1 Cor. 15:3; 2 Cor. 5:21; Gal. 3:13; Titus 2:14; 1 Pet. 2:24; 3:18).

The divinely appointed sacrifices of the OT dispensation are also full of significance, embracing as they did special offerings or sacrifices for sin. The uniform teaching of the NT is that these were typical of the sacrifice that Christ made of Himself for the sins of the world.

Summary. Although the Scriptures do not give a philosophical theory or explanation of the atonement, nor perhaps furnish us with data altogether sufficient for such a theory, they still give much information. (1) The Scriptures reveal the atonement to us as an accomplished and completed fact (Heb. 9:13–26). (2) They represent this fact as necessary to human salvation (Luke 24:41–47; Acts 4:12). (3) Although the whole earthly life of Christ contained an atoning and even sacrificial element, the virtue of the atonement is to be found chiefly in His sacrificial death, thus His death was indispensable (John 3:14–15). (4) In the atoning death of Christ was exhibited not only the holy wrath of God against sin but quite as much the love of God toward sinful men (Rom. 3:25–26; 5:6–8; John 3:16). (5) The gracious divine purpose realized in the atonement was wrought into the creation of man. Redemption was in the thought and plan of the Creator so that man, falling, fell into the arms of divine mercy. The Lamb of God was in the fore-knowledge of God slain from the foundation of the world (Rev. 13:8; 1 Pet. 1:19–20). (6) The atonement is not limited but universal in the extent of its gracious provisions (Heb. 2:9; 1 Tim. 2:5–6; 4:10; Rom. 5:18; 2 Cor. 5:14–15). (7) The universality of the atonement does not lead to universal salvation. The greater offer of salvation may be, and often is, rejected, and when the rejection is final the atonement avails nothing for the sinner (Mark 16:16; John 3:36; Heb. 10:26–29). (8) The atonement is the actual objective ground of forgiveness of sins and acceptance with God for all penitent believers (John 3:16; Acts 2:38; Eph. 1:7; Col. 1:14).

Theological Treatment. This branch of the subject calls for two classes of statements: (1) as to the history of the doctrine; (2) as to the theological views most generally held at the present time.

History. During the early centuries of the history of the church, and particularly prior to the Nicene Council (A.D. 325), Christian theology simply reflected, in the main, the teaching of the NT upon this subject. The attention of theologians was concentrated upon the Person of Christ. There was but little speculation as to the method of the atonement or the exact ground of its necessity. That the sacrifice of Christ was vicarious, that He suffered in the stead of men, was, however, an idea constantly held; that these sufferings were necessary to meet the requirement of divine righteousness was sometimes declared with emphasis. A fanciful notion, it is true, began to appear at that early period, a notion that afterward obtained some measure of prominence. Christ was regarded as a ransom paid to the devil to redeem men who by their sin had come under the dominion of the devil. This was taught by Origen (A.D. 230) and more emphatically by Gregory of Nyssa (A.D. 370). This view has also, but incorrectly, been attributed to Irenaeus (A.D. 180). Captious critics and infidels have often cited this incident in the history of theology in order to bring all theology into ridicule and contempt. But it is to be remembered that this phase of doctrine was always met with the strongest denial and opposition, as by Athanasius (A.D. 370) and Gregory of Nazianzum (A.D. 390). It was never the accepted doctrine of the Christian church.

Anselm. Prominent in the history of the doctrine of the atonement must stand the name of Anselm, A.D. 1100. In his book Cur Deus Homo he brings out most clearly and emphatically the idea of the atonement as satisfaction to divine majesty. He viewed the necessity of atonement as entirely in the justice of God. He made this term “satisfaction,” it has been said, “a watchword for all future time.” It is certain that what is known as the satisfaction theory of the atonement will ever stand associated with his name, although his satisfaction theory is not quite the same as that of the Reformers.

Abelard. Chief among the opponents of Anselm was Abelard, A.D. 1141. He referred the atonement wholly to the love of God and taught that there could be nothing in the divine essence that required satisfaction for sin. The death of Christ upon the cross was solely an exhibition of divine love. The effect is moral only. It is intended to subdue the hearts of sinful men, to lead them to repentance and devotion to Christ. Thus Abelard stands as the father of what is known as the moral influence theory.

Grotius. An epoch in the history of the doctrine was reached when Grotius, A.D. 1617, wrote his Defensio fidei Cathol. de Satisfactione. He wrote in refutation of the teaching of Socinus, who denied the vicarious character of Christ's death and the need of any reconciliation of God with man. Grotius held fast to the vicariousness of Christ's sufferings and used the term satisfaction. But in his view it was a satisfaction to the requirements of moral government and not to the justice that inheres in God Himself. The necessity of the atonement, accordingly, he found not in the nature of God but in the nature of the divine government. The purpose of the atonement is to make it possible to exercise mercy toward fallen and sinful men, and at the same time maintain the dignity of the law, the honor of the Lawgiver, and protect the moral interests of the universe. Grotius thus founded what is known as the rectoral or governmental theory.

The doctrines of Anselm, Abelard, and Grotius represent the principal tendencies of thought and discussion throughout the whole history of the doctrine. Under the treatment of various theologians these doctrines received modification more or less important, but in their leading principles these three forms of teaching have been the most prominent in the theology of the Christian church.

Modern Views. Aside from the opinion of rationalists and semirationalists, who wholly or in part reject the authority of Scripture and accordingly attach but slight if any importance to Scripture teaching concerning the atonement, the three theories prominent in the past are still the prominent theories of the present. With various shadings and modifications and attempts at interblending, they embody in the main the thinking of modern times upon this subject.

It should be said, however, that the moral influence theory has never obtained formal or general acceptance in any evangelical communion. It has justly been regarded as falling far short of adequately representing the teaching of Scripture. It contains some measure of truth but leaves out the truth most essential: that of real, objective atonement. It reduces the atonement to an object lesson.

The thought of the Christian church of today is divided in its adherence between the satisfaction and governmental theories, these theories appearing in various forms. But no one of these views is free from grave logical objections if held too rigidly and exclusively. Thus the satisfaction theory, if held in the sense that Christ actually bore the punishment for the sins of men, or that He literally, according to the figure of Anselm, paid the debt of human transgressors after the manner of a commercial transaction, must lead logically to one or the other of two extremes—either that of a limited atonement or that of universalism. It tends also to antinomianism, to say nothing of other objections often raised. The governmental theory, held alone and too boldly, loses sight of the fact that the divine government must be a reflection of the divine nature and that what is required by that government must be required also by some quality inherent in God. Further, this theory, if not guarded strongly, and by bringing in, in some form, the idea of satisfaction to divine justice, reduces the death of Christ to a great moral spectacle. It becomes, in fact, another moral influence theory.

A strong tendency, accordingly, of the present day is to seek some way of mediating between or of uniting the elements of truth found in these various theories. It is certain that the Scriptures do represent the death of Christ as a most affecting manifestation of the love of God. It is certain also that His death is represented as sacrificial and required by the justice of God. And it is equally true that it is often viewed in its relations to divine law and the moral economy that God has established. And if the earnest attempts of devout thinkers do not succeed wholly in penetrating the mystery of the cross and in bringing the exact meaning of Christ's death within the compass of their definitions, still it is held as beyond all question that the atonement wrought by Christ is a fundamental fact in human salvation, a real "covering" for sin, the divinely appointed measure for "reconciliation" between God and man.

Extent of Atonement. The extent of atonement is much less discussed than formerly. Many Calvinists have departed from the view they once strenuously held, that the atonement was for the elect only.

A'TROPH-SHO'PHAN (a'trōth-shō'fan). A town in Gad, listed between Aroer and Jazer (Num. 32:35).

AT'TAI (a'tā-i).

1. The son of a daughter of Sheshan, of the tribe of Judah, by his Egyptian servant, Jarha. He was the father of Nathan (1 Chron. 2:35–36).

2. One of David's mighty men, of the tribe of Gad, who joined David at Ziklag, where he had fled from Saul (1 Chron. 12:11).

3. The second of the four sons of King Rehoboam, by his second wife, Maacah, the daughter of Absalom (2 Chron. 11:20).

ATTALI'A (at-a-lî'a). A seaport on the coast of Pamphylia, at the mouth of the river Cattarrhactes. The town was named after its founder, Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamos, 159–138 B.C. Paul and Barnabas stopped there on the way to Antioch (Acts 14:25). Its name in the twelfth century appears to have been Satalia; it still exists, under the name of Adalia.

ATTITUDE. See Prayer; Salutation.

AUGUSTUS (aw-gus'tus). The imperial title assumed by Octavius, successor of Julius Caesar. He was born 63 B.C. and was principally educated by his great-uncle, Julius Caesar, who made him his heir. After the death of Caesar, he acquired such influence that Antony and Lepidus took him into their triumvirate. Afterward he shared the empire with Antony and attained supreme power after the battle of Actium, 31 B.C., being saluted emperor by the Senate, who conferred on him the title Augustus in 27 B.C. He forgave Herod, who had espoused the cause of Antony, and even increased his power. After the death of Herod, 4 B.C., his dominions were divided among his sons by Augustus, almost in exact accordance with his will. Augustus was emperor at the birth and during half the lifetime of our Lord, and his name occurs (Luke 2:1) in the NT as the emperor who ordered the enrollment in consequence of which Joseph and Mary went to Bethlehem, the place where the Messiah was to be born.

Augustus brought order and prosperity to the Roman Empire after the long period of civil war, and for his successes he was worshiped in many places. With him began the emperor cult, and Herod the Great built temples to the divine Augustus at Caesarea and Samaria; both of these have been excavated. Augustus was worshiped in Ephesus too, and a great lintel with an inscription to the divine Augustus has been excavated there and reerected over the gate to the Greek agora. Paul would have seen it and passed under it often as he ministered in the city for most of three years on his third missionary journey. See also Acts 25:21, 25; 27:1. H.F.V.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J. Buchan, Augustus (1937); M. Grant, The Twelve Caesars (1975).

AUNT (Heb. dôdâ, “loving”). A father’s sister (Ex. 6:20); also an uncle’s wife (Lev. 18:14; 20:20).

AUTHORITY. The power or right to perform certain acts without impediment. It is based upon some form of law, whether divine, civil, or moral. Supreme authority is God’s alone (Rom. 13:1), hence all human authority is derived.

There is no specific Heb. word for authority, but râbôt (Prov. 29:2) and tôqep (Esther 9:29) are rendered in this way by some versions. The Gk. word exousia furnishes the NT basis of authority, along with such words as dunamis (“power”), epitage (“command”), dunastes (Acts 8:27), and authenteo (1 Tim. 2:12).

God’s authority is unconditional and absolute (Ps. 29:10; Isa. 40), making Him supreme over nature and human history alike. From this intrinsic authority comes that of governments (Rom. 13:1–7), employers (Eph. 6:5–9), parents (Eph. 6:1–4), church elders (Heb. 13:7, 17), and others in positions of power. Similarly the angels function under divine authority (Luke 1:19–20), and evil spirits are also subject to God’s power (Eph. 6:11–12).

Because Jesus was God, His authority was not merely derived from the Father but was also intrinsic. His power knew no limitations (Matt. 28:18) and was the ground of His commissions to His disciples (Mark 6:7; John 20:22). A preeminent source of derived authority is the Scriptures, inspired by God Himself (2 Tim. 3:16; 2 Pet. 1:20–21) and therefore by His supreme authority. For this reason believers are required to obey them.

The general purpose of authority is to promote order in human society, and its highest use is an altruistic one, as Christ stated (Luke 22:26–27). Christians are given the authority to become children of God (John 1:12) and have the right to pursue certain forms of behavior (1 Cor. 6:12). Ultimately all derived authority will revert to God, who bestowed it (1 Cor. 15:24–28). R.K.H.

A’VA. See Avva; Ivvah.

AVE MARIA (a’vâ ma-rē’a; “Hail Mary”).

1. The words of the angel Gabriel to the virgin Mary, when announcing the incarnation (Luke 1:28), as rendered by the Vulg.

2. The familiar prayer, or form of devotion, in the Roman Catholic church, called also the “Angelical Salutation.” It consists of three parts: (1) the salutation of Gabriel, Ave (Maria) gratia plena Dominus tecum; benedicta tu in mulieribus; (2) the words of Elizabeth to Mary, et benedictus fructus ventris tui; (3) an addition made by the church, Sancta Maria, Mater Dei, ora pro nobis peccatoribus nunc et in hora mortis nostrae. The whole Ave Maria, as it now stands, is ordered in the breviary of Pius V (1568) to be used daily before each canonical hour and after compline; i.e., the last of the seven canonical hours (Cath. Dict., s. v.).

A’VEN (a’ven; “nothingness, vanity,” an “idol”).

1. The popular name of Heliopolis, in Lower Egypt, probably selected intentionally in the sense of an idol city (Ezek. 30:17, marg.) because On-Heliopolis was from time immemorial one of the principal seats of the Egyptian worship of the sun and possessed a celebrated temple of the sun and a numerous and learned priesthood.

2. The “high places of Aven” are the buildings connected with the image worship at Bethel, which were to be utterly ruined (Hos. 10:8).

3. Mentioned as “the valley of Aven” (Amos 1:5) and thought by some to be the same as the plain of Baalbek (which see), an early center of Baal worship. Others, however, connect the place with Awaniyek near Jerud on the road to Palmyra.

AVENGE, AVENGER. These words are often used in the sense of to avenge a wrong, or the one who brings punishment (see Blood, Avenger of). This is the meaning in Num. 35:19–27; 2 Sam. 14:11; Ps. 79:10; Jer. 15:15. The civil magistrate is called by Paul “a minister of God, an avenger who brings wrath upon the one who practices evil” (Rom. 13:4); while in 2 Cor. 7:11 the apostle recognizes as a prominent virtue of the church in Corinth its zeal in avenging wrong, i.e., disciplinary zeal against the incestuous person. He writes the church (2 Cor. 10:6) that he is “ready to punish all disobedience, when your obedience is complete.” How he intends to execute this vengeance he does not tell; he might do it by excommunication, by giving the intruders over to the power of Satan (1 Cor. 5:5), or by the exercise of his miraculous apostolic power. Revenge, or vengeance, is attributed to God in two remarkable passages (Deut. 32:41–43; Nah. 1:2), in which Jehovah is represented as bringing certain punishment upon the wicked. The ordinary understanding of revenge is quite different from the above, and implies a vindictive feeling against the offender. It differs from resentment, which rises up in the mind immediately upon being injured; for revenge may wait years after the offense is committed. In this vindictive sense we have scriptural instances (Jer. 20:10; Ezek. 25:15). This sort of revenge is forbidden by the command to love our enemies and to return good for evil.

AVENGER OF BLOOD. See Blood, Avenger of.

A’VIM. See Avvim.

A’VITH (a’vith). A city of the Edomites, capital of King Hadad before there were kings in Israel (Gen. 36:35; 1 Chron. 1:46).

AV’VA (av’va, 2 Kings 17:24; “Ava,” KJV), or Iv’vah (Iv’vah, 2 Kings 18:34; 19:13; “Ivah,” KJV). Identified with Tell Kafr ‘Ayah on the Orontes SW of Homs.

AV’VIM (av’vim), or Av’vites.

1. A people among the early inhabitants of Palestine, whom we meet in the SW corner of the seacoast where they may have made their way northward from the desert. The only notice of them that has come down to us is contained in a remarkable fragment of primeval history preserved in Deut. 2:23. Here we see them dwelling in the villages in the S part of the Shefelah, or great western lowland, “as far as Gaza.” In these rich possessions they were attacked by the invading Philistines, “the Capthorim which came forth from Capthor,” and who “destroyed them and lived in their place” and then appear to have pushed them farther N. Possibly a trace of their existence is to be found in the town “Avvim” that occurs among the cities of Benjamin (Josh. 18:23). It is a curious fact that both the LXX and Jerome identified the Avvim with the Hivites, and also that the town of ha-Avvim was in the actual district of the Hivites (9:7, 17; cf. 18:22–27).

2. The people of Avva, among the colonists who were sent by the king of Assyria to reinhabit the depopulated cities of Israel (2 Kings 17:31). They were idolaters, worshiping gods called Nibhaz and Tartak. See Avva.

AVVITES. See Avvim.

AWL (Heb. marṣēac, from a verb signifying “to bore”). A boring instrument, probably of the simplest kind, and similar to those in familiar use at the present time. It occurs twice in the Scriptures (Ex. 21:6; Deut. 15:17).

AXE, AX. The rendering of several original words:

1. Heb. garzen (“cut”). This appears to have consisted of a head of iron (Isa. 10:34), fastened with thongs or otherwise, upon a handle of wood, and so liable to slip off (Deut. 19:5; 2 Kings 6:5). It was used for felling trees (Deut. 20:19) and for shaping timber, perhaps like the modern adze.

2. Heb. ḥereb, usually rendered “sword,” is used of other cutting instruments; once rendered “axes” (Ezek. 26:9); probably a pickaxe as it says “with his axes he will break down your towers.”

3. Heb. kashshîl occurs only in Ps. 74:6 and appears to have been a later word denoting a “large axe” (rendered “hammer,” NASB, see marg.).

4. Heb. magzērâ, “iron cutting tools” (K. & D., Com., on 2 Sam. 12:31).

5. Heb. maʿāṣād, “hewing” instrument, rendered “cutting tool” (Isa. 44:12; Jer. 10:3). Some axes were shaped like chisels fastened to a handle. This may have been the instrument named in Jeremiah; but as Isaiah (44:12) refers to the work of a blacksmith, this instrument was probably a chisel for cutting iron on the anvil.

6. Heb. qardôm is the most common name for axe or hatchet. This is the tool referred to in Judg. 9:48; 1 Sam. 13:20–21; Ps. 74:5; Jer. 46:22, and was used extensively for felling trees.

7. The Gk. word for axe is axine (Matt. 3:10; Luke 3:9).

Figurative. The axe is used in Scripture as a symbol of divine judgment. John the Baptist, referring probably to the excision of the Jewish people, says, “And the axe is already laid at the root of the trees” (Matt. 3:10). This denotes that it had already been stuck into the tree prior to felling it. The axe was also used as a symbol of human instrument, e.g., “Is the axe to boast itself over the one who chops with it?” (Isa. 10:15), i.e., Shall the king of Assyria boast himself against God?

AXE HEAD (Heb. barzel). In 2 Kings 6:5 the term is literally “iron,” but as an axe is certainly intended, the passage shows that the axe heads among the Hebrews were of iron. Those found in Egypt are of bronze, such as was anciently used, but they have made them also of iron, the latter having been consumed through corrosion. The Iron Age began in 1200 B.C.

AXLE. The term occurs only in 1 Kings 7:32–33, as the translation of yād, “hand,” the whole phrase being the “hands of the wheels.”

A'YIN (a'yin; in the KJV A'in, Heb. ayin, an “eye”, a “spring”).

1. The sixteenth letter of the Heb. alphabet (y). It heads the sixteenth section of Ps. 119, in which passage (vv. 121–28) each verse begins with this letter in the original.

2. A place near Riblah in northern Palestine (Num. 34:11).

3. A place near Rimmon (Josh. 15:32).

AYYAH (ay'yah). A city with its suburbs that lay within the territory of the tribe of Ephraim (1 Chron. 7:28). E.H.M.

A'ZAL. See A'zel.

AZALI'AH (az-a-lī'a; “reserved by Jehovah”). The son of Meshullam and father of Shaphan the scribe. The latter was sent with others by Josiah to repair the Temple (2 Kings 22:3; 2 Chron. 34:8), about 624 B.C.

AZANI'AH (az-a-nī'a; “whom Jehovah hears”). The father of Jeshua, who was one of the Levites that subscribed the sacred covenant after the Exile (Neh. 10:9), 445 B.C.

AZA'REL (a-za'rel; “God has helped”; KJV Azareel).

1. One of the Korhites who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:6), before 1000 B.C.

2. The head of the eleventh division of the musicians of the Temple (1 Chron. 25:18), about 1000 B.C. Called Uzziel in v. 4.

3. The son of Jeroham, and prince of the tribe of Dan when David numbered the people (1 Chron. 27:22).

4. An Israelite, descendant of Bani, who renounced his Gentile wife after the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:41).

5. The son of Ahzai and father of Amashsai, who was one of the chiefs of 128 mighty men who served at the Temple under the supervision of Zabdiel on the restoration from Babylon (Neh. 11:13–14). He is probably the same as one of the first company of priests who were appointed with Ezra to make the circuit of the newly completed walls with trumpets in their hands (Neh. 12:36).

AZARI'AH (az-a-rī'a; “helped by Jehovah”). A common name in Heb., and especially in the families of the priests of the line of Eleazar, whose name has precisely the same meaning as Azariah. It is nearly identical and is often confused with Ezra, as well as with Zeraiah and Seraiah.

1. A son or descendant of Zadok, the high priest in the time of David, and one of Solomon's princes (1 Kings 4:2), 960 B.C. He is probably the same as no. 6 below.

2. A son of Nathan, and captain of King Solomon's guards or “deputies” (1 Kings 4:5).

3. Son and successor of Amaziah, king of Judah (2 Kings 14:21; 15:1–7; 1 Chron. 3:12), more frequently called Uzziah (which see).

4. Son of Ethan and great-grandson of Judah (1 Chron. 2:8).

5. The son of Jehu and father of Helez, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:38–39).

6. A high priest, son of Ahimaaz and grandson of Zadok (1 Chron. 6:9), whom he seems to have immediately succeeded (1 Kings 4:2). He is probably the same as no. 1 above.

7. The son of Johanan and father of Amariah, a high priest (1 Chron. 6:10–11). He was probably high priest in the reigns of Abijah and Asa, as his son Amariah was in the days of Jehoshaphat.

8. The son of Hilkiah and father of Seraiah. The last high priest before the captivity (1 Chron. 6:13–14; 9:11; Ezra 7:1).

9. A Levite, son of Zephaniah and father of Joel (1 Chron. 6:36). In v. 24 he is called Uziah. It appears from 2 Chron. 29:12 that his son Joel lived under Hezekiah and was engaged in the cleansing of the Temple.

10. The prophet who met King Asa on his return from a victory over Zerah the Ethiopian (2 Chron. 15:1, where he is called the son of Obed). He exhorted Asa to put away idolatry and restore the altar of God before the porch of the Temple. A national reformation followed, participated in by representatives out of all Israel.

11. Two sons of King Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 21:2), 875 B.C. M'Clintock and Strong (s. v.) conjecture that there is a repetition of name and that there was but one son of that name. The NIV reads the second of these as Azariahu.

12. A clerical error (2 Chron. 22:6, see marg.), for Ahaziah (which see), king of Judah.

13. A son of Jeroham, one of the “captains” who assisted Jehoiada in restoring the worship of the Temple, opposing Athaliah and placing Joash on the throne (2 Chron. 23:1).

14. The son of Obed, another of the “captains” who assisted in the same enterprise (2 Chron. 23:1).

15. High priest in the reign of Uziah. When the king, elated by his success, “entered the temple of the Lord to burn incense,” Azariah went in after him, accompanied by eighty of his brethren, and withstood him (2 Chron. 26:16–20).

16. Son of Johanan, and one of the heads of the tribe of Ephraim. One of those who protested against enslaving their captive brethren taken in the invasion of Judah by Pekah (2 Chron. 28:12–13).

17. A Merarite, son of Jehallelel, who was one of those who cleansed the Temple in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:12).

18. A high priest in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 31:10, 13), 719 B.C. He appears to have cooperated zealously with the king in that thorough purification of the Temple and restoration of the Temple services that were such conspicuous features of his reign.

19. The father of Amariah, and an ancestor of Ezra (Ezra 7:3).

20. Son of Maaseiah, who repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:23–24). He was one of the Levites who assisted Ezra in explaining the law (8:7), sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (10:2), and assisted at the dedication of the city wall (12:33).

21. One of the nobles who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 7:7). Called Seraiah in Ezra 2:2.

22. One of the “arrogant men” who rebuked Jeremiah for advising the people that remained in Palestine after their brethren had been taken to Babylon not to go down into Egypt, and who took the prophet himself and Baruch with them to that country (Jer. 43:2–7).

23. The Heb. name of Abed-nego (which see), one of Daniel’s three friends who were cast into the fiery furnace (Dan. 1:7).

A'ZAZ (a'zaz; “strong”). A Reubenite, the son of Shema and father of Bela (1 Chron. 5:8).

AZA'ZEL (azā'zel; Heb. ʿāzāzēl, likely for ʿāzāl-zēl, i.e., “an entire removal”; Arab. ʿazala, “remove”). The Heb. term is translated (Lev. 16:8, 10, 26) “scapegoat.” It is a word of doubtful interpretation and has been variously understood.

1. By some it is thought to be the name of the goat sent into the desert. The objection to this is that in vv. 10, 26 the Azazel clearly seems to be that for or to which the goat is let loose.

2. Others have taken Azazel for the name of the place to which the goat was sent. Some of the Jewish writers consider that it denotes the height from which the goat was thrown; whereas others regard the word as meaning “desert places.”

3. Many believe Azazel to be a personal being, either a spirit, a demon, or Satan himself. The Cabalists teach that in order to satisfy this evil being and to save Israel from his snares, God sends him the goat burdened with all the “iniquities and transgressions” of His people once a year. But we think it entirely improbable that Moses under divine guidance would cause Israel to recognize a demon whose claims on the people were to be met by the bribe of a sin-laden goat.

4. The most probable rendering of Azazel is “complete sending away,” i.e., solitude. The rendering then of the passage would be “the one for Jehovah, and the other for an utter removal.” See Atonement, Day of; Scapegoat.

AZAZI'AH (a-za-zī'a; “strengthened by Jehovah”).

1. One of the Levites who were appointed to play the lyre in the service of the Tabernacle at the time when the Ark was brought up from Obed-edom (1 Chron. 15:21), about 991 B.C.

2. The father of Hoshea, who was prince of the tribe of Ephraim when David numbered the people (1 Chron. 27:20), after 1000 B.C.

3. One of those who had charge of the Temple offerings in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 31:13), 726 B.C.

AZ'BUK (az'būk). The father of Nehemiah, who was ruler of half of the district of Beth-zur, and who repaired part of the wall after the return from Babylon (Neh. 3:16), before 445 B.C.

AZE'KAH (a-zē'ka; “tilled”). A town in the plain of Judah (Josh. 15:35; 1 Sam. 17:1), with suburban villages (Neh. 11:30), and a place of considerable strength (Jer. 34:7). The confederated Amorite kings were defeated here by Joshua, and their army destroyed by an extraordinary shower of hailstones (Josh. 10:10–11). Joshua's pursuit of the Canaanites after the battle of Beth-horon extended to Azekah; between it and Socoh the Philistines encamped before the battle between David and Goliath (1 Sam. 17:1). It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:9), was still standing at the time of the invasion of the kings of Babylon (Jer. 34:7), and was one of the places reoccupied by the Jews on their return from captivity (Neh. 11:30).

A'ZEL (a'zel).

1. The son of Eleasah, of the descendants of King Saul (1 Chron. 8:37–38; 9:43).

2. A place, evidently in the neighborhood of Jerusalem and probably E of the Mount of Olives (Zech. 14:5). Its site has not been identified, but the LXX rendering “Iasol” suggests Wadi Yasūl, a tributary of the Kidron.

A'ZEM. See Ezem.

AZ'GAD (az'gad; “strong in fortune”). An Israelite whose descendants, to the number of 1,222 (2,322 according to Neh. 7:17), returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:12). A second detachment of 110, with Johanan at their head, accompanied Ezra (Ezra 8:12). Probably the Azgad of Neh. 10:15 is the same person, some of whose descendants joined in the covenant with Nehemiah.

A'ZIEL (a'zī-el). A shortened form (1 Chron. 15:20) for Jaaziel (which see), in v. 18.

AZI'ZA (a-zī'za; "strong"). An Israelite, descendant of Zattu, who, after his return from Babylon, divorced the Gentile wife he had married (Ezra 10:27), 456 B.C.

AZMA'VETH (āz-mā'vēth; "strong as death").

1. A Barhumite (or Baharumite), one of David's thirty warriors (2 Sam. 23:31; 1 Chron. 11:33), and father of two of his famous slingers (12:3), about 1000 B.C.

2. The second of the three sons of Jehoaddah (1 Chron. 8:36), or Jarah (9:42), a descendant of Jonathan, after 1030 B.C.

3. Son of Adiel, and in charge of the storehouses of David (1 Chron. 27:25), about 1000 B.C.

4. A village of Judah or Benjamin (Neh. 12:29), called (7:28) Beth-azmaveth. It was occupied by Jews who returned with Ezra from Babylon. The notices of it seem to point to some locality in the northern environs of Jerusalem.

AZ'MON (az'mon; "bonelike"). A place on the southern border of Palestine, between Hazaraddar and the "brook of Egypt" (Num. 34:4–5; Josh. 15:4).

AZ'NOTH-TABOR (az'noth-tā'bor; "tops of Tabor"). A town in the W of Naphtali, between the Jordan and Hukkok (Josh. 19:34). Perhaps Amm Jebeil near Mt. Tabor.

A'ZOR (a'zor). The son of Eliakim and father of Zadok, in the paternal ancestry of Christ (Matt. 1:13).

AZO'TUS (a-zō'tus). The Grecized form (Acts 8:40) of Ashdod (which see).

AZ'RIEL (az'ri-el; "help of God").

1. A mighty man of valor, and one of the heads of the half tribe of Manasseh beyond the Jordan who were taken into captivity by the king of Assyria as a punishment for their national idolatry (1 Chron. 5:24), about 740 B.C.

2. The father of Jeremoth, who was ruler of the tribe of Naphtali under David (1 Chron. 27:19), about 1000 B.C.

3. The father of Seraiah, who with others was appointed by King Jehoiakim to apprehend Baruch the scribe and Jeremiah for sending him a threatening prophecy (Jer. 36:26), 606 B.C.

AZ'RIKAM (az'ri-kam; "help" against "the enemy," or "my help arises").

1. The last named of the three sons of Neariah, a descendant of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:23), about 404 B.C. He is perhaps the same as Azor (which see).

2. The first of the six sons of Azel, of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:38; 9:44).

3. A Levite, son of Hashabiah and father of Hasshub (1 Chron. 9:14; Neh. 11:15), before 536 B.C.

4. The governor of the king's house in the time of Ahaz, slain by Zichri, a mighty man of Ephraim (2 Chron. 28:7), 741 B.C.

AZU'BAH (a-zū'ba; "forsaken").

1. The daughter of Shilhi and mother of King Jehoshaphat (1 Kings 22:42; 2 Chron. 20:31), before 875 B.C.

2. The wife of Caleb, the son of Hezron (1 Chron. 2:18–19), about 1471 B.C. See Jerioth.

A'ZUR. See Azzur.

AZ'ZAH (az'zah; the “strong”). The more correct English form (Deut. 2:23; 1 Kings 4:24; Jer. 25:20) of Gaza (which see). The latter is the form given in the NASB and NIV.

AZ'ZAN (az'zan). The father of Paltiel, leader of the tribe of Issachar, and commissioner from that tribe in the dividing of Canaan (Num. 34:26), c. 1370 B.C.

AZ'ZUR (az'zur; “helper”; sometimes Azur, KJV).

1. One of the chief Israelites who signed the covenant with Nehemiah on the return from Babylon (Neh. 10:17), 445 B.C.

2. The father of Hananiah of Gibeon, the latter of whom was the prophet who falsely encouraged King Zedekiah against the Babylonians (Jer. 28:1), about 596 B.C.

3. The father of Jaazaniah, who was one of the men whom the prophet Ezekiel saw in a vision devising false schemes of safety for Jerusalem (Ezek. 11:1), 594 B.C.

B

BA´AL (bā´al; Heb. ba'al, “lord, possessor”).

1. A common name for god among the Phoenicians; also the name of their chief male god. See Gods, False.

2. The word is used of the master of a house (Ex. 22:7; Judg. 19:22), of a landowner (Job 31:39), of an owner of cattle (Ex. 21:28; Isa. 1:3), and so on. The word is often used as a prefix to names of towns and men, e.g., Baal-gad, Baal-hanan.

3. A Reubenite, son of Reaiah. His son Beerah was among the captives carried away by Tiglath-pileser (which see; 1 Chron. 5:5–6), before 740 B.C.

4. The fourth named of the sons of Jeiel, the founder of Gibeon, by his wife Maacah (1 Chron. 8:29–30; 9:35–36).

5. The name of a place (1 Chron. 4:33), elsewhere called Baalath-beer (which see).

BA´ALAH (bā´a-lā; “mistress”).

1. A city on the northern border of the tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:10), one of the religious sanctuaries of the ancient Gibeonites, as it appears (15:9) that Baalah and Kiriath-jearim were applicable to the same place. See 1 Chron. 13:6.

2. A city on the S of Judah (Josh. 15:29). Called Balah (19:3); also Bilhah (1 Chron. 4:29).

3. A mountain on the NW boundary of Judah, between Shikkeron and Jabneel (Josh. 15:11), usually regarded as the same as Mt. Jearim.

BA´ALATH (bā´a-lath; “mistress”). A town of the tribe of Dan (Josh. 19:44); supposed to be the place fortified by Solomon (1 Kings 9:18; 2 Chron. 8:6).

BA´ALATH-BE´ER (bā´a-lath be´er; “mistress of the well”). A city of Simeon (Josh. 19:8). Probably the same as Baal (1 Chron. 4:33). Doubtless identical with Ramah of the Negev (Josh. 19:8). It is also the same as the Bealoth (which see) of Judah (15:24).

BA´ALBEK (bā´al-bek; Gk. Heliopolis, “city of the sun,” but distinct from three other sites whose names also have reference to the sun: Beth-shemesh, no. 4; the City of Destruction [Ir-hahares, KJV]; and On [all which see]). A popular ancient center of the worship of Baal in the region between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon or “Hollow-Syria.” Later called Heliopolis when the Greeks associated Helios with Baal. It is fifty-three miles E of Beirut and is to be distinguished from a city in Egypt, On (which see), that is also sometimes called Heliopolis. The site may be identical with Baal-gad “in the valley of Lebanon at the foot of Mount Hermon” (Josh. 11:17). Greek architectural skill and Rome’s resources were lavished on Baalbek and its immense and beautiful temples. The temple complex was probably begun as early as the reign of Augustus (27 B.C.-A.D. 14), and construction continued there for a couple of centuries.

A worshiper entered the acropolis area through a tower-flanked propylaea 165 feet wide, passed through a hexagonal court and a great altar court, and finally ascended a magnificent stairway to the temple of Jupiter. Six of its Corinthian columns still stand to a height of 65 feet, tallest in the Greco-Roman world. Adjacent to the temple of Jupiter on the south and at a lower level is the temple of Bacchus with a peristyle of 46 columns 57 feet high. Beautifully preserved, it is the best surviving example of a Roman temple interior. East of the acropolis was a round temple, probably erected to Venus, constructed about A.D. 250. A German archaeological team began serious work at the site in 1900, and French and Lebanese efforts continued there intermittently until hostilities forced termination in 1975. The Baalbek complex is the most magnificent example of pagan worship and architecture in the Middle East. M.F.U.; H.F.V.

BA'AL-BE'RITH (bā'al-be-rith'). A god worshiped in Shechem. See Gods, False.

BA'ALE-JU'DAH (bā'a-le jū'da; "lords of Judah"). A city of Judah from which David brought the Ark into Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6:2). Probably the same as Baalah, no. 1 (which see); so also NIV.

BA'AL-GAD (bā'al gad; "lord of fortune"). A Canaanite city (Josh. 11:17; 12:7) at the foot of Mt. Hermon, hence called Baal-hermon (Judg. 3:3; 1 Chron. 5:23). Location uncertain.

BA'AL-HA'MON (bā'al ha'mon; "lord of the multitude"). The place where Solomon had a vineyard (Song of Sol. 8:11), which he let out to "caretakers." Location is unknown.

BA'AL-HA'NAN (bā'al ha'nan; "lord of grace").

1. An early king of Edom, son of Achbor, successor of Shaul, and succeeded by Hadar (Gen. 36:38–39; 1 Chron. 1:49–50).

2. A Gederite, David's overseer of "the olive and sycamore trees in the Shephelah" (1 Chron. 27:28), after 1000 B.C.

BA'AL-HA'ZOR (bā'al-ha'zor; "having a village"). A place near Ephraim where Absalom had a sheep farm and where he murdered Amnon (2 Sam. 13:23). Probably the same as Hazor (Neh. 11:33), now Tell 'Asar.

BA'AL-HERMON (bā'al her'mon; "lord of Hermon").

1. A city of Ephraim near Mt. Hermon (1 Chron. 5:23). Probably identical with Baal-gad (Josh. 11:17).

2. A mountain E of Lebanon (Judg. 3:3), from which the Israelites were unable to expel the Hivites. "Baal-hermon is only another name for Baal-gad, the present Banjas, under the Hermon (see Josh. 13:5)" (K. & D., Com.).

Com. Commentary

BA´ALI (bā´a-lî; “my master”). “You will call Me Ishi / And will no longer call Me Baali” (Hos. 2:16). The meaning is that Israel will enter into right relation with God, in which she will look toward Him as her husband (Ishi) and not merely as Baal, “owner, master.” Calling or naming is a designation of the nature or the true relation of a person or thing. Israel calls God her husband when she stands in the right relation to Him, when she acknowledges, reveres, and loves Him, as He has revealed Himself, i.e., as the only true God. On the other hand, she calls Him Baal when she places the true God on the level of the Baals, either by worshiping other gods along with Jehovah or by obliterating the essential distinction between Jehovah and the Baals.

BA´ALIM (bā´al-im). The plural of Baal. See Gods, False.

BA´ALIS (bā´a-lis; “in exultation”). King of the Ammonites about the time of the Babylonian captivity, whom Johanan reported to Gedaliah, the viceroy, as having sent Ishmael to slay him (Jer. 40:13–14), 588 B.C.

BA´AL-ME´ON (bā´al-me-on´; “lord of the dwelling”). One of the towns rebuilt by the Reubenites and their names changed (Num. 32:38). Baal-meon (“Beon,” v. 3; “Beth-meon,” Jer. 48:23; and “Beth-baal-meon,” Josh. 13:17) is to be located at Ma´in nine miles E of the Dead Sea.

BA´AL-PE´OR (bā´al-pe´or). A god of the Moabites. See Gods, False.

BA´AL-PERA´ZIM (bā´al-per-a´zim; “possessor of breaches”). Called Mt. Perazim (Isa. 28:21), in central Palestine. Location unknown. Here David fought the Philistines (2 Sam. 5:20; 1 Chron. 14:11). The place and the circumstances appear to be again alluded to in Isa. 28:21, where it is called Mt. Perazim.

BA´AL-SHAL´ISHA (bā´al-shal´i-sha; “lord of Shalisha”). A place of Ephraim, not far W of Gilgal (2 Kings 4:38, 42). From this place a man brought provisions for Elisha.

BA´AL-TA´MAR (bā´al-tā´mar; “lord of the palm trees”). One of the groves of Baal. Probably the palm tree of Deborah (Judg. 4:5), in the tribe of Benjamin near Gibeah of Saul (20:33). The notices seem to correspond to the present ruined site Erhah, about three miles NE of Jerusalem.

BA´AL-ZEBUB´ (bā´al-ze-bub´). The god of the Philistines at Ekron. See Gods, False.

BA´AL-ZE´PHON (bā´al-ze´fon; “Baal of winter, or north”). A place belonging to Egypt on the border of the Red Sea (Ex. 14:2; Num. 33:7), mentioned in connection with Pi-hahiroth, on the journey of the Israelites. It must have been a well-known place, inasmuch as it is always mentioned to indicate the location of Pi-hahiroth, but its present location is unknown.

BA´ANA (bā´a-na).

1. The son of Ahilud, one of Solomon’s twelve deputies, whose district comprised Taanach, Megiddo, and all Beth-shean, with the adjacent region (1 Kings 4:12), 960 B.C.

2. The son of Hushai and also a deputy of King Solomon. His district was in Asher and Bealoth (1 Kings 4:16), 960 B.C.

3. The father of Zadok, which latter person assisted in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. 3:4), 445 B.C.

BA´ANAH (bā´a-na). Another form of Baana (which see).

1. A son of Rimmon, the Beerothite. He, with his brother Rechab, slew Ish-bosheth while he lay in his bed and took the head to David in Hebron. For this David caused them to be put to death, their hands and feet to be cut off, and their bodies, thus mutilated, hung up over the pool at Hebron (2 Sam. 4:2–12), about 992 B.C.

2. A Netopthathite, father of Heleb, or Heled, who was one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. 23:29; 1 Chron. 11:30), about 1000 B.C.

BA'ARA (bā'a-ra). One of the wives of Shaharaim, of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:8). In v. 9, she is called Hodesh.

BAASE'IAH (bā'a-se'ya). A Gershonite Levite, son of Malchijah and father of Michael, in the lineage of Asaph the singer (1 Chron. 6:40), before 1000 B.C.

BA'ASHA (bā'a-sha). The third sovereign of the separate kingdom of Israel and the founder of its Second Dynasty. He reigned c. 908–866 B.C. Baasha was the son of Ahijah, of the tribe of Issachar, and conspired against King Nadab, the son of Jeroboam (when he was besieging the Philistine town of Gibbethon), and killed him and his whole family (1 Kings 15:27–28). He was probably of humble origin, as the prophet Jehu says, "I exalted you from the dust" (16:2). In matters of religion his reign was no improvement on that of Jeroboam, and he was chiefly remarkable for his hostility to Judah. He built Ramah "in order to prevent anyone from going out or coming in to Asa king of Judah" (15:17). He was compelled to desist by the unexpected alliance of Asa with Ben-hadad I of Damascus. Baasha died in the twenty-fourth year of his reign and was honorably buried in Tirzah, which he had made his capital (15:33; 16:6). For his idolatries the prophet Jehu declared to him the determination of God to exterminate his family, which was accomplished by Zimri in the days of his son Elah (1 Kings 16:10–13).

BABBLER. The KJV rendering (Eccles. 10:11) of the Heb. ba'al lāshôn, "master of the tongue." The word is understood by some as "charmer" (NASB); by others as "slanderer." Paul was called a "babblor" (Acts 17:18, Gk. spermologos, "seed picker," as the crow), probably with a twofold meaning: from the manner in which that bird feeds, a "parasite," and from its chattering voice.

BA'BEL, TOWER OF. The building that the Babel builders intended to construct and that became the symbol of their God-defying disobedience and pride (Gen. 11:1–9). This structure is adequately illustrated by a characteristic Mesopotamian building called the ziggurat. The Assyro-Babylonian word zigguratu denotes a sacred temple tower and means a "pinnacle" or "mountaintop." The Babylonian ziggurat was a gigantic artificial mound of sun-dried bricks. The oldest extant ziggurat is that at ancient Uruk, biblical Erech (Gen. 10:10), modern Warka. This ancient temple tower dates from the latter part of the fourth millennium B.C. Nothing in the biblical narrative indicates that the so-called Tower of Babel was a temple tower or ziggurat. It is simply called a tower (migdāl). It seems clear that the Tower of Babel was the first structure of this sort ever attempted, and if later towers have any connection with the Tower of Babel, they are to be thought of as descendants of it. Ziggurats were consecrated to the guardian deity of the city. At Ur, the birthplace of Abraham, the god was Nanna, and his holy shrine was set on the topmost stage. At Borsippa (Birs-Nimrūd), some ten miles SW of Babylon, Nebo, the god of knowledge and literature, was the divinity. These ancient ziggurats were built in steplike stages. The highest one was seven stories, although the common height was three stories. The ziggurat at Uruk was a vast mass of clay stamped down hard and buttressed on the outside with layers of brick and bitumen. Similar structures at Ur, Babylon, Borsippa, and other Mesopotamian cities illustrate the words of 11:3–4: “Come, let us make bricks and burn them thoroughly. And they used brick for stone, and they used tar for mortar. And they said, ‘Come, let us build for ourselves a city, and a tower whose top will reach into heaven, and let us make for ourselves a name; lest we be scattered abroad over the face of the whole earth.’” Also illustrated is a salient difference between the building materials of the stoneless alluvial plain of Babylonia and those of Palestine and Egypt. In the building of the tower sun-dried bricks were used for stone, and tar (bitumen, or “slime,” KJV), which was abundant in the general regions of Babylon, was used for mortar (cf. 11:3). Ruins of more than two dozen ziggurats may be seen in Mesopotamia.

The original Tower of Babel was probably constructed prior to 4000 B.C. when the arts and sciences had developed to such a degree as to contemplate building a city, and especially a tower “whose top will reach into heaven” (11:4). This phrase is not mere hyperbole but an expression of pride and rebellion manifested by the Babel builders. Both Assyrian and Babylonian kings greatly prided themselves upon the height of their temples and boasted of having their tops as high as heaven.

BAB'YLON (bab'i-lon). An ancient city-state in the plain of Shinar, derived from Hurrian papil.

Name. The name is derived by the Hebrews from the root bālal (“to confound”) and has reference to the confusion of tongues at the Tower (Gen. 11:9). Thus the biblical writer refutes any God-honoring connotation of the name. The biblical account ascribes the founding of the ancient prehistoric city of Babylon to the descendants of Cush and the followers of Nimrod (10:8–10). This statement distinguishes the people who founded the city (evidently the Sumerians) from the Semitic-Babylonians who afterward possessed it.

Beginnings. The beginnings of the city of Babylon are unknown to us except for the biblical passage mentioned earlier (Gen. 10:10). About 1830 B.C. the city began its rise to prominence. In the ensuing struggle with surrounding city-states, Babylon conquered Larsa and the First Dynasty of Babylon was established. Such kings as Sumu-abu, Sumla-el, Sabum, Apel-Sin, and Sin-mu-ballit ruled. Then the great Hammurabi (which see), ascended the throne about 1728–1686, and conquered not only all of S Babylonia but extended his conquests as far N as Mari. At this famous city on the middle Euphrates, André Parrot, excavating for the Musée du Louvre (1933ff.), unearthed thousands of cuneiform tablets, a vast royal palace, a temple of Ishtar, and a ziggurat.

The city of Babylon did not reach the height of its glory, however, until the reign of Nebuchadnezzar II (605–562 B.C.). Nebuchadnezzar made the city splendid, and the king’s own inscriptions are concerned largely with his vast building operations. Babylon was excavated thoroughly by the Deutsche Orientgesellschaft under the direction of Robert Koldewey, 1899 to 1917 (cf. Das wieder erstehende Babylon, 4th ed. [1925]). Nebuchadnezzar’s brilliant city included vast fortifications, famous streets such as the Processional, canals, temples, and palaces. The Ishtar Gate led through the double wall of fortifications and was adorned with rows of bulls and dragons in colored enameled brick. Nebuchadnezzar’s throne room was likewise adorned with enameled bricks. The tall ziggurat was rebuilt. This, Herodotus said, rose to a height of eight stages. Near at hand was Esagila (“whose housetop is lofty”), the temple of Marduk or Bel, which the king restored. Not far distant were the “hanging gardens,” which to the Greeks were one of the seven wonders of the world. How well the words of Dan. 4:30 fit this ambitious builder: “Is this not Babylon the great, which I myself have built as a royal residence by the might of my power and for the glory of my majesty?”

The splendid Babylonian Empire of Nebuchadnezzar was destined soon to fall. He was succeeded on the throne by Amel-Marduk (561–560), the Evil-merodach of 2 Kings 25:27. This man was murdered by his brother-in-law, Nergal-shar-usur (559–556), whose son ruled only a few months and was succeeded by one of the conspirators, who did away with him. A noble named Nabunaid, or Nabonidus, then ruled, together with his son Belshazzar (555–539; see Dan. 5); Nabonidus was the last king of the neo-Babylonian Empire. On October 12, 539 B.C., Babylon fell to Cyrus of Persia, and from that time on the decay of the city began. Xerxes plundered it. Alexander the Great thought to restore its great temple, in ruins in his day, but was deterred by the prohibitive cost. During the period of Alexander’s successors the area decayed rapidly and soon became a desert. From the days of Seleucus Nicator (312–280 B.C.), who built the rival city of Seleucia on the Tigris, queenly Babylon never revived.

Size and Appearance. Herodotus says the city was in the form of a square, 120 stades (13 miles, 1,385 yards) on each side. It had two walls, inner and outer. The vast space within the walls was laid out in streets at right angles to each other, lined with houses three to four stories in height. He lists the following chief public buildings: the temple of Bel, consisting of a tower in the shape of a pyramid, more than eight stories, topped with a sanctuary; the palace of the king; the bridge across the Euphrates connecting the eastern and western sections of the city. Herodotus described the city as overwhelming in its size (1.178–86). The next Greek writers whose records are important are Ctesias and Diodorus Siculus (2.7–8). According to them the city was much smaller than Herodotus had represented, its circuit being 360 stades (41 miles, 6 yards). To the bridge of Herodotus, Diodorus has added a tunnel under the river and describes the hanging gardens of Nebuchadnezzar as rising in terraces, which supported full grown trees. Hebrew accounts represent the city as great in size, beauty, and strength; in this they were amply sustained by the inscriptions and excavations. As a matter of fact, excavations show that Babylon was smaller than ancient Greek writers said. The wall was about eleven miles long and eighty-five feet thick and was protected by a moat filled with water from the Euphrates. Actually the wall was double: the outer wall was twenty-five feet thick and the inner one twenty-three feet thick with an intervening space filled with rubble. Watchtowers stood sixty-five feet apart on the walls. Eight or nine gates pierced the wall. The population of greater Babylon (the walled city and its suburbs) in Nebuchadnezzar’s day has been estimated at about a half million.

The Figurative Meaning. In the prophetic writings, when the actual city is not meant, the illustration is to the “confusion” into which the whole social order of the world has fallen under Gentile world domination (Luke 21:24; Rev. 6:16). The divine order is given in Isa. 11, that is, Israel in her own land the center of divine government of the world and the medium of the divine blessing, with Gentile nations blessed when associated with Israel. Anything else is politically mere “babel.” In the NT Babylon prefigures apostate Christendom, that is, ecclesiastical Babylon, the great harlot (Rev. 17:5–18). It also prefigures political Babylon (17:15–18), which destroys ecclesiastical Babylon. The power of political Babylon is destroyed by the glorious second advent of Christ (Rev. 16:19; 18:2–21). M.F.U.; H.F.V.

BABYLO'NIA (bab-i-lō'ni-a). The eastern end of the Fertile Crescent, which had Babylon for its capital, called Shinar (Gen. 10:10; 11:2; Isa. 11:11), and land of the Chaldeans (Jer. 24:5; Ezek. 12:13).

Principal Cities. The region anciently comprised Sumer and Akkad. Akkad was the northern region of the lower alluvial plain of the Tigris-Euphrates, in which were Babylon, Borsippa, Kish, Kuthah, Sippar, and Agade (Accad). Principal towns of Sumer were Nippur, Lagash, Umma, Larsa, Uruk (Erech, Gen. 10:10), Ur (Abraham's city), and Eridu.

Geography. The two great rivers Tigris and Euphrates, which have their source in the mountains of Armenia, have built up the alluvial plain of lower Babylonia. The old standard view subscribed to in most textbooks is that the rivers gradually pushed the coastline of the Persian Gulf ever southward. In fact, the entire area below Babylon is supposed to have been formed in that way. Presumably, the Tigris and Euphrates did not join in earlier days but flowed as separate streams into the gulf. On the basis of newer studies in geology, however, this view is being seriously questioned. It is argued that, although the rivers bring down much silt, some 90 percent apparently is deposited before reaching the gulf. But the rise of the land level has not been marked in this area. So the theory has been advanced that the Tigris and Euphrates drop their sediment in a slowly subsiding basin. The gradual sinking of the land level supposedly has prevented the land elevation or the coastline from changing significantly since Old Testament times, and the two Mesopotamian rivers are now believed always to have flowed into the gulf as a single stream. Although many geologists have followed the new theories, archaeologists have not been so quick to do so, and further study is necessary in order to solve this knotty problem.

In any case, Babylonia is a flat and stoneless alluvial plain without mineral or timber resources. This fertile plain, irrigated by the Tigris and Euphrates rivers, became the cradle of civilization. In this lower part of Mesopotamia, some fifty-five miles S of present Baghdad, there once stood on the banks of the Euphrates a city bearing the proud name of Bab-ilu, "gate of god," or Babylon. Although the history of the lower valley does not begin with this city, Babylon became prominent early, and its name is attached primarily to this region that is now known familiarly as Babylonia.

Early Inhabitants. People called Sumerians preceded the Semites in lower Babylonia as far as the biblical reports are concerned. They seem to have been "Hamitic" (Gen. 10:8–10), but scholars profess ignorance of their race and origin. They probably entered the plain of Shinar around 4000 B.C. and developed a high civilization. Their accomplishments included development of the wedge-shaped cuneiform script. They were polytheistic. Originally each city-state had its own gods or goddesses, but eventually a triad pantheon developed: Anu (sky), Enlil (atmosphere and earth), and Ea (waters).

Earliest History. As the marshes dried up and areas of solid land appeared in lower Babylonia, civilization began. The earliest known culture is dubbed Obeid, the name being derived from Tell el-Obeid, a small mound 4½ miles NW of the more famous site of Ur. The culture, characterized by a definite style of pottery, is also known from the remains of other sites, including Ur. At Warka, the site of ancient Erech or Uruk, some 35 miles up the Euphrates valley from Tell el-Obeid, appears the second culture of ancient Babylonia. It probably dates from the middle of the fourth millennium B.C. At Warka another distinctive form of pottery was found, as well as the oldest ziggurat (see Babel, Tower of), the first cylinder seals, and the beginnings of writing. A further period in the early history of Mesopotamia is known from the findings at Jemdet Nasr, a site in the Mesopotamian valley near Babylon. This culture with its characteristic pottery dates around 3200–2800 B.C. Its bronze tools indicate the beginning of the Bronze Age in Mesopotamia. During this period the important cities of Shuruppak (Fara), Eshnunna (Tell Asmar), and Kish were founded.

Early Dynastic Period, about 2800–2360 B.C. During this period dynasties of kings appear at Kish, Uruk, Ur, Awan, Hamazi, Adab, and Mari. Among the rulers in the First Dynasty of Kish was Etana, “a shepherd, the one who to heaven ascended.” The next dynasty is described as centering at the temple precinct of E-Anna, where the city of Uruk was subsequently built. Twelve kings were said to have reigned here for 2,310 years including Gilgamesh, the epic hero. Excavations at Tell Asmar (ancient Eshnunna) reveal the art and religion of the middle phase of the Early Dynastic Period. The First Dynasty of Ur indicates the last and culminating phase of the Dynastic Period. The Sumerian King List (Thorikild Jacobsen, The Sumerian King List, Assyriological Studies [1939]) states that “Uruk was smitten with weapons; its kingship to Ur was carried. In Ur Mes-Anne-Pada became king and reigned 80 years.” Four kings are mentioned as reigning 177 years. Then “Ur was smitten with weapons.” The high degree of culture that obtained under the First Dynasty of Ur is revealed in the famous royal cemetery uncovered there by C. Leonard Woolley. These tombs, dating around 2500 B.C., revealed a highly developed culture. Another dynasty flourishing during the last phase of the Early Dynastic Period was that established by Ur-Nanshe at Lagash (Al Hiba) about fifty miles N of Ur. Reference is made in the inscriptions of Ur Nanshe to extensive building operations, including construction of temples and digging of canals. A later ruler named Eannatum claimed victories over Umma, Uruk, Ur, Kish, and Mari. His battle against Umma is portrayed on the Stela of the Vultures. Subsequently Lagash fell again to Umma. The new conqueror was Lugalzagesi, who was governor of Umma. This conqueror ultimately became king of Uruk and Ur and was one of the most powerful figures in Sumerian history. His quarter-century reign constituted the Third Dynasty of Uruk. His armies marched to the Mediterranean Sea.

The Old Akkadian Period, about 2360–2180 B.C. Meanwhile the Semites were increasing in power in Babylonia under the leadership of the mighty Sargon, who was of humble origin and had been placed in an ark of bulrushes like Moses. He built up a far-flung empire and was succeeded by Rimush, Manishtusu, Sargon’s grandson, whose victory stela was discovered at Susa. But Naram-Sin’s sprawling empire, extending from central Persia to the Mediterranean and NE Arabia to the Taurus Mountains, lasted only through the reign of his son Sharkalisharri. Then Caucasian people, the Gutians, overran Babylonia.

The Neo-Sumerian Period, about 2070–1960 B.C. When Gutian power declined, a Sumerian governor of Lagash, named Gudea, came to power. He is represented by numerous statues. Gudea built a famous temple, bringing cedar wood for it all the way from the Amanus Mountains of northern Syria, part of the same general range as the Lebanon, from which Solomon more than a millennium later was to cut cedar trees for the Temple at Jerusalem (1 Kings 5:6). With the downfall of the Gutians the powerful Third Dynasty of Ur also arose in splendor under the leadership of Ur-

Nammu, who took the new title of “king of Sumer and Akkad” and who erected a mighty ziggurat at Ur. He was succeeded by Shulgi, Amar-Sin, Shu-Sin, and Ibbi-Sin.

The Isin-Larsa Period, about 1960–1830 B.C. Elamites sacked Ur and carried off Ibbi-Sin. Amorites from Mari and elsewhere settled at Isin and Larsa. An Elamite ruler came into power at Eshnunna. Isin and Larsa were the two powerful competitive city-states during this period.

Old Babylonia Period, about 1830–1550 B.C. This was the period of the ascendancy of Babylon (which see), particularly under the great Hammurabi (which see). Excavations at the brilliant city of Mari on the middle Euphrates have shed great light on this era. The Code of Hammurabi, discovered at Susa in 1901, was subsequently carried from Babylon and belongs to the period around 1700 B.C. It was during this time also that the famous epic of creation called Enuma elish assumed the form in which it was current for the next millennium. The discoveries at Nuzi, an ancient Hurrian center about twelve miles NW of modern Kirkuk, illuminated this period and especially the earlier patriarchal period.

Kassite Invasion, about 1550–1158 B.C. The Kassites, who had been invading the land from the highlands to the E and NE for a number of centuries, made themselves masters of the country. Finally Tukulti-Ninurta, king of Assyria (1244–1208 B.C.), invaded Babylonia and ruled for seven years before being expelled.

Dynasty II of Isin. With the fall of the Kassites a new dynasty arose in Babylonia, Dynasty II of Isin. The kings were all native Babylonians, among them Nebuchadnezzar I (1126–1105). He defeated the Elamites and the Hittites but was routed by the Assyrians. This dynasty came to an end in 1027 B.C.

Later History. About 1100–900 B.C. Aramaic tribes began invading Babylonia, and Assyria began to interfere in Babylonian affairs. Tiglath-pileser III (which see; 729 B.C.; his name is given as “Pul” in 2 Kings 15:19) became king of Babylon. In 689 the city revolted against Sennacherib, who sacked and burned it to the ground. It was rebuilt by Esarhaddon and remained a part of Assyria until 625 B.C.

Neo-Chaldean Empire, 605–539 B.C. The new nation, the Chaldeans, under Merodach-baladan, who proclaimed himself king of Babylon (721), sent an embassy to Hezekiah, king of Judah, but was defeated by Sennacherib in 703. In 625 B.C. Nabopolassar became king of the Chaldeans and founded the neo-Babylonian or Chaldean Empire; with Cyaxares, king of the Medes, he destroyed Nineveh in 612. His son Nebuchadnezzar defeated Neco of Egypt at Carchemish in 605. Now in control of all SW Asia, Nebuchadnezzar (605–562) entered his long and brilliant reign, destroying Jerusalem and making Babylon one of the most splendid of ancient cities. He was succeeded by his son Amel-Marduk (561–560). The latter was assassinated, and Neriglissar (559–556) succeeded to the throne. Neriglissar’s son reigned for nine months after Neriglissar’s death and was also assassinated in 556. Then a Babylonian noble, Nabonidus, came to the throne; he appointed his son Belshazzar as coregent (which see). In 539 B.C. Gobryas, one of Cyrus’s generals, took Babylon, which remained under Persian rule, 539–332 B.C. Alexander the Great controlled Babylon until 323. The Seleucids established their dynasty in Babylon in 311 B.C. and in 275 removed the inhabitants of Babylon to Seleucia on the Tigris; with that event the history of Babylon ended. M.F.U.; H.F.V.

BABYLONISH GARMENT. See Beautiful Mantle from Shinar.

BA’CA (ba’ka; “balsam tree” or “weeping”). An unidentified valley in Palestine (Ps. 84:6). It was possibly an imaginary poetical name, not intended to describe an actual location but to stand for any experience of drought (cf. Arab. baka'a, “to be sparsely watered”) in contrast to a well-watered experience (“who passing through the valley of Baca, make it a well,” KJV, italics added); or it may refer to an experience of “weeping” with a play upon the Heb. word bākâ (“to weep”). If it actually refers to a place, it was likely so named from the balsam trees in it, which exude a tearlike gum (cf. the valley of Rephaim, 2 Sam. 5:22–23, where such trees were found). M.F.U.

BACKBITE. See Slander.

BACKSLIDING. In the Heb. the idea is of “going back” (sûg, “backsliding,” Prov. 14:14), “being stubborn or refractory like a heifer” (sôrēr; Hos. 4:16, KJV; NASB, “stubborn”) and “turning back” (m□shūbâ; Jer. 3:6, 8, 11–12, 14, 22; 8:5; 31:22; all KJV; NASB reads, “faithless” or “turned away”) to the old life of sin and idolatry. In the NT backsliding is set forth as involving a change of the believer’s state before God but not of his standing. The former is variable and depends upon daily contact with Christ, “if we walk in the light” (1 John 1:7) and many other factors of the spiritual life. Standing, by contrast, refers to the believer’s position “in Christ,” which is grounded in the unchangeable and perfect work of Christ for the believer, whereas state describes the changing and imperfect condition of his soul from moment to moment as affected by backsliding on the one hand or spiritual progress on the other. Faith in Christ secures standing (John 1:12; Rom. 5:1–2; 8:17; Eph. 1:3, 6; Col. 2:10; Heb. 10:19; etc.), but observance of all the laws of the spiritual life alone assures protection against backsliding. Compare 1 Cor. 1:2–9 (standing) with 1 Cor. 1:11; 3:1–4; 4:18; 5:2 (state). Backsliding not only results in a changed state or experience but involves corrective chastening (Heb. 12:6; 1 Cor. 11:31), loss of rewards and fellowship (2 Cor. 5:10; 1 John 3:10), curtailment of usefulness, and in extreme cases physical death (1 Cor. 5:5; 1 John 5:16) that the “spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.” Those who hold that one may fall from grace teach that backsliding may become complete, rather than partial, and that the individual must then be converted a second time. BADGER. See Animal Kingdom: Porpoise.

BAGPIPE. See Music.

BAGS. Bags made of leather or woven materials were in common use in Bible lands to hold money—lumps of gold or silver in most ancient times (Prov. 7:20; Isa. 46:6) and, after the Persian period, minted coins. Water or wine bags were manufactured from skins of animals. The shepherd’s bag contained a heterogeneous assortment ranging from sling stones to food (1 Sam. 17:40). In Luke 12:33 Jesus referred to the common wallet for traveling (cf. 10:4; 22:35–36). M.F.U.

BAHA´RUMITE (ba-ha´rû-mīt). A native of Bahurim (which see). An epithet applied to Azmaveth, one of David’s warriors (1 Chron. 11:33); called Barhumite in 2 Sam. 23:31.

BAHU´RIM (ba-hur´im; “young men”). A town of Judah on the road from Jerusalem to the Jordan, E of Olivet (2 Sam. 3:16). David had trouble here with Shimei, and his spies hid here (16:5; 17:18). Azmaveth is the only other native of this place, except Shimei, mentioned in Scripture (23:31; 1 Chron. 11:33). It is identified with Râs et-Tmîm, just E of Mt. Scopus, near Jerusalem.

BAIL. See Surety.

BA´JITH (ba´jith; “house”). In the KJV, supposed to be a city in Moab where there may have been a celebrated idol temple; by others the Heb. is rendered “temple house” (Isa. 15:2) or, as in NASB and NIV, just “temple.”

BAKBAK´KAR (bak-bak´ar; “searcher”). One of the Levites inhabiting the villages of the Netophathites, after the return from Babylon (1 Chron. 9:15), about 536 B.C.

BAK´BUK (bak´buk; a “bottle”). The head of one of the families of the Temple servants that returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:51; Neh. 7:53), about 536 B.C.

BAKBUKI´AH (bak-bu-kī´a). A Levite, “second among his brethren,” who dwelt at Jerusalem on the return from Babylon (Neh. 11:17). He was also employed on the watches and was a gatekeeper (12:9, 25), about 536 B.C.

BA´LAAM (bā-lam). A heathen diviner who lived at Pethor, which is said, in Deut. 23:4, to have been a city of Mesopotamia. Although doubtless belonging to the Midianites (Num. 31:8), he possessed some knowledge of the true God and acknowledged that his superior powers as poet and prophet were derived from God and were His gift. His fame was great, and he became conceited and covetous. The Israelites having encamped in the plain of Moab (1401 B.C.), Balak, the king of Moab, entered into a league with the Midianites against them and sent messengers to Balaam “with the fees for divination in their hand” (22:5–7). Balaam seems to have had some misgivings as to the lawfulness of their request, for he invited them to remain overnight, that he might know how God would regard it. These misgivings were confirmed by the express prohibition of God upon his journey. Balaam informed the messengers of God’s answer, and they returned to Balak. A still more honorable embassy was sent to Balaam, with promises of reward and great honor. He replied that he could not be tempted by reward but would speak what God should reveal. He requested them to remain for the night, that he might know what more the Lord would say to him. His importunity secured for him permission to accompany Balak’s messengers with the divine injunction to speak as God should dictate. In the morning Balaam proceeded with the princes of Moab. But “God was angry because he was going, and the angel of the Lord took his stand in the way as an adversary against him” (22:22). Though Balaam did not see the angel, the donkey that he rode was aware of his presence. At first it turned into the field; again, in its terror, it pressed against the wall, squeezing Balaam’s foot; upon the third appearance of the angel, there being no way of escape, it fell down. This greatly enraged Balaam, who struck it with a stick, whereupon the donkey questioned Balaam as to the cause of the beating. He soon became aware of the presence of the angel, who accused him of perverseness. Balaam offered to return; the angel, however, told him to go on but to speak only as God should tell him. Meeting Balak, he announced to him his purpose of saying only what the Lord should reveal. According to his direction seven altars were prepared, upon each of which Balak and Balaam offered a bull and a ram. Three times Balaam tried to speak against Israel, but his utterances were overruled by God, so that instead of cursings there were blessings and magnificent prophecies, reaching forward until they told of “a star” coming “forth from Jacob” (24:17). Balaam is accused by Moses of seducing the Israelites to commit fornication (31:16). The effect of this is recorded in chap. 25. A battle was fought afterward with the Midianites, in which Balaam sided with them and was slain (Num. 31:8).

Typical. The “error of Balaam” (Jude 11) was the diviner-prophet’s mistake in concluding on the basis of natural morality that God must righteously curse the nation Israel, seeing the evil in it. He was ignorant of the higher morality of the cross, through which God enforces the awful sanctions of His law, at the same time manifesting His grace, so that He can be just and the justifier of a believing sinner. The “way of Balaam” (2 Pet. 2:15) is the covetous conduct of the typical hireling prophet, solicitous only to commercialize His gift. The “teaching of Balaam” (Rev. 2:14) was the teaching of the mercenary seer to abandon godly separation and a pilgrim character in favor of worldly conformity. Balaam taught Balak to corrupt the people who could not be cursed (Num. 31:15–16; 22:5–6; 23:8) by seducing them to marry Moabite women and commit spiritual adultery (James 4:4). Balaam as a prophet offers the strange spectacle of a prophet-diviner—a mixture of paganistic ritual with a true, though blurred, knowledge of the true God. M.F.U.

BAL´ADAN (bal´a-dan; Akkad. “[He] Marduk has given a son”).

A shortened form of Merodach-Baladan (Babylonian: Marduk-apla-iddina) or Berodach-Baladan, king of Babylon twice (721–710 and 703) in the time of Hezekiah, king of Judah (2 Kings 20:12; Isa. 39:1). He was a powerful Chaldean leader who was able to keep the Assyrians at bay for a few years but was ultimately destroyed by them. H.F.V.

BA´LAH (bā´la; to “decay”). A city in Simeon (Josh. 19:3), or Baalah (15:29).

BA´LAK (bā´lak; “destroyer, emptier”). The son of Zippor, the king of the Moabites (Num. 22:2, 4). He was so terrified at the approach of the victorious army of the Israelites, who, in their passage through the desert had encamped near the confines of his territory, that he appealed to Balaam to curse them, about 1400 B.C. His designs being frustrated in this direction, he acted upon Balaam’s suggestion and seduced the Israelites to commit fornication (25:1; Rev. 2:14).

BALANCES (Heb. mōznayim, i.e., “two scales”). That these were known to the early Hebrews and in common use is evident from the frequent reference to them in the OT (Lev. 19:36; Job 6:2; 31:6, “scales”; Hos. 12:7; etc.). The probability is that the Hebrews used the common balances of Egypt. They were not essentially different from the balances now in use. Sometimes they were suspended by a ring, and in other cases the crossbeams turned upon a pin at the summit of an upright pole, each end of the arm terminating in a hook, to which the precious metal to be weighed was attached in small bags.

Figurative. In a figurative sense the balance is employed in Scripture as an emblem of justice and fair dealing (Job 31:6; Ps. 62:9; Prov. 11:1). A balance or scale used in connection with the sale of bread or fruit by weight is the symbol of scarcity (Rev. 6:5; see also Lev. 26:26; Ezek. 4:16–17).

BALD LOCUST. See Animal Kingdom: Locust.

BALDNESS. In Scripture baldness is mentioned as a defect, interfering with personal beauty; and the more naturally so, as the hair was frequently allowed to grow with peculiar luxuriance as an ornament. Natural baldness appears to have been uncommon and is alluded to as a mark of squalor and misery (Isa. 3:24; 15:2; Jer. 47:5). The address to Elisha, “Go up, you baldhead” (2 Kings 2:23), may mean that his scoffers referred to his age only. Baldness was expressly distinguished from leprosy but had certain points of contact with it (Lev. 13:40–44). Artificial baldness was a mark of mourning (Jer. 16:6; Ezek. 7:18; Amos 8:10) and was forbidden to the Israelites on the ground of their being a holy people (Deut. 14:1–2); it was a punishment inflicted upon captives (21:12). The priests were forbidden to make their heads bald or to shave off the corners of their beards (Lev. 21:5; Ezek. 44:20). The Jewish interpretation of this injunction excluded a bald priest from ministering at the altar, although baldness is not mentioned as a disqualification (Lev. 21:17–20). Baldness by shaving marked the conclusion of a Nazirite's vow (Num. 6:9, 18).

BA´MAH (ba´ma; “height”). A high place where idols were worshiped. The word appears in its Heb. form only in Ezek. 20:29, where in the first part of the verse it is translated “high place.” By some the name is supposed to refer to some particular spot. Keil (Com., ad loc.) says that the word “is to be taken collectively and that the use of the singular is to be explained from the antithesis to the one divinely appointed Holy Place in the temple, and not from any allusion to one particular bamah of peculiar distinction.”

BA´MOTH (ba´mōth; “heights”). The forty-seventh station of the Israelites (Num. 21:19–20) in the country of the Moabites, and probably the same as Bamoth-baal (which see).

BA´MOTH-BA´AL (ba´moth-bā´al; “heights of Baal”). A place E of the Jordan, beside the river Arnon (Josh. 13:17). In the RV at Num. 21:28, called “the high places of Arnon.” Bamoth-baal is called Beth-bamoth on the Moabite Stone (line 27, which see), and is located somewhere near Mt. Nebo.

BANGLES. See Anklets.

BA´NI (ba-ni; “built”).

1. A Gadite, one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. 23:36), about 1000 B.C.

2. A Levite, son of Shemer and father of Amzi, a descendant of Merari (1 Chron. 6:46).

3. A descendant of Perez and father of Imri, one of whose descendants returned from Babylon (1 Chron. 9:4) long before 536 B.C.

4. One whose “sons” (descendants or retainers), to the number of 642, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:10). He is elsewhere (Neh. 7:15) called Binnui. He is probably the one mentioned (10:14) as having sealed the covenant.

5. The name of Bani is given (Ezra 10:29, 34, 38) three times as one who, either himself or his descendants, had taken strange wives after the captivity.

6. A Levite whose son, Rehum, repaired a portion of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:17). Apparently the same Bani was among those who were conspicuous in all the reforms on the return from Babylon (8:7; 9:4; 10:13). He had another son named Uzzi, who was appointed overseer of the Levites at Jerusalem; his own father's name was Hashabiah (Neh. 11:22).

BANISH (Heb. nādaḥ, to “cast out,” 2 Sam. 14:13–14); Banishment (Heb.

maddûaḥ, “causes of banishment,” Lam. 2:14, KJV, but NASB, “oracles,” marg.,

“burdens”; Aram. sh□rōshî, “rooting out,” Ezra 7:26, NASB, marg.). Banishment was not a punishment prescribed by the Mosaic law but was adopted, together with the forfeiture of property, by the Jews after the captivity. It also existed among the Romans, together with another form of exile called disportatio, which was a punishment of great severity. The person banished forfeited his estate and was transported to some island named by the emperor, there to be kept in perpetual confinement (see Smith, Dict. of Classical Antiquity, s.v. “Banishment”). Thus the apostle John was banished to the island of Patmos (Rev. 1:9).

BANK. In Scripture the term bank does not designate a financial institution for the custody of money but rather a “table” or “counter” (Gk. trapeza) at which a money changer stood or sat, exchanging coins (Matt. 21:12; Mark 11:15; John 2:15). In Luke 19:23, however, the word apparently approximates “bank” in the modern sense of the word. In the simple pastoral-agricultural economy of the OT era, loaning money among the Hebrews was not viewed favorably (Ex. 22:25; Lev. 25:37). In the NT period, however, not only was money lent between friends, but money lending was a lucrative business. The banker presided at his table (Luke 19:23) and loaned funds to others in pledge of mortgage (cf. Neh. 5:3–4). Exchanging money from one denomination to another, as shekels for the half shekel for the Temple tax, or current coins for foreign money, such as the Hebrew shekel for the Roman denarius or Greek drachma, was a profitable branch of the ancient banking business. M.F.U.

BANNER (Heb. ōt). A more literal rendering of this word is “sign” (Num. 2:2, see marg.), denoting the standard of each tribe and one that is different from the degel, the banner of these tribes together.

BANQUET (generally Heb. mishteh, “drinking”). Feasts are common in the Scripture narratives, and hospitality has always characterized life in Bible lands.

Occasions. Besides being a part of the religious observance of the great festivals, banquets or feasts were given on great family occasions, such as a birthday (Gen. 40:20; Matt. 14:6), the weaning of a son and heir (Gen. 21:8), a marriage (29:22; Judg. 14:10; Esther 2:18; Matt. 22:2–4), the separation and reunion of friends (Gen. 31:27, 54), a burial (2 Sam. 3:35; Jer. 16:7; Hos. 9:4), a sheep-shearing (1 Sam. 25:2, 8, 36; 2 Sam. 13:23–29).

Time. The usual time for holding the banquet was toward evening, corresponding to the dinners of modern times. To begin early was a mark of excess (Isa. 5:11; Eccles. 10:16). These festivals were often continued for seven days, especially wedding banquets (Judg. 14:12); but if the bride was a widow, three days formed the limit.

Invitations. Invitations were sent out through servants (Prov. 9:2–3; Matt. 22:3–4, 8–9) some time previous to the banquet; and a later announcement informed the expected guests that the arrangements were complete and their presence was looked for (22:4; Luke 14:7). This after-summons was sent only to those who had accepted the previous invitation, and to violate that acceptance for trivial reasons could only be viewed as a gross insult.

Etiquette. At a small entrance door a servant received the tablets or cards of the guests, who were then conducted into the receiving room. After the whole company had arrived, the master of the house shut the door with his own hands, a signal that no others were to be admitted (Luke 13:25; Matt. 25:10). The guests were kissed upon their arrival (Tobit 7:6; Luke 7:45); their feet washed (7:44), a custom common in ancient Greece and still found in Palestine; the hair and beard anointed (Ps. 23:5; Amos 6:6); and their places assigned them according to rank (1 Sam. 9:22; Luke 14:8; Mark 12:39). In some cases each guest was furnished with a magnificent garment of a light and showy color and richly embroidered, to be worn during the banquet (Eccles. 9:8; Rev. 3:4–5). The refusal of such a mark of respect implied a contempt for the host and his entertainment that could not fail to provoke resentment (Matt. 22:11).

Fare. In general the feasts of the Israelites were simple; but, no doubt, under the kings, with growing prosperity and luxury, riotous banquets were not unknown. Particularly choice dishes were set before the guest intended to be specially honored (1 Sam. 9:24), sometimes a double (1:5) and even fivefold portion (Gen. 43:34). In addition to a great variety of foods, wine was used, often drugged with spices (Prov. 9:2; song of Sol. 8:2); the banquets frequently degenerated into drinking bouts (Isa. 5:12; Amos 6:6).

The Jews of the OT appear to have used a common table for all the guests, although persons of high official position were honored with a separate table. In some cases a ceremonial separation prevailed, as at Joseph's entertainment of his brothers (Gen. 43:32). In early times sitting was the usual posture (1 Sam. 16:11; 20:5, 18); but later they adopted the luxurious practice of reclining upon couches (Luke 7:37–38; John 12:2–3).

In the houses of the common people the women and children also took part in the feast (1 Sam. 1:4; John 12:3), the separation of the women not being a Jewish custom.

Diversion. At private banquets the master of the house presided and did the honors of the occasion, but in large and mixed companies it was the ancient custom to choose a "headwaiter" (John 2:8). This functionary performed the office of chairman in preserving order and also took upon himself the general management of the festivities. The guests were entertained with exhibitions of music, singers, dancers, riddles, jesting, and merriment (Wisd. of Sol. 2:7; 2 Sam. 19:35; Isa. 5:12; 25:6; Judg. 14:12; Neh. 8:10; Amos 6:5–6; Luke 15:25). See Festivals; Food.

BAPTISM. The application of water as a rite of purification or initiation; a Christian sacrament. See Sacraments.

The word baptism is the English form of the Gk. baptismos. The verb from which this noun is derived—baptizo—is held by some scholars to mean "to dip, immerse." But this meaning is held by others to be not the most exact or common but rather a meaning that is secondary or derived. By the latter it is claimed that all the term necessarily implies is that the element employed in baptism is in close contact with the person or object baptized. The Gk. prepositions en and eis have played a prominent part in discussions respecting the mode of baptism.

The scope of this article is limited mainly to Christian baptism, but as preliminary to this brief mention is made of Jewish baptism, John's baptism, the baptism of Jesus, and the baptism of Christ's disciples:

Jewish Baptism. Baptisms, or ceremonial purifications, were common among the Jews. Not only priests and other persons but also clothing, utensils, and articles of furniture were thus ceremonially cleansed (Lev. 8:6; Ex. 19:10–14; Mark 7:3–4; Heb. 9:10).

John's Baptism. The baptism of John was not Christian, but Jewish. It was, however, especially a baptism "for repentance." The only faith that it expressed concerning Christ was that His coming was close at hand. Those who confessed and repented of their sins and were baptized by John were thus obedient to his call to “make ready the way of the Lord” (Matt. 3:3).

Because the disciples Paul met at Ephesus (Acts 19:1–7) were “acquainted only with the baptism of John” (18:25), i.e., were ignorant of the Christian message and the baptism of the Holy Spirit, save as a prophesied event (19:4), they did not “receive the Holy Spirit, when [they] believed” (19:2). They had heard only John’s message and received only John’s baptism, which were introductory and merely preparatory. Faith in them could not bring the free gift of the Holy Spirit. The moment they heard and believed the new message of a crucified, risen, and ascended Savior, they received the blessing of that message—the gift of the Holy Spirit, which included His baptizing ministry.

Baptism of Jesus. The baptism that Jesus received from John was unique in its significance and purpose. It could not be like that which John administered to others, for Jesus did not make confession; He had no occasion to repent. Neither was it Christian baptism, the significance of which we shall consider later. Jesus Himself declared the main purpose and meaning of this event in His words “It is fitting for us to fulfill all righteousness” (Matt. 3:15). It was an act of ceremonial righteousness appropriate to His public entrance upon His mission as the Christ, which included His threefold office of Prophet, Priest, and King, especially the second, for the essence of His redemptive work lies in His consecration as a Priest, the Great High Priest. In this office He offered not “the blood of goats and bulls,” but Himself to put away sin (Heb. 9:13–26). It is this consecration to His redemptive priesthood that comes into clearest view in His baptism in the Jordan. By “fulfilling all righteousness” our Lord meant the righteousness of obedience to the Mosaic law. The Levitical law required all priests to be consecrated when they began to be about thirty years of age (Num. 4:3; Luke 3:23). The consecration was twofold—first the washing (baptism), then the anointing (Ex. 29:4–7; Lev. 8:6–36). When John on the Jordan’s bank “washed” (baptized) Jesus, the heavens were opened, and the Holy Spirit came upon Him. This was the priestly anointing of Him who was not only a Priest by divine appointment but an eternal Priest (Ps. 110:4) who was thus divinely consecrated for the work of redemption (Matt. 3:16; Acts 4:27; 10:38).

Baptism of Christ’s Disciples. That Christ Himself baptized His disciples is a matter, to say the least, involved in doubt. Although it is probable that at the beginning of His ministry our Lord baptized those who believed in Him, He not long afterward delegated this work to His disciples (John 4:1–2). The office of Christ was and is to baptize with the Holy Spirit. His disciples administered the symbolical baptism, He that which is real (Matt. 3:11).

Christian Baptism. This may be considered under two heads: Baptist and non-Baptist views.

Baptist Views. Christian baptism is the immersion of a believer in water as a sign of his previous entrance into the communion of Christ’s death, burial, and resurrection. In other words, baptism is a token of the regenerated soul’s union with Christ.

Obligation. Baptism is an ordinance instituted by Christ (Matt. 28:19; Mark 16:16), practiced by the apostles (Acts 2:38), submitted to by members of NT churches (Rom. 6:3–5; Col. 2:11–12), and subsequently practiced as a rite in Christian churches. No church hierarchy has the right to modify or dispense with this command of Christ because only the local church (no other visible church of Christ) is known in the NT, and it is purely an executive, not a legislative body.

Significance. Symbolizing regeneration through union with Christ, baptism portrays not only Christ's death and resurrection and their purpose in atoning for sin in delivering sinners from sin's penalty and power, but also betokens the accomplishment of that purpose in the person baptized (Rom. 6:3–5; Gal. 3:27; Col. 3:3). By that external rite the believer professes his death to sin and resurrection to spiritual life. He also gives witness to the method by which God's purpose has been wrought for him, namely, by union with Christ. The rite sets forth the fact that the believer has received Christ and in faith given himself to Him (Rom. 6:5; Col. 2:12).

Proper Subjects of Baptism. Only those who give credible evidence of regeneration, and who thus by faith have entered into the communion of Christ's death and resurrection, are considered proper candidates for the rite. Biblical authority for this view is given in the command of Christ that those are to be baptized who have previously been made disciples (Matt. 28:19; Acts 2:41), or previously repented and believed (2:37–38; 8:12; 18:8). It is also proved from the nature of the church as a company of regenerated believers (John 3:5; Rom. 6:13) and the symbolism of the ordinance itself (Acts 10:47; Rom. 6:2–5; Gal. 3:26–27). Since it is intended only for the regenerate, baptism can never be the means of regeneration. It is the appointed sign, but never the condition, of forgiveness of sins.

Mode. This is immersion only as confirmed from the meaning of the original Gk. word baptizo in Greek writers and church Fathers, and in the NT. Immersion was a doctrine and practice of the Greek church.

Administration. Many Baptists, and others practicing believer's baptism, require the rite to be performed properly as a prerequisite to membership in the local church and participation in the Lord's Supper.

Non-Baptist Views. The views of other Christian groups on the subject of baptism vary from those like most Quakers, who deny the present-day validity of the rite at all, to Roman Catholics and others who attach to it regenerating efficacy.

Obligation. Most Christians believe that the rite, in one form or another, for one purpose or another, is permanently obligatory and rests upon Christ's command (Matt. 28:19) and the practice of the early church.

Significance. The Roman Catholic and the Greek Orthodox churches, most Lutheran bodies, and many in the Church of England and the Protestant Episcopal church hold that baptism is the direct instrument of regeneration. Roman Catholics subscribe so strongly to this view that, accordingly, they also hold that all adults or infants who die unbaptized are excluded from heaven. Many evangelical churches believe that baptism is not only the rite of initiation into the church of Christ but a sign and seal of divine grace symbolizing spiritual cleansing or purification (Acts 22:16; Rom. 6:4–11; Titus 3:5). For example, the Westminster Confession, art. 28, says: "Baptism is a sacrament of the New Testament, ordained by Jesus Christ, not only for the solemn admission of the party baptized into the visible Church, but also to be unto him a sign and seal of the covenant of grace of his ingrafting into Christ, of regeneration, of remission of sins, and of his giving up unto God through Jesus Christ, to walk in newness of life; which sacrament is, by Christ's own appointment, to be continued in His Church until the end of the world." As circumcision was the sign and seal of the Abrahamic covenant and practiced under the Mosaic covenant, so baptism is construed as the sign and seal of the New Covenant of the gospel. Baptism, under the new economy, takes the place of circumcision under the old (Col. 2:10–12).

Proper Subjects of Baptism. In contrast to those holding Baptist views that exclude all except adult believers from the rite, many believe it should be administered to children who have believing parents or sponsors to care for their Christian nurture. This is contended to be scriptural since Paul expressly teaches that believers in Christ are under the gracious provisions of the covenant that God made with Abraham (Gal. 3:15–29). Under the Abrahamic covenant circumcision was administered to children as a sign of their participation in the relation in which their parents stood to God. It is contended that children of Christian parentage have a similar right to the ordinance, which is construed as having replaced circumcision.

Mode. Non-Baptists deny that immersion is the only valid mode of baptism and admit sprinkling, pouring, and immersion as legitimate. All that is held essential is the application of water “in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.”

Administration. The administration of baptism is commonly regarded as exclusively a prerogative of the ministerial office. The wise and proper observance of church order has deemed this necessary, although in extreme cases it is held that a layman (or even a laywoman) can perform the rite. The same view is held among Lutherans and others who hold strongly to the doctrine of baptismal regeneration.

BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD (1 Cor. 15:29). Of this difficult passage there are many expositions, a few of which we present:

1. The Cerinthians, the Marcionites, and other heretics had a custom supposed to be referred to by the apostle. Persons who had been baptized had themselves baptized again for the benefit of people who had died unbaptized but already believing, in the persuasion that this would be counted to them as their own baptism. From this the apostle drew an argument to prove their belief in the resurrection. Meyer (Com., ad loc.) believes that this is the practice to which the apostle refers. “‘For the benefit of the dead’ remains the right interpretation.”

2. Chrysostom believed the apostle referred to the profession of faith in baptism, part of which was, “I believe in the resurrection of the dead.” The meaning, then, would be, “If there is no resurrection of the dead, why, then, art thou baptized for the dead, i.e., the body?” Whedon (Com., ad loc.) holds to this interpretation and says: “The apostolic Christians were baptized into the faith of the resurrection of the dead, and thereby they were sponsors in behalf of the dead, that the dead should rise.”

3. Another interpretation, that of Spanheim, considers “the dead” to be martyrs and other believers who, by firmness and cheerful hope of resurrection, have given in death a worthy example, by which others were also inspired to receive baptism. This interpretation, however, may perhaps also be improved if Christ is considered as prominently referred to among those deceased, by virtue of whose resurrection all His followers expect to be likewise raised.

4. Olshausen takes the meaning of the passage to be that “all who are converted to the Church are baptized for the good of the dead, as it requires a certain number (Rom. 11:12–25), a ‘fullness’ of believers, before the resurrection can take place.”

5. “Over the graves of the martyrs.” Vossius adopted this interpretation, but it is unlikely that this custom should have prevailed in the days of Paul.

BAPTISM OF FIRE. It is clear from the immediate context of this reference (Matt. 3:9–12; Luke 3:16–17) and from the general testimony of Scripture, that this baptism of fire is connected with judgment at the second advent of Christ as the baptism with the Holy Spirit (Acts 1:5 with 11:16) is connected with grace flowing from the death, resurrection, and ascension of Christ at His first advent. As John F. Walvoord correctly observes, “While the Church Age is introduced with a baptism of the Spirit, the Kingdom Age is to be introduced with a baptism of fire” (Doct. of the Holy Spirit [1943], p. 165). At first glance it might seem singular that John the Baptist should speak of the first and second advents in such intimate connection, but he is merely expressing himself as many of the OT prophets do, who often envision the Lord’s first and second comings in a blended view and speak of both in the same clause (cf. Isa. 61:1–2 with Luke 4:16–21). Though some expositors, as Plumptre, have attempted to find a fulfillment of the baptism with fire in the “tongues as of fire” (Acts 2:3), and others have construed it as a description of the baptizing work of the Holy Spirit as an experience to be sought in this age, a kind of “second Pentecost,” these interpretations are manifestly erroneous. It is not scriptural to pray for a baptism with fire; there is no such baptism now, for the believer has been graciously delivered from wrath by the blood of Christ. M.F.U.

BAPTISM OF JE’SUS. See Baptism: Baptism of Jesus.

BAPTISM OF THE SPIRIT. This momentous spiritual operation is set forth in the NT as the basis of all the believer’s positions and possessions “in Christ” (Eph. 1:3; Col. 2:10; 3:1–4; etc.). The operation is prophetic in the gospels (Matt. 3:11; Mark 1:8; Luke 3:16–17; John 1:33–34, where Christ is the baptizer), historic in the Acts (cf. 1:5 with 11:16), and doctrinal in the epistles (1 Cor. 12:13, where the Spirit is named specifically as the agent; Rom. 6:3–4; Gal. 3:26–27; Col. 2:9–12; Eph. 4:5). The Spirit’s baptizing work, placing the believer “in Christ,” occurred initially at Pentecost at the advent of the Spirit, who baptized believing Jews “into Christ.” In Acts 8, Samaritans were baptized in this way for the first time; in chap. 10, Gentiles likewise were so baptized, at which point the normal agency of the Spirit as baptizer was attained. According to the clear teaching of the epistles, every believer is baptized by the Spirit into Christ the moment he is regenerated. He is also simultaneously indwelt by the Spirit and sealed eternally, with the privilege of being filled with the Spirit, as the conditions for filling are met. No subject in all the range of biblical theology is so neglected, on one hand, or misunderstood and abused, on the other, as this. The baptism of the Spirit is widely confused with regeneration and with the indwelling, sealing, and filling ministries of the Spirit, as well as with water baptism and a so-called “second blessing.” M.F.U.; R.K.H.

BAR. A word with various meanings. (1) A bar, crossbar passing along the sides and rear of the Tabernacle (which see), through rings attached to each board, and thus holding the boards together (Ex. 26:26–29). (2) A bar or bolt for fastening a gate or door (Judg. 16:3; Neh. 3:3, 6, 13–15). The word is used figuratively of a rock in the sea (Jonah 2:6), the bank or shore of the sea (Job 38:10, NASB, “bolt”), of strong fortifications and impediments (Isa. 45:2; Amos 1:5).

BAR- (Aram., “son”). A patronymic sign, used like Ben, which had the same meaning. Ben, however, prevails in the pure Heb. names of the OT, and Bar in those of the NT, because bar was much more used in the Aram. and Syr. languages.

BARAB´BAS (bar-ab´as; Gk. barabbas, for Aram. barabbā, “son of the father,” or “Abba”). A robber who had committed murder in an insurrection (Mark 15:7; Luke 23:19) in Jerusalem and was lying in prison at the time of the trial of Jesus before Pilate, A.D. 29. The latter, in his anxiety to save Jesus, proposed to release Him to the people, in accordance with their demand that he should release one prisoner to them at the Passover. Barabbas was guilty of the crimes of murder and sedition, making him liable to both Roman and Jewish law. But the Jews were so bent on the death of Jesus that of the two they preferred pardoning this double criminal (Matt. 27:20; Mark 15:11; Luke 23:18; John 18:40). “And wishing to satisfy the multitude, Pilate released Barabbas for them, and after having Jesus scourged, he delivered Him over to be crucified” (Mark 15:15).

BAR´ACHEL (bar´a-kel; “God has blessed”). The father of Elihu the Buzite, one of four persons who visited Job in his affliction (Job 32:2, 6).

BARACHI´AH. See Berechiah.

BARACHI´AS. See Berechiah; Zechariah.

BA´RAH. See Beth-barah.

BAR´AK (bār´ak; “lightning”). The son of Abinoam of Kedesh, a city of refuge in the tribe of Naphtali (Judg. 4:6). He was summoned by the prophetess Deborah to take the field against the army of the Canaanitish king, Jabin, commanded by Sisera, with a force of ten thousand men from the tribes of Naphtali and Zebulun. He was further instructed to proceed to Mt. Tabor, for Jehovah would draw Sisera and his host to meet him at the river Kishon and deliver him into his hand. Barak consented only on the condition that Deborah would go with him, which she readily promised. Sisera, being informed of Barak’s movements, proceeded against him with his whole army, including nine hundred chariots. At a signal given by the prophetess, the little army, seizing the opportunity of a providential storm, boldly rushed down the hill and utterly routed the host of the Canaanites. The victory was decisive: Harosheth-hagoyim was taken, Sisera murdered, and Jabin ruined (chap. 4), between 1195 and 1155 B.C. The victory was celebrated by a beautiful hymn of praise composed by Barak in conjunction with Deborah (chap. 5). Barak appears in the list of the faithful of the OT (Heb. 11:32).

BARAKEL. See Barachel.

BARBARIAN (Gk. barbaros, “rude”). Originally the term was the Gk. epithet for a people speaking any language other than Gk. After the Persian wars it began to carry with it associations of hatred and to imply vulgarity and lack of culture. The Romans were originally included by the Greeks under the name barbaroi, but after the conquest of Greece and the transference of Greek art and culture to Rome, the Romans took the same position as the Greeks before them and designated as barbarians all who in language and manners differed from the Greco-Roman world. The word barbarian is applied in the NT, but not reproachfully, to the inhabitants of Malta (Acts 28:4, see marg.), who were of Phoenician or Punic origin, and to those nations that had indeed some refinement of manners but not the opportunity of becoming Christians, such as the Scythians (Col. 3:11). The phrase “Greeks and ... barbarians” (Rom. 1:14) means “all peoples.”

BARBER (Heb. gallāb). Occurs but once in the Scriptures (Ezek. 5:1); but, inasmuch as great attention was paid to the hair and beard among the ancients, the barber must have been a well-known tradesman. See Hair.

BAREFOOT (Heb. yāḥēf, “unshod,” Jer. 2:25). In the East great importance was attached to the clothing, and feelings respecting it were peculiarly sensitive, so that a person was looked upon as stripped and naked if he only removed an outer garment. To go “barefoot” was an indication of great distress (Isa. 20:2–4; 2 Sam. 15:30). Persons were also accustomed to removing their shoes when coming to places accounted holy (Ex. 3:5).

BARHU'MITE (bar-hū'mīt). A transposed form (2 Sam. 23:31) of the Gentile name Baharumite (which see).

BARIAH (ba-rī'ah). The third son of Shemaiah, a royal descendant of David (1 Chron. 3:22).

BAR-JE'SUS (bar-jī'sus; “son of Joshua”). Otherwise called Elymas (which see), a demonized sorcerer-magician who withstood Barnabas and Paul (Acts 13:6–12).

BARJO'NA (bar-jō'na; “son of Jonah”). The patronymic of the apostle Peter (Matt. 16:17; cf. John 1:42).

BAR'KOS (bar'kos). The head of one of the families of Temple servants that returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:53; Neh. 7:55), 536 B.C.

BARLEY. See Vegetable Kingdom.

BAR'NABAS (bar'na-bas; Gk. from Aram. barnā-bûâ, “son of prophecy,” especially as it is manifested in exhortation and comfort). The name given by the apostles to Joseph (Acts 4:36), probably on account of his eminence as a Christian teacher.

Charity. Barnabas was a native of Cyprus and a Levite by extraction. Possessing land, he generously disposed of it for the benefit of the Christian community and laid the money at the apostles' feet (Acts 4:36–37). As this transaction occurred soon after the Day of Pentecost, he must have been an early convert to Christianity.

Associated with Paul. When Paul made his first appearance in Jerusalem, Barnabas brought him to the apostles and attested to his sincerity (Acts 9:27). Word being brought to Jerusalem of the revival at Antioch, Barnabas (who is described as “a good man, and full of the Holy Spirit and of faith,” 11:24) was sent to make inquiry. Finding the work to be genuine, he labored among them for a time; fresh converts were added to the church through his personal efforts. He then went to Tarsus to obtain the assistance of Saul, who returned with him to Antioch, where they labored for a whole year (11:19–26). In anticipation of the famine predicted by Agabus, the Christians at Antioch made a contribution for their poor brethren at Jerusalem and sent it by the hands of Barnabas and Saul (11:27–30), A.D. 44. They, however, speedily returned, bringing with them John Mark, a nephew of the former (12:25).

First Missionary Journey. By divine direction (Acts 13:2) they were separated to the office of missionaries and as such visited Cyprus and some of the principal cities in Asia Minor (13:14). At Lystra, because of a miracle performed by Paul, they were taken for gods, the people calling Barnabas Zeus (14:8–12). Returning to Antioch, they found the peace of the church disturbed by a certain sect from Judea, who insisted upon the Gentile converts being circumcised. Paul and Barnabas, with others, were sent to Jerusalem to consult with the apostles and elders. They returned to communicate the result of the conference, accompanied by Judas and Silas (15:1–32).

Second Missionary Journey. As they prepared for a second missionary journey, a dispute arose between Paul and Barnabas on account of John Mark. Barnabas determined to take Mark with them; Paul was not sure that they should. The contention became so sharp that they separated, Barnabas with Mark going to Cyprus, while Paul and Silas went through Syria and Cilicia (Acts 15:36–41). At this point Barnabas disappears from the record of the Acts. Several times he is mentioned in the writings of Paul, but nothing special is noted save that Barnabas was at one time led away by Judaizing zealots. All else is a matter of inference.

BARREL. The English term barrel, from Heb. kad, appears only in the KJV. In the NASB it is replaced by bowl (marg., lit. “pitcher,” 1 Kings 17:12, 14, 16) and pitcher (1 Kings 18:33). The NIV renders it “jar” (1 Kings 17:12, 14, 16; 18:33) consistently. See Bowl; Pitcher.

BARREN (Heb. āqār, when spoken of persons). Barrenness, in the East, was looked upon as a ground of great reproach as well as a punishment from God (1 Sam. 1:6; Isa. 47:9; 49:21; Luke 1:7, 25; etc.). Instances of childless wives are found in Gen. 11:30; 25:21; 29:31; Judg. 13:2–3; and Luke 1:7, 36. Certain marriages were forbidden by Moses and were visited with barrenness (Lev. 20:20–21). The reproach attached to barrenness, especially among the Hebrews, was doubtless due to the constant expectation of the Messiah and the hope cherished by every woman that she might be the mother of the promised Seed. In order to avoid the disgrace of barrenness, women gave their handmaidens to their husbands, regarding the children born under such circumstances as their own (Gen. 16:2; 30:3).

BARSAB'AS (bar-sab'as; “son of Sabas”). A surname.

1. Of Joseph, a disciple who was nominated along with Matthias to succeed Judas Iscariot in the apostleship (Acts 1:23).

2. Of Judas, who, with Silas, was sent to Antioch in the company of Paul and Barnabas (Acts 15:22).

BARTHOL'OMEW (bar-thol'o-mū; “son of Tolmai”). One of the twelve apostles of Jesus, and generally supposed to have been the same person who in John's gospel is called Nathanael.

Name and Family. In the first three gospels (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:14) Philip and Bartholomew are constantly named together, whereas Nathanael is not mentioned. In the fourth gospel Philip and Nathanael are similarly combined, but nothing is said of Bartholomew. Nathanael must therefore be considered his real name, whereas Bartholomew merely expresses his filial relation (Kitto).

Personal History. If this may be taken as true, he was born in Cana of Galilee (John 21:2). Philip, having accepted Jesus, told Bartholomew that he had “found Him of whom Moses in the Law and also the Prophets wrote, Jesus of Nazareth.” To his question, “Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?” Philip replied, “Come and see.” His fastidious reluctance was soon dispelled. Jesus, as He saw him coming to Him, uttered the eulogy “Behold an Israelite, indeed, in whom is no guile!” (John 1:45–47). He was appointed with the other apostles (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:14), was one of the disciples to whom the Lord appeared after the resurrection (John 21:2), was a witness of the ascension, and returned with the other apostles to Jerusalem (Acts 1:4, 12–13). Tradition only speaks of his subsequent history. He is said to have preached the gospel in India (probably Arabia Felix); others say in Armenia, and report him to have been flayed alive there, then crucified with his head downward.

Character. Nathanael “seems to have been one of those calm, retiring souls whose whole sphere of existence lies not here, but ‘where, beyond these voices, there is peace.’ It was a life of which the world sees nothing, because it was ‘hid with Christ in God’” (Farrar).

BARTIMAE’US (bar-ti-mā’us; “son of Timaeus”). A blind beggar of Jericho who sat by the wayside begging as our Lord went out of the city on His last journey to Jerusalem (Mark 10:46). Hearing that Jesus was passing, he cried for mercy, and in answer to his faith he was miraculously cured and “began following Him on the road” (v. 52).

BA’RUCH (ba’ruk; “blessed”).

1. The son of Zabbai. He repaired (445 B.C.) that part of the wall of Jerusalem between the Angle of Zion and the house of Eliashib the high priest (Neh. 3:20) and joined in Nehemiah’s covenant (10:6).

2. Son of Col-hozeh, a descendant of Perez, a son of Judah. His son Maaseiah dwelt in Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 11:5).

3. Son of Neriah and brother of Seraiah, who held an honorable office in Zedekiah’s court (Jer. 32:12; 36:4; 51:59). Baruch was the faithful friend and scribe of Jeremiah. In the fourth year of King Jehoiakim (about 604 B.C.), Baruch was directed to write all the prophecies delivered by Jeremiah and read them to the people. This he did in the “Lord’s house” both that and the succeeding year. He afterward read them privately to the king’s counselors, telling them that he had received them through the prophet’s dictation. The king, when the roll was brought to him, cut it and threw it into the fire. He ordered the arrest of Jeremiah and Baruch, but they could not be found. Baruch wrote another roll, including all that was in the former and an additional prediction of the ruin of Jehoiakim and his house (chap. 36). Terrified by the threats in the prophetic roll, he received the assurance that he should be spared from the calamities that would befall Judah (chap. 45). During the siege of Jerusalem Jeremiah purchased the territory of Hanamel and deposited the deed with Baruch (32:12), 590 B.C. Baruch was accused of influencing Jeremiah in favor of the Chaldeans (Jer. 43:3; cf. 37:13), and he was thrown into prison with the prophet, where he remained until the capture of Jerusalem (Josephus Ant. 10.9.1). By the permission of Nebuchadnezzar he lived with Jeremiah at Mizpah but was afterward forced to go to Egypt (Jer. 43:6–7). Nothing certain is known of the close of his life. According to one tradition, he went to Babylon upon the death of Jeremiah, where he died, the twelfth year after the destruction of Jerusalem. There are two apocryphal books that purport to be the productions of Baruch.

BARZIL’LAI (bar-zil’î; “of iron”).

1. A wealthy and aged Gileadite of Rogelim, who showed great hospitality to David when he fled beyond the Jordan from his son Absalom, c. 967 B.C. He sent in a liberal supply of provisions, beds, and other conveniences for the use of the king’s followers (2 Sam. 17:27–29). On the king’s triumphant return Barzillai accompanied him over the Jordan but declined on account of his age (being eighty years old), and perhaps from a feeling of independence, to proceed to Jerusalem and end his days at court. He, however, recommended his son Chimham to the royal favor (19:31–39). On his deathbed David recalled this kindness and commended Barzillai’s children to the care of Solomon (1 Kings 2:7).

2. A Meholathite, father of Adriel, who was the husband of Mereb, Saul’s daughter (2 Sam. 21:8), before 1021 B.C.

3. A priest who married a descendant of Barzillai (no. 1) and assumed the same name. His genealogy became so confused that his descendants, on the return from captivity, were set aside as unfit for the priesthood (Ezra 2:61; Neh. 7:63–64), before 536 B.C.

BASE´MATH (bas’e-math; “fragrance”).

1. A daughter of Ishmael, the last married of the three wives of Esau (Gen. 36:3–4, 13), from whose son Reuel four tribes of the Edomites were descended. When first mentioned she is called Mahalath (28:9), while, on the other hand, the name Basemath is given in the narrative (26:34) to another of Esau’s wives, the daughter of Elon the Hittite. It may have been the original name of one and the name given to the other upon her marriage, for “as a rule, the women received new names when they were married.”

2. A daughter of Solomon who became the wife of Ahimaaz, one of the king’s deputies (1 Kings 4:15), about 965 B.C.

BA´SHAN (bā’shan). This territory extended from Gilead in the S to Hermon on the N, and from the Jordan to Salecah, the present Salkhat, on the E, and included Edrei (Deut. 3:10; Josh. 9:10), Ashtaroth (Deut. 1:4; Josh. 9:10; etc.), the present Tell-Ashtur, and Golan (Deut. 4:43; Josh. 20:8; 21:27). Golan, one of its cities, was a city of refuge. Its productiveness was noted in the OT (Ps. 22:12; Jer. 50:19). The western part is exceedingly fertile today. On the E rise the Hauran Mountains to a height of six thousand feet. It was noted for its fine breed of cattle (Deut. 32:14; Ezek. 39:18). The cities are described by Moses as “cities fortified with high walls, gates and bars” (Deut. 3:5). The inhabitants were giantlike men who were called Rephaim in the era of Abraham (Gen. 14:5).

Some of the deserted towns are as perfect as when inhabited. When Israel entered Canaan, Argob, a province of Bashan, contained sixty fenced cities (Deut. 3:4–5; 1 Kings 4:13). After the Exile Bashan was divided into four districts: Gaulonitis, or Jaulan, the western; Auranitis, or Hauran (Ezek. 47:16); Argob, or Trachonitis; and Batanaea, now Ard-el-Bathanyeh.

BA´SHAN, MOUNTAIN OF. In Ps. 68:15 the poet says, “A mountain of God is the mountain of Bashan;/A mountain of many peaks is the mountain of Bashan.” “This epithet, not applicable to the long, level edge of the tableland, might refer either to the lofty triple summits of Hermon, or to the many broken cones that are scattered across Bashan, and so greatly differ in their volcanic form from the softer, less imposing heights of western Palestine” (Smith, Hist. Geog., p. 550).

BA´SHAN-HA´VVOTH-JA´IR (bā-shan-ha’voth-jā’re; “The Bashan of the villages of Jair”). The name given by Jair to the places he had conquered in Bashan (Deut. 3:14, KJV). It contained sixty cities with walls and bronze gates (Josh. 13:30; 1 Kings 4:13). In Num. 32:41 it is called Havvoth-jair, which is the correct name (NASB; NIV; also KJV, but with only one “v”). The NASB correctly translates Deut. 3:14: “... Jair called it, that is, Bashan, after his own name, Havvoth-jair, as it is to this day.”

BASH´EMATH. See Basemath.

BASIN. This word is used for dishes, containers, and bowls of various descriptions.

(1) A large bowl, Heb. mizrāq, was a part of the furnishing of the Tabernacle and the Temple, particularly in service at the altar of burnt offering (Num. 4:14) to hold the grain offering (7:13) and to receive sacrificial blood (Zech. 9:15; 14:20). It was commonly made of gold or silver, sometimes of bronze (Ex. 27:3; Num. 7:84). In inordinate reveling, wine is said to be drunk from such bowls (Amos 6:6). (2) A smaller vessel, Heb. aggān, was a vessel for washing, a laver (Ex. 24:6). It was also a wine cup (Isa. 22:24; song of Sol. 7:2, translated “goblet”). See Laver. (3) A shallow vessel, Heb. sap. Such basins were of several types: utensils for holding the animal’s blood (Ex. 12:22; Jer. 52:19), containers for the oil for the sacred candlestick (1 Kings 7:50), basins for domestic purposes (2 Sam. 17:28), and cups for drinking (Zech. 12:2). The basin from which our Lord washed the disciples’ feet (John 13:5) was called a niptēr signifying, evidently, a utensil for washing. See Bowl; Cup. M.F.U.

BASKET. No fewer than five common Heb. words are used to denote baskets or containers of different sizes, shapes, and construction. Ancient art reliefs and sculptures and the etymological meaning of the words used show that the baskets were frequently woven or made of fiber from leaves of the palm tree or rushes, leaves, and twigs. Some were used especially for holding bread (Gen. 40:16–18; Ex. 29:3, 23; Lev. 8:2, 26, 31; Num. 6:15, 17, 19). Egyptian bread baskets appear on ancient tombs. Baskets were also used in gathering grapes (Jer. 6:9, KJV) and carrying fruit (Amos 8:1–2). In Egypt heavy burdens such as grain were carried in large baskets swung from a pole hung on the shoulders. In the NT baskets are described as sometimes large enough to hold a man. Paul was lowered from the wall of Damascus in such a hamper (2 Cor. 11:33). M.F.U.

BAS’MATH. See Basemath.

BASTARD. The word occurs in the KJV in Deut. 23:2 and Zech. 9:6 (NASB, see Zech. 9:6, marg.). Its etymology is obscure, but it appears to denote anyone to whose birth a serious stain is attached. The rabbis applied the term not to any illegitimate offspring but to the issue of any connection within the degrees prohibited by the law (see Marriage). A very probable conjecture is that which applies the term to the offspring of heathen prostitutes in the neighborhood of Palestine who were priestesses of a sort to the Syrian goddess Astarte. In Zech. 9:6, the word is, doubtless, used in the sense of foreigner (so NIV; the NASB reads “mongrel”), expressing the deep degradation of Philistia in being conquered by other people.

1. Persons of illegitimate birth among the Jews had no claim to a share in the paternal inheritance or to the proper filial treatment of children of the family. This is what is referred to in Heb. 12:8, where a contrast is drawn between the treatment that God’s true children might expect, as compared with that given to such as are not so related to Him but are “illegitimate.”

2. Persons of illegitimate birth are forbidden by the canon law from receiving any of the minor orders without a dispensation from the bishop; nor can they in the Latin church be admitted to holy orders or to benefices with cure of souls, except by a dispensation from the pope. In the Church of England a bastard cannot be admitted to orders without a dispensation from the sovereign or archbishop.

BATH. See Metrology: Liquid Measures of Capacity.

BATHE, BATHING (Heb. rāḥaṣ). The hot climate of the East, with its abundant dust, made bathing a constant necessity for the preservation and invigoration of health. This natural necessity was greatly furthered among the Israelites by the religious purifications enjoined by the law. For although these precepts had the higher object of teaching personal purity, they could not fail to intensify the instinct of cleanliness and to make frequent washing and bathing an indispensable arrangement of life.

The Israelites, from early times, were accustomed not only to wash the hands and feet before eating but also to bathe the body when about to visit a superior (Ruth 3:3), after mourning, which always implied defilement (2 Sam. 12:20), but especially before any religious service (Gen. 35:2; Ex. 19:10; Josh. 3:5; 1 Sam. 16:5), that they might appear clean before God. The high priest at his inauguration (Lev. 8:6) and on the day of atonement before each act of propitiation (16:4, 24) was also to bathe. Snow water was used to cleanse the body or lye was put into the water (Job 9:30), also bran, according to the Mishna. Bathing in running water (Lev. 15:13) or in rivers (2 Kings 5:10; Ex. 2:5) was especially favored. Baths were placed in the courts of private houses (2 Sam. 11:2; Susanna 15). In the later Temple there were bathrooms over the chambers for the use of the priests. The “pools,” such as those of Siloam and Hezekiah (2 Kings 20:20; Neh. 3:15–16; Isa. 22:11; John 9:7), were public baths by NT times, no doubt introduced in imitation of a Roman and Greek custom.

BATHSHEBA (bath-she'ba; “daughter of the oath”). Daughter of Eliam (2 Sam. 11:3), or Ammiel (1 Chron. 3:5), the granddaughter of Ahithophel (2 Sam. 23:34) and wife of Uriah. She had illicit intercourse with David while her husband was absent at the siege of Rabbah, about 980 B.C. Uriah was slain by a contrivance of David, and after a period of mourning for her husband Bathsheba was legally married to the king (11:3–27). The child that was the fruit of her adulterous intercourse with David died, but she became the mother of four sons—Solomon, Shimea (Shammua), Shobab, and Nathan (2 Sam. 5:14; 1 Chron. 3:5). When Adonijah attempted to set aside in his own favor the succession promised to Solomon, Bathsheba was employed by Nathan the prophet to inform the king of the conspiracy and received from him an answer favorable to Solomon (1 Kings 1:11–31). After the accession of Solomon she, as queen-mother, requested permission of her son for Adonijah to take in marriage Abishag the Shunammite (2:21). The request was refused and became the occasion of the execution of Adonijah (2:24–25).

BATTLE-AXE. See Armor.

BATTLE-BOW. See Armor.

BATTLEMENT. A wall or lattice surrounding the flat roofs of an Eastern house, regarded as a protection against accidents (Deut. 22:8; “parapet,” NASB, NIV). The term may also refer to the parapet of a city wall (Jer. 5:10; but see NASB and NIV, which read “branches”). Battlement appears in the KJV, NASB, and NIV, but not in the same verses.

BAV'VAI (bav'ī). A son of Henadad, and ruler of the half part of Keilah. He repaired a portion of the wall of Jerusalem on the return from Babylon (Neh. 3:18), 445 B.C.

BAY (Heb. lāshôn, “tongue”). The cove of the Dead Sea, at the mouth of the Jordan (Josh. 15:5; 18:19) and also of the southern extremity of the same sea (15:2). The same term is used (in the original) with reference to the forked mouths of the Nile (“the tongue of the Sea of Egypt,” Isa. 11:15).

BAY. The color, according to the RV, of one of the spans of horses in the vision of Zechariah (6:3, 7). It is the rendering of strong (NASB). Keil and Delitzsch translate “speckled, powerful horses” (Com., ad loc.).

BAY TREE. See Vegetable Kingdom.

BAZ'LITH (baz'lith). The head of one of the families of the Temple servants that returned to Jerusalem from the Exile (Neh. 7:54). He is called Bazluth in Ezra 2:52. The NIV renders Bazluth in both passages.

BAZ'LUTH (baz'luth). Another form of Bazlith (which see).

BDELLIUM. See Mineral Kingdom.

BEACH (Gk. algialos). A shore, on which the waves dash (Matt. 13:2, 48; John 21:4; Acts 21:5; 27:39–40). See also Seashore, Seacoast.

BEALI'AH (bē-a-li'a; “whose Lord is Jehovah”). One of the Benjamite heroes who went over to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:5), before 1000 B.C.

BE'ALOTH (bē'a-lōth).

1. A town in the southern part of Judah, i.e., in Simeon (Josh. 15:24), probably the same as Baalath-beer (19:8).

2. A district in Asher of which Baanah was deputy (1 Kings 4:16); NIV Aloth (which see).

BEAM. See Log.

BEAN. See Vegetable Kingdom.

BEAR (KJV, “Arcturus”). A part of the constellation Bootes and one of the three most brilliant stars of the Southern Hemisphere in line with the tail of Ursa Major, “the Great Bear.” See Job 9:9; 38:32. For the animal, see Animal Kingdom.

BEARD. See Hair.

BEAST. See Animal Kingdom.

Figurative. In a figurative or symbolical sense, the term frequently occurs in Scripture and generally refers to the sensual and groveling or ferocious and brutal natures properly belonging to the brute creation. The psalmist speaks of himself as being “like a beast” before God, while giving way to merely sensuous considerations (Ps. 73:22). The word is sometimes used figuratively of brutal men. Hence the phrase “I fought with wild beasts at Ephesus” (1 Cor. 15:32, cf. Acts 19:29) is a figurative description of a fight with strong and exasperated enemies. For a similar use of the word see Eccles. 3:18; 2 Pet. 2:12; Jude 10.

A wild beast is the symbol of selfish, tyrannical monarchies. The four beasts in Dan. 7:3, 17, 23, represent four kingdoms (Ezek. 34:28; Jer. 12:9).

In the Apocalypse the Beast obviously means a worldly power whose rising out of the sea indicates that it owes its origin to the commotions of the people (Rev. 13:1; 15:2; 17:8).

The “four beasts” (Gk. zōa, “living creatures,” not thêrion, “beast” in the strict sense) of the KJV of Rev. 4:6 should be rendered “four living ones” or “four living creatures” (so NASB and NIV). See Cherub, Cherubim.

BEATING. A punishment in universal use throughout the East. It appears to be designated by the Heb. phrase “rod of discipline,” shebet mûsār (Prov. 22:15).

Beating with rods (“scourging,” Matt. 27:26; “chastising,” Deut. 22:18) was established by law and was quite common among the Jews (Prov. 10:13; 26:3). The person to be punished was extended upon the ground and blows, not exceeding forty, were applied to his back in the presence of a judge (Deut. 25:2–3). Among the Egyptians, ancient and modern, minor offenses were generally punished with the stick, and persons who refused to pay taxes were frequently brought to terms by a vigorous use of the stick. Superintendents were wont to stimulate laborers by the persuasive powers of the rod. The punishment was inflicted on both sexes. See Punishments.

BEAUTIFUL MANTLE FROM SHINAR (Heb., “cloak of Shinar [or Babylon]”). An ample robe with figures of men and animals either embroidered or interwoven in the fashion for which the Babylonians were noted. It came to mean a valuable piece of clothing in general (Josh. 7:21).

BEAUTIFUL TREES (Heb. ēṣ hādār, “trees of ornament”). The Israelites were directed to take “the foliage of beautiful trees, palm branches and boughs of leafy trees and willows of the brook; and ... rejoice before the Lord your God for seven days,” i.e., to carry them about in festive procession (Lev. 23:40). This was to be done on the first day of the feast of Booths (see Festivals) in memory of their having dwelt in booths. The expression “beautiful trees” probably included not only the orange and citron, which were placed in gardens for ornament rather than for use, but also myrtles, olive trees, and others that had beauty or pleasant odor.

BEB´AI (be´baī).

1. The head of one of the families that returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (about 536 B.C.) to the number of 623 (Ezra 2:11) or 628 (Neh. 7:16). At a later period 28 more, under Zechariah, returned with Ezra (Ezra 8:11), about 457 B.C. Several of his sons were among those who had taken foreign wives (10:28).

2. The name of one who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:15), 445 B.C.

BE´CHER (be´ker; “firstborn,” or “a young camel,” cf. Arab. bakr, “young camel”).

1. The second son of Benjamin, according to the list of both in Gen. 46:21 and 1 Chron. 7:6 but omitted in 8:1. Some suppose that the word “first-born” in the latter passage is a corruption of Becher; others, that Becher in the two passages above is a corruption of the word signifying “first-born.” Yet 7:8 gives Becher as a person and names his sons. He was one of the sons of Benjamin that came down to Egypt with Jacob, being one of the fourteen descendants of Rachel who settled there. At the numbering of the Israelites in the plain of Moab (Num. 26) there is no family named after him. But there is a Becher and a family of Becherites among the sons of Ephraim. This has given rise to the supposition that the slaughter of the sons of Ephraim by the men of Gath had sadly thinned the house of Ephraim of its males, and that Becher, or his heir, married an Ephraimitish heiress, a daughter of Shuthelah (1 Chron. 7:20–21), and so his house was reckoned in the house of Ephraim.

2. Son of Ephraim; called Bered (1 Chron. 7:20); his posterity were called Becherites (Num. 26:35). He is probably the same as the preceding.

BECO´RATH (be-ko´rath; “firstborn”). The son of Aphiah, of the tribe of Benjamin, one of the ancestors of King Saul (1 Sam. 9:1), long before 1030 B.C.

BED. A common article of domestic furniture. In the ancient Near East, however, the poor and travelers often slept on the ground, using their outer garment as a covering (Gen. 28:11; Ex. 22:26–27). Sometimes a bed might be no more than a mat of rough material easily carried about (Matt. 9:6), but regular beds raised above the ground to protect from dampness and drafts were in existence early (Deut. 3:11). The wealthy of Amos's day in the eighth century B.C. had beds of ivory (Amos 6:4) and expensive coverings and cushions (3:12). Beds of the wealthy often had a canopy. The Jewish bed may be described in five principal parts: (1) Mattress. A mere matter of one or more garments. (2) Covering. A finer garment than used for the mattress. In summer, a thin blanket or an outer garment worn by day (1 Sam. 19:13) was sufficient. Hence the Mosaic law provided that this garment should not be kept in pledge after sunset, that the poor might not be without his covering (Deut. 24:13). (3) Pillow, mentioned in 1 Sam. 19:13 (NASB, "quilt"; NIV, "garment"), apparently a material woven of goat's hair with which persons in the East covered the head and face while sleeping. (4) The Bedstead. This was not always necessary. The divan or platform along the side or end of an oriental room serving as a support for the bed with a frame seems implied in such references as 2 Sam. 3:31; 2 Kings 4:10; Esther 1:6. (5) Ornamental Portions. These consisted of pillows, a canopy, ivory carvings, and probably mosaic work, purple, and fine linen (Esther 1:6; song of Sol. 3:9–10; Amos 6:4). M.F.U.

BE'DAD (be'dad; "separation"). The father of Hadad, a king in Edom (Gen. 36:35; 1 Chron. 1:46).

BE'DAN (be'dan).

1. The name of a judge of Israel, not found in Judges but only in 1 Sam. 12:11. It is difficult to identify him with any of the judges mentioned elsewhere, but it is probable that Bedan is a contracted form for the name of the Judge Abdon (which see). The NIV identifies Bedan with Barak (which see).

2. The son of Ulam, the great-grandson of Manasseh (1 Chron. 7:17).

BEDCHAMBER. See Bedroom.

BEDE'IAH (be-de'ya). One of the family of Bani who divorced his Gentile wife on the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:35), 456 B.C.

BEDROOM (Heb. ḥādar hammiṭṭôt, "room of beds," 2 Kings 11:2; 2 Chron. 22:11; ḥādar mishkāb, "sleeping room," Ex. 8:3; 2 Sam. 4:7; 2 Kings 6:12). The "bedroom" in the Temple where Joash was hidden was probably a room used for storing beds (2 Kings 11:2; 2 Chron. 22:11). The position of the bedroom in the most remote and secret parts of the palace seems marked in the passages Ex. 8:3; 2 Kings 6:12.

BEDSTEAD. See Bed.

BEE. See Animal Kingdom.

BEELI'ADA (be-el-i'a-da; "Baal has known"). One of David's sons, born in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 14:7), after 1000 B.C. He is called Eliada (2 Sam. 5:16; 1 Chron. 3:8).

BEEL'ZEBUB. See Beelzebul.

BEEL'ZEBUL (be-el'ze-bul), a heathen deity. Believed to be the prince of evil spirits (Matt. 10:25; 12:24, 27; Mark 3:22; Luke 11:15–28). By some Beelzebul is thought to mean ba'al zebel, the "dung god," an expression intended to designate with loathing the prince of all moral impurity. It is supposed, at the same time, that the name Beelzebub, the Philistine god of flies, was changed to Beelzebul ("god of dung") and employed in an approbrious way as a name of the devil. Others prefer to derive the word from ba'al zebul, the "lord of the dwelling" in which evil spirits dwell. The fact that Jesus designates Himself as “master of the house” would seem to indicate that Beelzebul had a similar meaning. See Gods, False.

BE´ER (be´er; Heb. בְּעַר, an artificial “well.” Distinguished from En, a “natural” spring). It is usually combined with other words as a prefix, but two places are known simply by this name:

1. A place in the desert on the confines of Moab, where the Hebrews dug a well with their staves and received a miraculous supply of water (Num. 21:16–18). It is probably the same as Beer-elim (Isa. 15:8).

2. A town in Judah to which Jotham fled for fear of Abimelech (Judg. 9:21), probably about eight Roman miles N of Eleutheropolis, the present el Bireth, near the mouth of the Wadi es Surâr.

BEE´RA (be-er´a; a “well”). The last given of the sons of Zophah, a descendant of Asher (1 Chron. 7:37).

BEE´RAH (be-er´a; a “well”). The son of Baal, a prince of the tribe of Reuben, carried into captivity by the Assyrian Tiglath-pileser (1 Chron. 5:6).

BE´ER-E´LIM (be´er-e´lim; “well of heroes”). A spot named in Isa. 15:8 as around the “territory of Moab,” probably the S, Eglaim being on the N end of the Dead Sea. It seems to be the same as Beer (Num. 21:16).

BEE´RI (be-er-i; “of a fountain,” or “well”).

1. A Hittite, and father of Judith, a wife of Esau (Gen. 26:34), about 1950 B.C.

2. The father of the prophet Hosea (Hos. 1:1), before 748 B.C.

BE´ER-LAHAI´-ROI (be´er-la-hi´roi; “the well of him that liveth and seeth me,” or “the well of the vision of life”). The fountain between Kadesh and Bered, near which the Lord found Hagar (Gen. 16:7, 14). In 24:62; 25:11 the KJV has “the well Lahai-roi.”

BEE´ROTH (be-e´roth; “wells”).

1. One of the four cities of the Hivites who made a covenant with Joshua (Josh. 9:17). Beeroth was allotted to Benjamin (18:25), in whose possession it continued at the time of David, the murderers of Ish-bosheth belonging to it (2 Sam. 4:2). Beeroth, with Chephirah and Kiriath-jearim, is in the list of those who returned from Babylon (Ezra 2:25; Neh. 7:29).

2. Beeroth of the children of Jaakan is named (Num. 33:31–32; Deut. 10:6) as a place through which the Israelites passed twice in the desert, their twenty-seventh and thirty-third station on their way from Egypt to Canaan, probably in the valley of the Arabah.

BEE´ROTHITE (be-e´ro-thi´t). An inhabitant of Beeroth (which see) of Benjamin (2 Sam. 4:2; 23:37).

BE´ERSHEBA (be´er-she´ba; “well of the oath,” or “of seven”). A city in the southern part of Palestine, about midway between the Mediterranean Sea and the southern end of the Dead Sea. It received its name because of the digging of the well and making of a covenant between Abraham and Abimelech (Gen. 21:31). It was a favorite residence of Abraham and Isaac (26:33). The latter was living there when Esau sold his birthright to Jacob, and from the encampment around the wells Jacob started on his journey to Mesopotamia. He halted there to offer sacrifice to “the God of his father” on his way to Egypt (46:1). Beersheba was allotted to Simeon (1 Chron. 4:28), and Samuel’s sons were appointed deputy judges for the southernmost districts in Beersheba (1 Sam. 8:2). Elijah fled to Beersheba, which was still a refuge in the eighth century, and frequented even by northern Israel (Amos 5:5; 8:14). The expression “from Dan to Beersheba” was a formula for the whole land. During the separation of the kingdoms the formula became “from Geba to Beersheba,” or “from Beersheba to Mount Ephraim.” After the Exile, Beersheba was again peopled by Jews, and the formula ran “from Beersheba as far as the valley of Hinnom” (Neh. 11:30).

The biblical town of Beersheba has been located at Tel es-Saba (Tell Beersheba), about two miles NE of the modern city. Yohanan Aharoni directed a Tel Aviv University excavation there from 1969 to 1976. He discovered that the town had a Hebrew foundation, built in the twelfth and eleventh centuries B.C. Apparently unwallled, it probably was the place where the sons of Samuel judged the people (1 Sam. 8:2). Beersheba was fortified with a twelve-foot-thick wall in the tenth century. At that time the enclosed area was a little less than three acres in size. Aharoni found nothing at Tell Beersheba dating to the patriarchal period, and he concluded that patriarchal Beersheba was located near the valley and the wells, probably at Bir es-Saba, within the area of modern Beersheba. BE-ESHTE'RAH (be'esh-te'ra). One of the two Levitical cities allotted to the Gershonites, out of the tribe of Manasseh beyond the Jordan (Josh. 21:27). In the parallel list (1 Chron. 6:71) Ashtaroth is given; and Be-eshterah is only a contracted form of Beth-Ashtaroth, the “temple of Ashtoreth.”

BEGGAR (Heb. ʿebyôn, “destitute,” 1 Sam. 2:8, NASB, “needy”; Gk. ptōchos, Luke 16:20, 22; Gal. 4:9; elsewhere “poor”). A beggar, whose regular business it was to solicit alms publicly or to go promiscuously from door to door as understood by us, was unknown to the Pentateuchal legislation. The poor were allowed privileges by the Mosaic law, and indeed the Hebrew could not be an absolute pauper. His land was inalienable, except for a certain period; then it reverted to him or his posterity, and if this resource was insufficient he could pledge the services of himself and family for a valuable sum. In the song of Hannah (1 Sam. 2:8–9), however, beggars are spoken of, and beggary is predicted of the posterity of the wicked, while it was promised not to be the portion of the seed of the righteous (Pss. 37:25; 109:10). In the NT we read of beggars that were blind, diseased, and maimed seeking alms at the doors of the rich, by the waysides, and before the gate of the Temple (Mark 10:46; Luke 16:20–21; Acts 3:2).

BEGINNING (Heb. rēshîṭ, “first”). “In the beginning” (Gen. 1:1) is used in an absolute sense. However, the “beginning” of John 1:1 used of Christ, the Logos, antedates that of Gen. 1:1 and refers to the eternal preexistence of the Son. Genesis 1:1 merely gives the commencement of the physical universe and time. The “beginning” of 1 John 1:1 evidently refers to the commencement of Christ’s public ministry.

Our Lord is called “the Beginning” (Gk. archē) by both Paul and John (Col. 1:18; Rev. 1:8; 3:14), and it is interesting to note that the Greek philosophers expressed the First Cause of all things by the same name.

BEINGS, LIVING. A term appearing frequently in the NASB (Ezek. 1:5–25; 3:13; 10:15, 17, 20; Rev. 4:6). The KJV renders “living creatures.” See Cherub, Cherubim.

BEKA, BE´KAH (bē´kà). An early Jewish weight and coin, being half a shekel. See Metrology: Measures of Weight; Measures of Value, or Money.

BEKER, BEKERITE. See Becher.

BEL. The national god of Babylonia. See Gods, False.

BE´LA, BE´LAH (be´la; “swallowed”).

1. A king of Edom, the son of Beor, and a native of the city of Dinhabah (Gen. 36:32–33; 1 Chron. 1:43). From the name of his father, Beor, we may infer that he was a Chaldean by birth and reigned in Edom by conquest. He may have been contemporary with Moses and Balaam.

2. The eldest son of Benjamin (Gen. 46:21; 1 Chron. 7:6–7; 8:3), about 1640 B.C. From him came the family of the Belaites (Num. 26:38).

3. A son of Azaz, a Reubenite (1 Chron. 5:8), “who lived in Aroer, even to Nebo and Baal-meon.”

4. Another name (Gen. 14:2, 8) for the city of Zoar (which see).

BE´LAITE (be´la-īt). The patronymic (Num. 26:38) of the descendants of Bela, no. 2 (which see).

BE´LIAL (be´li-al; “worthlessness, wickedness”). Belial is often used in the KJV as if it were a proper name, but beyond question it should not be regarded in the OT as such, its meaning being “worthlessness,” and hence “recklessness, lawlessness.” The expression “son” or “man of Belial” must be understood as meaning simply a worthless, lawless fellow (Deut. 13:13, KJV; Judg. 19:22; 20:13, see marg.; etc.).

In the NT the term appears (in the best manuscripts) in the form Belias, and not Belial, as given in the KJV. The term, as used in 2 Cor. 6:15, is generally understood as applied to Satan, as the personification of all that is bad.

Belial occurs only once in the NASB and NIV (2 Cor. 6:15). Elsewhere in those translations the Heb. terms rendered “sons [or children] of Belial” in the KJV are given as “worthless men,” “worthless fellows,” or “wicked men,” often with a marginal reading, “lit., sons of Belial.”

BELIEVE. “To remain steadfast” (Heb. ʾāman, Gen. 15:6; Ex. 4:1; Num. 14:11; etc.). “To be persuaded” of God’s revealed truth (Gk. peithomai, Acts 17:4; 27:11; 28:24). “To adhere to, rely on” God’s promises (Gk. pisteuō, Matt. 8:13; Mark 5:36; John 3:16; etc.). Although belief as mere credence or confidence is exceedingly common and often the result of ignorance or deception and not grounded in facts of knowledge or truth, yet in a scriptural sense faith in its larger usage represents four principal ideas. The first is personal confidence in God; second, a creedal or doctrinal concept of the essential body of revealed truth (Luke 18:8; 1 Cor. 16:13; 2 Cor. 13:5, Col. 1:23; 2:7; Titus 1:13; Jude 3); third, faithfulness as an evidence or fruit of the believer’s trust in God (Gal. 5:22–23); fourth, a designation for Christ as the object of faith (3:23–25). As personal confidence in God, it is of immense importance to clearly distinguish three features of faith:

Saving faith is inward confidence in God’s promises and provisions in Christ for the salvation of sinners. It leads one to trust solely in the Person and work of the Savior Jesus Christ (John 3:16; 5:24; Eph. 2:8–10). Such faith gives the believer an unchangeable and unforfeitable position described in innumerable passages as being “in Christ” (Rom. 8:1; Eph. 1:3; etc.).

Sanctifying faith comprehends knowledge of and trust in our position “in Christ” (Rom. 6:1–10), so that one has experiential possession of Christ (Rom. 6:11). Compare Eph. 1–3, setting forth the believer’s position, with Eph. 4–6, his experience of that position. Sanctifying or sustaining faith appropriates the power of God for conforming one’s position in Christ to one’s enjoyment of the blessings of that position, but in no sense is it to be confused with saving faith, which results in that position. All believers have a position of sanctification (cf. 1 Cor. 1:2 with 3:1–3; 5:5), are “saints,” and by faith are to realize that position in practice in living a saintly life (Eph. 4:1; Col. 3:1–4). All believers who have exercised “saving faith” in Christ are what they are “in Him,” whether or not they ever realize it. The difference is that when they realize it and in faith act upon it, they begin to enjoy the benefits of it in daily living.

Serving faith, acts upon the truth of divinely bestowed spiritual gifts and maintains confidence in all the details of divine enablement and appointments for service. “The faith which you have, have as your own conviction before God” (Rom. 14:22). This faith is accordingly a personal, individual matter. See also Faith. M.F.U.

BELIEVERS (Gk. pistoi). A term applied to Christian converts (Acts 5:14; 1 Tim. 4:12). It signifies those who have exercised saving faith in the Person and work of Jesus Christ and who, as a result, have obtained a position that is denoted by the oft-recurring phrase in the NT “in Christ” (Rom. 8:1; 1 Cor. 1:2; Eph. 1:3; etc.). This “in Christ” position wrought by the baptizing work of the Holy Spirit (6:3–4; 1 Cor. 12:13; Gal. 3:27; Col. 2:9–12) is the basis of all the believer’s spiritual possessions. The NT presents Christian obligation as living in accordance with this position (Eph. 4:1; Rom. 6:11). The NT, therefore, presents the believer’s position as unchangeable and unforfeitable as a result of the efficacy of Christ’s atoning work and God’s faithfulness. M.F.U.

BELL (Heb. pa-āmon, something “struck,” Ex. 28:33–34; 39:25–26; m□šillâ, “tinkling,” Zech. 14:20). The bell is closely allied to the cymbal. The indentation of cymbals would be found to add to their vibrating power and sonority, and as this indentation became exaggerated nothing would be more probable than that they should eventually be formed into half-globes. This form is found in Roman and Greek sculpture. The most ancient bells yet discovered consist of a plate of metal, bent round and rudely riveted where the edges meet. Such were in use among the Assyrians and ancient Chinese.

1. Small golden bells were attached to the lower part of the blue robe (robe of the ephod) that formed part of the official dress of the high priest. These may have been partly for ornament but partly also for use, to ring as often as the high priest moved, so as to announce his approach and departure (Ex. 28:33–35).

2. In Isa. 3:16–18 reference is made to little tinkling bells (NASB, “bangles”; NIV, “ornaments”) that are worn to this day by women upon their wrists and ankles to attract attention and gain admiration.

3. “Bells of the horses” (Zech. 14:20) were probably concave pieces or plates of brass, that were sometimes attached to horses for the sake of ornament. These by their tinkling served to enliven the animals, and in the caravans served the purpose of our modern sheep bells. In the passage referred to the motto “Holy to the Lord,” which the high priest wore upon his turban and that was also inscribed upon the bells of horses, predicted the coming of a millennial age when all things, even to the lowest, should be sanctified to God.

BELLOWS (“blower”). The term bellows appears in Jer. 6:29 only, though other passages that speak of blowing the fire (Isa. 54:16; Ezek. 22:21) may refer to them; but as wood was the common fuel in ancient times, and kindles readily, a fan would generally be sufficient. Bellows seem to have been of great antiquity in Egypt, and were used at the forge or furnace. They were worked by the foot of the operator pressing alternately upon two skins till they were empty and pulling up each empty skin with a string held in his hand. The earliest specimens seem to have been simply of reed tipped with a metal point where it came in contact with the fire.

BELLY (Heb. usually beten, “hollow”; Gk. koilia; also Heb. mē’ām; Gk. gaster, especially the “bowels”). Among the Hebrews and most ancient nations the belly was regarded as the seat of the carnal affections, as being, according to their view, that which first partakes of sensual pleasures (Titus 1:12; Phil. 3:19; Rom. 16:18).

Figurative. It is used figuratively for the heart, the innermost recesses of the soul (Prov. 18:8; 20:27; 26:22). The “belly of hell” (KJV; NASB, “depth of Sheol”; NIV, “depths of the grave”), literally, “out of the womb of the nether world,” is a strong phrase to express Jonah’s dreadful condition in the deep (Jonah 2:2).

BELMANCY. Divination by arrows. See Magic.

BELSHAZ’ZAR (Bel-shuz’er; Akkad. Bel-shar-ušur, “Bel has protected the king”).

The eldest son and coregent of Nabonidus (539 B.C.), the last sovereign of the neo-Babylonian Empire. The following passage explicitly states that before Nabonidus started on his expedition to Tema in Arabia he entrusted actual kingship to Belshazzar: “He entrusted a campaign to his eldest, firstborn son; the troops of the land he sent with him. He freed his hand, he entrusted the kingship to him. Then he himself undertook a distant campaign. The power of the land of Akkad advanced with him; towards Tema in the midst of the Westland he set his face.... He himself established his dwelling in Tema.... That city he made glorious.... They made it like a palace of Babylon....” The Babylonian records indicate that Belshazzar became coregent in the third year of Nabonidus’s reign (553 B.C.) and continued in that capacity until the fall of Babylon (539 B.C.). The Nabunaid Chronicle states that in the seventh, ninth, tenth, and eleventh years “the king was in the city of Tema. The son of the king, the princes and the troops were in the land of Akkad (Babylonia).” During Nabonidus’s absence in Tema, the Nabunaid Chronicle explicitly indicates that the New Year’s Festival was not celebrated but that it was observed in the seventeenth year upon the king’s return home. Accordingly, it is evident that Belshazzar actually exercised the coregency in Babylon and that the Babylonian records in a remarkable manner supplement the biblical notices (Dan. 5; 7:1; 8:1). The book of Daniel is thus not in error in representing Belshazzar as the last king of Babylon, as negative criticism once believed, nor can it be said to be wrong in calling Belshazzar the son of Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. 5:2). Apparently Belshazzar was lineally related to Nebuchadnezzar because his mother, Nitrocris, seems to have been Nebuchadnezzar’s daughter. Moreover, “son of” in Semitic usage is equivalent to “successor of”; so one could properly be called a son of even if not in lineal descent (cf. R. P. Dougherty, Nabonidus and Belshazzar, [1929]). In the Assyrian records Jehu is called “the son of Omri”; actually Jehu was only a royal successor with no lineal relation at all. M.F.U.; H.F.V.

BEN ("son"). A Levite "of the second rank," one of the porters appointed by David to the service of the Ark (1 Chron. 15:18), 988 B.C.

BEN (Heb. ben, "son of"). Often used as a prefix to proper names in Scripture, the following word being either a proper name, an appellative, or geographical location, or even a number expressing age. Thus, a "son of twenty years" would mean twenty years old. Hadadezer Ben-rehob (cf. 2 Sam. 8:3) would mean Hadadezer of Beth-rehob, born or brought up in that place. A "son of valor" (Heb. ben hayil, cf. Deut. 3:18) would mean a valorous one. "Son of" may, of course, mean a lineal father-son relationship, as the term is used today (Gen. 4:25), or contrary to our usage may mean to bear a more remote descendant as a grandchild (46:24; 2 Kings 9:2, 20) or a great-grandchild (Gen. 46:18). The Israelites were known as "the sons of Jacob" (or Israel) for centuries after the death of the patriarch (Mal. 3:6). The seventy souls that "came from the loins of Jacob" (Ex. 1:5) included grandchildren. Usage extends to tribes or countries (Gen. 10:20–22) or even to a nonblood relation. Jehu, a usurper and founder of a new dynasty in Israel, and with no blood relationship whatever to the house of Omri, is nevertheless called "the son of Omri" in the Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser III of Assyria (D. D. Luckenbill, Ancient Records of Assyria and Babylonia, 1:590). M.F.U.

BENA'IAH (be-na'ya; "built by Jehovah").

1. The son of Jehoiada the chief priest (1 Chron. 27:5), and a native of Kabzeel (2 Sam. 23:20; 1 Chron. 11:22). He was placed by David (11:25) over his bodyguard of Cherethites and Pelethites (2 Sam. 8:18; 20:23; 1 Kings 1:38; 1 Chron. 18:17), and given a position above "the thirty" but not included among the first three of the "mighty men" (2 Sam. 23:22–23; 1 Chron. 11:24–25; 27:6). He was a valiant man, and his exploits against man and beast that gave him rank are recorded in 2 Sam. 23:21; 1 Chron. 11:22. He was captain of the host for the third month (27:5). Benaiah remained faithful to Solomon during Adonijah's attempt on the crown (1 Kings 1:8–10). Acting under Solomon's orders he killed Joab and was appointed to fill his position as commander of the army (2:33–35; 4:4), c. 938 B.C. Jehoiada, the son of Benaiah, succeeded Ahithophel as counselor to the king according to 1 Chron. 27:34. This is possibly a copyist's mistake for "Benaiah the son of Jehoiada."

2. A man of Pirathon, of the tribe of Ephraim, one of David's thirty mighty men (2 Sam. 23:30; 1 Chron. 11:31) and the captain of the host for the eleventh month (1 Chron. 27:14), 1000 B.C.

3. One of the leaders of the families of Simeon, who dispossessed the Amalekites from the pasture grounds of Gedor (1 Chron. 4:36), about 715 B.C.

4. A Levite in the time of David who played with "harps tuned to alamothe" at the removal of the Ark (1 Chron. 15:18, 20; 16:5), about 990 B.C.

5. A priest appointed to blow the trumpet before the Ark when David caused it to be moved to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 15:24; 16:6), about 990 B.C.

6. A Levite of the sons of Asaph, the son of Jeiel and grandfather of Jahaziel, who was sent by God to encourage the army of Jehoshaphat against the Moabites (2 Chron. 20:14), about 875 B.C.

7. A Levite in the time of Hezekiah who was one of the overseers of the offerings to the Temple (2 Chron. 31:13), 726 B.C.

8–11. Four Jews who had taken Gentile wives after the return from Babylon, 456 B.C. They were respectively of the “sons” of Parosh (Ezra 10:25), Pahath-moab (v. 30), Bani (v. 34), and Nebo (v. 43).

12. The father of Pelatiah, who was one of the “leaders of the people” in the time of Ezekiel (Ezek. 11:1), before 592 B.C.

BEN-ABIN´ADAB (ben-a-bin´a-dab). One of Solomon’s district governors, who ruled over the district of Dor (1 Kings 4:11).

BEN-AM´MI (ben-am´i; “son of my kindred”). A son of Lot by his youngest daughter. He was the progenitor of the Ammonites (Gen. 19:38), twentieth century B.C.

BENCH. See Deck of Boxwood.

BEN-DE´KAR (ben-de´kar; “stab”). The father of Solomon’s deputy in the second royal district, lying in the western part of the hill country of Judah and Benjamin, Shaalbim, and Beth-shemesh (1 Kings 4:9), before 960 B.C.

BEN-DE´KER. See Ben-Dekar.

BEN´E-BE´RAK (ben´e-be´rak; “sons of lightning”). One of the cities of Dan (Josh. 19:45), the present Ibn Abrak, four miles E of Joppa. Sennacherib mentions it as one of the cities besieged and taken by him.

BENEDICTION. An essential form of public worship was the priestly benediction, the form of which is prescribed in the law, “The Lord bless you, and keep you;/The Lord make his face shine on you,/And be gracious to you;/The Lord lift up His countenance on you,/And give you peace” (Num. 6:24–26), the promise being added that God would fulfill the words of the blessing. This blessing was pronounced by the priest after every morning and evening sacrifice with uplifted hands, as recorded of Aaron (Lev. 9:22). The people responded by uttering an amen. This blessing was also regularly pronounced at the close of the service in the synagogues. The Levites appear also to have had the power of giving the blessing (2 Chron. 30:27), and the same privilege was accorded the king, as the viceroy of the Most High (2 Sam. 6:18; 1 Kings 8:55). Our Lord is spoken of as blessing little children (Mark 10:16; Luke 24:50), besides the blessing on the occasion of the institution of the Eucharist (Matt. 26:26).

BEN´E-JA´AKAN (ben´e-ja´a-kan; “children of Jaakan”). A tribe that gave its name to certain wells in the desert that formed one of the halting places of the Israelites on their journey to Canaan (Num. 33:31–32). “Bene-Jaakan is simply an abbreviation of Beeroth-bene-Jaakan, wells of the children of Jaakan. Now if the children of Jaakan were the same as the Horite family of Jakan mentioned in Gen. 36:27, the wells of Jaakan would have to be sought for on the mountains that bound the Arabah” (K. & D., Com., ad loc.).

BENE-KEDEM. See East, Sons of.

BENEVOLENCE, DUE (Gk. hē opheilomenē eunoia, NASB, “fulfill his duty”). In the KJV, a euphemism for marital duty (1 Cor. 7:3).

BEN-GEB´ER (ben-geb´er). Solomon’s district officer over the Transjordanian district of Ramoth-Gilead (which see; 1 Kings 4:13).

BEN-HA'DAD (ben-hā'dad). The Heb. form of Aram. Bar-hadad, "son of the god Hadad."

1. The Early Kings of Damascus. The succession of Syrian kings who reigned at Damascus and elevated the city-state to the height of its power. Under them it became the inveterate foe of Israel for a full century and a half after 925 B.C. Biblical reference to the Ben-hadads has been remarkably illuminated by archaeology as a result of the discovery of the inscribed stela of Ben-hadad I, recovered in N Syria in 1940. This important royal inscription in general confirms the order of early Syrian rulers as given in 1 Kings 15:18, where Ben-hadad is said to be the "son of Tabrimmon, the son of Hezion, king of Abram, who lived in Damascus." According to W. F. Albright's rendering of the Ben-hadad monument, with the somewhat precarious restoration of the partly undecipherable portion, the sequence is identical: "Bir-hadad, son of Tab-ramman, son of Hadyan, king of Aram" (cf. Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 87 [Oct. 1942]: 23–29; 90 [Apr. 1943]: 32–34). Bir-hadad is equivalent to Bar-hadad (Heb. Ben-hadad), and Tab-ramman and Hadyan are equatable with Heb. Tabrimmon and Hezion. The correct name of the first king of Damascus has been corroborated by archaeological evidence, but the identity of Rezon who seized Damascus during Solomon's reign and apparently ruled there (11:23–25) is still unsolved. Is Hezion the same as Rezon? If so, then the form Rezon is secondary and may be regarded as a corruption of Hezion. If this is not the case, which apparently is unlikely, Rezon must be excluded from the dynastic list of 15:18, which is improbable since he was ostensibly the founder of the powerful Damascene state.

2. Ben-hadad I. By the time Ben-hadad entered into the succession of Syrian kings somewhere around 890 B.C., Syria had become the strongest state in this region of W Asia and was ready to seize any opportunity to increase its territories. Such an occasion offered itself when the hard-pressed Asa, king of Judah (c. 917–876 B.C.), sent an urgent appeal to Syria for help against Baasha, king of Israel (c. 908–886 B.C.). Baasha, pushing his frontier southward to within five miles of Jerusalem, proceeded to fortify Ramah as a border fortress commanding the capital of Judah (1 Kings 15:17). Asa desperately sent what was left of the Temple and royal treasury, despoiled so recently by the Egyptian pharaoh Shishak, to Ben-hadad as a bribe to entice Syria into an alliance with himself against Israel. This strategy was at least immediately successful, for Ben-hadad invaded northern Israel and forced Baasha to abandon Ramah (15:20–22). But Asa committed a grievous mistake, for in courting the favor of Damascus against Israel, he granted Ben-hadad an unparalleled opportunity for aggrandizement and gave a common enemy of both the Northern and the Southern kingdoms a great advantage.

Formerly scholars almost universally distinguished between Ben-hadad I, son of Tabrimmon (who was the son of Hezion the contemporary of Asa and Baasha; 15:18), and Ben-hadad the contemporary of Elijah and Elisha. Only occasionally did a biblical scholar such as T. K. Cheyne recognize the possibility that the two might be identical (Encyclopaedia Biblica, 1:531–32). Still, the majority maintained that the so-called Ben-hadad I died during the early years of the reign of Omri or Ahab (c. 865 B.C.) and was succeeded by Ben-hadad II. However, evidence furnished by the stela of Ben-hadad argues strongly for the identity of Ben-hadad I and Ben-hadad II (cf. Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research: 83:14–22). In addition, careful research on the vexing problems of the chronology of the kings of Israel and Judah of this period has resulted in the reduction of years reigned, notably of Israel's kings, and obviated any serious objection to the equation on the grounds of an impossibly long reign for Ben-hadad I.

A further argument commonly urged against the identification of Ben-hadad I with Ben-hadad II is the word of the vanquished Syrian monarch to King Ahab of Israel after the latter's notable victory at Aphek (modern Fiq) three miles E of the Sea of Galilee, recorded in 20:34: "The cities which my father took from your father I will restore, and you shall make streets for yourself in Damascus as my father made in Samaria." This allusion can hardly be to Ahab's father Omri (c. 885–874 B.C.), who founded the metropolis of Samaria as the capital of the Northern Kingdom, for available sources do not lend the least support to the hypothesis that the latter incurred a defeat in a coalition with Syria. The term father, especially when used of royalty, must frequently be construed as "predecessor," as is commonly illustrated by the monuments. Doubtless towns taken from Israel by early Syrian kings such as Hezion or Tabrimmon are meant. Ben-hadad's use of the term Samaria was evidently formulaic. The city had been so strategically situated and enjoyed such a prosperous growth that soon after its establishment by Omri its name was used of the whole Northern Kingdom of which it was the capital. Ben-hadad I warred against Ahab of Israel (20:1). Ahab's brilliant strategy won not only this battle but also the one during the following year at Aphek (1 Kings 20:26–43).

The next year, however, the appearance on the horizon of a powerful Assyrian army marching toward Syria-Palestine compelled Ahab and his hereditary foe Ben-hadad to align themselves in a general coalition of neighboring kings to block the ambitious Assyrian invasion southward. The Monolith Inscription, now in the British Museum, records the military expeditions of Shalmaneser III (859–824 B.C.) and includes a description of his clash with the Syrian coalition headed by "Hadadezer [Ben-hadad], of Aram (Damascus)" in 853 B.C. The battle took place at Qarqar north of Hamath in the Orontes Valley, a strategic fortress city that guarded the approaches of lower Syria. Ahab "of Israel" is mentioned along with Ben-hadad of Damascus. Ben-hadad furnished twelve hundred chariots as compared to Ahab's two thousand, but Hadadezer (Ben-hadad) furnished twice as many soldiers, twenty thousand against Ahab's ten thousand. Shalmaneser's venture was evidently not successful, despite his extravagant boasts. In 848 B.C. Shalmaneser III made another thrust into Syria. He was again met by a coalition of "twelve kings of the seaboard" headed by Adadidri (Hadadezer of Damascus, i.e., Ben-hadad I). Ben-hadad I's long energetic reign came to an end about 843 B.C., and by 841 B.C. Hazael, an influential official, had succeeded to the throne.

3. Ben-Hadad II, another Aramaean king who ruled at Damascus. He was the son of Hazael. The latter sat on the throne at Damascus from c. 841 to 801 B.C. Ben-hadad II was a weak ruler who failed to protect the far-reaching conquests of his father, and Israel began to regain its fortunes. Although Aramaean power suffered in S Syria, Ben-hadad II displayed remarkable vitality in the N, as shown by the important stela of Zakir, king of Hamath, discovered in 1903 at modern Afis, SW of Aleppo in N Syria. This significant monument, published by its discoverer H. Pognon in 1907, makes reference in lines 4 and 5 to Ben-hadad II under the Aram. form of his name "Bar hadad, son of Hazael, king of Aram." He is presented as heading a coalition of kings against "Zakir, king of Hamath and Luash." The cause of the attack was the merger of two powerful independent states, Hamath and Luash. This political maneuver so upset the balance of power in Syria and was attended with such a serious threat to the autonomy of Damascus and other Syrian states that they were ready to go to war in order to break it up. Ben-hadad II especially had reason to be made sensitive to any added threat to Syrian power since his losses to Israel in the S had seriously curtailed his sway in that direction. Zakir's victory over the coalition, in the celebration of which he set up his stela, furnished another indication of the essential weakness of Ben-hadad II's might. In fact, his reign made possible Israel's power under Jeroboam II (c. 786–746 B.C.). M.F.U.

BEN-HA'IL (ben-ha'il; "son of strength," that is, "warrior"). One of the "officials" of the people sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the inhabitants of Judah (2 Chron. 17:7), 875 B.C.

BENHA'NAN (ben-ha'nan; "son of one gracious"). The third named of the four "sons" of Shimon, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:20).

BEN-HE'SED (ben-he'sed; the son of Hesed). The name of one of Solomon's deputies in the districts of Arubboth, Socoh, and Hephher (1 Kings 4:10), after 960 B.C.

BEN-HINNOM, VALLEY OF. See Hinnom, Valley of.

BEN-HUR' (ben-hur). The name of Solomon's governor of the district of Ephraim (1 Kings 4:8).

BEN'NU (be-nî'nū; "our son"). A Levite who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:13), 445 B.C.

BENJAMIN (ben'ja-min; "son of my right hand," or perhaps, "son of the South," Southerner). The name of the youngest son of Jacob (see below) and two other biblical personages.

1. A man of the tribe of Benjamin, second named of the seven sons of Bilhan, and the head of a family of "mighty men of valor" (1 Chron. 7:10).

2. An Israelite, one of the "sons of Harim," who divorced his foreign wife after the Exile (Ezra 10:32), 456 B.C. He seems to be the same person who had assisted in rebuilding (Neh. 3:23) and purifying (Neh. 12:34) the walls of Jerusalem.

BEN'JAMIN (ben'ja-min; "son of my right hand," or perhaps, "son of the South," Southerner). A son of Bihan and a son of Harim (see article above) as well as the youngest of the sons of Jacob, and the second by Rachel (Gen. 35:18), born about 1900 B.C.

Personal History. Benjamin was probably the only son of Jacob born in Palestine. His birth took place on the road between Bethel and Ephrath (Bethlehem), a short distance from the latter. His mother died immediately and with her last breath named him Ben-oni ("son of my pain"), which name the father changed. We hear nothing more of Benjamin until the time when his brothers went into Egypt to buy food. Jacob kept him at home, for he said, "I am afraid that harm may befall him" (Gen. 42:4). The story of his going to Joseph, the silver cup, etc., is familiar and discloses nothing beyond a strong affection manifested for him by his father and brothers.

The Tribe of Benjamin. In Gen. 46:21 the immediate descendants of Benjamin number ten, whereas in Num. 26:38–40 only seven are enumerated, and some even under different names. This difference is probably owing to the circumstance that some of the direct descendants of Benjamin died at an early period, or, at least, childless.

Numbers. At the first census the tribe numbered 35,400, ranking eleventh, but increased to 45,600 at the second census, ranking seventh.

Position. During the wilderness journey Benjamin's position was on the W side of the Tabernacle with his brother tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh (Num. 2:18–24). We have the names of the leader of the tribe when it set out on its long road (2:22); of the spy (13:9); of the families of which the tribe consisted when it was marshaled at the great halt in the plains of Moab, near Jericho (26:38–41, 63), and of the leader who was chosen to assist at the dividing of the land (34:21).

Territory. The proximity of Benjamin to Ephraim during the march to the Promised Land was maintained in the territories allotted to each. Benjamin lay immediately to the S of Ephraim, and between him and Judah.

Subsequent History. We may mention, among the events of note, that they assisted Deborah (Judg. 5:14); they were invaded by the Ammonites (10:9); that they were almost exterminated by the other tribes because they refused to give up the miscreants of Gibeah (chaps. 19–20); that the remaining six hundred were furnished with wives at Jabesh-gilead and Shiloh (chap. 21). To Benjamin belongs the distinction of giving the first king to the Jews, Saul being a Benjamite (1 Sam. 9:1–2; 10:20–21). After the death of Saul they declared themselves for Ish-bosheth (2 Sam. 2:15; 1 Chron. 12:29). They returned to David (2 Sam. 3:19–20; 19:16–17). David having at last expelled the Jebusites from Zion, making it his own residence, the close alliance between Benjamin and Judah (Judg. 1:8) was cemented by the circumstance that while Jerusalem actually belonged to the district of Benjamin, that of Judah was immediately contiguous to it. After the death of Solomon, Benjamin espoused the cause of Judah, and the two formed a kingdom by themselves. After the Exile, also, these two tribes constituted the flower of the new Jewish colony (cf. Ezra 4:1; 10:9). The prediction of Jacob regarding Benjamin's future lot, or the development of his personal character in his tribe, is brief: "Benjamin is a ravenous wolf;/In the morning he devours the prey,/And in the evening he divides the spoil" (Gen. 49:27). The events of history cast light on that prediction, for the ravening of the wolf is seen in the exploits of Ehud the Benjamite (Judg. 3), in Saul's career, and especially in the whole matter of Gibeah, so carefully recorded in Judg. 20. And again, the fierce wolf is seen in the fight in 2 Sam. 2:15–16, at Gibeon, and in the character of Shimei. Some find much of the wolf of Benjamin in Saul of Tarsus, "ravaging the church."

Archaeology. The famous letters from the eighteenth century B.C. recovered from the site of the Middle-Euphrates city of Mari since 1933 mention the Banu Yamina, "sons of the right," i.e., "sons of the South" (Southerners), who were roving Bedouin in this vicinity at the time. Although some scholars (such as A. Parrot) are tempted to connect these wandering bands with the biblical Benjamites, or Benjaminites, and A. Alt allowed the possibility, yet the biblical tribe was born in Palestine and is never said to have been in Mesopotamia. The name Benjamin, meaning "son of the right," "son of the South," or "Southerner," was a name likely to occur in various places, especially so at Mari, where the corresponding term "sons of the left," i.e., "sons of the North" or "Northerners," is found. Directions N and S in the ancient Near East were determined by facing E toward the sunrise—so left was N and right was S. M.F.U.

BEN'JAMITE (ben'ja-mīt; 1 Sam. 9:21; 22:7; 2 Sam. 16:11). The patronymic title of the descendants of the patriarch Benjamin (which see).

BE'NO (be'nō; "his son"). The only son, or the first of the four sons, of Jaaziah the Levite, of the family of Merari, in 1 Chron 24:26–27.

BEN-O'NI (ben-ō'ni; "son of my pain"). The name given by the dying Rachel to her youngest son, but afterward changed (Gen. 35:18) by his father to Benjamin (which see).

BEN-ZO'HETH (ben-zō'heth; "son of Zoheth"). A person named (1 Chron. 4:20) as the second son of Ishi, a descendant of Judah, or it may be that he was grandson of Ishi, being the son of Zoheth himself.

BE'ON (bē-on'). Perhaps an early scribal error for "Meon," one of the places fit for pasturage; Num. 32:3–4, "a land for livestock." It is more properly called Beth-baal-meon (Josh. 13:17), more briefly Baal-meon (Num. 32:38), and Beth-meon (Jer. 48:23).

BE'OR (bē'or).

1. The father of Bela, one of the kings of Edom (Gen. 36:32; 1 Chron. 1:43).

2. The father of Balaam, the prophet hired by Balak to curse the children of Israel (Num. 22:5), about 1400 B.C. He is also mentioned in 2 Pet. 2:15.

BE'RA (bē'ra). King of Sodom at the time of the invasion of the five kings under Chedorlaomer, which was repelled by Abraham (Gen. 14:2, 17, 21), twenty-first century B.C.

BER'ACAH (ber'a-ka; a "blessing").

1. One of the thirty Benjamite warriors who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:3).

2. A valley between Bethlehem and Hebron, not far from En-gedi; noted as the place where Jehoshaphat overcame the Moabites and Ammonites (2 Chron. 20:26).

BERACHI'AH. See Berechiah.

BERAI'AH (ber-aī-a; "created by Jehovah"). Next to the last named of the sons of Shimei and a chief Benjamite of Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:21).

BERAKI'AH. See Berechiah.

BERE'A (be-rē'a). A Macedonian city at the foot of Mt. Bermius, once a large and populous city and the residence of many Jews, whose concern for careful criticism in the study of the Scriptures was commended by Paul (Acts 17:10–13). Berea is now known as Verria, a place of more than thirty thousand people.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Strabo Geography of Strabo 7.

BERECHI'AH (ber-a-kī'a; "blessed by Jehovah").

1. Either one of the sons (according to most authorities) or a brother of Zerubbabel, of the royal line of Judah (1 Chron. 3:20), 536 B.C.

2. The son of Shimea and father of Asaph, the celebrated singer (1 Chron. 6:39, KJV, "Berachiah"; 15:17), 1000 B.C. He was one of the "gatekeepers for the ark" when it was moved from the house of Obed-edom (15:23).

3. The son of Asa, and one of the Levites that dwelt in the villages of the Netophathites after the return from Babylon (1 Chron. 9:16), about 536 B.C.

4. The son of Meshillemoth, and one of the "heads" of Ephraim who enforced the prophet Oded's prohibition of the enslavement of their Judaite captives by the warriors of the Northern Kingdom (2 Chron. 28:12), 741 B.C.

5. The son of Meshezabel and father of Meshullam, who repaired a part of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:4, 30). His granddaughter was married to Jehohanan, the son of Tobiah (6:18).

6. The son of Iddo and father of Zechariah the prophet (Zech. 1:1, 7), before 520 B.C.

7. The father of the Zechariah mentioned in Matt. 23:35 as having been murdered by the Jews; and perhaps the same as Jehoida the priest (cf. 2 Chron. 24:20–22). See Zechariah.

BE´RED (be´red).

1. A son of Shuthelah and grandson of Ephraim (1 Chron. 7:20), supposed by some to be identical with Becher (Num. 26:35).

2. A town in the S of Palestine (Gen. 16:14), near which lay the well Lahai-roi (Beer-lahai-roi), supposed by some to be at El-Khulasah, twelve miles from Beersheba.

BEREKI´AH. See Berechiah.

BE´RI (be´rî; “well, fountain”). A son of Zophah, and a mighty warrior of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:36).

BERI´AH (be-ri´a; perhaps “prominent,” cf. Arab. baraʿa, “to excel”).

1. The last named of the four sons of Asher, and father of Heber and Malchiel (Gen. 46:17; 1 Chron. 7:30). His descendants were called Beriites (Num. 26:44–45).

2. A son of Ephraim, so named on account of the state of his father’s house when he was born. Some of Ephraim’s sons had been killed by men of Gath “because they came down to take their livestock” (1 Chron. 7:21).

3. A Benjamite, and apparently son of Elpaal. He and his brother Shemed were ancestors of the inhabitants of Aijalon and expelled the people of Gath (1 Chron. 8:13). His nine sons are enumerated in vv. 14–16.

4. The last named of the four sons of Shimei, a Levite of the family of Gershon (1 Chron. 23:10–11). His posterity was not numerous and was reckoned with that of his brother Jeush.

BERI´TES (be-rî´its). Only mentioned in Num. 26:44, these are the descendants of Beriah (which see), son of Asher (Gen. 46:17; Num. 26:45).

BE´RITES (be´rîts). A people mentioned only in 2 Sam. 20:14, in the account of Joab’s pursuit of Sheba, son of Bichri. Being mentioned in connection with Abel Beth-maacah, they seem to have lived in northern Palestine. Thompson (The Land and the Book) places them at Biria, N of Safed. Biria he identifies with Beroth, a city of upper Galilee, not far from Cadash, where, according to Josephus (Ant. 5.1.18), the northern Canaanite confederacy pitched camp against Joshua. The story is told in Josh. 11, where, however, the camp is located at the waters of Merom.

BE´RITH. See Gods, False: Baal-berith.

BERNI´CE (ber-nî´se). The eldest daughter of Herod Agrippa I by his wife Cypros. See Herod: Princesses of the House of.

BERO´DACH-BAL´ADAN (be-rō´dak-bal´a-dan). The king of Babylon who sent friendly letters and a gift to Hezekiah upon hearing of his sickness (2 Kings 20:12). He is also called, in Isa. 39:1, Merodach-baladan (which see).

BEROE´A. See Berea.

BERO'THAH (be-rō'tha; Ezek. 47:16), or Bero'thai (be-rō'thī; “wells,” 2 Sam. 8:8). Ezekiel mentions Berothah, in connection with Hamath and Damascus, as forming the northern boundary of the Promised Land as restored in his vision. Now identified with Bereitan in the Beqa about thirty-five miles N of Damascus.

BE'ROTHITE (be'rō-thīt). An epithet of Naharai, Joab's armor bearer (1 Chron. 11:39), probably as a native of Beeroth (which see).

BERYL. See Mineral Kingdom.

BE'SAI (be'sī). One of the heads of the Temple servants, whose descendants returned from Babylon (Ezra 2:49; Neh. 7:52), 536 B.C.

BESODE'IAH (bes-o-dē'ya; “in the counsel of Jehovah”). The father of Meshullam, who repaired “the Old Gate” of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:6), 445 B.C.

BESOM (bē'som; a “broom”; Isa. 14:23, KJV, “besom of destruction”). To sweep away, as with a broom, is a metaphor still frequent in the East for utter ruin. Jehovah treats Babylon as rubbish and sweeps it away, destruction serving Him as a broom.

BESOR (bē'sor). A brook flowing into the Mediterranean, about five miles S of Gaza South, and the place where two hundred of David's men remained while the other troops pursued the Amalekites (1 Sam. 30:9–10, 21). The present Wadi es Sheriah, according to some; others claim its location in the Wadi Ghazzeah.

BE'TAH (bē'ta; “confidence”). Called Tibhath (1 Chron. 18:8), a city of Syria-Zobah, captured by David (2 Sam. 8:8) and yielding a large spoil of “bronze.” Probably a city on the eastern slope of the Anti-Lebanon Mountains; NIV, Tebah.

BE'TEN (be'ten; “belly, hollow”). One of the cities on the border of the tribe of Asher (Josh. 19:25 only). Identified perhaps with Abtun E of Mt. Carmel.

BETH (ב) (bāth; “house”). The name of the second letter of the Heb. alphabet (corresponding to Gk. beta [β], Lat. B), so named because originally the representation of a rude dwelling. As an appellative, Beth is the most general word for “house” (Gen. 24:32; 33:17; Judg. 18:31; 1 Sam. 1:7). From this general use the transition was natural to a house in the sense of a “family.” Beth is frequently employed in combination with other words to form the names of places.

BETHAB'ARA (beth-ab'a-ra; “house of the ford”). In the KJV, the place on the E bank of the Jordan where John was baptizing (John 1:28); placed by Conder at the ford 'Abarah, just N of Beisan. The NASB and NIV read “in Bethany beyond the Jordan.” Many of the best Gk. manuscripts have “Bethany” instead of “Bethabara.” This is not the Bethany near Jerusalem. The sixth-century Madeba map shows Bethabara on the W bank of the Jordan near the traditional site of Jesus' baptism. H.F.V.

BETH-A'NATH (beth-a'nath; “house of the goddess”). Anath, modern el-Ba'neh, twelve miles E of Acre, a fortified city of Naphtali, named with Beth-shemesh (Josh. 19:38; Judg. 1:33), from neither of which the Canaanites were expelled, although they were made tributaries (1:33).

BETH-A'NOTH (beth-a'nōth; “house of [the goddess] Anath”). A town in the mountains of Judah (Josh. 15:59), possibly located just N of Hebron.

BETH'ANY (beth'a-ni; "house, place of unripe figs").

1. A place on the E of the Jordan, the name of which is substituted in the NASB and NIV for Beth-abara (which see; see also John 1:28).

2. A village situated on the eastern slope of Mt. Olivet, fifteen furlongs (about one and one-half miles) from Jerusalem. It is called also the house of misery on account of its lonely situation and the invalids who congregated there. It was the home of Lazarus and was associated with important events in Scripture history (Matt. 21:17; 26:6; Mark 11:11; 14:3; Luke 24:50; John 11:1; 12:1); called now Azariyeh, or Lazariyeh, "the place of Lazarus."

BETH-AR'ABAH (beth-ar'a-ba; "house of the desert"). A town on the N end of the Dead Sea, and one of six cities belonging to Judah on the N border of the tribe (Josh. 15:6, 61); possibly to be located at modern 'Ain el-Gharbah SW of Jericho. It was afterward included in the list of the towns of Benjamin (18:22; "Arabah," 18:18). H.F.V.

BETH-ARAM. See Beth-haram; Beth-haran.

BETH-AR'BEL (beth-ar'bel; "house of Arbel"). In Hos. 10:14 we read of Ephraim, "All your fortresses will be destroyed,/As Shalman [which see] destroyed Beth-arbel in the day of battle." "Beth-arbel is hardly the Arbela of Assyria—which became celebrated through the victory of Alexander—since the Israelites could scarcely have become so well acquainted with such a remote city, but in all probability the Arbela in Galiloea Superior, a place in the tribe of Naphtali between Sefhoris and Tiberias" (K. & D., Com.). If so, it is to be identified with a site NW of Tiberias. Some would locate it E of the Jordan in Gilead. It is present-day Irbid, four miles NW of Tiberias.

BETH-ASH'BEA (beth`-ash'be-a). The place where "the families of the house of the linen workers" resided. The KJV renders just Ashbea and mentions him as the head of this branch of the descendants of Shelah, the son of Judah (1 Chron. 4:21).

BETH-A'VEN (beth-ā'ven; "house of nothingness," i.e., "idolatry"). A place in the mountains of Benjamin (Josh. 7:2; 18:12; 1 Sam. 13:5), E of Bethel (Josh. 7:2), and between it and Michmash (1 Sam. 13:5).

The place mentioned in Hos. 4:15 is not the same, but, as Amos 4:4 and 5:5 clearly show, a name that Hosea adopted from Amos 5:5 for Bethel (the present Beitin) to show that Bethel, the house of God, had become Beth-aven, the house of idols, through the setting up of the golden calf there (1 Kings 12:29).

BETH-AZMA'VETH (beth-az-ma'veth). A village of Benjamin, the inhabitants of which, forty-two in number, returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. 7:28; "Azmaveth," 12:29; Ezra 2:24). Its present site is Hizmeh, between Geba and Anathoth.

BETH-BA'AL-ME'ON (beth-ba'al-mē'on; "house of Baal-meon"). One of the places assigned to Reuben in the plains E of the Jordan (Josh. 13:17), known formerly as Baal-meon (Num. 32:38) or Beon (32:3), to which the Beth was possibly a Heb.

prefix. It is identified with the present ruins of Ma'in, in N Moab, four miles SW of Medeba. It is mentioned on the Moabite Stone, 9.30, as held by King Mesha.

BETH-BA'RAH (beth-ba'ra). A chief ford of the Jordan. Possibly the place of Jacob's crossing (Gen. 32:22), S of the scene of Gideon's victory (Judg. 7:24), and where Jephtha slew the Ephraimites (12:4). Location uncertain.

BETH-BIR'I (beth-bir'i). A town of Simeon, inhabited by the descendants of Shimei (1 Chron. 4:31); the Beth-lebaath of Josh. 19:6, or simply Lebaath (15:32). Not identified with any present locality.

BETH'CAR (beth-kar'; "sheep house"). The place to which the Israelites pursued the Philistines from Mizpah (1 Sam. 7:6–12). From the unusual expression "below Bethcar," it would seem that the place itself was on a height with a road at its foot. Its situation is not known.

BETH-DA'GON (beth-dā'gon; "house of Dagon," the fish god).

1. A city in the low country of Judah, about five miles from Lydda, near Philistia (Josh. 15:41). Present Khirbet Dajūn.

2. A town near the SE border of Asher (Josh. 19:27).

BETH-EDEN (beth-ē'den; Heb. bêt eden, "house of delight"). In the KJV a place named "House of Eden" occurs in the prophecy of Amos against Damascus (Amos 1:5). Some scholars have thought that the prophecy refers to the Aramaean city-states of Damascus and Bit-adini. The reading of the LXX is "from the men of Haran," since Haran was apparently in Bit-adini. The reference to "the people of Eden" (KJV, "children of Eden") in 2 Kings 9:12 and Isa. 37:12, along with the Eden mentioned in Ezek. 27:23, seem also to refer to Bit-adini. R.K.H.

BETH-E'KED (beth-e'ked; of the shepherds (lit., "house of binding of the shepherds"). The translation in the NASB and NIV of 2 Kings 10:12, 14 of a place on the road between Jezreel and Samaria. When Jehu was on his way to Samaria, he encountered forty-two members of the royal family of Judah, whom he slaughtered at the well or pit attached to the place. The KJV renders "shearing house." It is commonly identified with Beit Kad, sixteen miles NE of Samaria.

BETH'EL (beth'el; "house of God").

1. A town about ten miles N of Jerusalem, originally Luz (Gen. 28:19). It was here that Abraham encamped (12:8; 13:3), and the district is still known as suitable for pasturage. It received the name of Bethel, "house of God," because of its nearness to or being the very place where Jacob dreamed (28:10–22). Bethel was assigned to the Benjamites, but they appear to have been either unable to take it or careless about doing so, as we find it taken by the children of Joseph (Judg. 1:22–26). It seems to have been the place to which the Ark was brought (Judg. 20:26–28). It was one of the three places that Samuel selected in which to hold court (1 Sam. 7:16), and Jeroboam chose Bethel as one of the two places in which he set up golden calves (1 Kings 12:28–33). King Josiah removed all traces of idolatry and restored the true worship of Jehovah (2 Kings 23:15–20). Bethel was occupied by people returning from Babylon (cf. Ezra 2:28 with Neh. 11:31).

Bethel is identified with modern Beitin. It stands upon the point of a low rocky ridge, between two shallow wadis, which unite, the water then falling into the Wadi Suweinit toward the SE.

W. F. Albright and J. L. Kelso excavated Beitin in 1934, and Kelso resumed work in 1954 and continued in 1957 and 1960 on behalf of the American Schools of Oriental Research and Pittsburgh Theological Seminary. Although there was a village at Beitin as early as 3200 B.C., continuous occupation of the site apparently began just before 2000 B.C. During the sixteenth century the settlement was enlarged and surrounded with an eleven-foot-thick stone wall and possessed some of the best-laid masonry of that period yet discovered in Palestine. About 1235 the city was destroyed in a great fire that left debris five feet thick in places. Evidently this conflagration is to be attributed to the Israelite conquest of Judges 1:22–25. The subsequent Israelite level of occupation has construction strikingly inferior to Canaanite levels, but the period of David and Solomon shows noticeable recovery. No sanctuary dating to the days when Jeroboam I instituted calf worship there has yet been recovered. Although Bethel was only a small village during Nehemiah's day (fifth century B.C.), it became an important place during the Hellenistic period and grew even larger in Roman and Byzantine days. Remains in the area show that the city continued to exist throughout the Byzantine era but apparently disappeared when the Muslims took over Palestine. M.F.U.; H.F.V.

2. Knobel suggests that this is a corrupt reading for Bethul or Bethuel (Josh. 19:4; 1 Chron. 4:30), in the tribe of Simeon.

BETH-EL, MOUNT. The KJV rendering for the southern range of mountains belonging to Bethel (Josh. 16:1–2). Bethel is here distinguished from Luz because the reference is not to the town of Bethel but to the mountains, from which the boundary ran out to Luz. The NASB and NIV render “hill country.”

BETH´ELITE (beth´e-lit). A name by which Hiel, who rebuilt Jericho (1 Kings 16:34), was called, being a native of Bethel (which see) in Benjamin.

BETH-E´MEK (beth-e´mek; “house of the valley”). A city of Asher, in the S of the valley of Iphtahel (Josh. 19:27), not yet discovered; possibly Tell Mimas, near ‘Amqa, 6½ miles NE of Acre.

BE´THER (be´ther; “separation”). A range of mountains named in song of Sol. 2:17, perhaps the same as the “mountains of spices” (8:14). The NIV renders Bether as “rugged hills.”

BETHES´DA (beth-ez´da; Gk. from Aram. Beth hesdä, “house of grace”). A spring-fed pool with five porches where invalids waited their turn to step into the mysteriously troubled waters that were supposed to possess healing virtue (John 5:2–4). The last part of v. 3 and all of v. 4, which mention a periodic disturbance of the water by an angel, are placed in brackets in the NASB because there is not sufficient attestation by early texts. Here Jesus healed the man who was lame for thirty-eight years (5:5–9). The place is now thought to be the pool found during the repairs in 1888 near St. Anne's Church in the Bezetha quarter of Jerusalem not far from the Sheep's Gate and Tower of Antonia. It is below the crypt of the ruined fourth-century church and has a five-arch portico with faded frescoes of the miracle of Christ's healing. M.F.U.

BETH-E'ZEL (beth-e'zel; “a place near”). A town mentioned in Mic. 1:11 in southern Judah, now identified with Deir el-'Asal about two miles E of Tell Beit Mirsim.

BETH-GA'DER (beth-ga'der; “walled house”). A place in the tribe of Judah, of which Hareph is named as “father” or founder (1 Chron. 2:51). Probably identical with Gedor (which see) of Josh. 15:58, or Geder.

BETH-GA'MUL (beth-ga'mul; “house of recompense”). A city of Moab (Jer. 48:23). It is identified with Khirbet Jemeil, six miles E of Dibon, between the Arnon and Ummer Rašäs.

BETH-GIL'GAL (beth-gil'gal; “house of Gilgal,” Neh. 12:29). A place from which the sons of the singers gathered together for the celebration of the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem; doubtless the same as Gilgal (which see).

BETH-HACCHE'REM (Neh. 3:14, NASB; beth-hak-e'rem), Beth Hakkerem (Neh. 3:14; Jer. 6:1, NIV; pronunciation the same as above), Bethhacerem (Neh. 3:14; Jer. 6:1, KJV; Jer. 6:1, NASB; beth-hak'se-rim; marg., Jer. 6:1, NASB, “house of the vineyard”). A Judean town of such commanding height as to be a place for signaling upon occasions of invasion. It is now identified with Ramat-rahel in the southern suburbs of Jerusalem. Yohanan Aharoni excavated there five seasons (1954–62) for the Hebrew University and the University of Rome. The history of the site extends from about the ninth century B.C. to the Arab period. In strata V-A (see 608–586 B.C.) one of the last kings of Judah built an imposing palace; Aharoni originally supposed the builder was Jehoiakim (609–587 B.C.; see Jer. 22:13–19). A stamped jar handle with the inscription “Belonging to Eliakim, steward of Yaukin” (Jehoiachin, son of Jehoiakim), was found in the ruins. Evidently this citadel was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar.

BETH-HAG'GAN (beth-hag'an; “house of the garden”). A place by way of which King Ahaziah fled from Jehu (2 Kings 9:27, NASB, “garden house”). The “garden house” cannot have been in the royal gardens but must have stood at some distance from the city of Jezreel, as Ahaziah went away by the road leading to it and was not wounded till he reached the height of Gur, near Ibleam.

BETH-HA'RAM (beth-hâ'ram). A town of Gad, opposite Jericho and six miles E of the Jordan (Josh. 13:27). Named Julias, or Livias, by Herod, after the wife of Augustus; the present Tell er Rameh at the mouth of the Wadi Hesban, a source of the celebrated hot springs where King Herod had a palace. Also called Beth-haran (which see).

BETH-HA'RAN (beth-ha'ran). A fenced city E of the Jordan, “built,” i.e., restored and fortified, by the Gadites (Num. 32:36). The same as Beth-haram (which see).

BETH-HOG'LAH (beth-hog'la; “house of a partridge,” Josh. 15:6; 18:19). A place on the border of Judah and of Benjamin, and belonging to the latter tribe (18:21). The name and location are to be found at 'Ain Hajlah, four miles SE of Jericho.

BETH-HO'RON (beth-hō'ron; "house or place of the hollow"). The name of two towns, an "upper" and a "lower" (Josh. 16:3, 5; 1 Chron. 7:24; 2 Chron. 8:5), on the road from Gibeon to Azekah (Josh. 10:10–11) and the Philistine plain (1 Sam. 13:18). Beth-horon lay on the boundary line between Benjamin and Ephraim (Josh. 16:3, 5; 18:13–14), was assigned to Ephraim, and was given to the Kohathites (21:22; 1 Chron. 6:68). It is said (7:24) that Sheerah built Beth-horon, both upper and lower, along with Uzzan-sheerah. The building referred to was merely an enlarging and fortifying of these towns. Sheerah was probably an heiress who had received these places as her inheritance and caused them to be enlarged by her family.

"These places still exist and are called by Arabic names meaning 'upper' and 'lower.' They are separated by about half an hour's journey. The upper village is about four miles from Gibeon, the road always on the ascent. The descent begins from the upper to the lower village, and that road is one of the roughest and steepest in Palestine; it is still used as the road from the coast and is a key to the country; it was afterward fortified by Solomon. Old tanks and massive foundations exist" (Harper, Bible and Mod. Dis., p. 159).

It was along this pass that Joshua drove the allies against whom he went out in defense of the Gibeonites (Josh. 10:10); and by the same route one of three companies of Philistine raiders came against Israel (1 Sam. 13:18).

The importance of the road upon which the two Beth-horons were situated, the main approach to the interior of the country from the hostile districts on both sides of Palestine, at once explains and justifies the frequent fortification of these towns at different periods of their history (1 Kings 9:17; 2 Chron. 8:5; 1 Macc. 9:50; Judg. 4:4–5).

BETH-JESH'IMOTH (beth-jesh'i-mōth; "house or place of deserts"). A town in Moab, not far E of the mouth of the Jordan and just N of the Dead Sea (Num. 33:49; Josh. 12:3; 13:20; Ezek. 25:9). Belonging to Sihon, king of the Amorites (Josh. 12:3). It is to be identified with Tell el cAzeima).

BETH-JES'IMOTH. Another form of Beth-jeshimoth (which see). In NT times Besimoth (Tell el cAzeimeh).

BETH-LE-APH'RAH (beth-le-af-ra; "house or place of dust"; so in NASB, Mic. 1:10; "house of Aphrah" in the KJV; Beth Ophrah in the NIV). Site unknown, but apparently in Philistine territory.

BETH-LEBA'OTH (beth-le-ba'ōth; "house of lionesses"). A town in the lot of Simeon (Josh. 19:6), in the extreme S of Judah (15:32), where it is given as Lebaoth. The location of the site is near Sharuhin, but unknown.

BETH'LEHEM (beth'le-hem; "house of bread").

1. A town in Palestine, near which Jacob buried Rachel, then known as Ephrath (Gen. 35:19; 48:7). It is also called Bethlehem Ephrathah (Mic. 5:2), Bethlehem in Judah (1 Sam. 17:12), Bethlehem of Judea (Matt. 2:1), and the city of David (Luke 2:4; cf. John 7:42). The old name, Ephrath, or Ephrathah, lingered long after Israel occupied Palestine (Ruth 1:2; 4:11; 1 Sam. 17:12; Ps. 132:6; Mic. 5:2; etc.). The city overlooks the main highway to Hebron and Egypt. The site of the city on a commanding limestone ridge of the Judean highland has never been disputed.

After the conquest Bethlehem fell to Judah (Judg. 17:7; 1 Sam. 17:12; Ruth 1:1–2); Ibzan of Bethlehem judged Israel after Jephthah (Judg. 12:8); Elimelech, the husband of Naomi and father-in-law of Ruth, was a Bethlehemite (Ruth 1:1–2), as was Boaz (2:1, 4).

David was born in Bethlehem, and here he was anointed as future king by Samuel (1 Sam. 16:1); here was the well from which David's three heroes brought him water (2 Sam. 23:15–16), thought to be the same three wells still existing in the N side of the village; it was the birthplace of the Messiah (Matt. 2:1), and its male children were slain by order of Herod (2:16, cf. Jer. 31:15; Mic. 5:2). This Bethlehem is about five miles S of Jerusalem, and elevated 2,460 feet above sea level. In Bethlehem stands the Basilica of the Nativity, marking the traditional site of the birth of Christ.

2. A town in the portion of Zebulun, named only in connection with Idala (Josh. 19:15). It is to be located at Beit Lahm, seven miles NE of Nazareth.

BETH'LEHEM IN JU'DAH (beth'le-hem in jū'da). A more distinctive title (Judg. 17:7–9; 19:1; etc.; Ruth 1:1–2; 1 Sam. 17:12) of Bethlehem, no. 1 (which see). KJV reads “Beth-lehem-judah.”

BETH'LEHEMITE (beth'-le-hem-it). An inhabitant of Bethlehem (which see) in Judah (1 Sam. 16:1, 18; 17:58; 2 Sam. 21:19).

BETH'LEHEM-JUDAH. See Bethlehem in Judah.

BETH-MA'ACAH (beth-ma'a-ka; “house of Maakah”). A place to which Joab went in pursuit of Sheba the son of Bichri (2 Sam. 20:14). It was quite close to Abela, so that the names of the places are connected in v. 15 and afterward as Abel-beth-maacah (thus always in the NIV; see also 1 Kings 15:20; 2 Kings 15:29; all NASB); also called Abel-maim (2 Chron. 16:4). The modern site is Tell Abil, about 2½ miles WNW of Laish (Dan) and 6 miles WNW of Caesarea Philippi (Paneas) near the sources of the Jordan River.

BETH-MAR'CABOTH (beth-mar'ka-bōth; “place of chariots”). A town of Simeon, in the extreme S of Judah, in which some of the descendants of Shimei dwelt (Josh. 19:5; 1 Chron. 4:31). Site uncertain.

BETH-ME'ON (beth-mē'on; “house of habitation”). A place in the tribe of Reuben (Jer. 48:23); elsewhere (Josh. 13:17) in the full form Beth-baal-meon (which see). See also Baal-meon.

BETH-MILLO. The name of the citadel of Shechem (Judg. 9:6, 20; “house of Millo,” KJV), the garrison of which joined in proclaiming Abimelech their king. See Millo.

BETH-NIM'RAH (beth-nim'ra; “house of the leopard”). One of the towns “built,” i.e., fortified, by the tribe of Gad (Num. 32:36); called simply Nimrah (which see) in 32:3.

BETH OPHRAH. See Beth-le-Aphrah.

BETH-PALET. See Beth-pelet.

BETH-PAZ'ZEZ (beth-paz'ez; “house of dispersion”). A city of Issachar (Josh. 19:21). Probably modern Kerm el-Hadeth.

BETH-PE'LET (beth-pe'let; “house of escape”). A town in the S of Judah (Josh. 15:27), assigned to Simeon and inhabited after the captivity (Neh. 11:26). Location uncertain.

BETH-PE'OR (beth-pē'or; "house, or temple, of Peor"). A place in Moab E of the Jordan, abominable for its idolatry. It belonged to Reuben (Josh. 13:20; Deut. 3:29; 4:46). It was the last halting place of the children of Israel, and in the valley nearby Moses rehearsed the law to Israel and was buried (4:44–46; 34:6).

BETH'PHAGE (beth'fa-ji; Aram. "house of unripe figs"). On the Mount of Olives, and on the way from Jerusalem to Jericho, close to Bethany. A Sabbath day's journey from Jerusalem (Matt. 21:1; Mark 11:1; Luke 19:29). No trace of it now remains. It is not mentioned once in the OT, though frequently in the Talmud. Now called Abu Dīs.

BETH-PHELET. See Beth-pelet.

BETH-RA'PHA (beth-ra'fa; "house of Rapha, or giant"). A name occurring in the genealogy of Judah as a son of Eshton (1 Chron. 4:12).

BETH-RE'HOB (beth-re'hob; "roomy [?] house"). A place near which lay the valley of the town of Laish or Dan (Judg. 18:28). This valley is the upper part of the Huleh lowland, through which the central source of the Jordan flows, and by which Laish-Dan, the present Tell el Qadi, stood. The Ammonites secured foot soldiers from Beth-rehob to fight against David (2 Sam. 10:6; Rehob, v. 8).

BETHSA'IDA (beth-sā'i-da; Gk. from Aram. bēt ṣaydā, "house or place of fishing").

1. A city in Galilee, on the NE coast of the Sea of Tiberias (John 1:44; 12:21). It was the home of Peter, Andrew, and Philip, and a frequent resort of Jesus. Our Lord upbraided its inhabitants for not receiving His teachings (Luke 10:13). It is probably to be located at Aradj about a mile E of where the Jordan River enters the Sea of Galilee.

2. Bethsaida of Gaulanitis, afterward called Julias. There is every evidence that the city in Gaulanitis, on the E side of the sea, is that "desolate place" where Christ fed the five thousand (Luke 9:10–17) and cured "those who had need of healing." Here He also restored the blind man to sight (Mark 8:22–26), as it would be on the road to Caesarea Philippi, visited next by our Lord (v. 27).

It was originally a small town, but Philip the tetrarch, having raised it to the rank of city, called it Julias, after Julia, the daughter of the Emperor Augustus (Josephus Ant. 18.2.1). Philip died and was buried there. It is probably to be identified with et-Tell, a little more than a mile N of the Sea of Galilee. Et-Tell stood on the E bank of the Jordan and seems to have had access to the Sea of Galilee.

BETHSHAN (beth-shan'), or Beth-shean (beth-shē'an; Heb. "house of security." But more probably house of the Babylonian god Shahan, Phoenician Sha'an, the Sumerian serpent god). An ancient fortress city strategically commanding the Valley of Esdraelon (Tell el-Husn, "mound of the fortress") also known as NT Scythopolis (modern Beisan). This great fortress site was founded before 3000 B.C. and has a long and interesting occupational history. After Thutmose III's brilliant victory at Megiddo (c. 1482 B.C.), it passed into Egyptian hands and was garrisoned by Egyptian soldiers for almost three hundred years. Two stelae of Seti I and one of Rameses II were uncovered here. At the time of the conquest, around 1400 B.C., the inhabitants of the city and the plain had "chariots of iron" (Josh. 17:16), and the Israelites failed to drive out the Canaanites but developed strongly enough to make them pay tribute (17:12–16). At the battle of Gilboa, around 1000 B.C., the town was either in Philistine hands or in alliance with them, for the Philistines fastened the bodies of Saul and his sons to the wall of the city (1 Sam. 31:10–13; 2 Sam. 21:12–14). The University of Pennsylvania Expedition at Bethshan, 1921–33, unearthed a temple that the excavators identified with the temple of Ashtareth in which Saul’s armor was placed (1 Sam. 31:10). First Chron. 10:10 refers to a second temple of Bethshan called the house of Dagon, where Saul’s head was hung. The excavations uncovered another temple to the S of the temple of Ashtaroth that Alan Rowe identified with the temple of Dagon. In the reign of Solomon the city gave its name to a district (1 Kings 4:12). No mound in Palestine is more impressive than Bethshan, which yielded a number of Egyptian temples dating to the reigns of Amenhotep III (c. 1413–1377 B.C.), Seti I (1319–1301 B.C.), and Rameses II (1301–1234 B.C.). It has also revealed extensive fortress construction. In the level of City 7, from the reign of Amenhotep III, remains of the commanding officer’s residence have been unearthed, showing a spacious kitchen, a lavatory, and an immense silo for storing grain. A Canaanite migdol, or fort tower, designed as a last place of refuge if the walls were breached, was also found. M.F.U.

BETH-SHE’MESH (beth-she’mesh; “house of the sun”).

1. A priestly city (Josh. 21:16; 1 Sam. 6:15; 1 Chron. 6:59) in the tribe of Dan, on the N boundary of Judah (Josh. 15:10), toward Philistia (1 Sam. 6:9, 12). The expressions “went down” (Josh. 15:9–10) and “go up” (1 Sam. 6:20–21) seem to indicate that the town was lower than Kiriath-jearim; and there was a valley of wheat fields attached to the place (6:13). It was a city with “pasture lands” (Josh. 21:16; 1 Chron. 6:59) and contributed to Solomon’s expenses (1 Kings 4:9). In an engagement between Jehoash, king of Israel, and Amaziah, king of Judah, the latter was defeated and made prisoner (2 Kings 14:11, 13; 2 Chron. 25:21, 23). In the time of Ahaz the Philistines occupied it (28:18), and to this place the Ark was returned (1 Sam. 6:19). The number killed at Beth-shemesh for irreverently examining the Ark is recorded as 50,070. “In this statement of numbers we are not only struck by the fact that in the Hebrew the seventy stands before the fifty thousand, which is very unusual, but even more by the omission of the copula waw, which is altogether unparalleled.... We can come to no other conclusion than that the number fifty thousand is neither correct nor genuine, but a gloss which has crept into the text through some oversight” (K. & D., Com., ad loc.). The town of Beth-shemesh was small; the usual conclusion is that a copyist’s error has crept in here and that only seventy were struck down. The Jewish historian Josephus supports seventy as accurate (Ant. 6.1.4). Beth-shemesh was identical with Ir-shemesh (Josh. 19:41) and is preserved in the modern Ain-shems on the NW slopes of the mountains of Judah, a site known today as Tell er-Rumeileh. From 1911 to 1912 Duncan Mackenzie excavated at Beth-shemesh on behalf of the Palestine Exploration Fund, and Elihu Grant directed the Haverford College dig there from 1928 to 1933. The city was founded shortly after 2000 B.C. and fell under Hyksos control from about 1700 to 1550 B.C.; the Hyksos effectively fortified the seven-acre site. The Egyptians destroyed the city by fire about 1500 B.C., but then it prospered during the period 1500–1200 B.C. The Israelites controlled the site between 1200 and 1000, the period of the Judges, but there is evidence of strong Philistine influence at that time. Clearly the period from 1000 to 586 was Israelite, and excavations clearly attest the destruction by Nebuchadnezzar early in the sixth century B.C. The city was never rebuilt. H.F.V.

2. A city near the southern border of Issachar, between Tabor and the Jordan (Josh. 19:22). Unidentified.

3. One of the “fortified cities” of Naphtali (Josh. 19:35, 38; Judg. 1:33), from which, along with Beth-anath, the Canaanites were not driven out.

4. The name given in the KJV of Jer. 43:13 to On, the Egyptian city usually called Heliopolis (so NASB; the NIV reads “temple of the sun”). See discussion at On, no. 2; and Sun, Worship of.

BETH´-SHEMITE (beth-she´mīt). An inhabitant (1 Sam. 6:14, 18) of Beth-shemesh (which see) in Judea.

BETH-SHIT´TAH (beth-shi´ta; “house of the acacia”). A town not far from the Jordan to which the Midianites fled from Gideon (Judg. 7:22). It is probably Shattah, N of Bethshan.

BETH-TAP´PUAH (beth-tap´ū-a; “house of apples”). A town about five miles W of Hebron (Josh. 15:53), same as modern Taffuh. Another town in Judah (12:17) was known by the simple name of Tappuah (which see).

BETH TOGARMAH (beth-tō-gar´mah). See Togarmah.

BETHU´EL (beth-ū´el; perhaps “abode of God”).

1. A southern city of Judah, sometimes called Bethul or Bethel (1 Chron. 4:30; Josh. 19:4; 12:16; 1 Sam. 30:27). Named with Eltolad, Hormah, and Ziklag.

2. The son of Nahor by Milcah; the nephew of Abraham and father of Rebekah (Gen. 22:22–23; 24:15, 24, 47). In 25:20 and 28:5 he is called “Bethuel the Aramean” (marg., Syrian). In the narrative of Rebekah’s marriage he is mentioned as saying, “The matter comes from the Lord” (24:50); her brother Laban takes the leading part in the transaction.

BE´THUL (beth´ul; contraction for Bethuel, which see). A town in the S of Simeon, named with Eltolad and Hormah (Josh. 19:4). Location uncertain.

BETH-ZUR´ (beth-zur´; “house of rock”). A strategic elevated fortress about four miles N of Hebron. The site was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:7) and referred to in Nehemiah’s time (Neh. 3:16) but was most prominent in Maccabean times. Here Judas Maccabeus defeated the Greeks under Lysias, 165 B.C.

W. F. Albright and O. R. Sellers excavated there in 1931 and Sellers in 1957 for the American Schools of Oriental Research and McCormick Theological Seminary. These digs show that the site was first occupied near the end of the third millennium B.C. and fortified for the first time by the Hyksos in the sixteenth century B.C. The place was abandoned during the fourteenth and thirteenth centuries and then occupied by the Hebrews in the twelfth and eleventh centuries. Hellenistic builders erected strong fortifications there during the second century B.C. The Syrians, Ptolemies, and Maccabeans all apparently sought to use the site to good advantage during military activities in the third and second centuries B.C. H.F.V.

BET´ONIM (bet´o-nim; “hollows”). A town in the tribe of Gad (Josh. 13:26), located at Khirbet Batneh on Mt. Gilead.

BETRAY (Gk. paradidōmi, “to give into the hands” of another). The term used of the act of Judas in delivering up our Lord to the Jews (Matt. 26:16; Mark 14:10; Luke 22:4, 6).

BETROTHAL. See Marriage.

BEU’LAH (bū’la; “married”). A prophetic figurative expression used in the KJV (Isa. 62:4; NASB, “married”) describing Palestine restored to God’s blessing, not only after the Babylonian Exile but particularly after Israel’s present worldwide dispersion and establishment in Palestine in the millennial kingdom. Israel in its relation to Jehovah is as a weak but beloved woman who has Him for her Lord and husband (54:5) and who will yet be cleansed and restored to her Lord.

BEVERAGE. See Drink.

BEWITCH. To deceive or delude by satanic and demonic power, as Simon Magus the sorcerer did to the people of Samaria (Acts 8:9, 11, KJV; NASB, “astonish”); to thus charm or fascinate (Gal. 3:1).

BEYOND. The region or country beyond. The phrase “beyond the Jordan” frequently occurs in Scripture. To ascertain its meaning we must take into account the situation of the writer. With Moses, writing upon its eastern bank, it usually signified the country W of the river (Gen. 50:10–11; Deut. 3:8, 20), but with Joshua after he crossed the river it meant the reverse (Josh. 5:1; 12:7; 22:7). In Matt. 4:15 “beyond the Jordan” designates, after the two lands already mentioned, a new land after the coming of Jesus, namely, Perea.

BE’ZAI (be’zī). The head of one of the families who returned from Babylon to the number of 324, including himself (Ezra 2:17; Neh. 7:23), 536 B.C. Either he or his family is probably referred to (Neh. 10:18) as sealing the covenant, 445 B.C.

BEZ’ALEL (bez’a-lel; “in the shadow [protection] of God”).

1. The craftsman to whom was entrusted the design and construction of the Tabernacle and its furniture in the wilderness. For this work he was specially chosen and inspired by Jehovah. With him was associated Oholiab, though Bezalel appears to have been chief. He was the son of Uri, the son of Hur (Ex. 31:2–11; 35:30; 38:22), c. 1440 B.C.

2. One of the sons of Pahath-moab, who divorced his foreign wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:30), 456 B.C.

BE’ZEK (be’zek; “lightning”).

1. The residence of Adoni-bezek (which see), and inhabited by Canaanites and Perizzites (Judg. 1:4–5). The location is uncertain but may well be Khirbet Bezqa near Gezer.

2. The gathering place where Saul numbered the forces of Judah and Israel before going to the relief of Jabesh-gilead (1 Sam. 11:8). It is located at modern Khirbet Ibbiq, about twelve miles NE of Shechem.

BE’ZER (be’zer).

1. The sixth named of the eleven sons of Zophah, of the descendants of Asher (1 Chron. 7:37).

2. A Reubenite city of refuge E of the Jordan (Deut. 4:43; Josh. 20:8; etc.). It is probably to be located at modern Umm el-Amad, eight miles NE of Madaba. Location uncertain.

BIBLE. The name commonly used to designate the thirty-nine books of the OT and the twenty-seven books of the NT. These sixty-six books constitute a divine library that is nevertheless, in a vital sense, one Book.

The Name Bible. The development of the expression the Bible to designate the “Book of books” is providential. It admirably expresses the unity of the Word of God. The English word Bible came originally from the name of the papyrus or byblos reed used extensively in antiquity for making scrolls and books. Byblos (OT Gebal) was so named because, in that Phoenician seaport, trade and manufacture in papyrus writing material was carried on. From about the eleventh century B.C., or even earlier, papyrus rolls grown in the Delta of Egypt were shipped to Gebal. The word Bible comes from the Old French through the Lat. biblia, from the Gk. Quite naturally the Greeks came to term a book biblos or a small book biblion. By the second century A.D. Greek Christians called their sacred Scriptures ta Biblia, “the Books.” When this title was subsequently transferred to the Lat., it was rendered in the singular and through Old French came into English as “Bible.”

Other Designations. In the OT and the Apocrypha the sacred writings are called “the books” (LXX, bibloi, Dan. 9:2), “the holy books” (1 Macc. 12:9), “the books of the law” (1:56), “book of the covenant” (1:57), etc. In the prologue to Ecclesiasticus the Scriptures are referred to as “the law, the prophets, and the other books (biblia) of our fathers.” In the NT the common designations for the OT books are “the Scriptures” (writings; Matt. 21:42; Mark 14:49; Luke 24:32; John 5:39; Rom. 15:4), the “holy Scriptures” (Rom. 1:2), “the sacred writings” (2 Tim. 3:15). The Jewish technical division of “the Law,” “the Prophets,” and the “Psalms” or “writings” is recognized in Luke 24:44. Another term for the whole is “the Law and the Prophets” (Acts 13:15; cf. Matt. 5:17; 11:13). The term Law is occasionally extended to include the other divisions (John 10:34; 1 Cor. 14:21). Paul also employs the expression “the oracles of God” (Rom. 3:2).

The Terms Old Testament and New Testament. These terms have come into use since the close of the second century to distinguish the Jewish and the Christian Scriptures. The word testament (lit., a will) denotes a covenant. In the RV, accordingly, “testament” is generally corrected to covenant. However, these terms are not altogether accurate for the simple reason that the Mosaic covenant and the legal dispensation were still in operation throughout the lifetime and up to the death of Christ, when “the veil of the temple was torn in two from top to bottom” (Matt. 27:51). This momentous event signified that a “new and living way” (Heb. 10:20) was open for all believers into the very presence of God with no other sacrifice or priesthood necessary save Christ (cf. 9:1–8; 10:19–22). It was only as a result of the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ, the giving of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost (Acts 2), and the preaching of the gospel of grace that actually saw the outworking of the New Covenant.

Languages. The OT is written mostly in Heb.; the NT wholly in Gk. The parts of the OT not in Heb. are Ezra 4:8–6:18; 7:12–26; Jer. 10:11; and Dan. 2:4–7:28. These sections are written in Aram., a related Semitic dialect that, after the exilic period, gradually took the place of Heb. as the common language of the Jews. The ancient Heb. was a Canaanite dialect closely akin to Phoenician and Ugaritic, the latter being a language spoken at Ugarit (modern Ras Shamra) in northern Syria. At Ugarit an important and extensive religious epic literature shedding great light on Canaanite morality and religious practices has been uncovered by Claude Schaeffer and the French expedition (1929–37). NT Gk., so greatly illuminated by important papyri discoveries, particularly from Egypt, has been shown to be not a special sacred dialect, as was formerly thought, but the common Hellenistic speech of the first century A.D. In no phase of its composition does the Bible show itself to be a book for the people more than in its use of the everyday language of the Greek-speaking world of the period.

Division of the Old Testament Books. The thirty-nine books of the OT were anciently divided by the Hebrews into three distinct classes: (1) The Law (Torah), which consisted of the five books of Moses—Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. These are the oldest of the biblical books, Mosaic in origin but incorporating much earlier material. (2) The Prophets (Nevi'im), which embraced the four earlier prophets, Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings and the four later prophets, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve—Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. These were believed to have been written by those who had the prophetic office as well as the prophetic gift. (3) The Writings (Kethuvim), which consisted of (a) poetical books—Psalms, Proverbs, Job; (b) the Rolls—Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther; and (c) prophetic-historical books—Daniel, Ezra-Nehemiah, and Chronicles. The Heb. books number twenty-four and are identical in content with the thirty-nine of the English order, the difference being made up by the division of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles into two books respectively instead of one, and by counting the twelve minor prophets individually instead of as one.

Division of the New Testament Books. By the middle of the second century a Christian NT had come into existence. Early distinction had to be made between the generally acknowledged and the disputed books. As enumerated by Eusebius and substantiated by early lists such as the canon of Muratori (about A.D. 170), quotations, versions, and patristic use, the former included the four gospels, Acts, thirteen epistles of Paul, 1 Peter, and 1 John. With these may be placed Hebrews and Revelation. Disputed books included James, Jude, 2 and 3 John, and 2 Peter. However, the complete acceptance of all of the books in our present NT canon may be dated from the councils of Laodicea (about A.D. 363) and Carthage (A.D. 397), which confirmed the catalogs of Cyril of Jerusalem, Jerome, and Augustine.

Origin and Growth. Accepting the internal evidence together with predictive prophecy and divine miracle, the following general conclusions have been arrived at by conservative scholars: (1) The Pentateuch as it stands is historical and dates from the time of Moses. Moses was its author, though it may have been revised and edited later, the additions being just as much inspired as the rest. (Cf. Robert Dick Wilson, A Scientific Investigation of the O. T. [1926], p. 11.) In other words, the Pentateuch is one continuous work, the product of a single writer, Moses. This Mosaic unity of the Pentateuch may, however, admit post-Mosaic additions or changes that do not abrogate the authenticity and integrity of the text. It is not inconsistent with Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch to grant modification of archaic expressions and place names, marginal glosses, or explanatory scribal insertions that evidently crept into the text, and textual errors resulting from inadvertent mistakes of copyists. The latter constitute the legitimate domain of scholarly criticism. An example of an addition is Deut. 34:5–12, which narrates Moses' death and burial. An evident gloss is furnished by Gen. 15:2–3, which is obscure in the Heb. unless one sees that a copyist's explanation eventually got into the text (cf. KJV and NASB readings); also 14:14 and Deut. 34:1, where Laish is called "Dan," although apparently this place did not receive its later name until after the Mosaic age (Judg. 18:29). "Raamses" (Ex. 1:11) seems clearly a modification of the earlier city Zoan or Avaris. (2) The book of Joshua is a literary unit distinct from the Pentateuch. It dates from the period of Joshua and in all likelihood was written in substance by Joshua himself (cf. 24:26). In any event, it was written early, as numerous internal evidences show. (3) The Song of Deborah (Judg. 5) is unquestionably an authentic monument of the age of the Judges, and the older parts of Judges, at least, are contemporaneous with the events they recount. (4) The age of Samuel, Saul, David, and the monarchy was a period of literary activity and saw the gradual rise of such books as 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings, and many of the psalms. (5) The Solomonic period saw the development of wisdom literature such as Proverbs, Song of Solomon, and Ecclesiastes. (6) To the period of the Divided Monarchy in the main belongs the extensive prophetic literature of the OT. Obadiah and Joel are probably dated as early as the late ninth century B.C. To the eighth century B.C. belong Amos, Hosea, and Jonah in the Northern Kingdom, and Micah and Isaiah in the Southern Kingdom. Nahum, Zephaniah, Habakkuk, and Jeremiah (including Lamentations) come in the late seventh century B.C. (7) Ezekiel and Daniel are exilic, and (8) Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi are postexilic, as well as such books as Esther, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles. Concerning unsound views, it is especially important to note the claim of higher critics that Isa. 40–66 is the work of a “second” or “third” Isaiah (which see) living about 540 B.C. or later, and that the book of Daniel is a product of the Maccabean period (c. 167 B.C.) But denials of the unity of Isaiah and the genuineness of Daniel (which see) are based upon false assumptions and unsound conclusions, and they are challenged by believing scholars who refuse to abandon the fortress of a high and worthy doctrine of inspiration as set forth in the Word (2 Tim. 3:15; 2 Pet. 1:20–21). Conservative critics also refuse to surrender the historicity of Jonah (which see) or the authenticity of Ezekiel’s (which see) prophecies in the face of critical attack. M.F.U.

BIBLIA PAUPERUM (bib’li-a paw’per-um; “Bible of the Poor”).

1. The name given to a picture Bible, printed on wood blocks before the invention of movable type. It had forty leaves printed on one side, on which forty scenes from the life of our Lord were depicted, with some OT events, accompanied by an illustrative text or sentence in Lat. It was not intended so much for the poor people as for the indigent friars, who were, doubtless, aided in their preaching by the pictures.

The pictures in this book were copied in sculpture, paintings, and altar pieces. The stained-glass windows in Lambeth Chapel were copied from some of them.

2. A work of Bonaventura, in which Bible events are alphabetically arranged and accompanied with notes to aid preachers.

BIBLIOMANCY (Gk. biblion, “Bible,” and manteia, “divination”). A kind of fortune-telling by means of the Bible, consisting of drawing texts of Scripture at random, from which inference was made of duty, future events, etc. It was introduced from paganism, which made a similar use of Homer, Virgil, and other writers. In the twelfth century it was used for the detection of heretics and in the election of bishops. A sort of bibliomancy was in use among the Jews, which consisted in appealing to the very first words heard from anyone reading the Scriptures, and in regarding them as a voice from heaven.

BICH'RI (bik'ri; “firstborn”), or Bic'ri (NIV). A Benjamite, whose son Sheba stirred up a rebellion against David after the death of Absalom (2 Sam. 20:1–22), about 967 B.C.

BID'KAR (bid'kar). Jehu's captain and originally fellow officer who cast the body of Jehoram, the son of Ahab, into the field of Naboth after Jehu had killed him (2 Kings 9:25), 842 B.C.

BIER (Heb. mittâ, “bed”; but “bier” in 2 Sam. 3:31, KJV, NASB, NIV; Gk. saros, open “coffin,” funeral “couch,” Luke 7:14, rendered “coffin” in the NASB and NIV, but “bier” in the KJV). The original form of the term is “beere,” from the Anglo-Saxon beran, “to bear.” The bier is in fact a hand-barrow on which to carry a corpse to burial. In Europe it was usually covered by a “hearse,” or wagon-shaped framework, for the support of the “pall.” A combination of the two placed on wheels makes the modern hearse.

BIGAMY. See Marriage.

BIG'THA (big'tha; from Old Persian baga + da, “gift of God”). One of the seven eunuchs or chamberlains who had charge of the harem of Xerxes (Ahasuerus) and were commanded by him to bring in Queen Vashti to the banquet (Esther 1:10), 486–465 B.C.

BIG'THAN, or Bigtha'na (big'than or big-tha'na; Old Pers., cf. Bigtha). One of the officials of Xerxes (Ahasuerus) who “guarded the door.” He conspired with Teresh against the life of the king and, being exposed by Mordecai, was hanged with his fellow conspirator (Esther 2:21; 6:2), 486–465 B.C.

BIG'VAI (big'va-ī; Old Persian, “happy, fortunate,” from baga, “good luck”).

1. The head of one of the families of Israelites who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7) with a large number of retainers—2,056, by Ezra's count (Ezra 2:14); 2,067, by Nehemiah's (Neh. 7:19), 536 B.C. At a later period seventy-two males of his family returned with Ezra (Ezra 8:14), about 457 B.C.

2. One of the leaders of the people who subscribed to the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:16), 445 B.C. Perhaps the same as no. 1.

BIL'DAD (bil'dad). The Shuhite (which see), and the second of the three friends of Job who disputed with him as to his affliction and character (Job 2:11). In his first speech (chap. 8) he attributes the death of Job's children to their own transgression. In his second speech (chap. 18) he recapitulates his former assertions of the temporal calamities of the wicked, insinuating Job's wrongdoing. In his third speech (chap. 25), unable to answer Job's arguments, he takes refuge in a declaration of God's glory and man's nothingness. Finally, with Eliphaz and Zophar, he availed himself of the intercession of Job, in obedience to the divine command (42:9).

BIL'EAM (bil'i-am). A town in the western half of the tribe of Manasseh, given with its pasture-lands to the Kohathites (1 Chron. 6:70). Modern Belāmeḥ, thirteen miles NNE of Samaria. Possibly the same as Ibleam (which see).

BIL'GAH (bil'ga; "cheerfulness").

1. Head of the fifteenth division for the Temple service, as arranged by David (1 Chron. 24:14), about 989 B.C.

2. A priest who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel and Jeshua (Neh. 12:5, 18), 536 B.C. Perhaps the same as Bilgai (10:8).

BIL'GAI (bil'ga-i; "brightness, cheerfulness"). One of the priests whose descendants signed the seal with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:8), 445 B.C. Probably the same as Bilgah (which see).

BIL'HAH (bil'ha). The handmaid of Rachel, given to her by Laban (Gen. 29:29).

Rachel gave Bilhah to her husband, Jacob, that through her she might have children, about 1938 B.C. Bilhah thus became the mother of Dan and Naphtali (30:3–8; 35:25; 46:25). Her stepson Reuben afterward lay with her (35:22) and thus incurred his father's dying reproof (49:4).

BIL'HAN (bil'han).

1. A Horite chief, son of Ezer, son of Seir, dwelling in Mt. Seir, in the land of Edom (Gen. 36:27; 1 Chron. 1:42).

2. A Benjamite, son of Jediael (which see) and father of seven sons (1 Chron. 7:10).

BILL (Heb. sēper, "writing"). A word meaning anything that is written, e.g., a "bill of divorcement," KJV; "certificate [or writ] of divorce," NASB (cf. Deut. 24:1, 3; Isa. 50:1; Jer. 3:8; Matt. 19:7, Gk. biblion). The words in the KJV of Job 31:35, "that mine adversary had written a book," would be better rendered, "that mine adversary had given me a bill of accusation" (i.e., of indictment, as in the NIV), a reading reflected in the NASB: "Here is ... the indictment which my adversary has written." In the KJV of Jer. 32:10–16, 44, "the evidence" (marg., "book") means a bill of purchase or sale (NASB and NIV, "deed of purchase"). By "bill" (KJV, NIV, and NASB, from Gk. gamma, Luke 16:6–7) a legal instrument is meant, which showed the amount of indebtedness, probably of tenants who paid rent in kind.

BIL'SHAN (bil-shan; possibly from Akkad. Bēl-shun, "their lord"). The name of one of the leaders of the Jews who returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel after the captivity (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7), 536 B.C.

BIM'HAL (bim'hal). A son of Japhlet and the great-great-grandson of Asher (1 Chron. 7:33).

BIND (qāshar). In the command, "You shall bind them as a sign on your hand," etc. (Deut. 6:8), the "words are figurative, and denote an undeviating observance of the divine commands; their literal fulfillment could only be a praiseworthy custom or well-pleasing to God when resorted to as the means of keeping the commands of God constantly before the eye” (K. & D., Com., ad loc.).

BINDING AND LOOSING. In Matt. 16:19 the power of binding and loosing is given to the apostle Peter in connection with “the keys of the kingdom of heaven.” A key in Scripture is a symbol of power and authority (Isa. 22:22; Rev. 1:18). Peter was thus given authority to open and close, not with reference to the church but in connection with “the kingdom of heaven.” The history of the early church as recorded in the book of Acts makes clear the extent of this trust. It was Peter who opened the door to Christian opportunity on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2:14; 38–42), to the Samaritans (8:14–17), and to the Gentiles in Cornelius’s household at Caesarea (10:34–48). Each of these pivotal passages marked the opening of religious opportunity in a dispensational sense to the Jew, to the racially mixed Samaritans, and to the Gentile. With the gospel of grace reaching out to the Gentiles in chap. 10, the normal course of the age was established. The Holy Spirit, who came at Pentecost to baptize the Jew into the Body of Christ, was now given to Samaritan and Gentile. This marked the extent of Peter’s use of the keys of the kingdom of heaven and his power of binding and loosing. There was no other assumption of authority by the apostle (15:7–11). In the Jewish council James, not Peter, presided (15:13; Gal. 2:11–15). The power of binding and loosing was shared by the other disciples (Matt. 18:18). That it merely indicated special apostolic authority and power, and in no sense involved the determination of eternal destiny, is apparent from Rev. 1:18. Christ alone holds the “keys of death and of Hades.” To Peter alone was granted the special prerogative of opening gospel opportunity at the beginning of the church age or present period, characterized preeminently by God’s grace and extending from the formation of the church at Pentecost by the baptism of the Spirit (cf. Acts 1:5; 11:16 with 1 Cor. 12:13) to the out-taking of this body at the coming of Christ (15:53; 1 Thess. 4:13–17; 2 Thess. 2:1–8). M.F.U.

BIN’EA (bin’i-a). A Benjamite, son of Moza and father of Raphah, of the descendants of King Saul (1 Chron. 8:37; 9:43), about 850 B.C.

BIN’NUI (bin’nū-i; “built”).

1. A Levite whose son, Noadiah, was one of those who assisted in weighing the gold and silver designed for the divine service on the restoration from Babylon (Ezra 8:33), about 457 B.C.

2. One of the “sons” of Pahath-moab, who put away his foreign wife on the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:30), 456 B.C.

3. Another Israelite, of the “sons” of Bani, who did the same as above (Ezra 10:38), 456 B.C.

4. A Levite, son of Henadad, who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. 12:8), 536 B.C. He also (if the same) assisted in repairing the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:24), 446 B.C., and joined in the covenant (10:9), 410 B.C.

5. The head of one of the families of Israelites whose followers, to the number of 648, returned from Babylon (Neh. 7:15). In Ezra 2:10 he is called Bani (which see), and his retainers are numbered at 642.

BIRD. See Animal Kingdom; Food; Sacrifices.

BIR’SHA (bir’sha). A king of Gomorrah whom Abraham assisted during the invasion of Chedorlaomer (Gen. 14:1–16), about 2050 B.C.

BIRTH. See Child.

BIRTHDAY (Heb. yôm hūlledet, Gen. 40:20; Gk. ta genesia, Matt. 14:6; Mark 6:21). The custom of observing birthdays is ancient and widely extended. In Persia they were celebrated with peculiar honor and banquets, and in Egypt the king's birthday was observed with great pomp (Gen. 40:20). No reference is made in Scripture to the celebration of birthdays by the Jews themselves although the language of Jeremiah (20:14–15) would seem to indicate that such occasions were joyfully remembered. By most commentators the feasts mentioned in Job 1:13, 18 are thought to have been birthday festivals, but Delitzsch (Com., ad loc.) believes them to have been gatherings held each day in the home of one of the brothers. The feast commemorative of “Herod’s birthday” (Matt. 14:6) may have been in honor of his birth or of his accession to the throne (cf. Hos. 7:5). The later Jews regarded the celebration of birthdays as a part of idolatrous worship. In the early church the term birthdays was applied to the festivals of martyrs, the days on which they suffered death in this world and were born to the glory and life of heaven.

BIRTHRIGHT (Heb. bīkōrâ; Gk. prototokia, “primogeniture”). The right of the firstborn; that to which one is entitled by virtue of his birth. See Firstborn.

BIRTHSTOOL (Heb. obnayim, a “pair of stones,” as a “potter’s wheel,” and used of a low stool, so called from its resemblance to a potter’s wheel). A chair of peculiar form upon which a Hebrew woman sat during childbirth (Ex. 1:16).

BIR’ZAITH (bir’za-ith). A name given in the genealogies of Asher (1 Chron. 7:31) as the son of Malchiel and great-grandson of Asher.

BISH’LAM (bish’lam; “in peace”). Apparently an officer of Artaxerxes in Palestine at the time of the return of Zerubbabel from captivity. He wrote to the king against the Jews who were rebuilding the Temple (Ezra 4:7), 529 B.C.

BISHOP. See Elder; Office; Overseer.

BISHOPRIC (Gk. episcopē, “oversight”). A KJV term (Acts 1:20) referring to the ministerial charge of the church; it is replaced in the NASB by the term office and in the NIV by the expression place of leadership. In liturgical churches the term is used to designate (1) the office and function of a bishop and (2) the district over which he has jurisdiction. See also Elder; Office; Overseer.

BITHI’A (bi-thi-a; “daughter of Jehovah”) or Bithiah (NIV). Daughter of Pharaoh and wife of Mered, a descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 4:17). Her sons are mentioned in the clause beginning “and she conceived and bore.” As the pharaohs contracted marriages with royal families alone, Mered was probably a person of some distinction, or Bithia may have been an adopted daughter of Pharaoh. It may be supposed that she became the wife of Mered during captivity.

BITHRON (bith’ron; “cut,” “gorge,” “ravine”). A term found in the KJV and NIV of 2 Sam. 2:29 but not in the NASB. It refers to a narrow passage in the Arabah (or Jordan Valley) through which Abner and his men went following the death of Asahel.

BITHYN’IA (bi-thin’i-a). The NW province of Asia Minor. It is mountainous, thickly wooded, and fertile. It was conquered by the Romans in 75 B.C. The letters of Pliny to the emperor Trajan show that the presence of so many Christians in the province embarrassed him (1 Pet. 1:1). Paul was not permitted to enter Bithynia (Acts 16:7), being detained by the “Spirit of Jesus.”

BITTER (some form of Heb. mārar; Gk. pikros). Bitterness in Scripture is symbolic of affliction, misery, servitude (Ex. 1:14; Ruth 1:20; Prov. 5:4), and wickedness (Jer. 4:18). A time of mourning and lamentation is called a “bitter day” (Amos 8:10). The “gall of bitterness” describes a state of extreme wickedness (Acts 8:23), while a “root of bitterness” (Heb. 12:15) expresses a wicked, scandalous person or any dangerous sin leading to apostasy. The waters “made bitter” (Rev. 8:11) is figurative of severe political or providential events. In the KJV of Hab. 1:6 the Chaldeans are called “that bitter and swift nation,” i.e., having a fierce disposition (so NASB).

BITTER HERBS. Because of the symbolical meaning of bitterness, bitter herbs were commanded to be used in the celebration of the Passover (which see) to recall the bondage of Egypt (Ex. 12:8; Num. 9:11). See Vegetable Kingdom.

BITTERN. See Animal Kingdom: Hedgehog.

BITU´MEN (KJV, “slime”; NASB and NIV, “pitch”). See Mineral Kingdom: Pitch.

BIZ´TOTH´IAH (biz´i´ōthī´a; “contempt of Jehovah”). One of the towns that fell to Judah (Josh. 15:28), probably the same as Baalath-beer (19:8). Site unknown, but apparently located near Beersheba.

BIZJOTH´JAH. See Biziothiah.

BIZ´THA (biz´tha; perhaps from Avestan biz-da, “double gift”). One of the seven eunuchs of the harem of Xerxes (Ahasuerus) who were ordered to bring Vashti forth for exhibition (Esther 1:10), 486–465 B.C.

BLACK. See Colors.

BLACK KITE. See Animal Kingdom: Kite.

BLAINS. See Diseases: Boils.

BLASPHEMY (Gk. blasphēmia, signifies the speaking of evil of God; Heb. nāqab shēm Adōnai, to “curse the name of the Lord,” Isa. 52:5; Rom. 2:24). Sometimes, perhaps, “blasphemy” has been retained by translators when the general meaning “evil-speaking” or “slander” might have been better (Ps. 74:18; Col. 3:8). There are two general forms of blasphemy: (1) Attributing some evil to God, or denying Him some good that we should attribute to Him (Lev. 24:11; Rom. 2:24). (2) Giving the attributes of God to a creature—which form of blasphemy the Jews charged Jesus with (Matt. 26:65; Luke 5:21; John 10:36). The Jews from ancient times have interpreted the command in Lev. 24:16 as prohibiting the utterance of the name Jehovah, reading for it “Adonai” or “Elohim.”

Punishment. Blasphemy, when committed in ignorance, i.e., through thoughtlessness and weakness of the flesh, might be atoned for; but if committed “with a high hand,” i.e., in impious rebellion against Jehovah, was punished by stoning (Lev. 24:11–16).

New Testament. Blasphemy against the Holy Spirit (Matt. 12:31; Mark 3:29; Luke 12:10), also called the unpardonable sin, has caused extended discussion. The sin mentioned in the gospels would appear to have consisted in attributing to the power of Satan those unquestionable miracles that Jesus performed by “the finger of God” and by the power of the Holy Spirit. It is questionable whether it may be extended beyond this one limited and special sin (see Sin, The Unpardonable).

Among the early Christians three kinds of blasphemy were recognized: (1) of apostates and lapsi (lapsed), whom the heathen persecutors had compelled not only to deny, but to curse, Christ; (2) of heretics and other profane Christians; (3) blasphemy against the Holy Spirit.

BLASTING. This term, which appears several times in the KJV and once in the NASB, refers to two diseases that attack the grain: one to the withering or burning of the ears, caused by the E wind (Gen. 41:6, 23, 27); the other to the effect produced by a warm wind in Arabia, by which the green ears are turned yellow, so that they bear no grains (K. & D., Com.). In the NASB and NIV “blasted” is replaced with “scorched,” and “blasting” is replaced with “blight” or “scorching,” except in Hag. 2:17, where both the KJV and NASB read “blasting.” The NIV, however, retains “blight” in this passage. See Mildew.

BLAS’TUS (blas’tus; “sprout, shoot”). The chamberlain of King Herod Agrippa who acted as mediator between the people of Tyre and Sidon and the king (Acts 12:20), A.D. 44.

BLEMISH. A physical or mental defect. As the spiritual nature of a man is reflected in his bodily form, only a faultless condition of the body could correspond to the holiness of a priest. Consequently, all men were excluded from the priesthood, and all animals from being offered as sacrifices, who had any blemish or “defect.” These blemishes are described in Lev. 21:17–23; 22:18–25; Deut. 15:21. “A disfigured face” may mean any mutilation, or it could indicate a syphilitic condition. The rule concerning animals extended to imperfections, so that if an animal free from outward blemish was found, after being slain, internally defective it was not offered in sacrifice. See also the articles Defect; Diseases: Blemish.

BLESS, BLESSING. Acts of blessing may be considered: (1) When God is said to bless men (Gen. 1:28; 22:17). God’s blessing is accompanied with that virtue that renders His blessing effectual and which is expressed by it. Because God is eternal and omnipresent, His omniscience and omnipotence cause His blessings to avail in the present life in respect to all things and also in the life to come. (2) When men bless God (Pss. 103:1–2; 145:1–3; etc.). This is when they ascribe to Him those characteristics that are His, acknowledge His sovereignty, express gratitude for His mercies, etc. (3) Men bless their fellowmen when, as in ancient times under the spirit of prophecy, they predict blessings to come upon them. Thus Jacob blessed his sons (Gen. 49:1–28; Heb. 11:21), and Moses the children of Israel (Deut. 33:1–29). It was the duty and privilege of the priests to bless the people in the name of the Lord (see Benediction). Further, men bless their fellowmen when they express good wishes and pray to God in their behalf. (4) At meals. The psalmist says, “I shall lift up the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord” (Ps. 116:13), an apparent reference to a custom among the Jews. A feast was made of a portion of their thank offerings when, among other rites, the master of the feast took a cup of wine, offering thanks to God for His mercies. The cup was then passed to all the guests, each drinking in his turn. At family feasts, and especially the Passover, both bread and wine were passed and thanks offered to God for His mercies.

BLESSING, THE CUP OF. A name applied to the wine in the Lord’s Supper (1 Cor. 10:16), probably because the same name was given to the cup of wine in the supper of the Passover (which see).

BLINDNESS. The Bible speaks of three kinds of blindness: physical, spiritual, and judicial.

Physical Blindness. Instances of physical blindness appear in Scripture (John 9:25). Blindness was sometimes inflicted for political and other purposes in the East (Judg. 16:21; 1 Sam. 11:2). The eyes of captives taken in war were commonly put out.

This practice was especially followed by the cruel Assyrians, as well as by the Babylonians and others. Jesus often healed physical blindness during His earthly ministry. In John 9 physical blindness and its cure portray judicial blindness. See Diseases.

Spiritual Blindness. Spiritual blindness is that state affecting truth. “And even if our gospel is veiled, it is veiled to those who are perishing, in whose case the god of this world has blinded the minds of the unbelieving, that they might not see the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God” (2 Cor. 4:3–4). Numerous Scriptures portray the unsaved as blinded and held under the power of Satan (John 8:44; Col. 1:13; Eph. 2:1–2). Salvation involves the taking away of this satanic veil. Spiritual blindness also extends to carnal Christians. Yielding to sin on the part of a believer, or failing to walk by the Spirit, involves diminution of spiritual perception: “And I, brethren, could not speak to you as to spiritual men, but as to men of flesh, as to babes in Christ” (1 Cor. 3:1). The correction of blindness in the carnal believer can only be brought about by a separation from carnality and a yielding to the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 2:6–16). See also Isa. 6:10; 42:18–19; Matt. 15:14.

Judicial Blindness. This phase of blindness or hardness of heart is characteristic of the nation Israel as a result of its rejection of the Messiah. It extends throughout the entire Christian age since the crucifixion of Christ. In Rom. 11:1–5 the apostle describes Israelites as under a double election—the national election and their individual election. He points out that nationally they have been temporarily set aside but that through individual election of grace, when the present age of the out-calling of the church is completed, Israel will be brought into judgment, refined, and restored to its national election. For this reason Israel’s blindness is described by the apostle to be “partial” (Rom. 11:25), thus indicating the remnant of Israel who will be saved in this present age and will become members of the church, the Body of Christ. Judicial blindness of Israel is implied in such great passages of Scripture as Isa. 6:9–10, Jer. 31:35–37, Mark 4:12, Luke 8:10, Acts 28:26–27, John 12:37–41. We are told in 2 Cor. 3:14–16 that a veil is upon the heart of the understanding of Jews “whenever Moses is read.” However, when the nation shall turn to the Lord “the veil is taken away.” The difficult problem is that although Scripture declares that for their own national sins the Jews are blinded, yet not all of them are blinded, and only partially so for the period of the out-calling of the church. The apostle says, “For I do not want you, brethren, to be uninformed of this mystery, lest you be wise in your own estimation, that a partial hardening has happened to Israel until the fulness of the Gentiles has come in; and thus all Israel will be saved; just as it is written, ‘The Deliverer will come from Zion, He will remove ungodliness from Jacob.’/‘And this is My covenant with them, When I take away their sins’” (Rom. 11:25–27). M.F.U.

BLOOD (Heb. dām; Gk. haima, “the circulatory life fluid of the body”). A peculiar sacredness was attached to blood because of the idea that prevailed of its unity with the soul. We find this distinctively stated (Gen. 9:4): “Only you shall not eat flesh with its life, that is, its blood.” “This identification of the blood with the soul, which prevailed in antiquity, appears at first to have no further foundation than that a sudden diminution of the quantity of blood in the body causes death. But this phenomenon itself has the deeper reason that all activity of the body depends on the quantity of the blood. The blood is actually the basis of the physical life; and, so far, the soul, as the principle of bodily life, is preeminently in the blood. We are to understand this only of the sensuous soul, not of the intelligent and thinking soul” (Delitzsch).

Arising from this principle the Scriptures record different directions respecting blood:

As Food. When permission was given Noah to partake of animal food (Gen. 9:4), the use of blood was strictly forbidden. In the Mosaic law this prohibition was repeated with emphasis, though generally in connection with sacrifices (Lev. 3:8; 7:26). “The prohibition of the use of blood has a twofold ground: blood has the soul in itself, and in accordance with the gracious ordinance of God it is the means of expiation for human souls, because of the soul contained in it. The one ground is found in the nature of blood and the other in its destination to a holy purpose, which, even apart from that other reason, withdraws it from a common use” (Delitzsch, Bib. Psychology, p. 283). Because of the blood the eating of bloody portions of flesh (Gen. 9:4) or of flesh with blood (Lev. 19:26; 1 Sam. 14:32) is also forbidden. The penalty was that the offender should be “cut off” from the people, which seems to be death, but whether by the sword or by stoning is not known (Lev. 17:14). This prohibition was also made by the apostles and elders in the council at Jerusalem and coupled with things offered to idols (Acts 15:29).

Sacrificial. A well-known rabbinical maxim, recognized by the author of the epistle to the Hebrews (9:22), was “Without shedding of blood there is no forgiveness.” The life is in the blood, as is often declared by Moses; the life of the sacrifice was taken, and the blood offered to God, as a representative and substitute for the offerer (Lev. 17:11). See Sacrifice; Festivals.

Figurative. “Blood” is often used for life: “Whoever sheds man’s blood” (Gen. 9:6); “His blood be on us” (Matt. 27:25). “Blood” sometimes is used as a symbol of slaughter (Isa. 34:3; Ezek. 14:19). To “wash his feet in the blood of the wicked” (Ps. 58:10) is to gain a victory with great slaughter. He who “builds a city with bloodshed” (Hab. 2:12) causes the death of the subjugated nations. Wine is called the “blood of grapes” (Gen. 49:11).

BLOOD, AVENGER, or Revenger of (Heb. gô’el haddām, lit., “redeemer of blood”). At the root of the enactments of the Mosaic penal code lies the principle of strict but righteous retribution, the purpose being to eradicate evil and produce reverence for the righteous God. This principle, however, was not first introduced by the law of Moses. It is much older and is found especially in the form of blood revenge among many ancient peoples. It appears almost everywhere where the state has not yet been formed or is still in the first stages of development, and consequently satisfaction for personal injury falls to private revenge.

This custom of “blood calling for blood” exists among Arabs of today. If a man is slain there can never be peace between the tribes again unless the man who killed him is slain by the avenger.

By this custom the life, first of all, but after it also the property of the family, as its means of subsistence, was to be protected by the nearest of kin, called a redeemer. The following directions were given by Moses: (1) The willful murderer was to be put to death, without permission of compensation, by the nearest of kin. (2) The law of retaliation was not to extend beyond the immediate offender (Deut. 24:16; 2 Kings 14:6; 2 Chron. 25:4; etc.). (3) If a man took the life of another without hatred, or without hostile intent, he was permitted to flee to one of the cities of refuge (which see).

It is not known how long blood revenge was observed, although it would appear (2 Sam. 14:7–8) that David had influence in restraining the operation of the law. Jehoshaphat established a court at Jerusalem to decide such cases (2 Chron. 19:10).

BLOOD, FLOW, or Issue, of. See Diseases: Issue.

BLOODY SWEAT. In recording the scene in Gethsemane Luke says that our Lord's sweat "became like drops of blood falling down upon the ground" (22:44). These words are understood by many to express merely a comparison between the size and density of the drops of sweat and those of blood. But blood is properly understood here only when compared to the nature of the sweat, and we infer that the words imply a profusion of sweat mingled with blood. "Phenomena of frequent occurrence demonstrate how immediately the blood, the seat of life, is under the influence of moral impressions. A feeling of shame causes the blood to rise to the face. Cases are known in which the blood, violently agitated by grief, ends by penetrating through the vessels which inclose it, and, driven outward, escapes with the sweat through the transpiratory glands" (Godet, Com., ad loc.). The phenomenon of "bloody sweat" under extreme emotional stress is recognized by medicine and is called diapedesis, or the seeping of the blood through the vessels without rupture.

BLOSSOM. Several Heb. terms are translated "blossom" or "blossoms" in the KJV, NIV, and NASB. For the use of the term in the description in the NASB and NIV of the golden lampstand in the Tabernacle, see Almond Blossom; for the use of the term in the description in the NASB and NIV of the laver in Solomon's Temple, see Lily Blossom.

For the almond tree and the lily plant, see Vegetable Kingdom.

BLOSSOM, ALMOND. See Almond Blossom; Vegetable Kingdom: Almond.

BLOSSOM, LILY. See Lily Blossom; Vegetable Kingdom: Lily.

BLOT. This word is used in the sense of to obliterate; therefore to blot out is to destroy or abolish. To blot out sin is to forgive it fully and finally (Isa. 44:22, KJV). To blot men out of God's book is to withdraw His providential favors and to cut them off (Ex. 32:32; cf. Deut. 29:20; Ps. 69:28). When Moses says, in the above passage, "Blot me out from Thy book," we understand the written book as a metaphorical expression, alluding to the custom of making a list of all citizens so that privileges of citizenship might be accorded them. "To blot out of Jehovah's book, therefore, is to cut off from living fellowship with the living God ... and to deliver over to death. As a true mediator of his people, Moses was ready to stake his own life for the deliverance of the nation if Jehovah would forgive the people their sin. These words were the strongest expression of devoted, self-sacrificing love" (K. & D., Com., ad loc.).

The refusal to blot the name of the saints out of the book of life, etc. (Rev. 3:5), indicates their security and final vindication. A sinful act (Job 31:7) or reproach (Prov. 9:7) is termed a blot (KJV).

BOANER'GES (bo-a-nur'jēz; Gk. from Aram. "sons of thunder," "noise," rīgōshā, cf. Arab. rejasa, "to rumble"—thunder). An epithet used of James and John (Mark 3:17), denoting probably their fiery eloquence (so Jerome) or zeal. It may, however, refer to their quick temper and disposition to violence (Luke 9:52–56). Compare Aram. riggūshā (Syr. regshā, "tumult"; rugza, "anger"). M.F.U.

BOATS. As a farming people inhabiting the central highland region of Palestine, the Israelites, unlike the Phoenicians, were not sea-minded. References to boats inside Palestine are not numerous. There were ferry boats across the Jordan River (2 Sam. 19:18) and small fishing boats that plied the Sea of Galilee (Mark 4:36; John 6:1, 23). David had to depend on the Phoenician navy of Hiram, who helped Solomon build the Hebrew navy. Ezion-geber on the Gulf of Aqaba was the port. Although the Hebrews were a land-loving people, there are a number of references to the boats of other nations (cf. Pss. 107:23; 104:26; Prov. 31:14). Paul used coastal freighters for travel during his missionary journeys. His account of the voyage to Rome in Acts 27 is one of the best-known and most vivid ancient adventures at sea. In OT times Egyptian ships not only traveled along the Nile but the Mediterranean coast. Traffic with Phoenician Byblos (OT Gebal) was especially well known. Those ships, called “Byblos Travelers,” transported papyrus for papermaking and brought back various kinds of wood and expensive wines. From early times flat-bottomed boats were capable of hauling heavy stones for Egyptian buildings hundreds of miles on the Nile. Similar flat-bottomed boats, caulked with bitumen, and timber rafts floated on inflated skins, were used on the Tigris and Euphrates rivers. Traffic extended even to India via the Persian Gulf. Perhaps the most famous ships of antiquity were those of the Phoenicians, which plied the Mediterranean and extended Phoenician art and culture as far W as Spain. Those ships were propelled by sails and oars. M.F.U.

BO´AZ (bō´az; possibly “fleetness” from Arab. baʿaza, “to be nimble”).

1. A wealthy Bethlehemite, kinsman to Elimelech, the husband of Naomi. When Naomi and Ruth returned from the country of Moab the latter received permission to glean in the fields of Boaz. He treated her generously, offering her much greater privileges than were usually accorded to gleaners. Finding that the kinsman of Ruth, who was more nearly related to her, would not marry her according to the “levirate law,” Boaz voluntarily assumed that law’s obligations. He married Ruth, and their union was blessed by the birth of Obed, the grandfather of David (Ruth 1–4), about 1070 B.C.

2. One of the pillars of Solomon’s Temple. See Jachin.

BO´CHERU (boʻke-rū; “firstborn”). One of the six sons of Azel, a descendant of King Saul (1 Chron. 8:38).

BO´CHIM (bō´kim; “weepers”). A place near Gilgal that was so named as a reminder of the tears shed by the unfaithful people of Israel upon God’s reproofing them (Judg. 2:1, 5). It was W of the Jordan, near the Dead Sea, and probably between Bethel and Shiloh.

BODY. The lowest part of man as a triune being, in which his soul and spirit reside (1 Thess. 5:23). In the body of a redeemed man the Holy Spirit dwells (1 Cor. 6:19; 2 Pet. 1:13–14), and his body is said to be peculiarly God’s property (1 Cor. 6:20). Its members are to be yielded unto God as instruments of righteousness rather than unto iniquity (Rom. 6:13, 19).

Figurative. The apostle Paul uses the exquisite figure of the human body to portray the spiritual unity of believers in this age, from Pentecost to the out-taking of the church. This mystical body is formed by the baptizing work of the Spirit (1 Cor. 12:13), an operation that not only unites Christians to one another but to Christ (Rom. 6:3–4; Gal. 3:27). “The body” (Gk. sōma) is differentiated from the “shadow” (skia; Col. 2:17). Thus the ceremonies of the law are figures and shadows realized in Christ. The “body of sin” (Rom. 6:6), called also “the body of this death” (7:24), represents the physical body under the control of the old nature. Unless the Christian walks in the new nature under the power of the Holy Spirit, he will come under the contamination of the old nature, which is not eradicated or destroyed when he becomes a believer. The apostle speaks of a natural body in opposition to a spiritual body (1 Cor. 15:44). The spiritual body will be the body after glorification, no longer subject to sin or death. The body that is buried is natural, subject to dissolution. The resurrection body will be spiritual, no longer subject to natural law or to sin. M.F.U.

BOLSTER (Heb. māra'āshâ, “at the head”). A KJV term replaced in the NASB by “at his (or its) head.” In Gen. 28:18 māra'āshâ is rendered pillow (which see), but the NASB correctly gives “under his head.”

BOLT. See Lock.

BOLT (Heb. reshēp, a live “coal,” an “arrow”). The Heb. term, referring to a bolt of lightning (Ps. 78:48), doubtless has reference to the manner in which lightning strikes the earth.

BOND. The translation of several Heb. and Gk. words; an obligation of any kind (Num. 30:2, 4, 12). It is used to signify oppression, captivity, affliction (Ps. 116:16). We read of the “bond of peace” (Eph. 4:3); and love, because it completes the Christian character, is called the “perfect bond of unity” (Col. 3:14). Bands or chains worn by prisoners were known as bonds (Acts 20:23).

BONDAGE. See Service.

BONDMAID, BONDMAN, BONDSERVANT. See Service.

BONE. This word is used figuratively, as “bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh” (Gen. 2:23), “of his flesh, and of his bones” (Eph. 5:30, KJV; “members of His body,” NASB and NIV), to mean the same nature and being united in the nearest relation. Iniquities are said to be in men’s bones when their bodies are polluted thereby (Job 20:11, KJV); and the state of the national death of Israel scattered among the Gentile nations is represented by the “valley of dry bones” (Ezek. 37:1–14).

BONNET. A KJV term replaced in the NASB and NIV by caps, headdress, and linen turban. See Dress; Turban.

BOOK (Heb. sēper; Gk. biblos). The Heb. word is much more comprehensive than our English book. It means anything written, as a bill of sale or deed of purchase (Jer. 32:12), a bill of accusation or an indictment (Job 31:35), a certificate of divorce (Deut. 24:1, 3), a letter (2 Sam. 11:14), or a volume (Ex. 17:14; Deut. 28:58; etc.). Respecting the material, form, and making of books, see Writing.

There are some notable expressions one may paraphrase from Scripture regarding books:

1. “To eat a book” (Ezek. 2:8; 3:2; Rev. 10:9) is a figurative expression meaning to master the contents of the book; to receive into one’s innermost being the Word of God.

2. “A sealed book” is one closed up from view (Rev. 5:1–3) or one whose contents were not understood by those reading it (Isa. 29:11). By a book “written inside and on the back” (Rev. 5:1) we understand a roll written on both sides.

3. “Book of the generations” means the genealogical records of a family or nation (Gen. 5:1; cf. Matt. 1:1).

4. “The books” mentioned in Dan. 7:10 perhaps mean books of accounts with servants; or, as among the Persians, records of official services rendered to the king and the rewards given to those who performed them (Esther 6:1–3). The “books” (Rev. 20:12) are referred to in justification of the sentence passed upon the wicked.

5. “The Book of Life” is a figurative expression originating from the ancient custom of keeping genealogical records (Neh. 7:5, 64; 12:22–23) and of registering citizens for numerous purposes (Jer. 22:30; Ezek. 13:9). God is accordingly represented as having a record of all His creation, particularly those under His special care. To be expunged from “the book of life” is to be severed from the divine favor and to incur an untimely death. Moses thus pleads that he might die, rather than that Israel should be destroyed (Ex. 32:32; Ps. 69:28). In the NT “the book of life” refers to the roster of righteous who are to inherit eternal life (Phil. 4:3; Rev. 3:5; 13:8; 17:8; 21:27), from which the saved are not to be blotted out (3:5). In the Apocalypse “the book” (or “books”) is presented as the divine record of the works of the unsaved at the great white throne judgment (20:12, 15), according to which the lost will suffer degrees of eternal punishment.

6. “Book of the Wars of the Lord” represents a memento of a larger literary development in early OT times than is represented in the canonical books. This early literary work, probably poetical, existed in Mosaic times (Num. 21:14). It was likely a collection of odes celebrating God’s glorious acts toward Israel and recited over campfires, just as the Bedouin do today. Similarly, “The book of Jashar” (Josh. 10:13; 2 Sam. 1:18) seems to have been an early national chronicle of events in Israel that stretched over several centuries of the early history of the Hebrews.

BOOTH (Heb. sūkkâ, “hut,” or “lair”; often translated “tabernacle” or “pavilion”). A shelter made of branches of trees and shrubs (Gen. 33:17) and serving as a protection against rain, frost, and heat. Such were also the temporary green shelters in which the Israelites celebrated the feast of Booths (Tabernacles, KJV; Lev. 23:42–43). See Cottage; Festivals.

BOOTHS, FEAST OF. The NASB and NIV rendering of the Heb. expression given in the KJV as feast of Tabernacles. See Festivals.

BOR´-ASHAN (bor´a-shan; “smoking furnace”). A place named (1 Sam. 30:30) as the scene of David’s hunting exploits; also probably identical with Ashan of Simeon (Josh. 15:42; 19:7).

BORDER (from Heb. gēbūl). Generally a boundary line. Boundary stones were commonly set up to mark off property lines (Deut. 19:14; 27:17; Prov. 22:28; 23:10).

Many such markers have been excavated in Babylonia, where demarcation of fields in irrigation areas was especially important. One such “ancient landmark” survives from the reign of Nebuchadnezzar I (c. 1138 B.C.) and was unearthed at ancient Nippur. See also Boundary Mark.

BORN AGAIN. The new birth is a creative life-giving operation of the Holy Spirit upon a lost human soul, whereby in response to faith in Christ crucified (John 3:14–16; Gal. 3:24), the believing one, “dead in ... trespasses and sins” (Eph. 2:1), is quickened into spiritual life and made a partaker of the divine nature and of the life of Christ Himself (Gal. 2:20; Eph. 2:10; Col. 1:27; 1 Pet. 1:23–25; 2 Pet. 1:4). The complete necessity of this spiritual transaction is the result of fallen man’s state of spiritual death, his alienation from God, and his consequent utter inability to “see” (John 3:3) or “to enter into” the kingdom of God (3:5). No matter how moral, refined, talented, or religious the natural or unregenerate man may be, he is blind to spiritual truth and unable to save himself (3:6; cf. Ps. 51:5; 1 Cor. 2:14; Rom. 8:7–8). It is clear, therefore, that the new birth is not the reformation of the old nature but the reception of a new nature. See Regeneration. M.F.U.

BORROW, BORROWING. As a matter of law, etc., see Loan.

We call attention to the much-debated act of the Israelites in “borrowing” from the Egyptians (Ex. 12:35). This was in response to a divine command (3:22; 11:2); and it suggests a difficulty, seeing that the Israelites did not intend to return to Egypt or to restore the borrowed articles. So considered, the Israelites were guilty of an immoral act. The following are some of the attempts at explanation, briefly stated:

1. The Israelites borrowed, expecting to return in three days; but when Pharaoh refused to allow this, Moses was instructed to demand the entire departure of Israel. After the smiting of the firstborn, Israel was thrust out and had no opportunity of returning what she had borrowed.

2. After the borrowing the Egyptians made war upon the Israelites, and this breach of peace justified the latter in retaining the property as “contraband of war.”

3. Ewald (Hist. of Israel, 2:66) maintains that “since Israel could not return to Egypt, ... and therefore was not bound to return the borrowed goods, the people kept them, and despoiled the Egyptians. It appears a piece of highly retributive justice that those who had been oppressed in Egypt should now be forced to borrow from the Egyptians, and be obliged by Pharaoh’s subsequent treachery to retain them, and thus be indemnified for their long oppression.”

4. “The only meaning of shāl is to ask or beg; [and the expression] yash’ilūm [Ex. 12:36], lit., ‘they allowed them to ask’; i.e., the Egyptians ... received their petition with good will, and granted their request.... From the very first the Israelites asked without intending to restore, and the Egyptians granted their request without any hope of receiving back, because God had made their hearts favorably disposed to the Israelites” (K. & D., Com. on 3:21–22). This view appears to be taken by Josephus (Ant. 2.14.6): “They also honored the Hebrews with gifts; some in order to get them to depart quickly and others on account of [neighborly intimacy] with them.” It evidently refers to the custom, which is fresh now as always in the unchangeable East, of soliciting a gift on the eve of departure or on the closing of any term of service of any sort whatsoever. That this was the custom in that day, as it is now, is indicated in many Bible references to the giving of gifts (Gen. 12:16; 33:10–11; Judg. 3:15–18; etc.); but more explicitly in the divine command to the Israelites themselves not to “send him away empty-handed” when they released a servant at the beginning of the sabbatical year (Deut. 15:13–15).

BOSOM.

1. The bunchy fold of the dress in front of the breast, into which idlers thrust the hand (Ps. 74:11); also used as a pocket or bag in which bread, grain, and other kinds of food were carried (Hag. 2:12; Luke 6:38, KJV; NASB, NIV, “lap”; Gk. kolpos). Shepherds thus carried lambs (Isa. 40:11).

2. The front of the body between the arms; hence to “lean on one’s bosom” is to so recline at the table that the head covers, as it were, the breast of the one next to him (John 13:23). The expression “carried away ... to Abraham’s bosom” (Luke 16:22) means to obtain the seat next to Abraham, i.e., to be partaker of the same blessedness as Abraham. Christ “is in the bosom of the Father” (John 1:18), i.e., “He who is most intimately connected with the Father, and dearest to Him.”

BOTCH. See Diseases: Boils.

BOTTLES. Two kinds of containers of liquids were common in ancient times—bottles of skin and earthenware. The latter were easily broken, and recovered pottery and shards constitute one of the most helpful ways the archaeologist has of describing and dating old cultures in both Palestine and Mesopotamia. Beautiful Halafian ware from Tell Halaf in N Mesopotamia goes back to c. 4500 B.C. Obeidan ware from Tell Obeid, near Ur in Babylonia, dates around 3500 B.C.; Warkan ware from Uruk (Erech, Gen. 10:10) 3200 B.C.; Jemdet Nasr ware around 3100 B.C. Jeremiah mentions the potter’s earthen vessels (Jer. 19:1, 10; 13:12–14). Bottles, frequently decorated with glass, held tears of mourners (Ps. 56:8) and were placed in tombs. They were popular in Egypt and Palestine. Bottles of skin were manufactured from whole animal hides by slowly drying them. Such leather containers are referred to in Gen. 21:14 and Josh. 9:4. Jesus referred to the wineskin or bottle that bursts when new wine is put into the old skins (Matt. 9:17; Mark 2:22; Luke 5:37). Such skins were also used to churn butter. Skin bottles are found even today in Palestine.

Several Heb. words are given as “bottle” in the KJV. Except for Judg. 4:19; Ps. 56:8, these terms are translated “skin,” “wineskin,” “jug,” or “jar” in the NASB. The NIV translates “skin” in Judg. 4:19 and “scroll” (marg., “wineskin”) in Ps. 56:8.

When KJV “bottle” is the rendering of Heb. nēbel, the NASB and NIV translations are always jug or jar (both which see). M.F.U.

BOTTOMLESS PIT (NASB rendering of the Gk. to phrear tēs abussou, “the pit of the abyss,” Rev. 9:1–2; the NIV renders “abyss”). The prisonhouse of the demons. In the end of the age myriads of these imprisoned evil spirits will be set free to indwell, torment, and energize men (9:1–21) to engage in a gigantic attempt to oppose Christ and God’s kingdom plans for the Jew in the millennial age to come (16:13–16). At the second coming of Christ, Satan and demons will be remanded to the abyss (20:1–3), a condition that will make possible the Kingdom age on earth (20:3). See Abyss; Hell; Lake; Gehenna. M.F.U.

BOUNDARY MARK (Heb. gfbûl). This was used to designate the limits of land; it could be a stone, a stake, or other such marker. The removal of such a landmark was prohibited by Mosaic law (Deut. 19:14; 27:17; Prov. 22:28; cf. Job 24:2, "landmarks") on account of the close connection in which a man's possession as the means of his support stood to the life of the man himself. Landmarks were held sacred by other nations; by the Romans, for example, who held them so sacred that removal was punished with death. In Arab fields in Palestine one may sometimes still see stones piled on top of one another for use as a landmark. See also Border.

BOW AND ARROW. As a weapon, see Armor, Arms.

Figurative. The bow signifies judgments ready for offenders (Ps. 7:12); sometimes lying (Jer. 9:3). "A treacherous bow" (Ps. 78:57; cf. Hos. 7:16) represents unreliableness. "The song of the bow" (2 Sam. 1:18) refers to "a song to which the title Kesheth (Heb. word for 'bow') was given, not only because the bow is referred to (v. 22), but because it is a martial ode" (K. & D., Com., ad loc.).

BOW IN THE CLOUDS. See Rainbow.

BOWELS. A KJV term translating several Heb. words and the Gk. word splanchna, and often indicating the inner parts generally, the inner man, and also the heart. Thus the bowels are made the seat of tenderness and compassion (Gen. 4:30; Ps. 25:6, "tender mercies," KJV, "loving kindnesses," NASB, "great mercy," NIV; Phil. 1:8; Col. 3:12). "My bowels shall sound like an harp" (Isa. 16:11, KJV; "my heart intones like a harp," NASB) is thus explained by Keil and Delitzsch (Com.): "Just as the hand or plectrum touches the strings of the harp, so did the terrible things that he had heard Jehovah say concerning Moab touch the strings of his inward parts, and cause them to resound with notes of pain."

BOWING. An attitude of respect and reverence from the earliest times. Thus Abraham "bowed to the people of the land" (Gen. 23:7); Jacob, when he met Esau, "bowed down to the ground seven times" (33:3); and the brothers of Joseph "bowed down in homage" (43:28). The orientals in the presence of kings and princes often prostrate themselves upon the earth. Such customs prevailed among the Hebrews (Ex. 4:31; 1 Kings 1:53; 2:19; 1 Sam. 24:8).

Bowing is frequently noticed in Scripture as an act of religious homage to idols (Josh. 23:7; Judg. 2:19; 2 Kings 5:18; Isa. 44:15), and also to God (Josh. 5:14; Pss. 22:29; 72:9; Mic. 6:6; etc.).

BOWL. The translation of several Heb. words. We have no means of obtaining accurate information as to the material and precise form of these vessels. In the earliest times they were, doubtless, made of wood and shells of the larger kinds of nuts and were used at meals for liquids, broth, or stew (2 Kings 4:40). Modern Arabs are now content with a few wooden bowls, although those of the rulers are not infrequently made of copper and neatly tinned. Bowls with Heb. inscriptions have been found at Babylon. See Dish.

BOWMAN. See Armor, Arms.

BOWSHOT. The ordinary distance an archer could shoot an arrow (Gen. 21:16).

BOX OF OIL. See Flask.

BOX TREE. See Vegetable Kingdom: Box Tree; Cypress.

BOY (Heb. yeled, a young "boy" or "child," Joel 3:3; Zech. 8:5; na:ar, Gen. 25:27).

A term used of those who are from the age of infancy to adolescence.

BO'ZEZ (boz'es). Between the passes through which Jonathan endeavored to cross over to go up to the post of the Philistines there was a sharp rock on one side called Bozez, and one on the other called Seneh (1 Sam. 14:4–5). These rose up like pillars to a great height and were probably the “hills” that Robinson saw to the left of the pass.

BOZ'KATH (boz'kath). A town in the plain of Judah, near Lachish and Eglon (Josh. 15:39); and the birthplace of Adaiah, maternal grandfather of King Josiah (2 Kings 22:1).

BOZ'RAH (boz'ra; “enclosure, fortress”).

1. A city of Edom, and residence of Jobab (Gen. 36:33; 1 Chron. 1:44). This is the Bozrah of Isa. 34:6; 63:1; Jer. 49:13, 22; Amos 1:12. It is probably to be identified with present Buseirah SE of the Dead Sea. Bozrah was the metropolis of N Edom (1200–700 B.C.) and was famous for its dyed garments (Isa. 63:1).

2. A place in Moab (Jer. 48:24). Perhaps the same as Bezer.

BRACELET. An article of adornment popular in ancient times, worn on the wrists or arms of both men and women (Ezek. 16:11). Abraham's servant put such a piece of jewelry on Rebekah's wrist (Gen. 24:22). Israelites in the wilderness contributed gold or silver for the vessels of the Tabernacle from such a source (Num. 31:50). Saul wore a bracelet on his arm (2 Sam. 1:10), and archaeology furnishes many examples of royal bracelets, such as those worn by Ashurnasirpal, Tiglath-pileser, Esarhaddon, and other emperors of Assyria. Bracelets were often gorgeously inlaid with precious stones and pearls and were popular in Egypt and Phoenicia, as well as in Assyria and later in Rome. See Dress; Jewel, Jewelry. M.F.U.

BRAMBLE. See Vegetable Kingdom: Thistles, Thorns.

BRANCH. The rendering of a number of Heb. and Gk. words. In the Scriptures, as well as elsewhere, the family is spoken of as a tree, and its members as branches, twigs, or shoots. From this has arisen a number of figurative expressions:

1. A branch or shoot is used as a symbol of prosperity (Gen. 49:22; Job 8:16; Prov. 11:28; Ezek. 17:6) and also of adversity (Job 15:32; Ps. 80:11, 15).

2. “A rejected branch” (Isa. 14:19) may mean a branch that is withered, or a useless sucker starting from the root. The sentence might better be rendered, “But you have been cast out of your tomb like an offensive (i.e., useless) branch.”

3. “The top of the cedar” and “the topmost of its young twigs” (Ezek. 17:3–4) is used to describe Jehoiachin as king. “They are putting the twig to their nose” (8:17) is obscure as to its meaning. By some the act was thought to be expressive of contempt, similar to “they turn up the nose with scorn.” Others understand a reference to the hypocrisy of the Jews who carried branches in honor of Jehovah but held them to the nose in scorn—outward worship but secret contempt. It may be that the branch was of a tree dedicated to Baal and carried by them in his honor. The saying appears to be a proverbial one, but the origin and meaning have not yet been satisfactorily explained.

4. Christ the Branch. A branch is the symbol of kings descended from royal ancestors; and Christ, in respect of His human nature, is called “a shoot that will spring from the stem of Jesse, and a branch from his roots” (Isa. 11:1; cf. Jer. 23:5; Zech. 3:8; 6:12). Christians are called branches of Christ, the Vine, with reference to their union with Him (John 15:5–6).

BRAND. In Zech. 3:2 (Heb. śûd) the word means a wooden poker with which the fire is stirred, hence any burned wood. The NIV translates it here as “burning stick.” A firebrand (also Amos 4:11; Isa. 7:4).

BRANDING. “Branding instead of beauty” (Isa. 3:24). In Arabia the application of the cey with a red-hot iron plays an important part in the medical treatment of both man and beast. You meet with many men who have been burned not only on their legs and arms but on their faces as well. Branding thus appears to have been used as a symbol for disfigurement, as the contrary of beauty.

BRASS. Replaced in the NASB by “bronze.” See Metrology; Mineral Kingdom.

BRAY. The loud, harsh cry of a donkey when hungry (Job 6:5). It is used figuratively of the cry of persons when hungry (30:7, marg.). In addition, the KJV of Prov. 27:22 uses bray with the sense of pound or crush as in a mortar. The NASB renders “pound,” and the NIV “grind.”

BRAZEN SERPENT. See Bronze Serpent.

BREAD. The word bread in the Bible is used in a wide sense, often occurring as our “food,” as in the petition “Give us this day our daily bread.” In strictness it denotes baked food, especially loaves. Its earliest reference is found in Gen. 18:5–6.

Material. The best bread was made of wheat, called “flour” or “meal” (Judg. 6:19; 1 Sam. 1:24; 1 Kings 4:22; etc.) and, when sifted, “fine flour” (Gen. 18:6; Lev. 2:1). A coarser bread was made of barley (Judg. 7:13; John 6:9–13). Millet, spelt, beans, and lentils were also used (Ezek. 4:9–12).

Preparation. To make “leavened bread” (Heb. hamēs, “sour”) the flour was mixed with water, kneaded on a small kneading trough, with leaven added. These kneading troughs may have been mere pieces of leather, such as are now used by the Arabs, although the expression “bound up in the clothes” (Ex. 12:34) favors the idea of a wooden bowl. The leavened dough was allowed time to rise (Matt. 13:33; Luke 13:21), sometimes a whole night (Hos. 7:6, “their baker sleepeth all the night,” KJV). When the time for making bread was short the leaven was omitted, and unleavened cakes were baked, as is customary among the Arabs (Gen. 18:6; 19:3; Ex. 12:39; 1 Sam. 28:24). Such cakes were called in Heb. maṣṣâ, “sweetness.”

Thin, round cakes made of unleavened dough were baked on heated sand or flat stones (1 Kings 19:6), by hot ashes or coals put on them—“ash-cakes.” Such cakes are still the common bread of the Bedouin and poorer orientals. The outside is, of course, black as coal, but tastes good.

Old bread is described in Josh. 9:5, 12, as “crumbled” (Heb. niqqûd, a “crumb”; KJV and NIV, “mouldy”), a term also applied to a sort of easily crumbled biscuit (KJV, “cracknels”).

“From flour there were besides many kinds of confectionery made: (a) Oven-baked, sometimes perforated cakes kneaded with oil, sometimes thin, flat cakes only smeared with oil; (b) pancakes made of flour and oil, and sometimes baked in the pan, sometimes boiled in the skillet in oil, which were also presented as meat offerings; (c) honey cakes (Exod. 16:31), raisin or grape cakes (Hos. 3:1; Cant. 2:5; II Sam. 6:19; I Chron. 16:3), and heart cakes, kneaded from dough, sodden in the pan and turned out soft, a kind of pudding (II Sam. 13:6–9).... The various kinds of baked delicacies and cakes had, no doubt, become known to the Israelites in Egypt, where baking was carried to great perfection” (Keil, Arch., 2:126).

Baking. When the dough was ready for baking it was divided into round cakes (literally, “circles of bread,” Ex. 29:23; Judg. 8:5; 1 Sam. 10:3; etc.), not unlike flat stones in shape and appearance (Matt. 7:9; cf. 4:3), about a span in diameter and a finger’s breadth in thickness. The baking was generally done by the wife (Gen. 18:6), daughter (2 Sam. 13:8), or a female servant (1 Sam. 8:13). As a trade, baking was carried on by men (Hos. 7:4–6), often congregating, according to Eastern custom, in one quarter (Neh. 3:11; 12:38, “Tower of Furnaces”; Jer. 37:21, “bakers’ street”).

Egyptian Bread-making. The following account of early bread-making is interesting: “She spread some handfuls of grain upon an oblong slab of stone, slightly hollowed on its upper surface, and proceeded to crush them with a smaller stone like a painter’s muller, which she moistened from time to time. For an hour and more she labored with her arms, shoulders, loins, in fact, all her body; but an indifferent result followed from such great exertion. The flour, made to undergo several grindings in this rustic mortar, was coarse, uneven, mixed with bran or whole grains, which had escaped the pestle, and contaminated with dust and abraded particles of the stone. She kneaded it with a little water, blended with it, as a sort of yeast, a piece of stale dough of the day before, and made from the mass round cakes, about half an inch thick and some four inches in diameter, which she placed upon a flat flint, covering them with hot ashes. The bread, imperfectly raised, often badly cooked, borrowed, from the organic fuel under which it was buried, a special odor, and a taste to which strangers did not sufficiently accustom themselves. The impurities which it contained were sufficient in the long run to ruin the strongest teeth. Eating it was an action of grinding rather than chewing, and old men were not infrequently met with whose teeth had gradually been worn away to the level of the gums, like those of an aged ass or ox” (Maspero, Dawn of Civ., p. 320).

Figurative. The thin cakes already described were not cut but broken, hence the expression usual in Scripture of “breaking bread” to signify taking a meal (Lam. 4:4; Matt. 14:19; 15:36).

From our Lord’s breaking bread at the institution of the Eucharist, the expression “breaking of” or “to break bread,” in the NT is used for the Lord’s Supper (Matt. 26:26) and for the agape, or love, feast (Acts 2:46).

“Bread of privation” (lit., “penury”) signifies to put one on the low rations of a siege or imprisonment (1 Kings 22:27; Isa. 30:20).

“Bread of painful labors” (Ps. 127:2) means food obtained by toil.

“Bread of tears” (Ps. 80:5) probably signifies a condition of great sorrow.

“Bread of wickedness” (Prov. 4:17) and “bread obtained by falsehood” (Prov. 20:17) denote not only living or estate obtained by fraud but that to do evil is as much the portion of the wicked as to eat his bread.

“Cast your bread on the surface of the waters” (Eccles. 11:1) is doubtless an allusion to the custom of sowing seed by casting it from boats into the overflowing waters of the Nile or in any marshy ground. From v. 1 it is evident that charity is implied, and that, while seemingly hopeless, it shall prove at last not to have been thrown away (Isa. 32:20).

“Bread of Life” prefigures Christ as the supplier of true spiritual nourishment (John 6:48–51). He is the bread of heaven, and God’s Word, like bread, is the spiritual staff of life (Matt. 4:4).

BRIBE, BRIBERY (Heb. kōper, “redemption” money).

1. A payment made by a man to redeem himself from capital punishment. The expression “From whose hand have I taken a bribe to blind my eyes with it?” (1 Sam. 12:3) means, “Of whom have I taken anything to exempt from punishment one worthy of death?”

2. (Heb. shōhad, “gift”). A present to avert punishment (2 Kings 16:8; Prov. 6:35), or a bribe taken to “pervert justice” (cf. 1 Sam. 8:3; Ezek. 22:12).

BRICK (Heb. lābēnâ, from lāban, “to be white,” from the whiteness of the clay out of which bricks were made). The earliest mention made of bricks in Scripture is in the account of the building of Babel (Gen. 11:3). In Exodus (chap. 5) we have the vivid description of the grievous hardship imposed upon the Israelites in the making of bricks in Egypt.

Babylonian. The following account taken from Maspero (Dawn of Civilization, pp. 622–23) especially applies to Mesopotamia and Egypt: “In the estimation of the Chaldean architects stone was a matter of secondary consideration. As it was necessary to bring it from a great distance and at considerable expense, they used it very sparingly, and then merely for lintels, thresholds, for hinges on which to hang their doors, for dressings in some of their state apartments, in cornices or sculptured friezes on the external walls of their buildings; and even then its employment suggested rather that of a band of embroidery carefully disposed on some garment to relieve the plainness of the material. Crude brick, burnt brick, enameled brick, but always and everywhere brick was the principal element in their construction. The soil of the marshes or of the plains, separated from the pebbles and foreign substances which it contained, mixed with grass or chopped straw, moistened with water, and assiduously trodden under foot, furnished the ancient builders with material of incredible tenacity. This was molded into thin, square brick, eight inches to a foot across and three or four inches thick, but rarely larger. They were stamped on the flat side, by means of an incised wooden block, with the name of the reigning sovereign, and were then dried in the sun. They were sometimes enameled with patterns of various colors.” The Babylonian bricks were more commonly burned in kilns than those used at Nineveh, which are chiefly sun-dried like the Egyptian.

Egyptian. Egyptian bricks were not generally baked in kilns but dried in the sun, although a brickkiln is mentioned by Jeremiah (Jer. 43:9; NASB, “brick terrace”; the NIV renders “brick pavement”). Made of clay, they are, even without straw, as firm as when first put up in the reigns of the Thutmoids and others, whose names they bear. When made of the Nile mud they required straw to keep them from falling apart, and when laid up in walls were secured by layers of sticks and reeds. In size they varied from 20 or 17 inches to 14¼ inches long, 8¾ inches to 6½ inches wide, and 7 inches to 4½ inches thick.

Brickmaking was regarded as an unhealthy and laborious occupation by the Egyptians and was, therefore, imposed upon slaves. Very naturally, the Hebrews, when enslaved by the pharaohs, were put to this work. The use of brick as building material was, doubtless, quite general, although their fragility often insured early decay. We have illustrations of walls, storehouses, and temples having been built of bricks. The tomb of Rekhmire, grand vizier of Thutmose III (c. 1460 B.C.) depicts Semitic slaves busy with brickmaking. Rameses II (c. 1290 B.C.) rebuilt the older city Zoan-Tanis (Raamses of Ex. 1:11, NASB), and the bricks are stamped with his name.

Jewish. The Jews learned the art of brickmaking in Egypt, using almost the identical method. Even now in Palestine bricks are made from moistened clay mixed with straw and dried in the sun.

Mention is made of the brickkiln in the time of David (2 Sam. 12:31; cf. Nah. 3:14), and Isaiah complains (65:3) that the people built their altars of brick, instead of stone, as the law directed (Ex. 20:25). See Handicrafts: Brickmaker.

BRIDAL GIFT. See Marriage.

BRIDE, BRIDEGROOM. See Marriage.

Figurative. The church is alluded to (Rev. 21:9) as “the bride, the wife of the Lamb.” The meaning is that as the bridegroom rejoices over the bride, so the Lord shall forever rejoice in His people and His people in Him. Christ Himself is also called “the bridegroom” in the same sense (John 3:29).

The figure of marriage is used also in the OT to denote the relationship between Jehovah and the Jewish nation, however with this important contrast. Israel is portrayed as the wife of Jehovah (Hos. 2:2, 16, 23), now because of unbelief and apostasy disowned and dishonored, but yet to be restored (2:14–23). The church, on the other hand, is a pure virgin, espoused to Christ (2 Cor. 11:1–2), which could never be true of an adulterous wife, although she is eventually to be restored in grace. In the mystery of the Divine-trinity it can be true that Israel is the adulterous wife of Jehovah (to be forgiven and reinstated), whereas the church is the virgin wife of the Lamb (John 3:29; Rev. 19:6–8). To break down this distinction between Israel, God’s elect nation with a unique future when restored (Rom. 11:1–27), and the church, the Body (1 Cor. 12:13–14) and bride of Christ (Eph. 5:25–27), formed by the baptizing work of the Holy Spirit during the period of Israel’s national unbelief and setting aside, is to plunge biblical prophecy into confusion. BRIDGE. Bridges were not in use in early biblical times. Rivers were crossed either by ferries or more commonly by fords (Judg. 3:28; 2 Sam. 19:18). Later, however, the Romans constructed masonry bridges, ruins of which survive to our day. A famous ruin of a bridge is the structure built across the Tyropoean Valley at Jerusalem by John Hycranus (134–104 B.C.), called “Robinson’s Arch” for its modern discoverer. It was destroyed in 63 B.C. during Pompey’s siege. Ruins of a famous Roman bridge are to be found near Beirut in Lebanon, north of the Dog River. M.F.U.

BRIDLE (Heb. resen, “halter,” Job 30:11; 41:13, NASB, marg.; Isa. 30:28; meteg, strictly the “bit,” as rendered in Ps. 32:9, though NIV has “bridle”; maḥsôm, a “muzzle,” only in 39:1; Gk. chalinós, “bit,” James 3:2; Rev. 14:20). The word bridle is used for that portion of the harness by which the driver controls the horse, and consists of the headstall, bit, and reins (Ps. 32:9). The Assyrians ornamented their bridles to a high degree.

It was customary to fix a muzzle of leather on refractory slaves (see Isa. 37:29). Prisoners of war were similarly treated. One of the Assyrian sculptures represents prisoners with a ring in the lower lip, to which is attached a thin cord held by the king (2 Kings 19:28).

Figurative. The providence of God in leading men and nations away from the completion of their plans is symbolized by the “bridle” and “hook” (2 Kings 19:28; Isa. 30:28; 37:29; Ezek. 29:4). The restraints of law and humanity are called a bridle, and to “cast off the bridle” (Job 30:11) is to act without reference to these.

BRIERS. See Vegetable Kingdom: Thistles, Thorns.

BRIMSTONE (Heb. goprît, properly “resin”; Gk. theion, “flashing”). The Heb. word is connected with gopher (Heb. gōper) and probably meant the gum of that tree. It was thence transferred to all inflammable substances, especially sulfur. The cities of the plain were destroyed by a storm of fire and brimstone (Gen. 19:24, KJV; NIV, “sulfur”). See also Mineral Kingdom: Brimstone; Pitch and articles Sodom; Gomorrah.

Figurative. Apparently with reference to Sodom, brimstone is often used in Scripture to denote punishment and destruction (Deut. 29:23; Job 18:15; Ps. 11:6; Isa. 30:33; Ezek. 38:22; Luke 17:29; Rev. 9:17; etc.).

BROKEN HAND, BROKEN FOOT. See Diseases.

BRONZE. A unit of money and an alloy. See Metrology; Mineral Kingdom.

BRONZE SEA. See Laver; Sea, Bronze; Tabernacle of Israel.

BRONZE SERPENT (Heb. nāḥāsh nḥōshet, “serpent of copper”). As the Israelites “set out from Mount Hor by the way of the Red Sea” they rebelled against God and against Moses. Punished by Jehovah with fiery serpents (which see), many of them died. At the command of God Moses made the figure of a serpent and set it on a “standard” or pole; whoever of the bitten ones looked at it “lived,” i.e., recovered from the serpent’s bite (Num. 21:1–9). This bronze serpent afterward became an object of worship, under the name of Nehushtan, and was destroyed by King Hezekiah (2 Kings 18:4).

Figurative. From the words of our Lord (John 3:14) most commentators have rightly inferred that the “bronze serpent” was intended as a type of Christ as the redeemer of the world, as becoming “sin on our behalf” (2 Cor. 5:21) and as bearing our judgment. Cf. the historical fulfillment in Matt. 27:46.

BROOK (Heb. generally nahal; Gk. cheimarros, a “torrent”).

1. A small stream issuing from a subterranean spring and running through a deep valley, such as the Arnon, Jabbok, Kidron, etc.

2. Winter streams arising from rains, but drying up in the summer (Job 6:15, marg.).

3. The torrent bed, even though it might be without water, so that it is sometimes doubtful whether the bed or stream is meant. The word is sometimes rendered “river,” as in the case of the “brook of Egypt,” a small torrent in the southern border of Palestine (Num. 34:5; Josh. 15:4, 47).

Figurative. “My brothers have acted deceitfully like a wadi” (or brook, Job 6:15) is an expression of the failure of friends to comfort and help.

BROOM TREE. See Vegetable Kingdom.

BROTHER (generally Heb. āḥ; Gk. adelphos). Brother is a word extensively and variously used in Scripture. (1) A brother in the natural sense, whether the child of the same father and mother (Gen. 42:4; 44:20; Luke 6:14), of the same father only (Gen. 42:15; 43:3; Judg. 9:21; Matt. 1:2; Luke 3:1, 19), or of the same mother only (Judg. 8:19). (2) A relative, kinsman, in any degree of blood, e.g., a nephew (Gen. 14:16; 29:12, 15, marg.), or a cousin (Matt. 12:46; John 7:3; Acts 1:14; etc.). (3) One of the same tribe (Num. 8:26; 2 Kings 10:13, marg.; Neh. 3:1). (4) A fellow countryman

(Ex. 2:11; 4:18; Matt. 5:47; Acts 3:22; etc.), or one of a kindred nation, e.g., the Edomites and Hebrews (Gen. 9:25; 16:12; Num. 20:14). (5) An ally, confederate, spoken of allied nations such as the Hebrews and Tyrians (Amos 1:9) or those of the same religion (Isa. 66:20; Acts 9:30; 1 Cor. 5:11); probably the name by which the early converts were known until they were called “Christians” at Antioch (Acts 11:26). (6) A friend, associate, as of Job’s friends (6:15; see 19:13; Neh. 5:10), of Solomon, whom Hiram calls his brother (1 Kings 9:13). (7) One of equal rank and dignity (Matt. 23:8). (8) One of the same nature, a fellowman (Gen. 13:8; Matt. 5:22; Heb. 2:17). (9) It is applied in the Heb. to inanimate things, as of the cherubim it is said they are “facing one another” (Ex. 25:20; cf. 37:9; lit., a man his brother). (10) Disciples, followers (Matt. 25:40; Heb. 2:11–12).

Figurative. As likeness of disposition, habits, Jobs says (30:29), “I have become a brother to jackals,” i.e., I cry and howl like them. Proverbs 18:9 says, “He also who is slack in his work is brother to him who destroys.” The Jewish schools distinguish between a “brother” (i.e., an Israelite by blood) and “neighbor” (a proselyte). The gospel extends both terms to all the world (1 Cor. 5:11; Luke 10:29–37).

BROTHERLY KINDNESS (Gk. philadelphia, 2 Pet. 1:7). The Gk. term is also rendered “brotherly love” (Rom. 12:10); “love of the brethren” (1 Thess. 4:9; Heb. 13:1; 1 Pet. 1:22). It is affection for our brothers, in the broad meaning of which word the Scriptures include as our neighbors all mankind, not excluding our enemies. We are not required to bestow equal love upon all or recognize all as possessing an equal claim to it. It does not make men blind to the qualities of their fellows. While it requires obedience to the golden rule, a special and warmer love for our brothers in Christ is urged. Brotherly love requires the best construction of a neighbor’s conduct, effort, and sacrifice for others, and forgiveness of injuries. See Charity.

BROTHERLY LOVE. See Brotherly Kindness.

BROTHERS OF OUR LORD. In Matt. 13:55 “James and Joseph and Simon and Judas” are named as the brothers of Jesus, whereas sisters are mentioned in v. 56. The sense in which the terms “brothers and sisters” are to be taken has been a matter of great discussion, some contending that they are to be regarded in their literal sense, others in the more general sense of relatives. Several theories in support of the latter view have been advanced:

1. That they were our Lord’s first cousins, the sons of Alphaeus (or Cleopas) and Mary the sister of the virgin. Against this view it is argued that there is no mention anywhere of cousins or kinsmen of Jesus according to the flesh, although the term cousin (Gk. anepsios) is well known in NT vocabulary (Col. 4:10); also the more exact term “son of Paul’s sister” (Acts 23:16); also “relative” occurs several times (Mark 6:4; Luke 1:36, 58; John 18:26; Acts 10:24), as well as “kinsman” (Rom. 9:3). Thus it seems strange that if the brothers of our Lord were merely cousins they were never called such.

2. That they were sons of Joseph by a former marriage with a certain Escha, or Salome, of the tribe of Judah. The only ground for its possibility is the apparent difference of age between Joseph and Mary.

3. That they were the offspring of a levirate marriage between Joseph and the wife of his deceased brother, Cleopas. This, however, is a mere hypothesis.

The arguments for their being the full brothers of Jesus are numerous and, taken collectively, are very strong. (1) The words “first-born son” (Luke 2:7) appear to have been used with reference to later-born children. (2) The declaration that Joseph “kept her a virgin until she gave birth to a Son” (Matt. 1:25) does not necessarily establish the perpetual virginity of Mary. We must remember that “the evangelist employed the term ‘firstborn’ as an historian, from the time when his gospel was composed, and consequently could not have used it had Jesus been present to his historical consciousness as the only son of Mary. But Jesus, according to Matthew (12:46–48; 13:55–56), had also brothers and sisters, among whom he was the first-born” (Meyer, Com., on Matt. 1:25). (3) They are constantly spoken of with the virgin Mary and with no shadow of a hint that they were not her children. The mother is mentioned at the same time (Mark 3:31; Luke 8:19; John 2:12; Acts 1:14), just as in Matt. 13:55–56 the father and sisters are likewise mentioned along with Him.

BROTHER’S WIFE (Heb. yābemet, Deut. 25:7; “sister-in-law,” Ruth 1:15). See Marriage, Levirate.

BROWN (Heb. hûm, lit., “scorched”). The term applied in the KJV to the dark-colored sheep removed from Jacob’s flocks by Laban (Gen. 30:32–40). The NASB renders “black,” and the NIV “dark-colored.” See Colors.

BUILDERS. See Handicrafts.

BRUISED. The rendering of at least eleven Heb. and Gk. words is used in Scripture in a figurative sense. Thus Satan is said to bruise the heel of Christ (Gen. 3:15), i.e., to afflict the humanity of Christ and to bring suffering and persecution on His people. The serpent’s poison is in his head, and a wound in that part is fatal. So Christ is said to bruise the head of Satan when He crushes his designs, despoils him of his power, and enables His people to rise superior to temptation (Rom. 16:20). Our Lord was bruised when He had inflicted upon Him the punishment due to our sins (Isa. 53:5, 10). Weak Christians are bruised reeds, which Christ will not break (Isa. 42:3).

BRUISES. See Diseases.

BRUTISH (Heb. ba‘ar, “to be like an animal”). A KJV term applied to one whose mental and moral perceptions are dulled by ignorance (Prov. 12:1), idolatry (Jer. 10:8, 14, 21). “The word must be explained from Ps. 92:6, ‘brutish,’ foolish, always bearing in mind that the Hebrew associated the idea of godlessness with folly, and that cruelty naturally follows in its train” (Keil, Com., on Ezek. 21:31). The NASB and NIV render “stupid.”

BUBAS’TIS (bu-bas’tis). See Pi-beseth.

BUCK. See Animal Kingdom: Deer; Roebuck.

BUCKET. A skin vessel with which to draw water (Isa. 40:15). In John 4:11 the Gk. word antlēma is used.

Figurative. Bucket is used (Num. 24:7) for abundance, as water is the leading source of prosperity in the burning East. The nation is personified as a man carrying two buckets overflowing with water.

BUCKLER. See Armor: Defensive Weapons.

BUFFET (Gk. kolaphizo, to “strike with the fist”). Rude maltreatment in general, whether in derision (Matt. 26:67; Mark 14:65, KJV, “buffet”; NASB, “beat”), opposition (2 Cor. 12:7–9, where Paul states that Christ sent “a messenger of Satan to buffet me” that “the power of Christ may dwell in me”), or punishment (1 Pet. 2:20, KJV, “buffet”; NASB, “harshly treated”; NIV, “receive a beating”).

BUILDING. See Architecture; House.

Figurative. “To build” is used with reference to children and a numerous progeny (Ruth 4:11; 2 Sam. 7:27); and to the founding of a family. The church is called a building (1 Cor. 3:9; etc.); and the resurrection body of the Christian is called a building in contrast to a tent, symbolic of this mortal body (2 Cor. 5:1).

BUK'KI (buk'i).

1. The son of Jogli and leader of the tribe of Dan, appointed by Moses as one of the commission to divide the inheritance among the tribes (Num. 34:22), c. 1400 B.C.

2. The son of Abishua and father of Uzzi, being great-great-grandson of Aaron (1 Chron. 6:5, 51).

BUKKI'AH (bu-kī'a). A Kohathite Levite, of the sons of Heman, the leader of the sixth band in the Temple music service. The band consisted of himself and eleven of his kindred (1 Chron. 25:4, 13), 1000 B.C.

BUL (būl). The eighth ecclesiastical month of the Jewish year (1 Kings 6:38). See Time.

BULBS (Heb. kaptōr). Part of the ornamentation of the seven-branched lampstand in the Tabernacle (Ex. 25:31–36; 37:17–22; marg., “calyx”). The term is distinct from KJV “flower,” NASB “lily blossom,” NIV “buds.” In the KJV “bulbs” is rendered “knops.”

BULL, BULLOCK. See Animal Kingdom: Ox.

Figurative. In this sense bull represents powerful, fierce, and insolent enemies (Pss. 22:12; 68:30; Isa. 34:7).

BULRUSH. See Vegetable Kingdom: Reeds, Rushes.

BULWARK. Bulwarks in Scripture appear to have been rural towers, answering the purpose of the modern bastion. They were usually erected at certain distances along the walls, generally at the corners, and upon them were placed the military engines. See Fortifications.

BU'NAH (bū'na; “discretion”). The second of the sons of Jerahmeel, the grandson of Perez, the son of Judah (1 Chron. 2:25).

BUNCH. The rendering of several Heb. words, such as a bunch of hyssop (Ex. 12:22), a bunch of raisins (2 Sam. 16:1, KJV), the bunch of a camel (Isa. 30:6, KJV).

BUNDLE. Anything bound together, such as a “bundle of myrrh” (song of Sol. 1:13, KJV; NASB, “pouch”; NIV, “sachet”), of “wheat” (Matt. 13:30), of “sticks” (Acts 28:3). It is also used of money in a purse (Gen. 42:35).

Figurative. The speech of Abigail to David (1 Sam. 25:29) is rendered “The life of my lord shall be bound in the bundle of the living,” and the words seem to refer to the safer preservation of the righteous on the earth. The metaphor is taken from the custom of binding up valuable things in a bundle to prevent injury.

BUN'NI (bun'i; “built”). One of the Levites who made public prayer and confession (Neh. 9:4) and joined Nehemiah in the covenant after the return from Babylon (10:15), 445 B.C.

BURDEN (Heb. maššā, a “lifting up”). This word is often used in the familiar meaning of a load. It also frequently has the meaning of an oracle from God; sometimes as a denunciation of evil (Isa. 13:1; Nah. 1:1; Mal. 1:1), and also merely as a message, whether joyous or afflictive (Zech. 9:1; 12:1).

BURIAL. Burial customs favored by ancient peoples differed from one culture to another.

Hebrew. Interment in Bible times followed soon after death, as is evident in the narratives of the burial of Sarah (Gen. 23:1–20), Rachel (35:19, 20), and Rebekah’s nurse (35:8). The Hebrews did not normally cremate, except in most unusual cases of emergency, as in the case of Saul and his sons (1 Sam. 31:11–13). Neither did they generally use coffins or embalm. Joseph’s burial in a coffin (Gen. 50:26) and his being embalmed (as was his father, Jacob, 50:2–3) are to be explained as due to his eminent position in Egypt. Ordinarily a body, after being washed (Acts 9:37) and wrapped in a cloth or closely bound in bands (Matt. 27:59; John 11:44), was carried on a simple bier to the grave or vault (2 Sam. 3:31; Luke 7:14), which was commonly a natural cave artificially cut out of the rock (Gen. 25:9–10; Matt. 27:60). Unguents and perfumes were applied to the body if they could be afforded (John 12:3, 7; 19:39), or fragrant incense was burned (Jer. 34:5). Mourners lamented with loud demonstrations of grief (Mark 5:38) and were often hired (Jer. 9:17).

Egyptian. Egyptians took great pains to prepare their dead for the future life.

Under the early dynasties graves with stone superstructures (mastaba) built over them were used, and food and other essential commodities for the afterlife were placed near the body. The practice of placing one mastaba upon another resulted in a step pyramid, such as the famous one at Saqqara from Dynasty III. From these developed the square-based, perfect pyramids. These colossal structures, the most famous of which are located at Gizeh from Dynasty IV, are architectural wonders that still amaze the world. In the complex interior of these great masses of stone the mummified bodies of royalty were interred. The intricate process of mummification, including embalming, required seventy days during which the internal organs, except the heart, were removed and stored away in special animal-headed jars. The brains of the deceased were also removed and a resinous paste and linen used to stuff the body, while the body itself was carefully wrapped with linen bandages and cords. Jewels and scarabs were used to adorn the corpse, the latter enabling the mummy to be identified and dated. The mummy was set in a case, which was painted with the face of the deceased. The discovery of the lavish intact tomb of Tutankhamen (1922), a pharaoh of the fourteenth century B.C. (late Amarna Period) revealed incredible burial splendor. A whole series of fine metal coffins, including one of solid gold inlaid with lapis lazuli and carnelian, was uncovered, as well as exquisite death masks of the ruler.

Babylonian. Like the Egyptians, the Babylonians took great pains to prepare for the future life. The famous royal tombs from the First Dynasty of Ur, discovered by Sir Leonard Woolley and dating from about 2500 B.C., reveal rooms and vaults of brick and stone. The occupant of one of the tombs, identified by a lapis lazuli cylinder as Queen Puabi, lay upon a wooden bier, a golden cup near her hand. She wore an elaborate headdress, ornate earrings, and a golden comb with golden flowers set with lapis lazuli. Mass burials were discovered in several tombs. Twenty-five persons were interred with the queen. Other graves contained the remains of as many as six men and sixty-eight women. Even chariots filled with treasures were driven into these tombs. Superb gold daggers, bowls, animals, helmets, and other exquisitely wrought objects were interred with the deceased. But the graves of the common people were found to be simple rectangular pits. The body was wrapped in matting or put in a coffin of wood, clay, or wickerwork. Personal belongings as well as food and drink for the afterlife were placed in the grave. Kind provisions for the dead appear in the carefully folded hands in which there was a cup, once doubtless filled with water, for the need of the sleeper. Later Babylonians burned their dead and deposited their ashes in ornate funerary urns, as did Greeks and Romans. Hebrews in later times also practiced cremation, as is indicated by the numerous ossuaries found in NT Palestine.

Philistine. The Philistines around the twelfth century B.C. interred in clay coffins, numbers of which have been found in Palestine.

BUSH (Heb. sfneh, “bramble”; Gk. batos). The burning bush in which Jehovah manifested Himself to Moses at Horeb (Ex. 3:2; etc.; Deut. 33:16; Mark 12:26; Acts 7:30, 35). This was probably the bramble. See Vegetable Kingdom: Burning Bush.

Figurative. The thornbush or “bramble,” in contrast with the more noble and lofty trees (Judg. 9:15), represented the Israelites in their humiliation as a people despised by the world. The burning bush represents Israel as enduring the fire of affliction, the iron furnace of Egypt (Deut. 4:20), chastened but not consumed. See Vegetable Kingdom.

BUSHEL. See Metrology: Dry Measures of Capacity.

BUSYBODY (Gk. periergos, “working around,” 1 Tim. 5:13; to “be overbusy,” 2 Thess. 3:11; allotriepiskopos, “one who supervises others’ affairs,” 1 Pet. 4:15, NASB; “troublesome meddler”). A meddlesome person, emphatically condemned in the above passages.

BUTLER (Heb. mashqeh, “one who gives drink”). A cupbearer (which see), as the Heb. word is rendered in the KJV, NIV, and NASB of 2 Chron. 9:4, and an officer of honor in the royal household of Egypt (Gen. 40:1, 13). It was his duty to fill and bear the drinking vessel to the king. Nehemiah was cupbearer to King Artaxerxes (Neh. 1:11; 2:1). Where the KJV renders “butler,” the NASB and NIV render cupbearer (which see).

BUTTER (Heb. hemâ, “grown thick”). Although always rendered butter in the KJV, critics usually agree that the Heb. word means “curdled milk” or curds. Indeed, it is doubtful whether butter is meant in any passage except Prov. 30:33, “the churning of milk produces butter.” The other passages will better apply to curdled milk than to butter. The ancient method of making butter was probably similar to that followed by the modern Bedouin. The milk is put into a skin, the tanned hide of a whole goat; this skin is hung up on a light frame, or between two poles, and pushed steadily from side to side till the butter is ready. “When the butter has come, they take it out, boil or melt it, and then put it into bottles made of goats' skins. In winter it resembles candied honey; in summer it is mere oil" (Thompson, The Land and the Book, 1:393).

BUZ (būz; "contempt").

1. The second son of Nahor and Milcah (Gen. 22:21).

2. The father of Jahdo, of the tribe of Gad (1 Chron. 5:14).

3. One of three tribes of northern Arabia. In Jer. 25:23 the following are mentioned: "Dedan, Tema, Buz, and all who cut the corners of their hair."

BU'ZI (būz'i). A priest, father of Ezekiel the prophet (Ezek. 1:3), before 595 B.C.

BUZ'ITE (būz'īt). A term indicating the ancestry of Elihu, found only in Job 32:2, 6, "Elihu the son of Barachel the Buzite," indicating ancestry from the Arabian tribe of Buz.

BUZZARD. See Animal Kingdom.

C

CAB. The cab (KJV) or kab (NASB, NIV) was a dry measure of capacity. See Metrology.

CAB'BON (kab'on). A place in the plain of Judah (Josh. 15:40); possibly the same as Machbena (1 Chron. 2:49; Macbenah, NIV).

CA'BUL (ka'bul; perhaps “sterile, worthless”), i.e., fettered land (Heb. kebel, “a fetter”).

1. A city on the E border of Asher, at its N side (Josh. 19:27), probably identical with the village of Kabul, nine miles SE of Acre.

2. A district of Galilee, containing twenty “cities,” which Solomon gave to Hiram, king of Tyre, in return for services rendered in building the Temple. When Hiram saw them he was displeased, and he said, ““What are these cities which you have given me, my brother?” So they were called the land of Cabul to this day” (1 Kings 9:13). These cities were occupied chiefly by a heathen population and were probably in bad condition. Or it may have been that, as the Phoenicians were a seafaring people, Hiram would have preferred to have had coastal cities rather than those inland.

CAESAR (sē'zer). A name taken by—or given to—all the Roman emperors after Julius Caesar. It was a sort of title, like Pharaoh, and as such is usually applied to the emperors in the NT, as the sovereigns of Judea (John 19:15; Acts 17:7). It was to him that the Jews paid tribute (Matt. 22:17; Luke 23:2), and to him that such Jews as were cives Romani had the right of appeal (Acts 25:11); in which case, if their cause was a criminal one, they were sent to Rome (25:12, 21). The Caesars mentioned in the NT are Augustus (Luke 2:1), Tiberius (3:1; 20:22), Claudius (Acts 11:28), and Nero (25:8). See each name.

CAESARE'A (sē-sa-rē'a; “pertaining to Caesar”).

Caesarea Maritima (i.e., “Caesarea by the sea”). This Caesarea, so called to distinguish it from Caesarea Philippi—or simply Caesarea—was situated on the coast of Palestine on the great road from Tyre to Egypt, and about halfway between Joppa and Dora (Josephus Wars 1.21.5), or about twenty-seven miles S of Haifa. The distance from Jerusalem is given by Josephus (Ant. 13.11.2; Wars 1.3.5) as six hundred stadia; the actual distance in a direct line is forty-seven miles. Philip stopped at Caesarea at the close of his preaching tour (Acts 8:40). Paul, to avoid Grecians who wished to kill him, was taken to Caesarea before embarking for Tarsus (9:30). Here dwelt Cornelius the centurion, to whom Peter came and preached (10:1; 11:11), and to this city Herod (which see) resorted after the miraculous deliverance of Peter from prison (12:19). Later Paul visited Caesarea several times (18:22; 21:8, 16) and was sent there by the Roman commander at Jerusalem to be heard by Felix (23:23, 33; 25:1–14); and from Caesarea he started on his journey to Rome (27:1).

Although small excavations were conducted at Caesarea in 1945, 1951, and 1956, large-scale archaeological work did not begin there until 1959. In that year A. Frova launched the Italian Archaeological Mission dig at the theater (1959–63), where he found an inscription mentioning Pontius Pilate and the emperor Tiberius. The theater has been restored and is used periodically for musical and dramatic performances.

In 1960 the Edwin A. Link Underwater Archaeological Expedition explored the harbor area and plotted the breakwaters. Since 1980 an international consortium of four universities, headed by the Israel Center for Maritime Studies and directed by Avner Raban, has been working on the harbor of Caesarea. The effort is called the Caesarea Ancient Harbor Excavation Project. The project has been conducting a survey and excavation that has provided important new information on Roman harbor design and construction. Two immense breakwaters were constructed to frame outer and inner basins. Hydraulic concrete was used in a sophisticated way, and sluice gates and subsidiary breakwater provided protection against siltation.

During the years 1960–62, A. Negev excavated on behalf of the National Parks Authority in the Crusader town. The Crusader fortifications of the thirteenth century A.D. and the great moat were uncovered, as were remains of the temple Herod built in honor of Augustus, and part of the Roman pier. A consortium of twenty-two American, Canadian, and Israeli universities, under the direction of Dr. Robert Bull of Drew University, contributed talent and money to uncover the ancient site in an ongoing project that began in 1970. Since that time teams have worked at the site every season, exploring the water system and excavating houses, the gate area, and the aqueducts. Two aqueducts and a Mithras shrine (the first in Palestine) have been uncovered and work has been done on the second-century A.D. hippodrome. Caesarea was a great city, and it is only beginning to emerge from the sand dunes. Population estimates run as high as 250,000, and it is judged to have occupied an area half the size of Manhattan Island.

Caesarea Philippi (sē-sa-rēʾa fi-lip'í; “Caesarea of Philip”). A town in the northern part of Palestine, about 120 miles from Jerusalem, 50 from Damascus, and 30 from Tyre, near the foot of Mt. Hermon. It was first a Canaanite sanctuary for the worship of Baal; perhaps Baal-hermon (Judg. 3:3; 1 Chron. 5:23). It was called by the Greeks Paneas because of its cavern, which reminded them of similar places dedicated to the worship of the god Pan. In 20 B.C. Herod the Great received the whole district from Augustus and dedicated a temple to the emperor. Herod Philip enlarged it and called it Caesarea Philippi to distinguish it from his father’s on the seacoast. It was the northern limit of Christ’s travels in the Holy Land (Matt. 16:13; Mark 8:27). The site of Caesarea is Baniyas, a paltry village. H.F.V.

CAGE (kflûb). A “basket” or “cage” for keeping birds (Jer. 5:27) and fruit (Amos 8:1). On the Taylor Prism in the British Museum, Sennacherib says of Hezekiah: “Himself like a caged bird, I shut up in Jerusalem....” A place of confinement for prisoners in transit (Ezek. 19:9).

CA IAPHAS (ka'ya-fas). A surname, the original name being Joseph (Josephus Ant. 18.2.2); but, the surname becoming his ordinary and official designation, it was used for the name itself. Caiaphas was the high priest of the Jews in the reign of Tiberius Caesar, at the beginning of the Lord's public ministry (Luke 3:2) and also at the time of His condemnation and crucifixion (Matt. 26:3, 57; etc.). He was appointed to this dignity through the curator Valerius Gratus (probably A.U.C. 770–88 or 789, Meyer, Com., on Luke) and held it during the whole procuratorship of Pontius Pilate, but was deposed by the proconsul Vitellus, A.D. about 38. Caiaphas was the son-in-law of Annas, with whom he is coupled by Luke (see below). His wife was the daughter of Annas, or Ananus, who had formerly been high priest and who still possessed great influence and control in sacerdotal matters.

After the miracle of raising Lazarus from the dead Caiaphas advocated putting Jesus to death. His language on this occasion was prophetic, though not so designed: "You know nothing at all, nor do you take into account that it is expedient for you that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation should not perish" (John 11:49–50). After Christ was arrested He was taken before Annas, who sent Him to Caiaphas, probably living in the same house. An effort was made to produce false testimony sufficient for His condemnation. This expedient failed; for, though two persons appeared to testify, they did not agree, and at last Caiaphas put our Savior Himself upon oath that He should say whether He was indeed the Christ, the Son of God, or not. The answer was, of course, in the affirmative, and was accompanied with a declaration of His divine power and majesty. The high priest pretended to be greatly grieved at what he considered our Savior's blasphemous pretensions, and appealed to His enraged enemies to say if this was not enough. They answered at once that He deserved to die, but, as Caiaphas had no power to inflict the punishment of death, Christ was taken to Pilate, the Roman governor, that His execution might be duly ordered (Matt. 26:3, 57; John 18:13, 28). The bigoted fury of Caiaphas exhibited itself also against the first efforts of the apostles (Acts 4:6–21). What became of Caiaphas after his deposition is not known.

The expression in Luke 3:2, "In the high priesthood of Annas and Caiaphas," has led some to maintain that Annas and Caiaphas then discharged the functions of the high priesthood by turns; but this is not reconcilable with the statement of Josephus. Others think that Caiaphas is called high priest because he then actually exercised the functions of the office, and that Annas is so called because he formerly filled the position. But it does not thus appear why, of those who held the priesthood before Caiaphas, Annas in particular should be named, and not others who had served the office more recently than Annas. Meyer (Com., ad loc.) says: "Annas retained withal very weighty influence (John 18:12, sq.), so that not only did he continue to be called by the name, but, moreover, he also partially discharged the functions of high priest." Edersheim (Life and Times of Jesus, 1:264): "The conjunction of the two names of Annas and Caiaphas probably indicates that, although Annas was deprived of the pontificate, he still continued to preside over the Sanhedrin" (cf. Acts 4:6).

CAIN (kān; a "smith, spear"). The firstborn of the human race, and likewise the first murderer and fratricide. His history is narrated in Gen. 4.

A.U.C. ab urbe condita (from the founding of the city [Rome])
Com. Commentary

Sacrifice. Cain was the eldest son of Adam and Eve, and by occupation a tiller of the ground. He and his brother offered a sacrifice to God, Cain of the fruit of the ground and Abel of the firstlings of his flock. Cain's temper and offering (being bloodless) were not acceptable, while Abel's received the divine approval.

Murder. At this Cain was angered, and, though remonstrated with by the Almighty, he fostered his revenge until it resulted in the murder of his brother. When God inquired of him as to the whereabouts of Abel he declared, "I do not know," and sullenly inquired, "Am I my brother's keeper?" (v. 9). The Lord then told him that his crime was known, and pronounced a curse upon him and the ground that he should cultivate. Cain was to endure, also, the torments of conscience, in that the voice of his brother's blood would cry unto God from the ground. Fearful lest others should slay him for his crime, he pleaded with God, who assured him that vengeance sevenfold would be taken on anyone who should kill him. He also gave him "a sign," probably an assurance that his life should be spared. Cain became a fugitive, and journeyed into the land of Nod, where he built a city that he named after his son Enoch. His descendants are named to the sixth generation and appear to have reached an advanced stage of civilization, being noted for proficiency in music and the arts.

The NT references to Cain are Heb. 11:4, where it is recorded, "By faith Abel offered to God a better sacrifice than Cain"; 1 John 3:12; Jude 11.

CAINAN (kā'i-nan). The son of Arphaxad and father of Shelah, according to Luke 3:35–36. He is nowhere named in the Heb. text, nor in any of the versions made from it, such as the Samaritan, Aram., Syr., Vulg., etc. It is believed by many that the name was not originally in the text, even of Luke, but is an addition of careless transcribers from the LXX.

CA'LAH (ka'la). An ancient city of Assyria built by Nimrod (which see) or by people from his country (Gen. 10:11). Shalmaneser I (c. 1280–60 B.C.) made this place famous in his day. By the time of the great conqueror Ashurnasirpal II (883–59 B.C.) the site had fallen into decay. But this eminent warrior chose Calah as his capital. At this site, now represented by the mound of Nimrud, the young Assyriological pioneer Austen Henry Layard began his excavations in 1845. At the very outset of these diggings the splendid palace of Ashurnasirpal II was discovered with colossal winged man-headed lions guarding the palace entrance. In a small temple nearby a statue of Ashurnasirpal II was found in a perfect state of preservation. Numerous inscriptions of the king also came to light. Calah remained the favorite haunt of Assyrian kings for a century and a half. Here Layard recovered the famous Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser III in 1846, which, among other captives, portrays Jehu of Israel (c. 842–15 B.C.) bringing tribute to his Assyrian overlord. M. E. L. Mallowan led a dig at Calah for the British School of Archaeology in Iraq from 1949 to 1961. He completed excavation of Ashurnasirpal's magnificent palace, covering six acres. This is now the best preserved of Assyrian royal dwellings. He also discovered and largely excavated Shalmaneser's great fort, eighteen acres in size, which lay just inside the five-mile circuit of the city wall at its SE edge. This is the most extensive military installation yet discovered in ancient Assyria. Calah was the staging ground from which the Assyrians launched their attack on Samaria, and to Calah Sargon II brought the booty and captives after the fall of Samaria (723/2 B.C.).

Valuable antiquities from Calah are housed in the British Museum in London, the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, the University Museum at Philadelphia, and the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston. M.F.U.; H.F.V.

CALAMUS. See Vegetable Kingdom: Reeds, Rushes.

CAL'COL (kal'kol). One of the four sons of Mahol, who were famous for their wisdom before the time of Solomon (1 Kings 4:31), before 960 B.C. In 1 Chron. 2:6 he and his brothers are given as the sons of Zerah, of the tribe of Judah.

CALDRON. The rendering of several Heb. words, all meaning a vessel for boiling flesh, either for domestic or ceremonial purposes. The term appears only once in the NASB (1 Sam. 2:14) and twice in the NIV (1 Sam. 2:14; Job 41:31), but is frequent in the KJV (1 Sam. 2:14; 2 Chron. 35:13; Job 41:20; Jer. 52:18, 19; Ezek. 11:3, 7).

Metallic vessels of this kind have been found in Egypt, Babylonia, and Mesopotamia.

CA'LEB (kā'leb; a "dog").

1. The son of Jephunneh (which see), the Kenizzite, and head of one of the families of Judah. The first mention of Caleb was his appointment at the age of forty years (Josh. 14:6–7) as one of the twelve spies sent by Moses to explore Canaan (Num. 13:6, 17–25), c. 1440 B.C.

On their return all the spies agreed respecting the preeminent goodness of the land but differed in their advice to the people. While the ten others announced the inability of Israel to overcome the Canaanites, Caleb and Joshua spoke encouragingly. They admitted the strength and stature of the people and the greatness of the walled cities but were far from despairing. Caleb, stilling the people before Moses, exhorted them earnestly and boldly, "We should by all means go up and take possession of it, for we shall surely overcome it" (Num. 13:30). For this act of faithfulness, repeated the following day, Caleb and Joshua barely escaped being stoned by the people (14:10). Moses announced to the congregation, however, that they alone, of all the people over twenty years of age, should enter into the Promised Land, and in a plague that shortly followed the other spies died (14:26–38). A special promise was given to Caleb that he should enter the land that he had trodden upon, and that his seed should possess it (14:24).

We find no further mention of Caleb until about forty-five years after. The land was being divided, and he claimed the special inheritance promised by Moses as a reward of his fidelity. His claim was admitted, and Joshua added his blessing. Caleb, who at the age of eighty-five was still as strong for war as when he was forty, drove out the Anakim from Hebron (Josh. 14:6–15; 15:14). He then attacked Debir (Kiriath-sepher), to the SW of Hebron. This town must have been strong and hard to conquer, for Caleb offered a prize to the conqueror, promising to give his daughter Achsah for a wife to anyone who should take it. Othniel, his nephew, took the city and secured Achsah and a tract of land (15:13–19). We have no further information respecting Caleb's life or death.

Concerning the taking of Debir, Keil notes: "There is no discrepancy between the accounts of the taking of Debir (Josh. 11:21–22; 15:13–19), for the expulsion of its inhabitants by Joshua did not preclude the possibility of their returning when the Israelitish armies had withdrawn to the north” (Com.).

2. The last named of the three sons of Hezron (1 Chron. 2:18), of the descendants of Judah, in 1 Chron. 2:9, where he is called Chelubai (which see; still Caleb in the NIV). His sons by his first wife, Azubah, or Jerioth (which see), were Jeshur, Shobab, and Ardon (v. 18). After her death he married Ephrath, by whom he had Hur (v. 19) and perhaps others (v. 50). He had also several children by his concubines, Ephah and Maacah (vv. 46, 48).

3. In the KJV and NIV of 1 Chron. 2:50, a son of Hur. See the NASB for a better reading.

CALEB-EPH'RATHAH (kā'leb-ef'ra-tha). Only in 1 Chron. 2:24: “And after the death of Hezron in Caleb-ephrathah,” etc. “The town or village in which Caleb dwelt with his wife Ephrath may have been called Caleb of Ephrathah, if Ephrath had brought this place as a dower to Caleb (comp. Josh. 15:18). Ephrathah or Ephrath was the ancient name of Bethlehem, and with it the name Ephrath is connected, probably so called after her birthplace. If this supposition is well founded, then Caleb of Ephrathah would be the little town of Bethlehem” (Keil, Com.). Many scholars, however, adopt the LXX reading, “After the death of Hezron Caleb came unto Ephrath, the wife of Hezron, his father.”

CALENDAR (Lat. calendarium, from calere, “to call,” because the priests called the people to notice that it was new moon). An ecclesiastical almanac indicating the special days and seasons to be observed.

Chaldean. Their years were vague years of 360 days. The twelve equal months of which they were composed bore names that were borrowed, on the one hand, from events in civil life, such as “Simanu,” from the making of brick, and “Addaru,” from the sowing of seed, and, on the other, from mythological occurrences whose origin is still obscure, such as “Nisanu,” and “Elul.” The adjustment of this year to astronomical demands was roughly carried out by the addition of a month every six years, which was called a second Adar, Elul, or Nisan, according to the place in which it was intercalated. The neglect of the hours and minutes in their calculations of the length of the year became with them, as with the Egyptians, a source of serious embarrassment, and we are still ignorant as to the means employed to meet the difficulty.

Egyptian. Very early the Egyptians divided the year into twelve months of 30 days each, with a sacred period of 5 feast days intercalated at the end of the year. The year began when Sirius first appeared on the eastern horizon at sunrise (July 19 on our calendar). Since this calendar year was a quarter of a day shorter than the solar year, it gained a full day every 4 years, and a full year in 1,460 years. An astronomical event such as the heliacal rising of Sirius, when computed on the basis of the Egyptian calendar, may therefore be reckoned and dated within four years in terms of our reckoning, i.e., in years B.C. This is the calendar that Julius Caesar introduced into Rome and that was bequeathed to us by the Romans (see below), thus being in operation for over six millennia.

Jewish. The Israelites divided their year according to natural phenomena exclusively, combining the solar and lunar year. The months began with the new moon, but the first month was fixed (after the Exodus and by the necessities of the Passover) by the ripening of the earliest grain, namely, barley. The lunar month averaging 29½ days, a year of twelve months of 30 and 29 days alternately resulted; but this involved a variation of 11 and 22 days alternately in eighteen out of nineteen years. To reconcile this lunar year with the year of the seasons, a thirteenth month was inserted about once in three years. That the Jews had calendars wherein were noted all the feasts, fasts, and days on which they celebrated any great event of their history is evident from Zech. 8:19. Probably the oldest calendar is the Megillath Taanith (“volume of affliction”), said to have been drawn up in the time of John Hyrcanus, before 106 B.C. In table 1, “The Jewish Calendar,” it is assumed, as usual, that the first month of the Hebrew ecclesiastical year, Abib or Nisan, answers nearly to half March and half April, the earliest possible commencement of the lunar year being on our fifth of March. See Chronology.

3. Feast to commemorate the repeal of decree of Grecian kings forbidding Jews to circumcise their children.

Roman. The ancient Roman year consisted of twelve lunar months, of 29 and 30 days alternately, making 354 days; but a day was added to make the number odd, which was considered more fortunate, so that the year consisted of 355 days. This was less than the solar year by 10 days and a fraction. Numa is credited with attempting to square this lunar year of 355 days with the solar of 365; but how he did it is not known for certain. The Decemviri, 450 B.C., probably introduced the system of adjustment afterward in use, namely, by inserting biennially an intercalary month of 23 days between February 24 and 25, and in the fourth year a month of 22 days between February 23 and 24. But this gave the year an average of 366 $\frac{1}{4}$ days, or one too many; and it was the business of the pontiffs to keep the calendar in order by regular intercalation. Their neglect produced great disorder. The mischief was finally remedied by Julius Caesar, with the assistance of the mathematician Sosigenes. To bring the calendar into correspondence with the seasons, the year 46 B.C. was lengthened so as to consist of fifteen months, or 445 days, and the calendar known as the Julian was introduced January 1, 45 B.C. The use of the lunar year and the intercalary month was abolished, and the civil year was regulated entirely by the sun. Caesar fixed this year to 365 $\frac{1}{4}$ days, which is correct within a few minutes. After this the ordinary year consisted of 365 days, divided into twelve months, with the names still in use.

Gregorian. The method adopted by Caesar answered a good purpose for a short time, but after several centuries astronomers began to discover a discrepancy between the solar and the civil year. The addition of the day every fourth year would be correct if the solar year consisted of exactly 365 $\frac{1}{4}$ days, whereas it contains only 365 days, 5 hours, 47 minutes, 51 $\frac{1}{2}$ seconds. This makes the Julian year longer than the true solar year by about 12 minutes. In 1582 the Julian year was found to be about 10 days behind the true time, the vernal equinox falling on March 11 instead of March 21, its date at the Council of Nice, A.D. 325. Pope Gregory issued an edict causing October 5 to be called the 15th, thus suppressing 10 days, and making the year 1582 to consist of only 355 days; thus restoring the concurrence of the solar and civil year, and consequently the vernal equinox to the place it occupied in 325, namely, March 21. In order that this difference might not recur it was further ordained that every hundredth year (1800, 1900, etc.) should not be counted as a leap year, except every fourth hundredth, beginning with 2000. In this way the difference between the civil and solar years will not amount to a day in five thousand years. The pope was promptly obeyed in Spain, Portugal, and part of Italy. The change took place in France the same year by calling the 10th the 20th day of December. Gradually other countries adopted this style.

Ecclesiastical. Originally the ecclesiastical calendar was only an adaptation of Greek and Roman calendars, although Christian influence is seen in two calendars as early as the middle of the fourth century. This influence is shown in the setting of the Christian week side by side with the pagan, while the other, A.D. 448, contains Christian feast days and holidays, though as yet few, namely, four festivals of Christ and six martyr days. The earliest known pure Christian calendar is of Gothic origin, from Thrace, in the fourth century. It is a fragment, merely 38 days, but contains mention of seven saints.

Originally the martyrs were celebrated only where they suffered, and each church had its own calendar, but in the Middle Ages the Roman calendar spread throughout the Western church. From the eighth century combined calendars of saints and martyrs were made and are found in great numbers. They are designed to suit all times and are supplied with means to ascertain the movable feasts, especially Easter.

The present Saints' Calendar of the Roman Catholic church is copious and may be found more or less complete in its almanacs.

The German Lutheran church retained the Roman calendar (with the saints' days of that age) at the Reformation. An Evangelical Calendar for the use of the Evangelical Church of Germany is issued annually.

The calendar of the Church of England may be found in the large edition of the Prayer Book, and consists of nine columns, containing (1) the golden number or cycle of the moon; (2) days of the month in numerical order; (3) dominical or Sunday letter; (4) calends, nones, and ides; (5) holy days of the church, as also some festivals of the Roman church, for convenience rather than reverence; (6–9) portions of Scripture and of the Apocrypha, appointed for the daily lessons.

CALF. The young of the ox species. The frequent mention in Scripture of calves is due to their common use in sacrifices. The “fatted calf” was considered by the Hebrews as the choicest of animal food. It was stall-fed, frequently with reference to a particular festival or extraordinary sacrifice (1 Sam. 28:24; Amos 6:4; Luke 15:23). The allusion in Jer. 34:18–19 is to an ancient custom of ratifying a covenant (which see). See Animal Kingdom: Ox.

Figurative. The expressions “calves of our lips” (Hos. 14:2, KJV) and “fruit of our lips” (Heb. 13:15, KJV) signify prayers or thanksgiving, young oxen being considered as the best animals for thank offerings.

CALF, GOLDEN. The idolatrous image of a young bull set up at Mt. Sinai (Ex. 32:2–4) and later by Jeroboam at Bethel and Dan (1 Kings 12:28). The young bull symbolized vitality and strength, and the Israelites sought to worship Jehovah under this representation. Doubtless the prevalence of bull worship in Egypt suggested this animal. Jeroboam also had likely seen the bull Apis worshiped in Egypt while he was a refugee at the court of Shishak (11:40), but ancient tradition also influenced him, for he quotes Ex. 32:4 in advertising his new cult. Common among western Semites are gods represented as standing on an animal’s back or as seated on an animal-borne throne. What Jeroboam likely did was to represent the invisible Jehovah astride a young bull of gold. It is inconceivable that he would resort to the crass idea of actually expecting worship of a golden calf itself. M.F.U.

CALL, CALLING (Heb. usually qārā; Gk. kaleō, to “call”).

To Call for Help. Hence, to pray. We first meet this expression in Gen. 4:26: “Then men began to call upon the name of the Lord” (see also Pss. 79:6; 105:1; Isa. 64:7; Jer. 10:25; Zeph. 3:9). In this sense of invoking God in prayer, with an acknowledgment of His attributes, confession of sins, etc., “call” is used in the NT (Acts 2:21; 7:59; 9:14; Rom. 10:12; 1 Cor. 1:2).

Divine Call. The word call is used in Scripture with the following significations: (1) In the sense of “to name,” “to designate” (Gen. 16:11; Deut. 25:10), and in the sense of “to be,” e.g., “His name will be called Wonderful” (Isa. 9:6); i.e., He shall be wonderful, and so acknowledged. (2) In the designation of individuals to some special office or work, as the call of Bezalel (Ex. 31:2), of judges, prophets, apostles, etc. (Acts 13:2); of nations to certain functions, privileges, or punishments (Lam. 2:22); particularly of Israel (Deut. 7:6–8; Isa. 41:9; 42:6; Hos. 11:1). (3) A condition of life, “Let each man remain in that condition in which he was called” (1 Cor. 7:20).

Call to Salvation. “To call” signifies to invite to the blessings of the gospel, to offer salvation through Christ. This calling is, we believe, general, extending to all mankind. There is likewise a calling by the Spirit that is not resisted and clearly described as an efficacious calling. The efficacious calling of God is tantamount to His sovereign choice. There are now two elect companies in the world—Israel and the church. Both alike appear in Scripture as called by God. Israel’s calling is national, whereas the calling of those who compose the church is individual. It is wholly within the bounds of the efficacious calling that believers are termed the called ones. They are thus distinguished from the general mass who though subject to a general call are not efficaciously called. The efficacious call is the work of God in behalf of each elect person under grace. They are referred to as “those who are called according to His purpose” (Rom. 8:28). The apostle goes on to declare that those whom God foreknew, He predestined; those whom He predestined, He called; those whom He called, He justified; and those whom He justified, He glorified (8:29–30). Calling, then, is that choice on the part of God of an individual through an efficacious working in his mind and heart by the Holy Spirit so that the will of the one who is called operates by its own determination in the exercise of saving faith. In this way two great necessities are provided; namely, only those are called whom God has predestined to be justified and glorified and those who are thus called choose from their own hearts and minds to accept Christ as Savior. CAL'NEH (kal'ne).

1. An ancient Babylonian city pertaining to Nimrod's kingdom (Gen. 10:10). Its location is uncertain, and because of this some scholars emend the Heb. to küllānâ, "all of them." Some have identified Calneh with Nippur, an important excavated city in central Babylonia. Others see a connection with Kulunu, an ancient important city near Babylon. Another possibility is that Calneh is Hursagkalama, a twin city of Kish.

2. Calneh mentioned in Amos 6:2 together with Hamath may be Kullani, modern Kullanh, about six miles distant from Arpad. It was conquered and annexed to Assyria by Tiglath-pileser in 738 B.C.

CAL'NO (kal'nō). A city referred to in Isa. 10:9 as offering futile resistance to the military power of Assyria. Doubtless the same as Calneh (no. 2).

CAL'VARY (Gk. kranion, a "skull," but having its English form from the translators' having literally adopted the Lat. word calvaria, a bare "skull"; the Gk. is the interpretation of the Heb. Golgotha, which see; the word occurs once, in Luke 23:33, KJV.) Calvary refers to the place where Christ was crucified, designated as the place of a skull (Golgotha), either because of the shape of the mound or elevation or because it was a place of execution. Some claim that Moriah and Calvary are identical. The shift of the city wall from time to time renders it difficult to locate the spot. It would probably have been a prominent place near the public highway, for the Romans selected such places for public executions.

From the fourth century to the present day the sites of Calvary and of the Holy Sepulcher have been shown within the precincts of the church of the Holy Sepulcher, a Crusader construction, standing where Constantine's Basilica was raised. Others identify the spot with "Gordon's Calvary," N of the present N wall.

CAMEL. For a description of the camel, see Animal Kingdom.

Figurative. "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God" (Matt. 19:24) is a proverbial expression to show how difficult it is for a rich man who has the many temptations of wealth to leave them for the sake of Christ. The objection is made that the metaphor of an animal passing through a needle's eye is a bad one, and that the Gk. kamēlos ought to be read kamilos, a "cable," "as for a rope to pass," etc. There appears, however, to be no such Gk. word as kamilos, a "cable." "To render the word by a narrow gate, a narrow mountain pass, or anything but a needle is inadmissible" (Meyer, Com., ad loc.).

"You blind guides, who strain out a gnat and swallow a camel!" (Matt. 23:24) is a proverb applied to those who superstitiously strive to avoid small faults and yet do not scruple to commit great sins. This is a reference to the custom of the Jews in straining their wine in order that there might be no possibility of swallowing with it any unclean animal, however minute (Lev. 11:42).

CAMEL'S HAIR. The long hair of the camel, which is somewhat woolly in texture, becomes toward the close of spring loose and is easily pulled away from the skin. The modern Arabs still weave it into a coarse sort of cloth for tent covers and coats for shepherds and camel drivers. Garments of this material were worn by John the Baptist in the wilderness (Matt. 3:4).

Figurative. It was an outward mark of that deadness to carnal enjoyment and mortification that marked John's mission as God's prophet in the apostasy of Israel. In this he imitated his great predecessor and type, Elijah (2 Kings 1:8), in a time of similar degeneracy (see Zech. 13:4).

CA'MON. See Kamon.

CAMP, ENCAMPMENT (Heb. maḥāneh, "place of pitching a tent," from ḥānâ, "to pitch a tent"). A term applied to any band or company presenting a regular and settled appearance; a nomad party at rest (Gen. 32:21); an army or caravan when on its march (Gen. 32:7–8; Ex. 14:9; Josh. 10:5), and the resting place of an army or company (Ex. 16:13). Sometimes the verb refers to the casual arrangement of a siege (Ps. 27:3) or campaign (1 Sam. 4:1). Among nomadic tribes war never attained the dignity of a science, and their encampments were consequently devoid of all the appliances of more systematic warfare. The art of laying out an encampment appears to have been well understood in Egypt long before the departure of the Israelites from that country, and it was there, doubtless, that Moses became acquainted with that mode of encampment that he introduced among the Israelites.

Camp of Israel.

Arrangement. During the sojourn in the wilderness, when the people had to be kept for a long period in a narrow space, it was necessary for the sake of order and safety to assign the several tribes and families to their respective positions, leaving as little as possible to personal rivalry or individual caprice. With the exception of some scattered hints, our information respecting the camp of Israel is found in Num. 2–3. The Tabernacle occupied the center of the camp, following the common practice in the East of the leader of a tribe having his tent in the center of the others. It should be borne in mind that Jehovah, whose tent was the Tabernacle, was the leader of Israel. The tents nearest to the Tabernacle were those of the Levites, whose business it was to watch it; the family of Gershon pitched to the W, that of Kohath to the S, and that of Merari to the N. The priests occupied a position to the E, opposite the entrance of the Tabernacle (3:38). The priests and Levites were under the immediate supervision of Moses and Aaron (1:53; 3:21–38). The host of Israel was divided into four divisions and encamped in the following order: first, on the E, Judah, having associated with him Issachar and Zebulun; on the S, Reuben, Simeon, and Gad; on the W, Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin; on the N, Dan, Asher, and Naphtali. Each division had its separate standard (which see), and each family had a separate standard, around which it was to pitch its tents (1:52). The order of encampment was preserved on the march (2:17), the signal for which was given by a blast of the two silver trumpets (10:5). Sentinels were probably placed at the gates (Ex. 32:26–27) in the four quarters of the camp. This was evidently the case in the camp of the Levites (cf. 1 Chron. 9:18, 24; 2 Chron. 31:2).

Sanitary Regulations. The encampment of Israel, being that of the Lord's host, and with the Lord Himself symbolically resident among them, was ordered to be kept in a state of great cleanliness. This was for the twofold purpose of preserving the health of so great a number of people and preserving the purity of the camp as the dwelling place of God (Num. 5:3; Deut. 23:14). The dead were buried outside of the camp (Lev. 10:4–5); lepers were excluded till their leprosy departed (13:46), and likewise all others with loathsome diseases (15:2; Num. 5:2) or personal uncleanness (Deut. 23:10–13); those defiled by contact with the dead, whether slain in battle or not, were excluded from the camp for seven days; captives remained for a while outside (Num. 31:19; Josh. 6:23); the ashes from the sacrifices were carried to an appointed place outside of the camp, where the entrails, skin, horns, and all that was not offered in sacrifice, were burned (Lev. 4:11–12; 6:11; 8:17); the execution of criminals took place outside of the camp (24:23; Num. 15:35–36; Josh. 7:24), as did the burning of the young bull for the sin offering (Lev. 4:12). An important sanitary regulation is mentioned in Deut. 23:12–14. The encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness left its traces in their subsequent history. The Temple, so late as the time of Hezekiah, was still the camp of Jehovah (2 Chron. 31:2, KJV, “the tents of the Lord”; cf. Ps. 78:28), and the multitudes who flocked to David were “a great army like the army of God” (1 Chron. 12:22, lit., “a great camp, like the camp of God”).

Military. We have no definite information concerning the military encampments of Israel in later times. Formed merely for the occasion, and as circumstances might admit, they could scarcely be brought under precise or stringent regulations. They were pitched in any suitable or convenient situation that presented itself—sometimes on a height (1 Sam. 17:3; 28:4; etc.), or near a spring or well (Judg. 7:1; 1 Sam. 29:1). The camp was surrounded by the rampart (17:20; 26:5–7), which some explain as an earthwork thrown up around the encampment, others as the barrier formed by the baggage wagons. We know that, in the case of a siege, the attacking army, if possible, surrounded the place attacked (1 Macc. 13:43) and drew a line about it (2 Kings 25:1), which was marked by a breastwork of earth (Isa. 62:10; Ezek. 21:22; cf. Job 19:12) for the double purpose of preventing the escape of the besieged and of protecting the besiegers from their sallies. To guard against attacks sentinels were posted (Judg. 7:19; 1 Macc. 12:27) around the camp, and the neglect of this precaution by Zebah and Zalmunna probably led to their capture by Gideon and the ultimate defeat of their army (Judg. 8:21). The valley that separated the hostile camps was generally selected as the fighting ground (1 Sam. 4:2; 14:15; 2 Sam. 18:6) upon which the contest was decided, and hence the valleys of Palestine have played so conspicuous a part in its history (Josh. 8:13; Judg. 6:33; 2 Sam. 5:22; 8:13; etc.). When the fighting men went forth to the place selected for marshaling the forces (1 Sam. 17:20), a detachment was left to protect the camp and baggage (17:22; 30:24). The beasts of burden were probably tethered to the tent pegs (2 Kings 7:10; Zech. 14:15).

CA'NA (kā'na). “Cana of Galilee,” a name found in the gospel of John only, but in such references no clue is given as to its locality; supposed to be near Capernaum. Cana of Galilee is distinguished from Cana of Asher (Josh. 19:28, NASB and NIV, “Kannah”). It was the birthplace of Nathanael (John 21:2) and honored as the scene of Christ's first recorded miracle (2:1, 11; 4:46). North of Nazareth lie the two sites that have at various times been regarded as representing Cana of Galilee. The one is the Christian village of Kefr Kenna, about four miles NE of Nazareth, accepted before the Crusades as the true site; the other site is Khirbet, four or five miles farther N. Though the former is usually pointed out to tourists as the true site, scholars are increasingly leaning to acceptance of the latter.

CA'NAAN, CA'NAANITES (kā'nān, kā'na-nīt). In Gen. 10:6, 15–18, Canaan is listed as the fourth son of Ham, the father of “Sidon, his first-born, and Heth and the Jebusite and the Amorite and the Girgashite and the Hivite and the Arkite and the Sinite and the Arvadite and the Zemarite and the Hamathite.”

The Name. The Canaanites were the inhabitants of Canaan, the more ancient name of Palestine. The Heb. form of Canaan apparently was taken from Hurrian, signifying “belonging to the land of red-purple.” From the fourteenth century B.C. on this designation came to be employed of the country in which the “Canaanite” or Phoenician traders exchanged for their commodities their most important commercial product, red-purple, which was obtained from the murex mollusks of coastal Palestine and used for dyeing. In the Amarna Letters the “land of Canaan” is applied to the Phoenician coast, and the Egyptians called all western Syria by this name. By the time of the conquest the term Canaan signified the territory later called Palestine.

Territory. The term “land of Canaan” covers all Palestine W of the Jordan (Num. 34:2–12). This territory was situated between the great ancient empires of the Tigris-Euphrates and Halys rivers on the one hand and the great Egyptian empire of the Nile on the other. It was providential that the nation Israel, with its testimony to the knowledge of the one true God and with its obligation to make known that fact, should inherit a country that formed a geographical bridge between the ancient centers of pagan civilization.

Civilization. The Canaanites were talented and developed the arts and sciences early. Stout walled cities have been excavated, and their construction was much superior to that of later Israelite buildings. They excelled in ceramic arts, music, musical instruments, and architecture. The Solomonic Temple was planned with the help of Phoenician artisans and architects. Craftsmen of Hiram of Tyre executed much of the work (1 Kings 7:13–51). Decorations, architectural motifs, and general styling were heavily indebted to Syro-Phoenician art. From all sections of Palestine, well-executed fortifications, ornate palaces, and temples contrast strongly to the strata containing inferior Hebrew construction. The art treasures in ivory, gold, and alabaster recovered from Canaanite Megiddo demonstrate Canaanite architectural elegance. Many of the treasures from Ras Shamra-Ugarit tell the same story. However, by the time of the Israelite conquest, Canaanite civilization had become decadent and was ripe for destruction. Among Canaanite cities that have been excavated are Jericho, Bethel, Libnah, Debir (Kiriath-sepher), Megiddo, Taanach, Beth-shean, Beth-shemesh, Byblos, Ras Shamra, and Gezer.

Religion. New vistas of knowledge of Canaanite cults and their degrading character and debilitating effect have been opened up by the discovery of the Ras Shamra religious epic literature from Ugarit in N Syria. Thousands of clay tablets stored in what seems to be a library between two great Canaanite temples dating from c. fifteenth-fourteenth century B.C. give a full description of the Canaanite pantheon. Canaanite fertility cults are seen to be more base than elsewhere in the ancient world. The virile monotheistic faith of the Hebrews was continually in peril of contamination from the lewd nature worship with immoral gods, prostitute goddesses, serpents, cultic doves, and bulls. El, the head of the pantheon, was the hero of sordid escapades and crimes. He was a bloody tyrant who dethroned his father, murdered his favorite son, and decapitated his daughter. Despite these enormities, El was styled “father of years” (abu shanima), “the father of man” (abu adami, “father bull”), i.e., the progenitor of the gods. Baal, the widely revered Canaanite deity, was the son of El and dominated the Canaanite pantheon. He was the god of thunder, whose voice reverberated through the heavens in the storm. He is pictured on a Ras Shamra stela brandishing a mace in his right hand and holding in his left hand a stylized thunderbolt. The three goddesses were Anath, Astarte, and Ashera, who were all three patronesses of sex and war. All were sacred courtesans. Other Canaanite deities were Mot (death); Reshep, the god of pestilence; Shulman, the god of health; Koshar, the god of arts and crafts. These Canaanite cults were utterly immoral, decadent, and corrupt, dangerously contaminating and thoroughly justifying the divine command to destroy their devotees (Deut. 20:17).

Conquest. After their victories in Transjordan over Sihon, king of the Amorites, and Og, king of Bashan, Israel under Joshua's leadership passed over the Jordan and began their conquest. The story is told in Josh. 1–12, and the allocation of the land to the various tribes is recounted in chaps. 13–22. After the destruction of Jericho (around 1400 B.C., according to Garstang and in agreement with underlying OT chronology) and Ai (6:1–8:29), the conquest of southern Canaan (chap. 10) and northern Canaan (11:1–5) is described. In 11:16–12:24 the conquest is summarized. The events recorded in the Bible are evidently highly selective. Summary statements embrace other conquests not specifically described in the book (cf. 21:43–45). Those that were included were considered sufficient to accomplish the author's purpose of proving God's faithfulness in giving them the land for their possession.

Language. Languages of Canaan included Phoenician and Ugaritic. Hebrew seems to have been adapted from a Canaanite dialect. It originated from the old Phoenician alphabet. The origin of this proto-Semitic alphabet is still obscure. Examples of this rude script discovered at Serabit el Khadem in the Sinai Peninsula in 1904–5 push alphabetic writing back to pre-Mosaic times. It is interesting that this early (Sinai Heb.) script was found in the general region where Moses was told to write (Ex. 17:8–14). But it is scarcely credible that the alphabet was invented in the desert wastes of the Sinai Peninsula. Since 1930 several brief inscriptions dated between 1700 and 1550 have been found in Palestine and are more archaic than the letters from Serabit el Khadem. These apparently belong to the same alphabet. Proto-Sinaitic was demonstrably affected by Egyptian characters, in both the form of the letters and in the limitation of the alphabet to consonants. The alphabet itself was in all likelihood invented in Hyksos Egypt, or conceivably in Palestine at this or an earlier period. But old Heb. goes back to the patriarchal age. Did Abraham find the Heb. language in Palestine, or did he bring it with him from Haran? The Hebrew patriarchs presumably spoke an Aram. dialect while in Mesopotamia before their entrance into Palestine, but once in Palestine "they adopted a local Canaanite dialect which was not identical with the standard speech of the sedentary Canaanites, as may be linguistically demonstrated" (Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity). This conclusion seems valid because old Heb. is practically the same as Phoenician. Apparently it appears in the traditional name of Heb., "the language of Canaan" (Isa. 19:18). It is furthermore attested by early Canaanite and Heb. inscriptions. These appear in Ugaritic about 1400 B.C., Canaanite inscriptions from Byblos and inscriptions from Cyprus, Sardinia, Carthage, and other colonies in the western Mediterranean. Inscriptions made in Heb. from Palestine including the Gezer Calendar (c. 925 B.C.), the Moabite Stone (c. 850 B.C.), the Samaritan Ostraca (c. 776 B.C.), the Siloam Inscription (c. 701 B.C.), and the Lachish Letters (589 B.C.) add further epigraphic evidence of the close association of biblical Heb. with Phoenician and other Canaanite dialects. CAN'DACE (kan'dā-se). The title of the queen of the Ethiopians whose high treasurer was converted to Christianity under the preaching of Philip the evangelist (Acts 8:27), A.D. 34. Candace was probably a distinctive appellation borne by successive queens, similar to Pharaoh, Ptolemy, etc., which were titles. The country over which she ruled was that region in Upper Nubia called by the Greeks Meroë, where George Reisner identified pyramid tombs of reigning Candaces of Ethiopia constructed from c. 300 B.C. TO A.D. 300.

CANON OF SCRIPTURE, THE NEW TESTAMENT. Although the churches of the West are divided as to the position of the OT Apocrypha, they have joined in ratifying one canon of the NT.

The Apostles. They claimed for their writings a public use (Col. 4:16; 1 Thess. 5:27; 1 Tim. 4:13; Rev. 22:18) and an authoritative power (2 Thess. 2:6; 1 Tim. 4:1–6; Rev. 22:19), and Peter (2 Pet. 3:15–16) places the epistles of Paul in significant connection with “the rest of the Scriptures.”

Apostolic Fathers. In the writings of the apostolic Fathers, A.D. 70–120, with the exception of Jude, 2 Peter, and 2 and 3 John, with which no coincidences occur, and 1 and 2 Thessalonians, Colossians, Titus, and Philemon, with which the coincidences are questionable, all the other epistles were clearly known, and used by them; but still they are not quoted with the formulas that preface citations from the OT.

Apologists. The next period, A.D. 120–170, the age of the apologists—carries the history of the formation of the canon one step further. The facts of the life of Christ acquired a fresh importance in controversy with Jew and Gentile. The oral tradition, which still remained in the former age, was dying away, and a variety of written documents claimed to occupy its place. It was then that the canonical gospels were definitely separated from the mass of similar narratives in virtue of their outward claims, which had remained, as it were, in abeyance during the period of tradition.

From A.D. 170 to 305. The testimony of Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian extends to the four gospels, Acts, 1 Peter, 1 John, thirteen epistles of Paul, and the Apocalypse; and, with the exception of the Apocalypse, no one of these books was ever afterward rejected or questioned until modern times.

From A.D. 303 to 97. The persecution of Christians by the Roman emperor Diocletian, which began with that emperor's edict against Christians in A.D. 303 and continued until A.D. 313, was directed in a great measure against the Christian writings, and some obtained protection by surrendering the sacred books. The Donatists may be regarded as maintaining in its strictest integrity the popular judgment in Africa on the contents of the canon of Scripture, and Augustine allows that they held in common with the Catholics the same “canonical Scriptures,” and were alike “bound by the authority of both Testaments.” The canon of the NT, as commonly received at present, was ratified by the third Council of Carthage (A.D. 397) and from that time was accepted throughout the Latin church, though occasional doubts as to Hebrews still remained. Meanwhile the Syrian churches still retained the canon of the Peshito. The churches of Asia Minor seem to have occupied a mean position between the East and West. With the exception of the Apocalypse, they received generally all the books of the NT as contained in the African canon.

The Reformation. At the era of the Reformation the question of the NT canon became again a subject of great though partial interest. The hasty decree of the Council of Trent, which affirmed the authority of all the books commonly received, called out the opposition of controversialists, who quoted and enforced the early doubts. Erasmus denied the apostolic origin of Hebrews, 2 Peter, and the Apocalypse, but left their canonical authority unquestioned. Luther set aside Hebrews, Jude, James, and the Apocalypse at the end of his version, and spoke of them and the remaining Antilegomena with varying degrees of disrespect, though he did not separate 2 Peter and 2 and 3 John from the other epistles.

Calvin. Calvin, although he denied the Pauline authorship of Hebrews, and at least questioned the authenticity of 2 Peter, did not set aside their canonicity, and he noticed the doubts as to James and Jude only to dismiss those doubts. The language of the Articles of the Church of England with regard to the NT is remarkable. In the Articles of 1552 no list of the books of Scripture is given; but in the Elizabethan Articles (1562, 1571) a definition of Holy Scripture is given as “the canonical books of the Old and New Testament, of whose authority was never any doubt in the Church” (Art. 6). This definition is followed by an enumeration of the books of the OT and of the Apocrypha; and then it is said summarily, without a detailed catalog, “All the books of the New Testament, as they are commonly received, we do receive and account them canonical.” A distinction thus remains between the “canonical” books, and such “canonical books as have never been doubted in the church”; and it seems impossible to avoid the conclusion that the framers of the Articles intended to leave a freedom of judgment on a point on which the greatest of the Continental Reformers, and even of Romish scholars, were divided.

CANON OF SCRIPTURE, THE OLD TESTAMENT. If the testimony of Scripture is accepted, that God is the author of the Bible and that the Holy Spirit worked upon men to receive and record His word for future generations, the important question was bound to arise (since many religious books were written during the OT period), what particular books enjoy divine origin and hence are divinely authoritative? This and similar problems concerning the origin of the thirty-nine books of the OT and the twenty-seven of the NT constitute a historical inquiry concerning man's response to God's operation in giving the sacred oracles.

The Meaning of the Term. The canon of sacred Scripture is a phrase by which the catalog of the authoritative sacred writings is designated. The word for the expression, of Gk. derivation, kanōn, and possibly a loan word from Semitic (Heb. qāneh; Akkad. qānu), originally signified a reed or measuring rod. Actually it indicated "that which measures"; that is, a standard, norm, or rule; specifically, "that which is measured" by that standard, norm, or rule. Those books that were measured by the standard or test of divine inspiration and authority and were adjudged to be "God-breathed" were included in "the canon." The term thus came to be applied to the catalog or list of sacred books thus designated and honored as normative, sacred, and binding. Athanasius (c. A.D. 350) was the first person known with certainty to apply the term to sacred Scripture. Thereafter the concept became general both in the Greek and Latin churches. The Jewish idea was expressed technically in terms of a ritualistic formula known as "defiling the hands." The most likely explanation of this enigmatic phrase seems to be that of George Robinson Smith; namely, that the hands that had touched the sacred writings, that is, those that were really God-inspired, were rendered "taboo" with respect to handling anything secular. The high priest (Lev. 16:24) washed not only when he put on the sacred garments on the Day of Atonement but when he took them off. This seems to be the thought; when writings were holy they were said to "defile the hands."

Contents of the Hebrew Canon. The standard or Masoretic text (MT) of the OT contains twenty-four books, beginning with Genesis and concluding with 2 Chronicles. The arrangement is such that there are only twenty-four books instead of thirty-nine as in the Protestant canon, but the subject matter is exactly the same. In other words, the OT canon of Protestantism is identical with that of the ancient Jews. The only difference is in the order and division of the books. In these matters the Protestant canon has been affected by the LXX, the version of the OT in Gk. dated about 250–160 B.C. The Gk. version divides Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, Ezra-Nehemiah each into two books (making eight instead of four). The twelve minor prophets are divided into twelve instead of being counted as one, as in the Heb. This totals fifteen additional books, accounting for the thirty-nine. Modern Heb. Bibles from the sixteenth century on also have the books divided into thirty-nine but retain the ancient threefold division, Genesis opening and 2 Chronicles closing the canon. The twenty-four-book division of the MT into the law, the prophets, and the writings is as follows:

The Law (5 books)

Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy

The Prophets (8 books)

The Former Prophets (4 books) Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings

The Latter Prophets (4 books)

Major (3 books) Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel

Minor (1 book): The Twelve: Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi

Poetical (3 books) Psalms, Proverbs, Job

Five Rolls (5 books) Song, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther

Historical (3 books) Daniel, Ezra-Nehemiah, Chronicles

The Critical View of the Formation of the Canon of the Old Testament. This hypothesis, which is a naturalistic attempt to account for the threefold division of the Heb. Scriptures, maintains the gradual development of the Heb. OT under three claims.

The First Claim: The Hebrew Canon First Consisted of the Pentateuch and That Alone.

1. This is implied, the critics contend, in the expressed reverence paid to the Mosaic law in the postexilic writings. The compiler of the Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah, it is stated, assumes the authority of the law in its finished form throughout the narration of postexilic history. Malachi 4:4 appeals to the law of Moses as a sacred standard of doctrine for all Israel.

Reply. But there is ample reason for an emphatic reference to the law of Moses after the Exile. The catastrophe of the fall of the Northern Kingdom (2 Kings 17:13–41) and the later captivity of Judah are time and again attributed to infraction of the law and the prophets. These are joined together alike as binding upon Judah and Israel (Isa. 5:24; 30:9; Amos 2:4–6). It would be natural after the restoration to give special attention to that to which former disobedience had brought suffering and captivity. The question of whether or not the law of Moses was received as authoritative centuries before the Exile is not in view. The reason Ezra stresses the law of Moses is that the specific evils current in the young restored community—foreign religions, Sabbath desecration, and neglect of adequate Temple worship (Neh. 10:29)—were covered most comprehensively by the requirements of the law. The prophetic injunctions, although rooted in the Mosaic revelation, were not so direct and pointed.

2. It is suggested, it is contended, in the special deference accorded the Pentateuch in later times. In this connection the critical theory stresses the Torah as the mainstay of Judaism and the object of Antiochus Euphron's wrath (168 B.C.; 2 Macc. 5:16). The Pentateuch was not only the first installment of the translation of the OT into Gk., but the only portion carried out with the accuracy demanded by an authoritative edition. Philo attributes to Moses and the law the highest gift of inspiration.

Reply. It is true that the law is exclusively spoken of in 1 Maccabees as adhered to by the faithful and forsaken by the godless (1:52; 2:21, 26–27), but who would be so bold as to assert on that account that there were no other books in the canon at that late date? As far as the evidence from the LXX is concerned, the fact of an inferior translation for the prophets and the writings as compared with the law, even if it could be proved, might rest upon any number of other factors and not on a supposed noncanonization of the prophets and the writings. Philo's finespun theory of inspiration, like later rabbinical speculations, is mere fancy and offers no real weight.

3. It is implied, the critics say, in the employment of the Torah in the synagogue service. From the Torah alone lessons were systematically read in public services of the synagogue. Not until later times (cf. Luke 4:17–21) were lessons added from the prophets and then only to supplement and illustrate the Torah.

Reply. Readings were confined to the law originally, not because it alone was canonical, but because the divine covenant relation with Israel rested upon it and hinged upon its faithful observation. This alone would give sufficient reason that from the first institution of the synagogue the law should have a place in the worship. It would be only natural that soon selections from the prophets would be attempted to illustrate and amplify the law. The writings (Heb. kethubim) were more adaptable for reading on special occasions. The psalms were sung in the Temple and the five rolls were read on festal days. Selections from Job, Ezra-Nehemiah, Chronicles, Daniel, and Proverbs were read throughout the entire night preceding the Day of Atonement.

4. It is implied by the subsequent use of “the law,” signifying the whole Heb. canon. This expression is assumed by critics to be a reminiscence of a much earlier usage as well as a recognition of the higher esteem in which the law was held (John 10:34–35; 15:25). Jesus refers to the Psalms as the law. In 1 Cor. 14:21 Isaiah is alluded to under the same designation.

Reply. As the foundation of the whole Hebrew religious and liturgical system, it was natural for the name of the Pentateuch to be figuratively applied to the whole, a part denoting the entirety. With perfect propriety all Scripture may be designated “the law” since it constitutes the revelation of God’s purpose and will.

5. The Samaritan Pentateuch points at least to the high probability that around 432 B.C. the Torah (the law) alone was canonical. Why did the Samaritans take only the Pentateuch? The critics see in this anomaly “presumptive evidence” that around 432 B.C. (cf. Neh. 13:29) the Torah alone was canonical among Jerusalem Jews.

Reply. The mutilated canon of the Samaritans evidently originated like heretical sects in general. These groups accept what suits their own particular purposes, arbitrarily rejecting the rest. That the Samaritans did this is suggested by their deliberate alteration of Deut. 27:4 to read Mt. Gerizim instead of Mt. Ebal, in order to get divine sanction for the construction of their rival temple there. Since they deliberately did this, it is scarcely possible that they would have hesitated to reject any part of the sacred canon that spoke approvingly of worship at Shiloh or Jerusalem. Recognizing the force of this argument, Ryle (The Canon of the Old Testament, pp. 92–93) suggests the inclusion of books such as Joshua or Hosea that would have been inoffensive to the purposes of the Samaritans, had these writings at that time been canonical. But would a few isolated books outside the Pentateuch have offered any advantage? It would have in reality spoiled the unity and completeness that the Pentateuch afforded. The Samaritans were thus, as W. H. Green clearly remarks (General Introduction to the Old Testament, The Canon [1898], p. 100), “necessarily limited to the Pentateuch irrespective of the extent of the Jewish canon at the time.”

The Second Claim: The Prophets Were Not Added to the Hebrew Canon Until Between 300 B.C. and 200 B.C. The critical view acknowledges that the steps by which the prophets became canonical over a century and a half after the law “are, indeed, in a great measure hidden from our view” and that the evidence is “scanty” (Ryle, op. cit., pp. 95–96). However, they insist upon the claim.

1. It is implied, they claim, by the unpopularity of the prophets during the canonical period. As long as the prophets were not well received, it is maintained that it was unlikely for their utterances and their writings to have been regarded as having canonical authority. Supposedly not until the power and prestige of the prophets were enhanced toward the end of the exilic period were the prophetic writings collected and canonized. This erroneous presupposition fails to see the real nature of Scripture inspiration. The inspired Word of God possesses intrinsic binding authority and did not have to wait for intervals of time to give it this quality. Moreover, this quality is independent of the popularity or unpopularity of the prophet or the reception or rejection of his message. It is unwarrantedly assumed that “the incorporation of recent or almost contemporary work in the same collection with the older prophets would not have been approved” (Ryle, p. 106). But why should it not have been approved if inspired and thus possessing intrinsic authority? Why did many years have to slip away, for example, before Malachi’s writings, written about 445 B.C., would be accepted, as Ryle contends?

2. It is suggested by the date of the compilation of the book of Isaiah. Chapters 1–39 are in the main ascribed to Isaiah, whereas chapters 40–66, considered as non-Isaianic and late postexilic, were added when the prophetic writings were being collected. The real author of this section being completely forgotten, they were simply appended to Isaiah’s genuine prophecies.

Reply. Only the critical hypothesis demands a long interval of time to attempt to offer some rational explanation for the unaccountable oblivion of the so-called second Isaiah. Not the internal evidence of the book itself, considered as a genuine work of Isaiah, but the assumptions of the critics, create the unanswerable question: How could so prominent a prophet with such unusual literary skill, who wrote near the end of the Exile, be so completely forgotten that he was confused with another who lived at an entirely different time and under different circumstances?

3. It is implied in the date of the composition of the book of Daniel. Wildeboer concisely states the critical position: “At what time the division of the prophets was closed we are not informed. But on account of Dan. 9:2, whose author, living about 165 B.C., seems to know ‘the books’ as a collection with definite limits, and because the book of Daniel itself was unable to obtain a place in the second section, we fix the terminus ad quem about 200 B.C.” (Origin of the Canon of the Old Testament [1895], p. 116).

Reply. The critical date of Daniel, about 167 B.C., is largely dictated by rationalistic presuppositions with regard to miracles and prophecies. There is no valid reason for rejecting the Danielic authorship that the book claims for itself. It is not true that the book was unable to obtain a place in the prophetic section of the canon. The rightful place, according to the Jewish criteria for arranging the threefold division, is in the third division. But if the book was not written until about 167 B.C., it may be asked, How did it gain credence in such a short time as to be quoted in 1 Macc. 2:59–60? Or again it may be asked, Why should it have been translated into Gk. with other canonical books when, according to the uniform admission of the critics, this book would not have been in the canon at all if it were not considered to be the genuine work of the prophet Daniel?

The Third Claim. The Writings Were Not Canonized Until After the Prophets, Between 160 B.C. and 105 B.C. The general position is that no steps were taken toward the formation of a third division until the second was closed. Reasons cited to support this presupposition are as follows:

1. Much time had to elapse after Malachi for the general conviction to crystallize that prophecy had ceased and no more prophets were to be expected. Otherwise, it is contended, Ezra-Nehemiah and Chronicles would have been placed with the other historical books, such as Samuel and Kings, and Daniel would have been inserted with other prophecies into the second section, if that division had not been previously closed when they were finally considered canonical.

Reply. The order of the Heb. canon is not the result of the character or contents of the various books. It is due to the official status or position of their authors. There is no need to assume that the second division was closed and could not be opened to admit these books.

2. The general freedom and inaccuracy of the Gk. rendering of the writings are proof against their canonization before 160 B.C. Dillmann, for example, maintains that the additions to Esther and Daniel in the Gk. and the recasting of Chronicles and Ezra in the apocryphal Esdras furnish evidence that these books were not regarded as authoritative as the law and the prophets.

Reply. It would be strange if stories so vivid and remarkable as Esther and Daniel would not arouse popular imagination. Later Targumic legends connected with the law are answer enough that canonicity is no bar to imaginative additions. The evidence from the LXX has been doubtlessly overdone, and it is a subtle fallacy to assume that canonization always insures accurate translation or precludes imaginative fancy.

3. The evidence of the prologue to Ecclesiasticus is opposed to the canonicity of the writings before 160 B.C. The supposed “vagueness” with which the author of the prologue about 132 B.C. refers to the third division is construed as a testimony to the late canonization of the writings.

Reply. However, this argument is invalid. So far from an imagined “vagueness,” the language is remarkably definite. Actually the designation is comprehensive. By referring to the third division as “the rest of the books” or “the other books of the fathers” the designation is just as unambiguous in the light of the miscellaneous contents of these writings as is the term “the law and the prophets.” In fact, this statement in the prologue is in full agreement with the history of Josephus, who, flatly denying the critical hypothesis, asserts that the canon was completed and closed in the days of Artaxerxes (465–425 B.C.) and that since that time “not a soul has ventured to add or to remove or to alter a syllable” of the ancient records (Contra Apionem 1:8). There is no proof, despite the theorizing of the critics that, in the long interval between Malachi and the translator of Ecclesiasticus, the third division of the canon was still in the process of formation, much less that it was not formed until 160 B.C. or later.

The Correct and Conservative View of the Development of the Hebrew Canon. The OT books were written with the immediate idea of being held sacred and divinely authoritative. Being divinely inspired, they possessed the stamp of canonicity from the first. The prophets were conscious that they were speaking the Word of God by inspiration. Often they prefix their spoken and written messages with an authoritative “the word of the Lord came,” or some similar expression (cf. Ex. 4:15–16; 1 Kings 16:1; 2 Kings 7:1; Jer. 13:1; Ezek. 1:3). Early in the history of Israel, God began the formation of the book that was to constitute the revelation of Himself to man. The Decalogue was inscribed on stone (Deut. 10:4–5), Moses’ laws were written in a book (31:24–26), and copies of this book were made (17:18). Samuel also wrote in a book (1 Sam. 10:25). The prophets wrote their inspired message (Jer. 36:32); Ezra read the law publicly (Neh. 8:3). However, the precise way in which the entire group of OT books was set apart and divinely inscribed as the Word of God is hidden from our eyes. Jewish tradition attributes these remarkable achievements to Ezra and the men of the Great Assembly, but these facts are also far from being clear. Because the writings of the prophets, as soon as they were issued, had tremendous authority as inspired Scripture, no formal declaration of their canonicity was needed to give them sanction. The divine author who inspired these writings, we may reasonably believe, acted providentially in behalf of their acceptance by the faithful. However, their inspiration and consequent divine authority were inherent and not dependent on human reception or lapse of time to give them prestige or until there were no more living prophets, or any other factor. Canonical authority is not derived from the sanction of Jewish priests and leaders or from the Christian church. That authority is in itself.

This view of the formation of the canon, however, is not the mere history of the production of the various books. That OT authors were fully conscious of their inspiration is clear from the internal evidence of the books themselves. There is no need, however, to think that they simply deposited their oracles in the Temple, the oracles thereby immediately being considered part of the sacred canon. Inspired Scripture had to face opposition and sometimes destruction, as Jer. 36:1–32 indicates. Canonization of books is not to be confused with their collection. Books were not made canonical by reason of their collection. They were collected because they were canonical, that is, possessed of divine authority by virtue of their inspired character. It is to be feared that modern scholars, in making the collection and arrangement of Bible books a primary element in canonization, have created an artificial idea that has led to serious misunderstanding and unsound views. The Jews had a canon of Scripture long before their holy writings were formally arranged in the threefold division and as a unified whole.

The real basis of the threefold division of the Heb. Scriptures is evidently the official position of the individual authors. Moses was the writer of the books of the law in the first division. The writers in the second division were those who had the prophetic office, that is, the official status and calling of a prophet, as well as the prophetic gift (the endowment of inspiration). The authors in the third category had the prophetic gift but not the prophetic office. They were not officially prophets. David and Solomon were kings; Ezra was a scribe; Daniel, a government official; Nehemiah, a civil governor. This view seems to be the simplest and most satisfactory of all.

The Christian Canon of the Old Testament. In proportion as the Fathers were more or less absolutely dependent on the LXX for their knowledge of OT Scriptures, they gradually lost in common practice the sense of the difference between the books of the Heb. canon and the Apocrypha. The history of the Christian canon is to be sought from definite catalogs and not from isolated quotations. But even this evidence is incomplete and unsatisfactory, few of the catalogs being really independent. They evidently fall into two great classes, Hebrew and Latin; the former, again, exhibits three distinct varieties, which are to be traced to the three original sources from which the catalogs were derived. The first may be called the pure Heb. canon, which is that of the Church of England. The second differs from this by the omission of the book of Esther. The third differs by the addition of Baruch, or “the letter.” During the first four centuries this Heb. canon was the only one that was distinctly recognized, and it was supported by the combined authority of those Fathers whose critical judgment was entitled to the greatest weight. The real divergence as to the contents of the OT canon is to be traced to Augustine, whose wavering and uncertain language on the point furnishes abundant materials for controversy. In the famous passage (De Doct. Christ. 2.8 [13]) he enumerates the books that are contained in “the whole canon of Scripture,” and includes among them the apocryphal books without any clear mark of dysfunction. The Council of Trent pronounced the enlarged canon, including the apocryphal books, to be deserving in all its parts of “equal veneration,” and added a list of books to prevent the possibility of doubt. The Reformed churches agreed in confirming the Heb. canon of Jerome and refused to allow any dogmatic authority to the apocryphal books; but the form in which this judgment was confirmed varied considerably in the different confessions. The English church (Art. 6) appeals directly to the opinion of Jerome, and concedes to the apocryphal books, including 4 Esdras and the Prayer of Manasses, a use “for example of life and instruction of manners,” but not for the establishment of doctrine. CAPERBERRY. The rendering in Eccles. 12:5 (NASB) of Heb. ʿābiyyônâ, “provocative of desire,” to form the reading “the caperberry is ineffective.” The KJV reads “desire shall fade”; the NIV, “desire is no longer stirred.” See Vegetable Kingdom.

CAPER NAUM (ka-per'nā-um; “town of Nahum”). A city of Galilee, frequently mentioned by the evangelists in connection with the life of our Lord. It was on the western shore of the “Sea of Galilee” (Matt. 4:13; cf. John 6:24), lower than Nazareth and Cana, from which the road to it was one of descent (John 2:12; Luke 4:31). It was of sufficient size to be called a “city” (Matt. 9:1; Mark 1:33), and had its own synagogue, in which our Lord frequently taught (John 6:59; Mark 1:21; Luke 4:31–38)—a synagogue built by the centurion of the detachment of Roman soldiers that appears to have been quartered in the place (7:2; Matt. 8:8). But besides the garrison there was also a customs station, where the dues were gathered both by stationary (9:9; Mark 2:14; Luke 5:27) and by itinerant (Matt. 17:24) officers.

Capernaum was the residence of Jesus and His apostles, and the scene of many miracles and discourses. At Nazareth He was “brought up,” but Capernaum was emphatically His “own city”; it was when He returned to it that He is said to have been “at home” (Mark 2:1). Here He chose the evangelist Matthew, or Levi (Matt. 9:9). The brothers Simon Peter and Andrew belonged to Capernaum (Mark 1:29), and it is perhaps allowable to imagine that it was on the sea beach that they had the quiet call that was to make them forsake all and follow Him (1:16–17; cf. v. 28). Here Christ worked the miracle on the centurion’s servant (Matt. 8:5; Luke 7:1–2), on Simon’s wife’s mother (8:14; Mark 1:30; Luke 4:38), the paralytic (Matt. 9:1–2; Mark 2:1–3; Luke 5:18), and the man afflicted with an unclean demon (Mark 1:32; Luke 4:33). At Capernaum the incident of the child occurred (Mark 9:36–37; Matt. 18:1–6); and in the synagogue there was spoken the wonderful discourse of John 6 (see v. 59).

The doom pronounced against Capernaum and the other unbelieving cities (Matt. 11:23) has been remarkably fulfilled. Tell Hum, its generally accepted site, is an uninhabited place two and a half miles SW of where the Jordan enters the Sea of Galilee. The Franciscans acquired the site in 1894, and in 1905 H. Kohl and C. Watzinger, working for the German Oriental Society, uncovered part of the ruins of the synagogue. From 1905 to 1914 the Franciscan W. Hinterkeuser worked in the area of the synagogue and the octagonal church that stood to the S of it. G. Orfali restored part of the synagogue and worked on the octagonal church from 1921 to 1926. And since 1968 V. Corbo and S. Loffreda have been excavating inside and around the synagogue, on the site of the octagonal church, and on adjacent parts of the town. The dominant structure of Tell Hum is the limestone synagogue, which the excavators have now dated about A.D. 400. Under the floor of this synagogue in 1981 were excavated ruins of a first-century synagogue of basalt. The octagonal church, that stands between the synagogue and the seashore, covers a first-century house that the excavators conclude was the house of Peter. H.F.V.

CAPH TOR (kaf'tor). The place from which the Philistine groups mentioned by Jeremiah (Jer. 47:4) and Amos (Amos 9:7) originally came. It is probably to be identified with Kap-ta-ra or Crete, which under second millennium B.C. Minoan rule controlled the Aegean. The Caphtorim originated in Egypt (Gen. 10:14), and evidently migrated in the third millennium (B.C.) to establish the Minoan civilization with others. Caphtor is described as an “island,” or a “coastland.” R.K.H.

CAPHTORIM (kaf-tor-im’). The inhabitants of Caphtor or Crete (Deut. 2:23).

Originally migrants from Egypt (Gen. 10:14), they formed part of the Sea Peoples, settling finally in Canaan. See Philistines.

CAPITAL. In modern architecture, the upper, ornamental part of a column. Once (2 Chron. 3:15) the Heb. ṣepet, “to encircle,” is so rendered; elsewhere (1 Kings 7:16–20; Jer. 52:22) the term is the rendering of the Heb. kōteret, and refers to the capitals of the Temple pillars.

CAPPADO´CIA (kap-a-dō’shi-a). A province in the eastern part of Asia Minor whose boundaries were changed several times by the Roman emperors. In NT history it comprised Lesser Armenia. On the Day of Pentecost it was represented at Jerusalem (Acts 2:9), and Peter refers to it (1 Pet. 1:1); hence its interest for the Bible reader.

CAPSTONE. See Cornerstone.

CAPTAIN. This word is the rendering of numerous Heb. and several Gk. words, some of which require special consideration. See Shipmaster.

1. Prince or Leader (Heb. śar; Gk. chiliarch; usually “official” or “leader” in the NIV), a military title (1 Sam. 22:2); also rendered “chief” (Gen. 40:2; 41:9; see article Chief), “commander” (2 Sam. 23:19; Dan. 1:7), “ruler” (Judg. 9:30), “governor” (1 Kings 22:26). The “captain of the guard” (Acts 28:16, KJV) was the commander of the pretorian troops. The rank or power of an Israelite captain was designated by the number of men under his command as “captain of fifty,” or “captain of a thousand”; and the commander of the whole army was called the “captain of the host.” See Army; Officer.

2. Ruler (Heb. qāśîn; usually “commander” in the NIV), sometimes denotes a military (Josh. 10:24; Judg. 11:6–11; Isa. 22:3), sometimes a civil, command (Isa. 1:10; 3:6); in Isaiah rendered “ruler,” or “leader” (NIV).

3. Adjutant (Heb. shālîsh), properly a third man, or one of three. Some conclude from this that the term was applied to a higher order of soldiers, who fought from chariots and were so called because each chariot contained three soldiers, one of whom managed the horses while the others fought (Ex. 14:7; 2 Sam. 23:8; etc.). Others hold to the opinion that the shālîsh were third officers in rank after the king, or commanded a third part of the army.

4. The “officer” or “captain of the temple” (Luke 22:4; Acts 4:1; 5:24) was not a military officer but a priest who had command of the Levitical Temple police, called by Jewish writers “the man of the temple mount” (Edersheim, The Temple, p. 119). His duty was to visit the posts during the night and see that the sentries were doing their duty.

Figurative. Christ is called the “captain of our salvation” (Heb. 2:10, KJV; Gk. archēgos), because He is the “author” (NASB and NIV) of His people’s salvation and their leader. Jehovah announces Himself to Joshua (5:14) as the “captain of the host,” i.e., the head and protector of His people (Dan. 8:11, rendered “commander”).

CAPTIVE. Persons taken prisoner during war. As ancient inscriptions and reliefs show, they were treated with great indignities and cruelty. Those who surrendered were led out with halters, as if for execution (1 Kings 20:32); the victors set their feet upon the necks of captured kings and nobles (Josh. 10:24); cut off their thumbs, toes, or ears (Judg. 1:7; 2 Sam. 4:12; Ezek. 23:25) and put out their eyes (2 Kings 25:7). Captives were suspended by the hand (Lam. 5:12); made to lie down and be walked or driven over (Isa. 51:23); thrown among thorns, sawn in two, beaten to pieces with threshing machines, or had severe labor imposed upon them (Judg. 8:7; 2 Sam. 12:31; 1 Chron. 20:3). When a city was captured the men were usually put to death, the women and children sold as slaves (2 Chron. 28:8–15; Ps. 44:12; Isa. 47:3; Joel 3:3; Mic. 1:11) or exposed to most cruel treatment (2 Kings 8:12; Esther 3:13; Isa. 13:16, 18; Nah. 3:5–6; Zech. 14:2). Sometimes the people were transported (2 Kings 24:12–16; Jer. 20:5; 39:9–10) or made tributary (2 Sam. 8:6; 2 Kings 14:14).

CAPTIVITY (properly some form of shābā, to “take captive”; often expressed by other Heb. words). This word may be taken in the strict sense of imprisonment, but in relation to the people of Israel it has come to mean expatriation. Captives and captivity are used in Scripture very much in the sense of exile, yet with the notion that this state of exile was compulsory and that the persons thus exiled were in a dependent and oppressed condition. The violent removal of the entire population of a city or district is not an uncommon event in ancient history and was much more humane than the selling of captives into slavery. Such deportation might arise from one of two motives—the desire to rapidly populate new cities, built for pride or policy; or to break up hostile organizations. In addition to the destruction of national existence such exile was made the more bitter from the sanctity attributed to special places and the local attachment to deity. Removal was thought to sever a people from the care and protection of their god; indeed, it implied the defeat of such deity. Tiglath-pileser of Assyria (745–727 B.C.) inaugurated the practice of transporting whole conquered populations to distant parts of his empire (1 Kings 15:29). In this policy he was followed by many of his royal successors including Sargon, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon, and by Babylonian rulers, notably Nebuchadnezzar II (605–562 B.C.).

The bondage of Israel in Egypt, and their subjugation at different times by the Philistines and other nations, are sometimes spoken of as captivities; the Jews themselves reckon their national captivities as four—the Babylonian, Persian, Grecian, and Roman. The general use of the term, however, is applied to the forcible deportation of the Jews under the Assyrian or Babylonian kings (Matt. 1:17).

Captivity of Israel. The removal of the ten tribes, though often spoken of as a single event, was a complex process. The larger part of the people were carried away, not to Babylon, but to Assyria. The period during which their removal was gradually effected was not less than 150 years. There were two of these captivities: (1) In the reign of Pekah, king of Israel, Tiglath-pileser III carried away in 732 B.C. the trans-Jordanic tribes (1 Chron. 5:26) and the inhabitants of Galilee (2 Kings 15:29; cf. Isa. 9:1) to Assyria. (2) In the reign of Hoshea, king of Israel, Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, twice invaded (2 Kings 17:3, 5) the kingdom that remained, and his successor Sargon II took Samaria in 722 B.C., carrying away 27,290 of the population as he tells in his Khorsabad Annals. Later Assyrian kings, notably Esarhaddon (681–668 B.C.), completed the task.

Captivity of Judah. The carrying away of the people of Judah was not accomplished at once, either. Sennacherib, about 701 B.C., is stated to have carried into Assyria 200,000 captives from the Jewish cities that he took (2 Kings 18:13). Three distinct deportations are mentioned in 24:14 (including 10,000 persons) and 25:11, one in 2 Chron. 36:20, three in Jer. 52:28–30 (including 4,600 persons), and one in Dan. 1:3. The two principal ones were: (1) when Jehoiachin with all his nobles, soldiers, and artificers were carried away; and (2) that which followed the destruction of Jerusalem and the capture of Zedekiah, 586 B.C. (Albright, 587 B.C.). The three mentioned by Jeremiah may have been contributions from the more distinguished portions of the captives, and the captivity of certain selected "children" (Dan. 1:3), 607 B.C., may have occurred when Nebuchadnezzar was a colleague of his father, Nabopolassar.

Condition of Captives. The condition of the captives must have had many an element of bitterness. They were humiliated with the memory of defeat and present bondage; if faithful to Jehovah they were subject to bitter scorn and derision (Ps. 137:3–5); they were required to pay for their existence in heavy services and tributes; those of high-priestly, noble, or royal origin were treated with indignity (Isa. 43:28; 52:5). On the other hand, they were treated not as slaves but as colonists. There was nothing to hinder a Jew from rising to the highest eminence in the state (Dan. 2:48) or holding the most confidential office near the person of the king (Neh. 1:11; Tobit 1:13, 22). The advice of Jeremiah (29:5; etc.) was generally followed. The exiles increased in numbers and in wealth. They observed the Mosaic law (Esther 2:10; Tobit 14:9). They kept up distinctions of rank among themselves (Ezek. 20:1). Their genealogical tables were preserved, and they were at no loss to tell who was the rightful heir to David's throne. They had neither place nor time of national gathering, no temple, and they offered no sacrifice. But the rite of circumcision and their laws respecting food, etc., were observed; their priests were with them (Jer. 29:1); and possibly the practice of erecting synagogues in every city (Acts 15:21) was begun by the Jews in the Babylonian captivity.

Literature. The captivity had also a contemporaneous literature. Tobit presents a picture of the inner life of a family of Naphtali among the captives of Nineveh. Baruch was written by one whose eyes, like those of Ezekiel, were familiar with the gigantic forms of Assyrian sculpture. Several of the psalms appear to express the sentiments of Jews who were either partakers or witnesses of the Assyrian captivity. But it is from the three great prophets, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, that we learn most of the condition of the children of the captivity.

Duration. Jeremiah (25:12; 29:10) predicted that the captivity should last for seventy years, which has aroused much discussion. The best explanation of the chronological problem involved is that there were two, if not more, coordinate modes of computing the period in question, used by the sacred writers, one civil, extending from the first invasion by Nebuchadnezzar to the decree of Cyrus, 605–537 B.C.; and the other ecclesiastical, from the burning of the Temple to its reconstruction, 586–515 B.C. The Babylonian captivity was brought to a close by the decree (Ezra 1:2) of Cyrus, 537 B.C. and the return of a portion of the nation under Sheshbazzar, or Zerubbabel, 535 B.C., Ezra, 458 B.C., and Nehemiah, 444 B.C. The number who returned upon the decree of 537 B.C. was 42,360, besides servants. Among them about 30,000 are specified (cf. Ezra 2 and Neh. 7) as belonging to the tribes of Judah, Benjamin, and Levi. It has been inferred that the remaining 12,000 belonged to the tribes of Israel (cf. Ezra 6:17). Those who were left in Assyria (Esther 8:9, 11), and kept up their national distinctions, were known as The Dispersion (which see; John 7:35; James 1:1; 1 Pet. 1:1).

The Ten Tribes. Of these little is known. (1) Some returned and mixed with the other Jews (Luke 2:36; Phil. 3:5; etc.). (2) Some were left in Samaria, mingled with the Samaritans (Ezra 6:21; John 4:12), and became bitter enemies of the other Jews. (3) Many remained in Assyria and were recognized as an integral part of the Dispersion (see Acts 2:9; 26:7). (4) Most, probably, apostatized in Assyria, adopted the usages and idolatry of the nations among whom they were planted, and became wholly swallowed up in them.

Cause and Effects of Captivity. The captivity in Babylon was the result that justly befell the covenant people from their becoming assimilated to heathen states. By accepting other gods they broke their covenant with Jehovah and placed themselves beyond His protection. “Repentance, and a return to the ancient, the everlasting, and the true God, from the delirium, the charms, and the seductions of the world, had indeed been for centuries the cry of the best prophets, ever growing in intensity” (Ewald, Hist. of Israel). They now came to God in penitence and earnest prayer. The clearest proof of repentance is found in the establishment of four fast days, celebrated in four different months (Isa. 58:3–12; Zech. 7:5; 8:19). Thus the Jews who returned from captivity were remarkably free from the old sin of idolatry, and a great spiritual renovation, in accordance with the divine promise (Ezek. 36:24–28), was wrought in them. A new and deep reverence for at least the letter of the law and the institutions of Moses was probably the result of the religious services in the synagogue. The Exile was also a period of change in the vernacular language of the Jews (see Neh. 8:8), and a new impulse of commercial enterprise and activity was developed.

For an excellent discussion of the chronology of this period see David N. Freedman, “The Babylonian Chronicle,” The Biblical Archaeologist 19, no. 3 (1956): 5–60.

Captivity Under the Romans. The Jews’ fate at the hands of the Romans far better deserves the name of captivity; for, after the massacre of many thousands, the captives were reduced to real bondage. Josephus tells us that 1.1 million men fell in the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, and 97,000 were captured in the whole war. Those under seventeen were sold into private bondage; of the rest some were sent to the Egyptian mines, others into the provinces to be destroyed at the theaters by the sword and wild beasts (Wars 6.9.3).

An equally dreadful destruction fell upon the remains of the nation, which had once more assembled in Judea under the reign of Hadrian, and by these two wars the Jewish population must have been effectually extirpated from the Holy Land.

Figurative. “People of the exile” denotes those who were in captivity, or their posterity (Ezra 4:1). “The Lord turned the captivity of Job” (Job 42:10, KJV) means that He released him from his sufferings and restored him to prosperity. “He led captive a host of captives” (Eph. 4:8) is a figurative allusion to the victory of Christ over the enemies of Himself and His kingdom.

Prophetic. The OT speaks of a future restoration of Israel to God’s favor in Palestine and as head of the nations in the coming age (the Millennium). Isaiah (11:11) calls it a “second” restoration. The Jews have never been restored but “once” and that was from Babylon. The Egyptian deliverance was not a restoration, because Palestine was never in their possession until conquered by Joshua. The “second” and final restoration will be from their present worldwide dispersion (Isa. 43:5–7; Jer. 16:14–15; 24:6) after the completion of “the times of the Gentiles” (Luke 21:24) at the second advent of Christ (Matt. 24:29–30). It will be a restoration in unbelief (Ezek. 36:24–27) to be followed by judgment and chastening in “a great tribulation” (Jer. 30:4–7; Dan. 12:1; Matt. 24:21–31) previous to their conversion (Zech. 12:10; 1 Cor. 15:8). It will be a national restoration (Ezek. 37:1–22; Rom. 11:25) and will usher in the mediatorial, Davidic, messianic kingdom on earth. This millennial age with the Jew in his God-ordained position as a priestly nation at the head of the nations (Zech. 3:1–10) will constitute the last of God’s ordered ages in time (Rev. 20:1–10) before the dawn of the eternal state (Rev. 21–22). M.F.U.

CARBUNCLE. A KJV term. It is replaced in the NASB and NIV by either crystal or emerald. See Mineral Kingdom.

CARCAS (car’cas). One of the seven eunuchs of King Ahasuerus (or Xerxes, NIV) of Persia (Esther 1:10).

CARCASS. The dead body of man or beast. According to the Mosaic law: (1) The dead body of a human being rendered unclean the tent (or house) in which the man had died, with any open vessels therein, for seven days. It was no less defiling to touch the dead. (2) Contact with the carcass of any animal rendered the one touching, carrying, or eating it unclean until evening (Lev. 11:39). For fuller particulars, see Uncleaness; Dead, The.

CAR’CHEMISH (kar’kem-ish). A Hittite city on the right bank of the Euphrates commanding one of the best fords of that river (Isa. 10:9; Jer. 46:2). Located about sixty miles NE of Aleppo, the site was excavated by Sir Leonard Woolley and T. E. Lawrence for the British Museum. An important Hittite culture was revealed, and the city formed the E capital of the Hittite Empire. It lay just W of Haran and may have been visited by Abraham on his trek to Palestine. Sargon II of Assyria (c. 718 B.C.) took Carchemish. To this place Josiah went to do battle with Pharaoh Neco of Egypt (2 Chron. 35:20–22). And it was here that Nebuchadnezzar II defeated Neco (605 B.C.), the event that inaugurated the splendid neo-Babylonian Empire and presaged the Babylonian captivity of the Southern Kingdom. M.F.U.

CARE, CARES (Gk. merimma). The Gk. word has the sense of being drawn in different directions, and answers to our distraction. It is translated “anxiety” in 1 Pet. 5:7, where it is contrasted with melō, to “be of interest” to, and may be read, “Casting all your anxiety upon Him, because He cares for you” (cf. Ps. 55:23; Luke 8:14; 21:34). In Matt. 13:22 and Mark 4:19, the “worries of the world” are anxiety about things pertaining to this earthly life. Paul uses the same word, “concern for all the churches” (2 Cor. 11:28).

CARE’AH. See Kareah.

CARITES (car’ites). Probably the same as the Kerethites or the Cherethites (which see).

CAR’MEL (kar’mel; a plant, “field, park, garden”).

1. As a common noun, rendered “fruitful garden” or “fertile field” (Isa. 10:18; 29:17; 32:15–16), “fruitful field” (Isa. 16:10; Jer. 48:33), “fruitful land” (2:7). In 2 Kings 19:23; 2 Chron. 26:10, KJV, it is incorrectly rendered as a proper name, “Carmel” (NASB, “fertile fields”; NIV, “fertile lands”).

2. A prominent headland of Palestine, bounding on the S the Bay of Acre, and running out almost into the Mediterranean, bearing about S-SE for more than 12 miles, ending suddenly by an eastern bluff. Its average height is 1,500 feet. Carmel fell within the lot of the tribe of Asher (Josh. 19:26), which was extended as far S as Dor, probably to give the Asherites a share of the rich grain-growing plain of Sharon. The king of “Jokneam in Carmel” was one of the Canaanite chiefs who fell before the arms of Joshua. From earliest times the gardenlike loveliness of Carmel was sacred to the Canaanite Baal and other oracles.

That which has made Carmel most familiar is its connection with the history of Elijah and Elisha. Here Elijah brought back Israel to allegiance to Jehovah and killed the prophets of the foreign and false god (1 Kings 18:20–40). Here Elisha received the visit of the bereaved mother whose son he was soon to restore to her arms (2 Kings 4:25). Carmel may have been the location of an incident that took place near the end of Elijah's life: fire coming "down from heaven" and consuming the two "fifties" of the guard Ahaziah had dispatched to take Elijah prisoner, for having stopped the messengers to Baalzebub the god of Ekron (1 Kings 1:9–15).

Carmel is still clothed with the same excellency of wood that supplied the prophets of Israel and Judah alike with one of their most favorite illustrations (Isa. 33:9; Mic. 7:14, see marg.).

3. A town in the mountainous country of Judah (Josh. 15:55), familiar as the residence of Nabal (1 Sam. 25:2, 5, 7, 40), and the native place of David's favorite wife, "Abigail the Carmelites" (1 Sam. 27:3; 1 Chron. 3:1). This was doubtless the Carmel at which Saul set up "a monument" after his victory over Amalek (1 Sam. 15:12). It is now called Kermel, about nine miles SE of Hebron.

CAR'MELITE (kar'mel-īt). The designation of Nabal (1 Sam. 30:5; 2 Sam. 2:2; 3:3) and his wife Abigail (1 Sam. 27:3; 1 Chron. 3:1, "Carmelites"); also of Hezro, one of David's warriors (2 Sam. 23:35), probably from being an inhabitant of Carmel (which see) in Judah.

CAR'MI (kar'mi; "vine-dresser").

1. The fourth son of Reuben (Gen. 46:9; Ex. 6:14), about 1870 B.C. His descendants were called Carmites (Num. 26:6).

2. The son of Hezron (Judah's grandson), and father of Hur (1 Chron. 4:1). He is elsewhere called Caleb (2:18), or Chelubai (2:9).

3. The son of Zabdi (of the tribe of Judah), and father of Achan, the traitor (Josh. 7:1; 1 Chron. 2:7), before 1400 B.C.

CAR'MITES (kar'mīts). The patronymic of the descendants of Carmi (which see), the Reubenite (Num. 26:6).

CARNAL. See Flesh.

CARNELIAN (car-nē'lyan). A precious stone rendered by "sardius" in the NASB. See Mineral Kingdom: Sardis.

CAROUSE (Gk. kōmos, a "carousel"). In the Gk. writings, this term referred to a nocturnal and riotous procession of half-drunken people who paraded after supper through the streets with torches and music in honor of Bacchus or some other deity, and sang and played before the houses of their friends; hence it was used generally of feasts and drinking parties that were protracted into the night and during which people indulged in revelry (Rom. 13:13; Gal. 5:21; 1 Pet. 4:3).

CARPENTER (Heb. ḥārāsh, "artisan," 2 Sam. 5:11; 1 Chron. 14:1; etc.; Gk. tektor, Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3). A general term, including an artificer in stone and metal, as well as wood. See Handicrafts: Builders; Wood, Workers in.

CARPUS (kar'pus; "fruit"). A Christian of Troas with whom the apostle Paul states that he left a cloak (2 Tim. 4:13), probably when passing through Asia Minor for the last time before his martyrdom at Rome.

CARRION VULTURE. See Animal Kingdom: Vulture.

CARSHE'NA (kar-she'na). The first named of the seven "wise men" or chief rulers of the court of Xerxes (Ahasuerus), with whom he consulted as to what course he should pursue toward Vashti, who had refused to appear at the royal banquet (Esther 1:14). The name is evidently Old Persian, signifying "plowman."

CART (Heb. āgālā), something "revolving"; sometimes rendered "chariot," Ps. 46:9; "wagon," Gen. 45:19, 21, 27; 46:5). A two-wheeled vehicle used for transporting persons (Gen. 45:19; Num. 7:8) or freight (1 Sam. 6:7–8). Carts were drawn by cattle (2 Sam. 6:3, 6) and are to be distinguished from the war chariots drawn by horses. The wheels were sometimes made of solid blocks of wood, sometimes with spokes, as represented on the monuments of Egypt and Nineveh.

Figurative. The expression "Woe to those who drag iniquity ... and sin as if with cart ropes" (Isa. 5:18) is understood by some to refer to the binding of burdens upon carts, and so to the enslaving power of sin. Others use "cart rope" in the sense of a trace and think that the metaphor is used to illustrate the heavy burdens that must be drawn by the sinner.

CARVE, CARVING. See Handicrafts.

CASEMENT. See articles Lattice; House.

CASIPH'IA (ka-sif'i-a). A "place" of the Persian Empire where Levites settled during the captivity, and where Iddo and others joined Ezra (Ezra 8:17). Its location is unknown.

CAS'LUHIM (kas'lū-him), Cas'luhites (NIV). A Mizraite people or tribe (Gen. 10:14). The only clue we have as yet to the position of the Casluhim is their place in the list of the sons of Mizraim between the Pathrusim and the Caphtorim, making it probable that they were located in Upper Egypt.

CASSIA. See Vegetable Kingdom.

CASTANETS. See Music.

CASTAWAY. See Disqualified.

CASTLE. In addition to its meaning of fortress or stronghold (1 Chron. 11:7), castles were, probably, towers used by the priests for observation and for making known, through the sounding of trumpets, anything discovered at a distance (1 Chron. 6:54). The "castles" in the KJV of Gen. 25:16 may have been enclosures for flocks or cattle, watchtowers from which shepherds watched their flocks. The NASB and NIV render "camps." The "castle" in the KJV of Acts 21:34 refers to the barracks (so NASB and NIV) of the Roman soldiers in the fortress of Antonia, adjacent to the Temple.

CAST METAL SEA. See Laver; Sea, Bronze.

CAS'TOR AND POL'LUX (kas'tor and pol'ux). The Dioscuri, i.e., sons of Jupiter; Castor being a horse-tamer, and Pollux (Gk. Polydeucēs) the master of the art of boxing. They were the ideal types of bravery and dexterity in fight and thus became the tutelary gods of warlike youth. They were supposed to lend their aid to the mariner, who, in case of a storm, prayed to them, and vowed to sacrifice a lamb to them as soon as the storm ceased. The ship in which Paul sailed from Malta had Castor and Pollux for its figurehead (Acts 28:11).

CATHOLIC EPISTLES. At the end of the epistles stand seven—James, 1 and 2 Peter, 1, 2, 3 John, and Jude—which bear the name of catholic, or general. This title is inaccurate, for two of them, 2 and 3 John, are addressed to individuals, and two more to a designated circle of readers; James to “the twelve tribes who are dispersed abroad” and 1 Peter to “those who reside as aliens, scattered throughout,” etc. The following explanations have been given of the term: (1) these epistles are “general letters of instruction, the name at first applied only to a part, but afterward including even those addressed to private persons”; (2) because the different apostles wrote them; (3) because of the catholic doctrine taught in them; (4) 1 Peter and 1 John, having from the beginning been received as authentic, obtained the distinction of being catholic, or universally accepted; as the others came to be thus received, they also were called catholic.

CATTLE. See Animal Kingdom.

CAVALRY. See Army; War.

CAUDA (caw'da). See Clauda.

CAUL. A KJV term replaced in the NASB by (1) “lobe of the liver” (Lev. 3:4; lit., “surplus tissue”); “chest” (Hos. 13:8); and “headbands” (Isa. 3:18), and in the NIV by “covering of the liver,” “rip them open,” and “headbands,” respectively.

CAUSEWAY (Heb. mā'sillâ from sālal, to “throw up”). A KJV term referring to the “ascending highway” (NASB), or “upper road” (NIV), leading from the lower city up to the Temple site (1 Chron. 26:16, 18). In the NASB of 2 Chron. 9:4, 11, it is called a “stairway” and “steps.”

CAVE. The chalky limestone of which the rocks of Syria and Palestine chiefly consist presents, as in the case in all limestone formations, a vast number of caverns and natural fissures, many of which have also been artificially enlarged and adapted to various purposes, both of shelter and defense. The most remarkable caves noticed in Scripture are: (1) that in which Lot dwelt after the destruction of Sodom (Gen. 19:30); (2) the cave of Machpelah (23:17); (3) cave of Makkedah (Josh. 10:16); (4) cave of Adullam (1 Sam. 22:1); (5) cave of Engedi (24:3); (6) the cave in which Obadiah concealed the prophets (1 Kings 18:4), which was probably in the northern part of the country, where abundant caves fit for such a purpose might be pointed out; (7) Elijah's cave in Horeb (19:9), the locality of which cannot be determined; (8, 9) the rock sepulchers of Lazarus and of our Lord (John 11:38; Matt. 27:60).

Caves were used as habitations (Num. 24:21; song of Sol. 2:14; Jer. 49:16; Obad. 3), as places of refuge (Judg. 6:2; 1 Sam. 14:11), and as prisons (Isa. 24:22; Zech. 9:11). See also Cottage; Dwelling.

CEDAR. See Vegetable Kingdom.

CEDRON. See Kidron.

CELLAR. An underground vault for storage of wine and oil (1 Chron. 27:27–28). The NIV, however, renders “wine vats” here. The word is also used to denote the treasury of the Temple (1 Kings 7:51) and of the king (14:26). See House.

CEN'CHREA (sen'kre-a; “millet”). The eastern harbor of Corinth, the modern name of which is still Kenchreae, although the popular name is Kikries. It is about eight miles from Corinth. Paul once sailed from this port (Acts 18:18). He also makes reference in Rom. 16:1 to the church established there.

CENSER (Heb. maḥṭâ, a “firepan”; miqṭeret, “vessel for burning incense,” from qāṭar, “burn incense”). The vessel upon which the incense was burned in the sanctuary, and which was appointed to be set every morning on the altar of incense when the priest went in to trim the lamps and again when he lighted them in the evening (Ex. 30:7–8). Yearly, on the Day of Atonement, the high priest entered the Holy of Holies, bearing the censer, and threw upon the burning coals the incense, holding the censer in his hand while the incense burned (Lev. 16:12–13).

No description is given of the censer, and therefore we are left in doubt as to its form and appearance. The probability is that, inasmuch as all fire upon which incense was burned was taken from the “bronze altar,” every censer had a handle by which it could be carried. They are mentioned among the vessels of the Tabernacle, which were to be wrapped up in proper coverings when the order was given to march (Num. 4:14, NASB and NIV, “firepans”); and from Lev. 10:1; Num. 16:6, 17, in which each ministering priest is spoken of as having his censer, it would seem that they existed in considerable numbers.

As to material, the censers were made of “bronze,” and from the fact that the censers of the rebels were used as plates to cover the altar (16:38–39) it would seem that they were simply square sheets, folded at the corners like the modern sheet-iron pan. Solomon prepared “firepans of pure gold” for the Temple (1 Kings 7:50; 2 Chron. 4:22). In Rev. 5:8; 8:3, 5, the angel is represented with a golden censer.

The word thumiastērion, “place of fumigation,” is rendered “censer” in the KJV of Heb. 9:4; more correctly, “altar of incense” in the NASB and NIV.

CENSUS. This term does not occur in the KJV, although found in the original (Matt. 17:25, kēnsos, KJV, “tribute”). The act is, however, referred to in the Heb. mīpqqād, or p□qūddâ, “numbering”; and the Gk. apographē, “enrollment.”

Old Testament. According to the law of Moses (Ex. 30:12–14) every male Israelite of twenty years old and upward was enrolled in the army and was to pay half a shekel as atonement money. The following instances of a census being taken are given in the OT: (1) Under the express direction of God (Ex. 38:26), in the third or fourth month after the Exodus during the encampment at Sinai, chiefly for the purpose of raising money for the Tabernacle. The numbers then taken amounted to 603,550 men. (2) In the second month of the second year after the Exodus (Num. 1:2–3). This census was taken for a double purpose: (a) To ascertain the number of fighting men from the age of twenty to fifty. (b) To ascertain the amount of the redemption offering due on account of all the firstborn, both of persons and cattle. The Levites, whose numbers amounted to 22,000, were taken in lieu of the firstborn males of the rest of Israel, whose numbers were 22,273, and for the surplus of 273, a money payment of 1,365 shekels, or five shekels each, was made to Aaron and his sons (3:39, 51). (3) Thirty-eight years afterward, previous to the entrance into Canaan, when the total number, excepting the Levites, amounted to 601,730 males, showing a decrease of 1,870 (26:51). (4) In the reign of David the men of Israel above twenty years of age were 800,000, and of Judah 500,000, total 1,300,000. The book of Chronicles gives the numbers of Israel 1,100,000, and of Judah 470,000, total 1,570,000, but informs us that Levi and Benjamin were not numbered (1 Chron. 21:6; 27:24). The time of this census belongs undoubtedly to the closing years of David’s reign. The wrong of this census is thought by some to have consisted in the omission to collect the atonement money (see above), but the following explanation seems the correct one: “The true kernel of David’s sin was to be found, no doubt, in self-exaltation, inasmuch as he sought for the strength and glory of his kingdom in the number of the people and their readiness for war” (K. & D., Com., 2 Sam. 24:1–9). (5) The census of David was completed by Solomon by causing the foreigners and remnants of the conquered nations resident within Palestine to be numbered. Their number amounted to 153,600 (1 Kings 5:15; 2 Chron. 2:17–18), and they were employed in forced labor on great architectural works (Josh. 9:27; 1 Kings 9:20–21; 1 Chron. 22:2). The numbers in the armies under the several kings between Solomon and the captivity assist us in estimating the population at the various times referred to. The census taken of those who returned with Zerubbabel was to settle the inheritances in Palestine and to ascertain the family genealogies. The number was 42,360 (Ezra 2:64).

New Testament. Luke, in his account of the “taxing,” says a decree went out from Augustus that “a census be taken of all the inhabited earth” and in the Acts alludes to a disturbance raised by Judas of Galilee in the days of the “census” (Luke 2:1–2; Acts 5:37). The Roman census under the Republic consisted, so far as the present purpose is concerned, in an enrollment of persons and property by tribes and households.

The Gk. expression apographē (Luke 2:2; Acts 5:37; “taxing,” KJV), referred to an enrollment (or registration) in the public records of persons, together with their property and income, as the basis of an apotimēsis, “census,” or valuation, i.e., that it might appear how much tax should be levied upon each one. Another form of the same Gk. verb (apographesthai) is used in Heb. 12:23, “To the general assembly and church of the first-born, who are enrolled.” The English word conveys to us more distinctly the notion of a tax or tribute actually levied, but it appears to have been used in the sixteenth century for the simple assessment of a subsidy upon the property of a given county, or the registration of the people for the purpose of a poll tax. The word apographē by itself leaves undetermined the question whether the returns made were of population or property. In either case “census” would have seemed the most natural Latin equivalent. Two distinct registrations, or taxings, are mentioned in the NT, both of them by Luke. The first is said to have been the result of an edict of the emperor Augustus, that “a census be taken of all the inhabited earth” (Luke 2:1), and is connected by the evangelist with the name of Cyrenius, or Quirinius (which see). The second, and more important (Acts 5:37), is distinctly associated, in point of time, with the revolt of Judas of Galilee. The account of Josephus brings together the two names that Luke keeps distinct, with an interval of several years between them.

CENT. A unit of money. See Metrology.

CENTURION. The captains of the sixty centuries (companies of one hundred men) in the Roman legion. The centurion carried a staff of vinewood as his badge of office. There were various degrees of rank among the centurions according as they belonged to the three divisions of the triarii, principes, and hastati, and led the first or second centuria of one of the thirty manipuli. The first centurion mentioned in Scripture is the one who in our Lord's early ministry sent a request that He would heal his dying servant (Matt. 8:5–10). The other is Cornelius, an early convert to Christianity (Acts 10:1). Others are mentioned (Luke 7:2, 6; also in Acts). See Army.

CE´PHAS (sē´fas; Aram. “rock, stone”). A surname that Christ bestowed upon Simon Peter (John 1:42; 1 Cor. 1:12, 3:22; 9:5; 15:5).

CERTIFICATE OF DEBT (Gk. cheirographon, “what one has written with his own hand”). Applied figuratively in Col. 2:14 to the Mosaic law, which shows men to be chargeable with offenses for which they must pay the penalty. KJV, “the handwriting of ordinances.” The NIV renders “the written code.”

CE´SAR. See Caesar. Cesare´a. See Caesarea.

CHAFF. Most generally “chaff” is the rendering of the Heb. môš, the refuse of winnowed grain, consisting of husks and broken straw. In the East it was the custom to burn chaff, in case, with the changing wind, it might be blown again among the grain (Job 21:18; Pss. 1:4; 35:5; Isa. 17:13; 29:5; 41:15; Hos. 13:3; Zeph. 2:2).

In Isaiah (33:11) the word rendered “chaff” is hāshash and means “dry grass, hay.” It only occurs in the above passage.

Hebrew teben, “chaff” in the KJV of Jer. 23:28 (but “straw” in the NASB and NIV), is elsewhere translated “straw” (Ex. 5:7–10; KJV, NASB, NIV). The “stubble” mentioned in Job 21:18 is cut straw. See also Vegetable Kingdom.

In Daniel (2:35) the Aram. word āṭr occurs.

Figurative. From its being the lighter and, comparatively speaking, worthless portion of the grain, chaff is used in Scripture as an emblem of that which is, in doctrine or morals, of a similar nature; of false teaching, evildoers, who must come to naught (Ps. 1:4; Isa. 33:11; Matt. 3:12).

CHAIN. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words. From ancient times chains have been used, as at present, both for ornament, bondage, and badges of office.

Badge of Office. Instances of such are the golden chain on Joseph's neck (Gen. 41:42; Heb. rābîd, NASB, “necklace,” lit., “collar”) and the one promised to Daniel (Dan. 5:7; Aram. hamnûkâ, “necklace”). In Egypt it was one of the insignia of a judge, who wore an image of truth attached to it; it was also worn by the prime minister. In Persia it was considered not only a mark of royal favor, but a token of investiture. In Ezek. 16:11 the chain or necklace is mentioned as the symbol of sovereignty.

Ornamental. Chains for ornamental purposes were worn by men, as well as women, in many countries, both of Europe and Asia, and probably this was the case among the Hebrews (Prov. 1:9; Heb. ānāq, “neck,” NASB, “ornaments about your neck”). In addition to necklaces of pearls, corals, etc., other chains were worn (Judith 10:4), hanging down as far as the waist or even lower. Mention is made of “ankle chains” (Isa. 3:20; Heb. šādôt, “step-chains,” rendered “ornaments of the legs”), which were attached to ankle-rings to shorten the step and give it elegance.

Chains. Chains were used to confine prisoners in a manner similar to our handcuffs (Judg. 16:21; 2 Sam. 3:34; Jer. 39:7; Heb. nḥōshet, “bronze chains,” sometimes rendered “fettters”). The Romans frequently fastened the prisoner with a light chain to the soldier guarding him, as was the case with Paul (Acts 28:20; Eph. 6:20; 2 Tim. 1:16); and when the utmost security was desired two chains were used (Acts 12:6). Isaiah speaks (Isa. 40:19) of silver chains in connection with idols, which may have been for ornament or to fasten them to their shrines.

Figurative. Chains are used as a symbol of oppression or punishment (Ps. 149:8; Lam. 3:7; Ezek. 7:23; etc.).

CHALDE'A (kal-dē'a; from Accad. kaldu). Originally a small territory in southern Babylonia at the head of the Persian Gulf, but later, after the neo-Babylonian Empire of Nebuchadnezzar II (605–562 B.C.), the term came to include practically all of Babylonia extending N of Hit southward to the gulf. M.F.U.

CHALDEAN (kal-dē'an). A native of Chaldea. See Babylonia. The Chaldeans were a warlike, aggressive people from the mountains of Kurdistan. Apparently they were Haldians (or Khaldians), the inhabitants of Urartu, that is, Ararat or Armenia. The ancient Chaldeans are mentioned in the Babylonian inscriptions. They began to appear in Assyrian notices in the reign of Ashurnasirpal II (883–859 B.C.), though their existence as a people goes back well beyond 1000 B.C. When Tiglath-pileser III (745–727 B.C.) became king of Assyria he conquered Babylon. Here the Chaldeans and roving Aramaean tribes were constantly disturbing the native king. In 731 B.C. Ukinzer, who came from one of the Chaldean cities, made himself king of Babylon. However, he was deposed by Tiglath-pileser III in 728 B.C., who ascended the throne of Babylon and ruled under the name of Pul. Pul was followed on the Assyrian throne by Shalmaneser IV (726–722 B.C.). He was in turn succeeded on the throne of Babylon by Merodach-Baladan, a Chaldean. Merodach-Baladan was conquered by Sargon but continued as king until 709 B.C., when the latter became king of Babylon as well as of Assyria. At the time of Hezekiah (702 B.C.), Merodach-Baladan, son of Baladan, ruled in Babylon. It was not until about 625 B.C. that Chaldean power began to assert itself over Assyria. Nabopolassar at that time rebelled against Assyria and established the new Babylonian Empire. He reconstructed the city of Babylon. In the fourteenth year of his reign (612 B.C.) with Cyaxares the Mede and the Scythian king he captured Nineveh and laid it waste (cf. Nah. 3:1–3). In 605 B.C. he was succeeded by his son Nebuchadnezzar II. Under Nebuchadnezzar, Judah and Jerusalem were carried captive to Babylon, and the Chaldean armies overran the Fertile Crescent, with Nebuchadnezzar making the Babylon of his day the most splendid city of antiquity (cf. Dan. 4:30). Nebuchadnezzar was succeeded by his son Evil-Merodach (562–560 B.C.), who was murdered by his brother-in-law Neriglissar (560–558 B.C.). The next king, Labashi-Marduk, reigned only three months and was succeeded by the usurper Nabonidus, whose son Belshazzar (Dan. 5) was coregent until the fall of the Chaldean Empire in 539 B.C. CHALDEAN ASTROLOGERS. Because of their proficiency in the science of astronomy and their skillful practice of astrology, the Chaldeans became a special caste of astrologers. In this sense the word is used in the book of Daniel (2:2, 10; 4:7; etc.; NASB, “conjurers”; NIV, “astrologers”). The explanation of this specialized name is easily understood. From 625 B.C. onward the Chaldeans held complete sway in Babylonia. The city of Babylon was their capital and was the center of intellectual life in all western Asia. This intellectual activity was used especially in the study of the stars, both scientific and as a means of divination. Astronomy and astrology were both sought after in the land. Hence Babylon became famous as the home of all sorts of magicians, sorcerers, diviners, and other occultists. As scientists the Chaldeans founded the exact science of astronomy. For more than 360 years they kept meticulous astronomical records. One of their astounding contributions was to reckon a year of 365 days, six hours, fifteen minutes and forty-one seconds, a calculation that measures within thirty minutes of what modern instruments have worked out. As the Chaldeans reigned in Babylon, it was perfectly natural that they should give their name to the astrologers as well as astronomers who had made the city famous. See also Magic. M.F.U.

CHAL'DEE (kal'dî). See Aramaic.

CHALDEES (kal'dîz). This is a variant form of the term Chaldeans used in the expression “Ur of the Chaldees” (Neh. 9:7). The qualifying phrase “of the Chaldees [Chaldeans]” is not an anachronism as many critics hold (cf. Finegan, Light from the Ancient Past [1946], p. 57). Instead, as in the case of numerous archaic place names, it is a later scribal gloss to explain to a subsequent age, when Abraham’s native city Ur and its location had utterly perished, that the city was located in southern Babylonia, then known as Chaldea. After 1000 B.C. the race of the Chaldeans became dominant, and it was, of course, quite natural for the Hebrew scribe to define the then-incomprehensible foreign name by an appellation customary in his own day. Genesis 14 (vv. 2–3, 7–8, 17) offers a good example of such scribal glosses to explain archaic place names. M.F.U.

CHALK STONES. See Mineral Kingdom.

CHAMBER (Heb. ḥūppâ, “canopy”). A bridal couch with curtains (Ps. 19:5; Joel 2:16). The same word is employed by the Jews today for the canopy under which the marriage ceremony is still performed. Also refers to an apartment of a house (which see).

Figurative. The term chamber is used metaphorically in Pss. 104:3, 13 for the heavens.

The expression “enter into my chambers,” etc. (Isa. 26:20, NASB, “rooms”), is figurative of earnest prayer.

The “chambers of the south” (Job 9:9) are the constellations, or, perhaps, in a more general sense, the regions of the southern sky.

“Chambers of imagery” (Heb. “image store-rooms,” Ezek. 8:12, NASB, “room of his carved images”; NIV, “shrine of his own idol”) is used by the prophet to denote the vision that he had of the idolatrous practices of the Jews in Jerusalem. “Image chambers” is the term applied to the rooms or closets in the houses of the people in which idolatrous images were set up and secretly worshiped.

CHAMBERING (Gk. koitē, “beds”). A KJV term occurring in Rom. 13:13, where it signifies lewd and licentious conduct, especially illicit intercourse. The NIV renders “sexual immorality.”

CHAMBERLAIN (Heb. sārîs, “castrated,” sometimes translated “eunuch,” which see). An officer confidentially employed about the person of the sovereign, such as Potiphar (Gen. 39:1). This officer was introduced into the court by Solomon (1 Kings 4:6; 16:9; 18:3; “over the household”). His duty seems at first to have been the superintendence of the palace and royal etiquette. Later this post became one of special and increasing influence, including the right of introduction to the king. He thus became the chief minister.

Erastus, the “chamberlain” of the city of Corinth, was one of those whose salutations to the Roman Christians are given (Rom. 16:23, NASB, “city treasurer”; NIV, “director of public works”; Gk. oikonomos). The office was apparently that of public treasurer or arcarius. The arcarii were inferior magistrates having charge of the public chest and were under the authority of the Senate.

Blastus, Herod’s chamberlain (Acts 12:20; Gk. koitōn), was the chief valet de chambre of the king and by reason of his office had great influence with Herod.

CHAMELEON. See Animal Kingdom.

CHAMOIS. See Animal Kingdom: Mountain Sheep.

CHAMPION (Heb. gibbôr, 1 Sam. 17:51; elsewhere “mighty man”). The Heb. phrase, rendered “champion” in 17:4, 23, literally is a “man between the two,” a go-between, a challenger. So Goliath went between the armies of the Hebrews and Philistines, as the champion of the latter.

CHANCE. The use of this word in Scripture has the sense of to meet unexpectedly (2 Sam. 1:6), an occurrence for which there seems to be no explanation (1 Sam. 6:9), a coincidence (Luke 10:31), opportunity (Eccles. 9:11).

CHANCELLOR. See Commander.

CHANNEL. The bed of the sea, or of a river (Ps. 18:15; Isa. 8:7; Heb. āpîq, “valley”). See Conduit.

CHAOS. A term not used in Scripture (though see Isa. 34:11, NIV), but in frequent use to designate the unformed mass of primeval matter mentioned in Gen. 1:2. It comes from the Gk. chaos (“immeasurable space”) and is used by Hesiod for the unfathomable gulf that was supposed to be the first of existing things. Some cosmogonies, such as the Phoenician, retain the biblical terms descriptive of chaos but changed into personal existences; e.g., the Heb. term bōhû, “emptiness,” is transformed into Baau, the producing principle. According to Greek mythology, from chaos arose the Earth, Tartarus, and Love, also Erebus and Night. Ovid describes chaos as a confused mass, containing the elements of all things that were formed out of it. The great majority of the cosmogonies, however, are atheistic, ascribing creation to inherent ability in matter or to a blind necessity; whereas the Scriptures make it the act of God.

In Babylonian thought, however, matter and spirit are identified with each other and confused. Apsu (male) and Tiamat (female) are not only conceived as gods (spirit) but as cosmic forces (matter). Apsu is the primeval fresh water ocean and Tiamat, the primordial salt water ocean. Their union produces the gods and the universe. Tiamat (chaos) in her war with Marduk is slain and her corpse made into kosmos. Tiamat and tjhôm, “the deep” of Gen. 1:2, are etymologically equivalent, but whereas the former is a mythical personality confused with matter, the latter is a common noun, without any mythological connotation whatever and simply describes the entire chaotic mass out of which the waters above the firmament were separated on the second day and out of which the dry land emerged on the third day. Tiamat and tffhôm, although cognate, are independent of each other, and both go back to a common proto-Semitic form. M.F.U.

CHAPTER. A KJV term referring to the upper, ornamental part of a column. In Ex. 36:38; 38:17, 19, 28 it is the translation of Heb. rōsh, “head.” The NASB and NIV render “top.” Chapter is also the KJV translation of two other Heb. words; for those, see Capital.

CHAR´AN. See Haran.

CHAR´ASHIM (kar´a-shim; “craftsmen”). A KJV term appearing in 1 Chron. 4:14. It is rendered “craftsmen” in the NASB. The NIV reads “Ge Harashim,” a place name identified in the margin as “valley of craftsmen.”

CHARIOT. The rendering of several Heb. words and one Gk. word, the indiscriminate use of which makes it difficult to know which kind of vehicle is meant. The same words are employed in speaking of chariots of war, state chariots, and even of wagons. The earliest mention of chariots in Scripture is where Joseph, as a mark of distinction, rode in Pharaoh’s second chariot (Gen. 41:43); and later when he went in his own chariot to meet his father (46:29). Chariots also accompanied the funeral procession of Jacob, as a guard of honor (50:9). We next find them used for a warlike purpose (Ex. 14:7), when Pharaoh pursued the Israelites with six hundred chariots. Chariots date back to early Sumerian times in Mesopotamia.

Egyptian. From the Egyptian monuments we are able to form a correct idea of that nation’s chariots. They were all similar in form, having but two wheels, furnished on the right side with cases for bows and spears and arrows. The framework, wheels, pole, and yoke were of wood, with the wheels sometimes tipped with iron and the axletrees ending with a scythelike projection. The binding of the framework, as well as the harness, were of rawhide or tanned leather; the floor was often made of rope network, to give a more springy footing to the occupants. The chariot was open behind, and here the charioteer entered. The sumptuous gold-stuccoed chariot of Tutankhamun was recovered from his lavish intact tomb.

From the Egyptian sculptures it would seem that an Egyptian army was composed exclusively of infantry and chariots. Chariots were manned sometimes with three men, the warrior, the shield-bearer, and the charioteer; sometimes with only one person. The assumption is that the horsemen and riders (Ex. 14:9; 15:1) were riders in the chariots; and the “officers” (14:7) were chariot-warriors, literally, “third” men, probably selected for their valor.

Assyrian. From the sculptures we learn that the Assyrian chariot resembled the Egyptian in all material points. An early chariot from Sumerian Ur is pictured with solid wooden wheels clamped around a copper core.

Canaanite. The Canaanites had iron chariots (Josh. 17:18), “not scythe chariots, for these were introduced by Cyrus, but simply chariots tipped with iron” (K. & D., Com., ad loc.). Of these it is recorded that Jabin, king of Canaan, had 900 (Judg. 4:3). The number of chariots that the Philistines had in the time of Saul, namely, 30,000 (1 Sam. 13:5), appears excessive, the probability is that there was a mistake by the copyist, so that it would be more correct to read 3,000. David took from Hadadezer, king of Zobah, 1,000 chariots (2 Sam. 8:4, KJV; NASB, “1,700 horsemen”) and later 700 from the Syrians (10:18), who, in order to recover their ground, collected from various countries 32,000 (1 Chron. 19:6–7).

Hebrew. Hitherto the Israelites had few chariots, partly on account of the mountainous nature of the country, partly owing to the prohibition against their multiplying horses. Solomon raised and maintained a force of 1,400 chariots (1 Kings 10:26) by taxation on certain cities. The chariots and the horses were imported chiefly from Egypt (10:29). “Chariot cities” (2 Chron. 1:14) were the depots and stables erected by Solomon on the frontiers of his kingdom, such as Beth-marcaboth, “the house of chariots” (Josh. 19:5).

New Testament. In the NT the only mention made of a chariot, except in Rev. 9:9, is in the case of the Ethiopian eunuch of Queen Candace (Acts 8:28–39).

Figurative. Chariots are frequently alluded to as symbols of power (Pss. 20:7; 104:3; Jer. 51:21; Zech. 6:1–2), hosts, or armies (2 Kings 6:17; Ps. 68:17). Elijah, by his courage, faith, and power with God, saw “the chariots of Israel and its horsemen” (2 Kings 2:12). “Chariot” is likewise used poetically in Scripture to designate the rapid agencies of God in nature (Pss. 68:17; 104:3; Isa. 66:15; Hab. 3:8). “Gold for the model of the chariot, even the cherubim” (1 Chron. 28:18) probably means the cherubim as the chariot upon which God enters or is throned (see Cherubim, no. 3). “A chariot of fire and horses of fire” (2 Kings 2:11) signifies some bright effulgence which, in the eyes of the spectators, resembled those objects. “Chariots of the sun” are mentioned (2 Kings 23:11) as being burned by Josiah. Horses and chariots were dedicated to the sun by its worshipers, under the supposition that that divinity was drawn in a chariot by horses. The rabbis inform us that the king and nobles rode in these chariots when they went forth to greet the morning sun.

CHE´BAR (kí´bar), Kebar (NIV). A river or canal in the “land of the Chaldeans” (Ezek. 1:3), on the banks of which some of the Jews were located at the time of the captivity, and where Ezekiel saw his earlier visions (1:1; 3:15, 23; etc.).

CHEDORLAO´MER (kedorlaōmer), Kedorlao´mer (NIV). A king mentioned in Gen. 14 as invading the Jordan Valley at the time of Abraham. He is called “king of Elam,” a country E of Babylonia at the head of the Persian Gulf (14:1, 4–5). He was allied with three other Mesopotamian kings who fought against the five kings in the region of the Salt Sea. When the rulers of Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboiim, and Zoar threw off his hegemony, he attempted to crush all resistance. Abraham clashed with him and rescued Lot. Although all attempts to identify him have thus far failed, the episode is to be dated around the middle of the twenty-first century B.C. according to chronological notations in the MT of the Heb. Bible. Former identification with Hammurabi (c. 1790 B.C.) is now completely untenable. M.F.U.

CHEEK (Heb. לִחִי). Smiting on the cheek was considered a great insult (Job 16:10; Lam. 3:30; Mic. 5:1; Luke 6:29). “Thou hast smitten all my enemies on the cheek” (Ps. 3:7) is figurative of utter destruction of those enemies. The cheekbone (KJV) denotes the bone in which the teeth are placed; to break that is to disarm the animal.

CHEESE. The coagulated curd of milk pressed into a solid mass (Job 10:10; 1 Sam. 17:18; 2 Sam. 17:29). The Tyropoean Valley in Jerusalem is the Gk. equivalent for “The Valley of the Cheese Makers.” The making of cheese was an important industry in antiquity, and this dairy product was a vital part of the diet of the Jews.

Among the regulations regarding food in the Mishna was that no cheese made by foreigners should be eaten, for fear that it might be derived from the milk of an animal that had been offered to idols.

CHE´LAL (ke´lal; “completion”), Ke´lal (NIV). One of the “sons” of Pahath-moab, who divorced his Gentile wife after the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:30), 456 B.C.

CHEL´LUH. See Chelluhi, Keluhi (NIV).

CHEL´LUHI (ke´lū-hi). One of the “sons” of Bani, who divorced his Gentile wife after the return from captivity (Ezra 10:35), 456 B.C.

CHE´LUB (ke´lūb), Ke´lub (NIV).

1. The brother of Shuhah and father of Mehir, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:11).

2. The father of Ezri, who was David’s chief gardener (1 Chron. 27:16), after 1000 B.C.

CHELU´BAI (ke-lū´bi). One of the sons of Hezron (1 Chron. 2:9); elsewhere in the same chapter (vv. 18, 42) called Caleb. See Caleb, no. 2.

CHEM´ARIM (ke´mā-rim; “servants”?). A KJV term appearing in Zeph. 1:4 to refer to “idolatrous priests” (so NASB and NIV). The Heb. word is found elsewhere (2 Kings 23:5; Hos. 10:5), with the NASB rendering “idolatrous priests,” and the NIV “pagan priests.” The term refers to the priests appointed by the kings of Judah for the worship of the high places and the idolatrous worship of Jehovah.

CHE´MOSH (ke´mosh). The leading deity of the Moabites. See Gods, False.

CHENA´ANAH (ke-na´a-na), Kena´anah (NIV).

1. The fourth named of the seven “sons” of Bilhan, a Benjamite and mighty warrior, apparently, in the time of David (1 Chron. 7:10), about 1000 B.C.

2. The father of the false prophet Zedekiah, which latter opposed Micaiah and encouraged Ahab (1 Kings 22:11, 24; 2 Chron. 18:10, 23), before 850 B.C.

CHEN´ANI (ken´a-ni; “established”), Ken´ani (NIV). One of the Levites who conducted the devotions of the people after Ezra had read to them the book of the law (Neh. 9:4), 445 B.C.

CHENANI´AH (ken-a-nī´a; “established by Jehovah”), Kenani´ah (NIV). Chief of the Levites who, as master of song (1 Chron. 15:22), conducted the grand musical services when the Ark was removed from the house of Obed-edom to Jerusalem (15:27). He was of the family of Izharites and was appointed over the inspectors of the building of the Temple (26:29), about 1000 B.C.

CHE'PHAR-AM'MONI (ke'far-am'ō-ni; "village of the Ammonites"), Ke'phar Am'moni (NIV). A place mentioned among the towns of Benjamin (Josh. 18:24). Site uncertain.

CHEPHI'RAH (ke-fi'ra; "village, hamlet"), Kephi'rah (NIV). One of the Gibeonite towns of Benjamin (Josh. 18:26); now Kefireh, about eight miles from Jerusalem. Joshua made peace with its people (9:17). It was occupied after the captivity by a remnant of Benjamin (Ezra 2:25; Neh. 7:29).

CHE'RAN (ke'ran), Ke'ran (NIV). The last named of the four sons of Dishon, the Horite chief descended from Seir (Gen. 36:26; 1 Chron. 1:41).

CHER'ETHITES (ker'e-thīts), Ker'ethites (NIV).

1. Those tribes of the Philistines who dwelt in the SW of Canaan (1 Sam. 30:14); treated by Ezekiel (25:16) and Zephaniah (2:5) as synonymous with Philistines. The LXX and Syr. rendered the words in these passages by "Cretans," from which it is now known that the Philistines (which see) sprang from Crete (cuneiform, "Kaptara").

2. "The Cherethites and the Pelethites," a collective term for David's personal bodyguard (2 Sam. 8:18; 15:18; 20:7, 23; 1 Kings 1:38, 44; 1 Chron. 18:17). The words are adjectives in form, but with a substantive meaning, and were used to indicate a certain rank, literally, the executioners and runners. At a later date they were called "the captains" and "the guards" (2 Kings 11:4, 19; cf. 1 Kings 14:27). The NIV renders "Carites" in 2 Kings 11:4, 19.

CHE'RITH (ke'rith), Ke'rith (NIV). A brook in Transjordan where Elijah fled to hide (1 Kings 17:3, 5). The traditional site is now the Wādi Qelt, a wild glen that runs into the Jordan Valley; but the Bible indicates that it was E of that river, and therefore in Elijah's own native country of Gilead. Wādi Yabis, opposite Beth-shean, may be the place.

CHER'ETHIM. See Cherethites.

CHE'RUB (ke'rub). An Israelite of doubtful extraction, who accompanied Zerubbabel to Judea (Ezra 2:59; Neh. 7:61).

CHER'UB (cher'ub), Cherubim (Heb. kā'rūbīm; Gk. cheroubim).

Mention in Scripture. Cherubim are mentioned at the expulsion of our first parents from Eden (Gen. 3:24), when their office was "to guard the way to the tree of life," i.e., to render it impossible for man to return to paradise and eat of the tree of life. In this account there is no mention of their nature or form.

We next read of them in connection with the furnishing of the Tabernacle (Ex. 25:18–20), where directions are given to place two golden cherubim upon the top of the Ark of the Covenant. They were to be of "hammered work," i.e., beaten with the hammer and rounded, and not solid. They were fastened to the Mercy Seat (lid of the Ark) and, facing each other, stretched out their wings so as to form a screen over the Mercy Seat. They were called the "cherubim of glory" (Heb. 9:5). Cherubim were also woven into or embroidered upon the inward curtain of the Tabernacle (Ex. 26:1; 36:8) and the veil (26:31).

The two cherubim placed by Solomon in the Holy of Holies (1 Kings 6:23–28; 8:7; 2 Chron. 3:7–14) were made of olive wood, overlaid with gold. They had bodies ten cubits high, and stood upon their feet, like men. The length of their wings was five cubits. They stood “facing the main room,” i.e., the Holy Place, the outward wing of each cherub touching the wall and the tip of the other wings touching each other.

Other references are as follows: “He rode on a cherub and flew” (2 Sam. 22:11; Ps. 18:10); the vision of four cherubim (NASB, “living beings”; NIV, “living creatures”) seen by Ezekiel (1:5–14; 10:1–22), and that of the “four living creatures” in Rev. 4:6–9.

Form. From an excavated pair of cherubs supporting the throne of King Hiram of Byblos (c. 1200 B.C.) a creature with a lion’s body, human face, and conspicuous wings is indicated. The Assyrians and other Semitic peoples used symbolic winged creatures, notably winged lions and bulls, to guard temples and palaces. Egyptians also had winged creatures in some of their temples. Griffins—winged sphinxes having lions’ bodies and eagles’ heads were familiar to the Hittites. The cherubim of Solomon are said to have “stood on their feet” (2 Chron. 3:13). Ezekiel says they “appeared to have the form of a man’s hand under their wings” (10:8). The representations of the Bible stress the human likeness but also indicate the animal characteristics. Undoubtedly we are to think of the cherub as at Byblos; that is, as a winged lion with human face. In any case, they are celestial creatures belonging to the spiritual realm and not at all to be confounded with any natural identification.

The Cherubim and the Throne. As a winged lion with human head, i.e., a winged sphinx, this hybrid animal appears hundreds of times in the iconography of western Asia between 1800 and 600 B.C. The fact that many representations picture the deity or king seated on a throne supported by two cherubs suggests that in the OT the Deity and His throne—both invisible—were similarly supported by symbolical cherubim (cf. W. F. Albright O.T. Commentary [1948], p. 148; Graham and May, Culture and Conscience [1936], pp. 195–96, 249–50). Archaeology thus greatly illuminates the meaning of the cherubim both in Solomon’s Temple and the earlier Tabernacle and enables 1 Sam. 4:4 (cf. Rev. 4:6) to be rendered thus: “the ark of the covenant of the Lord of hosts who sits above the cherubim.”

The Meaning. The cherubim from their position at the gate of Eden, upon the cover of the Ark of the Covenant, and in Rev. 4 are evidently connected with vindicating the holiness of God against the presumptuous pride of fallen man, who despite his sin, would “stretch out his hand, and take also from the tree of life” (Gen. 3:22). Upon the Ark of the Covenant they looked down upon the sprinkled blood that symbolizes the perfect maintenance of God’s righteousness by the sacrifice of Christ (Ex. 25:17–20; Rom. 3:24–26). The cherubim seem to be actual beings of the angelic order. They do not seem to be identical with the seraphim (Isa. 6:2). The cherubim apparently have to do with the holiness of God as violated by sin; the seraphim with uncleanness in the people of God. M.F.U.

CHES’ALON (kes’a-lon), Kes’alon (NIV). One of the landmarks on the W part of the N boundary of Judah (Josh. 15:10). Eusebius and Jerome differ as to its location but agree that it was a large village near Jerusalem. Kesla, ten miles W of Jerusalem, is its present site.

CHE’SSED (ke’sed), Ke’sed (NIV). The fourth named of the sons of Nahor (Abraham’s brother) by Milcah (Gen. 22:22).

CHE'SIL (ke'sil; "a fool"), Ke'sil (NIV). A town in the S of Judah (Josh. 15:30), identical with Bethul and Bethuel (19:4; 1 Chron. 4:30; "Bethel," 1 Sam. 30:27).

CHEST. The rendering of two distinct Heb. terms:

1. אַרֹּן , invariably used for the Ark of the Covenant, with but two exceptions. These exceptions are (1) the "coffin" in which the bones of Joseph were carried to Palestine (Gen. 50:26) and (2) the "chest" in which Jehoiada the priest collected the offerings for Temple repairs (2 Kings 12:9–10; 2 Chron. 24:8–11).

2. $G\text{נָזִימ}$, used only in the plural, rendered in KJV "chests" (Ezek. 27:24) and "treasuries" (Esther 3:9; 4:7).

CHESTNUT TREE. See Vegetable Kingdom.

CHESUL'LOTH (ke-sul'oth), Kesul'loth (NIV). A town of Issachar (Josh. 19:18), probably identical with Chisloth-tabor (v. 12). Modern Iksal, near Nazareth, marks the ancient site.

CHE'ZIB (ke'zib; "deceitful"), Ke'zib (NIV). A town in which Judah was when Shelah, his third son, was born (Gen. 38:5); probably the same as Achzib.

CHICKEN (Gk. nossion, 2 Esd. 1:30; cf. Matt. 23:37). See Animal Kingdom: Cock.

CHICKS. See Animal Kingdom: Cock.

CHI'DON (ki'don; a "spear"), Ki'don (NIV). Thought by some to be an Israelite on whose threshing floor the accident to the Ark, and the death of Uzza, took place as the Ark was being carried to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 13:9). It is more probable that it was the name of the place.

CHIEF. The rendering of a large number of Heb. and Gk. words, frequently in official terms, as "chief cupbearer," "chief officers" (see Army), "chief of the Levites" (see Levites), "chief gatekeeper" (which see), "chief priests" (see Priest), "chief ministers" (see Synagogue).

The translation of two Heb. terms: (a) Chief (Heb. אַלְלֹוּפ , "leader of a thousand"), the distinguishing title of the head of Edomite or Horite divisions (Gen. 36:15–43; Ex. 15:15; 1 Chron. 1:51,54). אַלְלֹוּפ is used rarely of Jews (Zech. 9:7; 12:5–6; "clan[s]," NASB; "governor[s]," KJV; "leaders," NIV), and once of chiefs in general (Jer. 13:21, "captains," KJV; "companions" or "chieftains," marg., NASB; "allies," NIV).

(b) Prince, Heb. נָאֲסִי , "anointed" one), "princes of Sihon" (Josh. 13:21; "dukes of Sihon," KJV), "properly vassals of Sidon, princes created by the communication or pouring in of power" (K. & D., Com., ad loc.). The Heb. term is rendered "princes" in Ps. 83:11; "chiefs" in Ezek. 32:30 ("princes," KJV, NIV, NASB marg.); and "leaders of men" (NIV; "principal men," KJV) in Mic. 5:5.

CHIEF OF THREE. The official title of Adino (which see), the Ezrite (2 Sam. 23:8, NASB, "chief of the captains"; marg., "chief of the three").

CHIEFS OF ASIA. See Asiarch.

CHILD, CHILDREN (Heb. properly yeled; Gk. teknon, something "born"). This term is often used freely in Scripture; thus the descendants of a man, however remote, are called his sons or children. For other uses, see below.

Desire for. It is of children that the house, the family, is built (Gen. 16:2; 30:3, marg., "from her I too may be built"). The conception and bearing of children was a matter of longing and joy among the Israelites, especially to the women (24:60; 30:1; 1 Sam. 1:11). On the ground of the twofold blessing connected with creation and the covenant promise (Gen. 1:28; 12:2, 7; 13:16) a numerous group of children was considered as a special gift of God's grace (Deut. 28:4; Pss. 113:9; 128:3; 144:12; Prov. 17:6; Eccles. 6:3), and sterility in marriage was thought to be a divine punishment (Gen. 16:2; 30:23; 1 Sam. 1:6–20; Isa. 47:9).

Infants. At childbirth women were helped by nurses and midwives, even in the time of the patriarchs (Gen. 35:17; 38:28; Ex. 1:15), although women in the East often give birth so easily as not to need this help. The newborn child, after having the navel cord cut, was bathed in water, rubbed with salt, and wrapped in swaddling clothes (Ezek. 16:4). As a rule, it was nursed and tended by the mother herself (Gen. 21:7; 1 Sam. 1:23; 1 Kings 3:21; song of Sol. 8:1), excepting in case of weakness or death or in princely families (2 Kings 11:2; cf. Ex. 2:9). After eight days boys were circumcised (see Circumcision), and got their names from some memorable circumstance connected with their birth (Gen. 25:25; 35:18; 38:29) or according to the mother's hopes or wishes (4:25; 29:32; 1 Sam. 1:20), but in later times from some relative (Luke 1:61). Forty days after its birth, in the case of a boy, and eighty in the case of a girl, the mother had to offer a sacrifice of purification in the Temple (Lev. 12:1–8), to present the male firstborn to Jehovah and to redeem it with five shekels of silver (Num. 18:15; cf. with Lev. 27:5). The weaning of the child did not occur, in some cases, till it was two or three years of age (2 Macc. 7:27). The event was celebrated with festivities (Gen. 21:8) and on special occasions was accompanied by the offering of a sacrifice (1 Sam. 1:23–25).

Training. Both boys and girls in their earlier years were under the training of their mother (Prov. 31:1; 2 Tim. 1:5; 3:15), the daughters, no doubt, remaining so until their marriage. At the age of five years, probably, the boys were trained by their fathers, or in well-to-do families were placed under the care of special tutors (Num. 11:12, marg.; Isa. 49:23; 2 Kings 10:1, 5; Gal. 3:24). This instruction was not only in reading and writing, but also in the law, its commandments and doctrines, and the deeds and revelations of Jehovah to His people (Ex. 12:26; 13:8, 14; Deut. 4:10; 6:7, 20–23; 11:19; Prov. 6:20). Schools were not set up till a comparatively late time, and only in the larger cities.

Children and the Law. In the Ten Commandments reverence for parents is made a condition of children's prosperity (Ex. 20:12; Lev. 19:3; Deut. 5:16). If a child cursed his parents he was under the divine curse (Deut. 27:16) and was to be put to death equally with him who did violence to them (Ex. 21:15, 17; Lev. 20:9; cf. Prov. 20:20; Matt. 15:4). Drunkenness, gluttony, and the like, persevered in against a father's warning, were punished by the elders of the city with stoning (Deut. 21:18–21).

Thus while the law gave parents full authority over their children, it provided also against the abuse of full parental power. The father was not to deprive his firstborn of his rights of inheritance in favor, for example, of a younger son by a second and more loved wife (21:15–17). He could nullify a vow made by his daughter, but he must do so immediately upon hearing it; otherwise he could not prevent its fulfillment (Num. 30:4–5). He had power to marry his daughters, and even to sell them into concubinage, but not to a foreign people (Ex. 21:7–8).

Children seem to have often been taken as bondsmen by creditors for debts contracted by the fathers (2 Kings 4:1; Neh. 5:5; Isa. 50:1). Children who were slaves by birth are called in Scripture those "born in [the] house" (Gen. 14:14; 15:3; 17:23).

Illegitimate. Such children had no legal inheritance (Gen. 21:10; Gal. 4:30); they did not receive the training of legitimate sons (Heb. 12:8, “discipline”; Gk. paideia, “education”), were excluded from the congregation (Deut. 23:2), and were despised by their brethren (Judg. 11:2).

Figurative. In the Scriptures, children, like sons or daughters, are used figuratively (1) to express a state of ignorance and of intellectual darkness (Matt. 11:16; 1 Cor. 13:11; 14:20; Eph. 4:14; Heb. 5:13); (2) of persons who are distinguished, whether for good or evil, by some particular quality or power. Thus the expression “sons of light” (Luke 16:8) is applied to those who have a knowledge of God through Christ; the “obedient children” (1 Pet. 1:14) are those submitting themselves readily to the will of God. On the other hand, we have such expressions as “son of hell” (Matt. 23:15), “sons of the evil one” (Matt. 13:38), “sons of this age” (Luke 16:8).

CHILDBEARING (Gk. teknogonia). As a part of the curse coming to our first parent, on account of sin, it was said to her, “In pain you shall bring forth children” (Gen. 3:16). Commenting on this, Delitzsch says: “That the woman should bear the children was the original will of God; but it was a punishment that henceforth she was to bear them in sorrow, i.e., with pains which threatened her own life as well as that of the child.” The punishment consisted in an enfeebling of nature, in consequence of sin. The language of the apostle, “But women shall be preserved through the bearing of children if they continue in faith and love,” etc. (1 Tim. 2:15), implies that a patient endurance of this penalty shall contribute to woman’s spiritual benefit.

CHILDBIRTH. See Child: Infants.

CHILDREN OF GOD. Persons in this category are only those who of the fallen race are regenerated as a result of faith in Christ. The believer’s relationship to God as a child, accordingly, issues from the new birth (John 1:12–13). But all regenerated people are not only children, (that is, born again) but adult sons as well, children of God receiving a place as sons (Gal. 4:5) by adoption (which see). The indwelling Spirit gives to the child of God the realization of his sonship or spiritual adulthood (4:1–6). The popular doctrine of the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man is not taught in Scripture. Since man is fallen, a person becomes a child only by faith in Christ, and only members of the Father’s family are brothers in any vital spiritual sense. Liberal theological thinking that seeks to break down this important biblical distinction between the children of God and the children of the devil is contrary to divinely revealed truth. It not only robs Christianity of its distinctive message but provokes great harm, confusion, and empty utopian dreaming. M.F.U.

CHILDREN OF ISRAEL. See Israel.

CHIL'EAB (kil'e-ab; “restraint” [?]), Kil'eab (NIV). The second son of David, by Abigail, the widow of Nabal (2 Sam. 3:3), about 1000 B.C. He is called Daniel in the parallel passage (1 Chron. 3:1).

CHIL'ION (kil'i-un; “pining”), Kil'ion (NIV). The younger son of Elimelech and Naomi, and husband of Orpah, Ruth’s sister-in-law; he died childless in the land of Moab (Ruth 1:2, 5; 4:9), about 1100 B.C.

CHIL'MAD (kil'mad), Kil'mad (NIV). A place or country mentioned in conjunction with Sheba and Asshur (Ezek. 27:23). The only name bearing any similarity to it is Charmande, a town near the Euphrates between the Mascus and the Babylonian frontier; but it is highly improbable that this place was of sufficient importance to rank with Sheba and Asshur.

CHIM'HAM (kim'hām; “pining, longing”), Kim'ham (NIV). A follower and, according to Josephus (Ant. 7.11.4), a son of Barzillai, the Gileadite. Upon David's restoration after Absalom's rebellion, Chimham returned from beyond the Jordan with him and received marked favors at his hand, which were first offered to Barzillai, but declined on account of old age (2 Sam. 19:37–40), 973 B.C. David probably bestowed upon him a possession at or near Bethlehem, on which, in later times, was an inn called after him (Jer. 41:17).

CHIMNEY (Heb. ḥrūbbâ, “lattice”). The expression “like smoke from a chimney” (Hos. 13:3) should be rendered “smoke out of the window” (thus NIV), i.e., “window lattice,” as the houses were without chimneys. The same word is elsewhere translated “window.” See House.

CHIN'NERETH (kin'e-reth; “harp-shaped”), or Chin'neroth (kin'e-rōth), Kin'nereth (NIV).

1. A fortified city in the tribe of Naphtali (Josh. 19:35 only), of which no trace is found in later writers, and no remains by travelers. By Jerome, Chinnereth was identified with the later Tiberias. On the temple walls of Karnak, at Thebes, Thutmose III (1475 B.C.) gives a list of Canaanitish towns submitting to him, among which Chinnereth is found.

2. Sea of Chinnereth (Num. 34:11; Josh. 13:27), the inland sea, which is most familiarly known to us as the lake of Gennesaret or the Sea of Galilee. This is evident from the mode in which it is mentioned as being at the end of the Jordan opposite to the “sea of the Arabah,” i.e., the Dead Sea; as having the Arabah or Ghor below it, etc. (Deut. 3:17; Josh. 11:2; 12:3). In the two latter of these passages it is in a plural form, Chinneroth. It seems likely that Chinnereth was an ancient Canaanite name existing long prior to the Israelite conquest.

CHI'OS (ki'os), Ki'os (NIV). An island in the Grecian Archipelago, about five miles from the mainland; now Scio. It was once noted for wine. Paul anchored there on his last missionary journey (Acts 20:15).

CHIS'LEV (kis'lev) in the NASB, Chis'leu (kīšlū; Heb. kislēw from Akkad.

kislīmu) in the KJV, Kis'lev in the NIV. The name of the third civil or ninth ecclesiastical month adopted from the Babylonians after the captivity (Neh. 1:1; Zech. 7:1). See Calendar; Time.

CHIS'LON (kis'lon; “hopeful”), Kis'lon (NIV). The father of Elidad, who, as one of the leaders of Benjamin, was selected on the part of that tribe to divide Canaan (Num. 34:21).

CHIS'LOTH-TA'BOR (kis'lōth-ta'bor; “flanks of Tabor”), Kis'loth Ta'bor (NIV). A place near Tabor (Josh. 19:12), and probably the same as Chesulloth (v. 18).

CHIT'LISH (chit'lish), Kit'lish (NIV). A town in the valley of Judah (Josh. 15:40; “Kithlish,” KJV). It is identified by some with Jelemah; by others it is thought to be found in Tell Chilchis; to the SSE of Beit-jibrin.

CHITTIM, KITTIM. See Kittim.

CHI'UN. See Kiyyun in the general listing; and also Gods, False: Kiyyun.

CHLO'E (klō'e; "verdure"). A female Christian mentioned in 1 Cor. 1:11, some of whose household had informed the apostle Paul of divisions in the Corinthian church. Whether she was a resident of Corinth or not we do not know.

CHOENIX. A foreign measure of capacity. See Metrology.

CHOR'ASHAN. See Bor-ashan.

CHORA'ZIN (ko-ra'zin), Kora'zin (NIV). This city, in the general vicinity of Bethsaida and Capernaum near the Sea of Galilee, was upbraided by Jesus and committed to destruction for its unbelief in the face of His mighty works (Matt. 11:21; Luke 10:13). It is now identified with Kerazeh, about three miles N of Tell Hum (Capernaum).

H. Kohl and C. Watzinger excavated the synagogue at Kerazeh on behalf of the German Oriental Society from 1905 to 1907. J. Ory for the Palestine Department of Antiquities (1926) and Z. Yeivin for the Israel Department of Antiquities (1962–63) continued work on the synagogue, the latter also excavating nearby houses. Since 1983 restoration work on the synagogue has been conducted. The synagogue, of black basalt, measures seventy by fifty feet and dates to the third or fourth centuries A.D. Its design is similar to that of Capernaum, with three monumental entrances facing toward Jerusalem, a roof supported by pillars, stone benches around the wall for the men, and an outside stairway leading to the women's gallery. M.F.U.; H.F.V.

CHOSEN (Heb. from bāḥar; Gk. eklektos). This term means singled out from others for some special service or station. "Chosen" warriors were picked out as being most skillful or best adapted to some service (Ex. 15:4; Judg. 20:16; NASB, "choice"; NIV, "best"). The Israelites were a "chosen" people, God having set them apart to receive His word and maintain His worship (Ps. 105:43; Deut. 7:6–7). Jerusalem was "chosen" as the seat of the Temple (1 Kings 11–13). Christ was chosen (Isa. 42:1) of God to be the Savior of men. The apostles were "chosen beforehand by God" to be witnesses of the resurrection (Acts 10:41). The declaration, "Many are called, but few are chosen," means that the invitation is extended to many but that only few profit thereby so as to be finally accepted (Matt. 22:14). See Election.

CHOZE'BA. See Cozeba.

CHRIST (Gk. Christos; "anointed"). The official title of our Savior (occurring first in 2 Esd. 7:28–29, and constantly in the NT), as having been consecrated by His baptism and the descent of the Holy Spirit as our Prophet, Priest, and King. See Jesus.

CHRISTIAN. A Christian is a believer in and a follower of Jesus Christ the Messiah. This name is more widely employed than any other designation of those who believe unto salvation. However, it occurs in the Scriptures only three times: "And the disciples were first called Christians in Antioch" (Acts 11:26); "and Agrippa replied to Paul, ‘In a short time you will persuade me to become a Christian’” (26:28); “If anyone suffers as a Christian, let him not feel ashamed” (1 Pet. 4:16). The term Christian is clearly a Gentile designation for believers because the word Christ, upon which the term was constructed, suggests recognition of the Messiah, which no unbelieving Jew was prepared to do. Becoming a Christian, according to the NT, is a definite act with significant results. According to Lewis Sperry Chafer, no fewer than thirty-three simultaneous and instantaneous divine undertakings and transformations, which collectively constitute the salvation of a soul, take place the moment one exercises faith in Christ and is saved. Among these is that a believer in Christ has the guilt of his sins removed. Second, he is taken out of Adam, the sphere of condemnation, and placed in Christ, the sphere of righteousness and justification. Third, he is given a new standing by virtue of his being placed “in Christ” by the Spirit’s baptizing work (1 Cor. 12:13; Rom. 6:3–4). A Christian then, as Chafer says, “Is not one who does certain things for God but ... one for whom God has done certain things; he is not so much one who conforms to a certain manner of life as he is one who has received the gift of eternal life; he is not one who depends upon a hopelessly imperfect state but rather one who has reached a perfect standing before God as being in Christ” (Systematic Theology, 7:75). CHRISTIANITY. The body of doctrine that consists of the teachings and way of life made possible by the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ and the giving of the Holy Spirit. These teachings were committed by Christ to His disciples and particularly by special divine revelation to the apostle Paul, so that what was provided by Christ is given full-fledged doctrinal expression by the apostle. Other NT writers give various aspects of Christian doctrine, but the most developed revelation concerning the Person and work of Christ and of the Holy Spirit for the normal, established course of the age was given to Paul. His doctrinal epistles demonstrate that Christianity, although having its roots in Judaism, is not Judaism or a mixture of Judaism. It is a way of life, of salvation, the full expression of the gospel of the grace of God for this age in which God is visiting the Gentiles and “taking from among [them] a people for His name” (Acts 15:14). After this period Christ will return and “rebuild the Tabernacle of David which has fallen” (15:16), i.e., restore Israel for blessing in the coming millennial age.

To many, Christianity is a general term descriptive of all that is not Jewish. To others it is synonymous with Christendom. In such cases, little attention is given to the distinctive features of Christian truth. M.F.U.

CHRISTMAS (“Christ’s Mass,” or “Festival”). The annual festival held by the Christian church in memory of the birth of Christ. It begins with the evening of December 24 (called Christmas Eve) and continues until Epiphany (January 6), the whole period being called Christmastide. It is more particularly observed on December 25, called Christmas Day, or simply Christmas.

As to whether our Lord’s birth really occurred on December 25 ancient authorities are not agreed. Clement of Alexandria says that some place it on April 20, others on May 20, whereas Epiphanius states that in Egypt Jesus was believed to have been born on January 6. For a long time the Greeks had no special feast corresponding to Christmas Day. Chrysostom, in a Christmas sermon, A.D. 386, said: “It is not ten years since this day was clearly known to us, but it has been known from the beginning to those who dwell in the West.” The Western church unanimously agreed upon this date, and the Eastern church adopted it without much contradiction.

As mentioned above, the period from Nativity to Epiphany was consecrated. The four Sundays preceding Christmas were incorporated with the cycle, under the title of the Advent, as a preparation for the festival. On Christmas Day, in the Roman Catholic church, three masses were celebrated, namely, at midnight, dawn, and in the daytime, a custom still observed in collegiate and cathedral churches. “A mystical explanation of the three masses is given, and they are supposed to figure the three births of our Lord: of His Father before all ages, of the Blessed Virgin, and in the hearts of the faithful” (Cath. Dict., s.v.).

Several non-Christian elements have crept into the observance of Christmas. The use of lighted tapers reminds us of the Jewish feast of purification. The giving of presents was a Roman custom, whereas the yule tree and the yule log are remnants of old Teutonic nature worship. Gradually the festival sank into mere revelry. In England an abbot of misrule was chosen in every large household; in Scotland an abbot of unreason, who was master of the house during the festival. The custom was forbidden by Parliament in 1555; and the Reformation brought in a refinement in the celebration of Christmas by emphasizing its Christian elements.

CHRISTS, FALSE (Gk. pseudochristoi). Those who falsely claim to be the Messiah, and against whom our Lord warned His disciples (Matt. 24:24; Mark 13:22). About twenty-four such persons have had more or less prominence.

CHRONICLES, BOOKS OF. In the Heb. these two historical books were originally one work. The twofold LXX division did not become effective in modern Heb. Bibles until the sixteenth century. The term Chronicle, from the Heb. divre hayyamim (“events or annals of the days,” i.e., “times,” cf. 1 Chron. 27:24), was suggested by Jerome who said “the name might be better called a Chronicle of the entire divine history.” The LXX styled the two books inaccurately Paralipomena, i.e., “things passed over or omitted” (from the books of Samuel and Kings), construing Chronicles as a mere supplement to these works. In the Heb. canon the books of Chronicles come at the end of the third and last section.

Purpose. First and Second Chronicles catalog the history of priestly worship from the death of Saul to the conclusion of the Babylonian captivity, when the book of Ezra takes up the account. Samuel and Kings present a prophetic standpoint over against the priestly approach of Chronicles. These books interpret the history of the Jerusalem priesthood in its growth and development from the time of David. Chronicles is not a mere supplement to the parallel books of Samuel and Kings, but emphasizes only those aspects of history that illustrate the observance of the priestly laws of Moses as a way to spiritual prosperity in Israel. Priestly genealogies and faithful Jehovah-worshiping kings are given prominence. The kings of the Northern Kingdom are, accordingly, passed over along with prophetic aspects, which are brought to the fore in Samuel and Kings:

Author and Date. Ezra is traditionally fixed as the author of Chronicles. W. F. Albright defends this thesis that the chronicler is Ezra and that he wrote between 400 and 350 B.C. Negative critics commonly assign the book considerably later. R. Pfeiffer sees nothing wrong with a date as late as 250 B.C. No conclusive argument can be advanced against authorship by Ezra around 400 B.C. or somewhat earlier. Arguments for a later date derived from the language and spirit of the work are not potent, since the diction of the chronicler is generally confessed to be similar to that of Ezra-Nehemiah and to come from the same period. Arguments based on the genealogies in 1 Chron. 3:17–24 are inconclusive, for the text as it stands does not permit determining whether five or eleven generations are listed after Zerubbabel and, accordingly, whether the last generation belongs to the period around 400 B.C. or around 270 B.C.

Historical Authenticity. Critics have customarily depreciated the historical reliability of the chronicler's work. As W. F. Albright says, "Chronicles contains a considerable amount of original material dealing with the history of Judah which is not found in Kings and ... the historical value of this original material is being established by archaeological discoveries" (Bulletin Am. Schools of Oriental Research 100 [1945]: 18). It is quite evident also that the writer's wide use of sources and his meticulous references to them disprove the critical notion that he was an inaccurate historian. The priestly slant of the book, as W. A. L. Elmslie correctly says, is "invaluable for the light it gives on the post-exilic priestly standpoint toward the past" (How Came Our Faith [1949], p. 39) and must be evaluated on this score.

Other "Chronicles." It is known that the books of Chronicles and Ezra, though put into their present form by one hand, contain in fact extracts from the writings of many different writers, which were extant at the time the compilation was made. For the full account of the reign of David the compiler made copious extracts from the books of Samuel the seer, Nathan the prophet, and Gad the seer (1 Chron. 29:29). For the reign of Solomon he copied from "the records of Nathan," from "the prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite," and from "the visions of Iddo the seer" (2 Chron. 9:29). Another work of Iddo, "the treatise (or interpretation, Midrash) of the prophet Iddo," supplied an account of the acts and the ways and sayings of King Abijah (13:22); while yet another book of Iddo concerning genealogies, with the book of the prophet Shemaiah, contained the acts of King Rehoboam (12:15). For later times the "Book of the Kings of Israel and Judah" is repeatedly cited (25:26; 27:7; 32:32; 33:18; etc.), and "the records of the Hozai" (33:19, marg., "seers"); and for the reigns of Uzziah and Hezekiah "the vision of Isaiah the prophet" (26:22; 32:32). Besides the above-named works there was also the public national record mentioned in Neh. 12:23. These chronicles of David are probably the same as those above referred to, written by Samuel, Nathan, and Gad. From this time the affairs of each king's reign were regularly recorded in a book (1 Kings 14:29; 15:7; etc.); and it was doubtless from this common source that the passages in the books of Samuel and Kings identical with the books of Chronicles were derived (Smith, Bib. Dict., s.v.). M.F.U.

CHRONOLOGY, NEW TESTAMENT. When the chronology in mind is the scientific measurement of time according to the revolutions of the heavenly bodies, it is said to be astronomical; when the chronology refers to particular events occurring among men on earth, it is called historical.

Difficulties of Chronology. The chronology of the NT relates alike to the dates when the several books of which it is composed were written and to the historicity of the facts recorded in their contents. Thus the origin of the Christian era is involved. But the modern chronologist is confronted with considerable difficulty at the very outset to fix the exact date of the birth of Jesus Christ, as the founder of Christianity, which synchronizes with the beginning of the Christian era. This is because he is compelled to base his computation on dateless documents written in a remote antiquity. For neither sacred nor secular authors in those times were at all accustomed to record historical facts under distinct dates. All demands were satisfied when known occurrences were referred to definite periods, as within a certain generation, or under a specific dynasty, or within the reign of a given ruler already familiar to the contemporaries addressed; for our modern method of historical notation according to the calendar was something altogether unknown to the ancients. A fine illustration of the ancient method is furnished in the third gospel, wherein a chronological minute is made of the beginning of John the Baptist's ministry, compacting away and synchronizing in a single sentence the names of the ruling Caesar at Rome, the several political rulers of Palestine under that emperor, the territories over which they presided, and even the high priests of the Jewish religion at Jerusalem (Luke 3:1–2). Now it does not follow that because such documents were dateless they were unhistorical, or in any sense to be discredited. Rather, because that practice was the universal custom of the times with historians, a departure from the method would at once justify a suspicion against an ancient document as unauthentic and incredible.

Basis of Computation. The argument relies upon three facts: (1) the star of the ancient wise men, a scientific conclusion; (2) the death of Herod the Great, with special reference to an eclipse of the moon; and (3) the enrollment of the Jewish population at the birth of Christ, by the Roman Quirinius. Edward Robinson states: "The present Christian era, which was fixed by the abbot Dionysius Exiguus in the 6th century, assumes the year of the Christian era as coincident with the year 754 from the building of Rome. Our era begins in any case more than four years too late; i.e., from four to five years at least after the actual birth of Christ. This era was first used in historical works by the Venerable Bede early in the 8th century and was not long after introduced in public transactions by the French kings Pepin and Charlemagne" (Greek Harmony of the Gospels).

Dionysius Exiguus did not give origin to the Christian era, he merely computed it. Considering the data then at his command, his work is as remarkable for its difficulty as for its measure of success. However, the common consensus of eminent biblicists is that he erred in his conclusion by at least four years: that the beginning of the Christian era should properly have been dated at A.U.C. (ab urbe condita, "from the founding of the city” of Rome) 750 instead of 754, which would have been coincident with 4 B.C. of our present chronology. There are several scientific and historical data now to be considered as determinative of the time of the birth of Jesus Christ, upon which the Christian era is based.

Star of the Wise Men. Matthew alone notes the passage of the magi, who had crossed the deserts of the East, guided by the presence of a strange star, to the feet of the infant Jesus. They ask of Herod, “Where is He who has been born King of the Jews? For we saw His star in the east, and have come to worship Him” (Matt. 2:2). The appearance of a star was the predicted sign of the Messiah’s birth as made by Balaam, the Moses of the Midianites. It reads: “A star shall come forth from Jacob, and a scepter shall rise from Israel.... One from Jacob shall have dominion” (Num. 24:17, 19).

In reference to the star of the magi Schaff remarks: “The Savior was not without a witness among the heathen. Wise men from the East—i.e., Persian magi, of the Zend religion, in which the idea of a Zoiosh, or redeemer, was clearly known—guided miraculously by a star or meteor created for the purpose, came and sought out the Savior to pay Him homage” (Smith, Bib. Dict., 2:1349, Hackett’s ed.).

Jewish Intimations. With reference to Balaam’s prediction, the Jewish rabbis wrote in their Talmud: “When the Messiah shall be revealed there shall rise up in the east a star flaming with six colors” (R. Frey, Messiah, p. 137). “The star shall shine forth from the east, and this is the star of the Messiah. It shall shine forth from the east for fifteen days, and if it be prolonged it will be for the good of Israel” (Edersheim, Jesus of Nazareth, 1:212).

Those Jews who are still looking for their Messiah to come confidently expect a star to appear as the sign of His Advent. So it was also in the early centuries of Christianity; and this explains why that celebrated messianic imposter succeeded so well in the reign of Hadrian, A.D. 132–35, who assumed the name Bar-Kokheba, i.e., “the son of a star,” and issued coins bearing a star in allusion to Balaam’s prediction. In his open rebellion against the Romans he found a large following of the Jews, but when made a prisoner he promised that if his captors killed him he would prove his messiahship by rising from the dead. The Romans took him at his word and cut off his head. Because he did not rise as he had promised, the Jews became disgusted and named him Bar-Kozibar, i.e., “the son of a lie!” (see Schaff, Hist. Christ. Church, 1:402).

Schaff also mentions the learned rabbi named Abarbanel, or Abrabanel, as authority for the tradition of the Jews, “There was a conspicuous conjunction of planets ... three years before the birth of Moses, in the sign Pisces,” and that another “would occur before the Messiah’s birth.” This was fifty years before Kepler published his discovery of the conjunction of the planets Jupiter, Saturn, and Mars, in the sign Pisces, at the birth of Jesus. Kepler’s discovery has since been verified by other eminent astronomers, “including Schubert, of Petersburg; Charles Pritchard, of London, honorable secretary of the Royal Astronomical Society; and Ideler and Encke, of Berlin.” “Dean Alford accepts this view.... The mathematical calculation of Wieseler, placing the date of the appearance of the star at A.U.C. 750 is coincident with 4 B.C., the time of the corrected chronology of the nativity.” “It is pronounced by Pritchard to be ‘as certain as any celestial phenomenon of ancient date.’” “If we accept the results of these calculations of astronomers, we are brought to within two years of the nativity, viz., between A.U.C. 748 (6 B.C.) (Kepler) and 750 (4 B.C.) (Wieseler). The differences arise, of course, from the uncertainty of the time of the departure and length of the journey of the magi” (Hist. 1:115–16, 119).

Chinese Notations. Edersheim mentions the astronomical tables of the Chinese as being honored by Humboldt, which contains an account of this star; and that “Pingre and others have designated it as a comet,” whose appearance was coincident with the visit of the magi, which would “seem to go before (them) in the direction of, and stand over, Bethlehem.” “And here the subject must, in the present state of information, be left” (Jesus the Messiah, 1:213).

Death of Herod the Great. He was sometimes known as Herod I (see article Herod). The first gospel relates that “Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea in the days of Herod the king” (Matt. 2:1; cf. Luke 1:5). Josephus, the celebrated Jewish priest and historian, born A.D. 37, affirms in both his historical works that Herod died in Jericho, in the valley of the Jordan, A.U.C. 750, or 4 B.C. It is known that his death occurred just before the Jewish Passover, on March 13. This writer further remarks that on “that very night there was an eclipse of the moon” (Ant. 17.6.4.; Wars 1.1.8). The fact of the eclipse is conspicuous for the reason that it is the only one mentioned by this writer and that this circumstance furnishes a certain astronomical datum for determining the nativity, since Herod was then alive and sought the child’s life.

When the magi inquired of Herod respecting Him “born King of the Jews,” it filled him with consternation. “Herod the king ... was troubled, and all Jerusalem with him.” Fearing that the royal infant would be his supplanter, he “sent and slew all the male children ... from two years old and under.” Joseph meanwhile had fled with the holy family into Egypt, “until the death of Herod,” when an angel directed him to return to the land of Israel, “for those who sought the Child’s life are dead” (Matt. 2:2–20). Now, Josephus relates that Herod, just five days before he died, killed his own son Antipater, which reveals his horrible character. This fact seems to have been confused with the account of the massacre of the infant children at Bethlehem when the report reached the emperor at Rome. Thereupon Macrobius states that Augustus Caesar, recalling Herod’s Jewish hatred of swine, said, “It is better to be Herod’s hog than to be his son” (“Melius est Herodis porcum esse quam filium,” Saturnalia Convivia 2.4).

It is obvious that Jesus was born at least several months before the death of Herod; that the murder of the innocents occurred between the birth of our Lord and the death of Herod; and withal, the moon’s eclipse on that “very night” of his death renders it scientifically certain and ascertainable by mathematical calculation that Herod departed this life on March 13, A.U.C. 750, which is identical with the year 4 B.C. the year assumed as that of the nativity.

Enrollment of Cyrenius (Quirinius). Schaff gives Franciscus Junius as the authority for the historical statement that “the agent through whom Saturninus carried out the census in Judea was the governor Cyrenius, according to Luke, ch. 2.”

Another chronological datum for determining the year of Christ’s birth is furnished by the third gospel: “Now it came about in those days that a decree went out from Caesar Augustus, that a census be taken of all the inhabited earth. This was the first census taken while Quirinius was governor of Syria. And all were proceeding to register for the census, everyone to his own city. And Joseph also went up from Galilee, from the city of Nazareth, to Judea, to the city of David, which is called Bethlehem, because he was of the house and family of David, in order to register along with Mary.... And she gave birth to her first-born son” (Luke 2:1–7).

Method of Registration. This was a Roman registration conducted by the Jewish method. Every person was required to resort to his own tribal territory in order to be entered in the registry. By this simple but most significant circumstance Joseph and Mary left their residence in Galilee and came to their ancestral Bethlehem, in the territory of Judah, where Jesus was born; and Micah's prediction of the Messiah's birth was circumstantially realized: "But as for you, Bethlehem Ephrathah ... from you One will go forth for Me to be ruler in Israel" (Mic. 5:2).

A head tax was imposed upon all men and women between the ages of fourteen and sixty-five (Schaff). Edersheim says: "In consequence of the decree of Caesar Augustus, Herod (the Great) directed a general registration to be made after the Jewish rather than the Roman manner.... All country people were to be registered in their own city; meaning thereby the town to which the village or place where they were born was attached. In so doing the house or lineage of each was marked. According to the Jewish mode of registration the people would have to be enrolled according to tribes, families, or clans, and the house of their father.... In the case of Joseph and Mary, whose descent from David was not only known, but where, for the sake of the unborn Messiah, it was most important that this should be distinctly noted, it is natural that in accordance with Jewish law they should go to Bethlehem" (Jesus the Messiah, 1:182–83).

The Two Registrations. There has been in the past an interesting question: How could Cyrenius conduct an enrollment of the Jews at the birth of Christ, 4 B.C. when it is a known fact that he was appointed governor of Syria and made a registry ten years later, namely, in A.D. 6? The answer is that Cyrenius was twice appointed to this service. In the first instance it was a census of the population, taken with a view of replacing their tribute to the empire in produce by a head tax in money; and in the second it was a registration of their property. The census occurred 4 B.C. to A.D. 1. It was begun by Sentius Saturninus, was then continued by Quintilius Varus until 4 B.C. and concluded by Cyrenius from the year 4 B.C. to A.D. 1, the time of the nativity. Luke expressly says, "This was the first census" (2:2). The second enrollment by Cyrenius occurred A.D. 10–14, according to the correct chronology.

Now, Luke makes historical notation of both enrollments in a way that indicates a perfect understanding of them on the part of his contemporaries. He refers to the first as a principal fact connecting it with the birth of Jesus; he refers to the second enrollment incidentally, in narrating what Gamaliel said in defense of the apostles before the Sanhedrin. In recounting different rebellions against the Romans in that country, Gamaliel said, "After this man Judas of Galilee rose up in the days of the census" (cf. Luke 2:1–3; Acts 5:37). It is of this registration that Josephus says: "Under his administration [Cyrenius's as procurator of Judea] it was that a certain Galilaean whose name was Judas prevailed with his countrymen to revolt" (Wars 2.8.1); "I mean that Judas who caused the people to revolt when Cyrenius came to take an account of the estates of the Jews" (Ant. 20.5.2).

The latest word on these enrollments is that of the eminent Augustus W. Zumpt, the classical scholar and archaeologist of Berlin, whose researches have secured us "full historical probability; and whose conclusions of the date of the birth of Christ at the time of the census taken 4 B.C. by Cyrenius is endorsed by the scholarly Mommsen, and accords with the view of Ideler, Bergmann, Browne, Ussher, and Sanclemente" (Schaff).

Patristic References. These have their evidential value, coming from those who were so near in the succession of the apostles and corroborating the historical character in the common understanding of their contemporaries respecting the census taken by Cyrenius at the time of the nativity. Manifold strength is added to these references in that they appeal directly to the registries of the Roman government for the truth of what they say. Justin Martyr (born A.D. 105) says: "Now there is a village in the land of the Jews, thirty-five stadia from Jerusalem, in which Christ was born, as you can ascertain also from the registries of the taxing under Quirinius [Cyrenius] your first procurator in Judea” (First Apology, chap. 34). Now, as Justin was defending the Christians from persecutions by the government, nothing could have been more unfortunate and fatal to his claim if the appeal to the public registries was false; but nothing could be stronger in evidence if the appeal was verified by the registration. This remark applies alike to Tertullian of Carthage (born A.D. 160) who was a highly gifted lawyer, and who, writing with a different design from a different country, refers to the same enrollment, and the same period, when he says: “There is historical proof that at this very time a census had been taken in Judea by Sentius Saturninus, which might have satisfied their inquiry respecting the family and descent of Christ” (Marcion 4.19).

Accounts of Historians. Schaff cites with approval several high authorities as historians on this subject. He says: “Cassiodorus and Suidas expressly assert the fact of a general census, and add several particulars which are not derived from Luke; e.g., Suidas says that Augustus elected twenty commissioners of high character and sent them to all parts of the empire to collect statistics of the population.... Hence Huschke, Wieseler, Zumpt, Plumptre, and McClellan accept their testimony as historically correct.... Wieseler quotes also John Malala, the historian of Antioch, as saying ... that ‘Augustus in the thirty-ninth year and tenth month of his reign (i.e., 5 or 6 B.C.) issued a decree for a general registration throughout the empire.’ Julius Caesar had begun a measurement of the whole empire, and Augustus completed it” (Hist. Christ. Church, 1:124–25, n. 4).

Affirmation of an Enemy. It is greatly to our advantage in the investigation of the truth of the gospels to cite the testimony of a conspicuous adversary of Christianity who lived in the early centuries of the era, touching this census taken by Cyrenius at the time of the nativity—Julian, born 331, a Roman emperor, known as “the Apostate,” because, having been brought up a Christian, he repudiated this religion when he came to the throne. When in possession of all the archives of the empire he wrote against the Christians as one so conscious of the certainty of his source of information that he adopted a defiant tone, especially in reference to the enrollment of Joseph and Mary at Bethlehem, as mentioned by Luke. There is absolutely no known record of evidence that Jesus was “enrolled as one of Caesar’s subjects,” unless it was at the time which Julian affirms. He says: “Jesus, whom you celebrate, was one of Caesar’s subjects. If you dispute it, I will prove it.... For yourselves allow that He was enrolled with His father and mother in the time of Cyrenius.” “But Jesus having persuaded a few among you, and those the worst of men, has now been celebrated about three hundred years, having done nothing in His lifetime worthy of remembrance, unless anyone thinks it a mighty matter to heal lame and blind people, and exorcise demoniacs in the villages of Bethsaida and Bethany” (Lardner, Works, 7:626–27).

Monumental Inscription. A monument has been unearthed at Rome between the Villa Hadriani and the Via Tiburtina. The name of him to whom the monument was dedicated is obliterated. Bergmann, Mommsen, and Merivale refer it to Cyrenius. Then it reads: “Quirinius as proconsul obtained Asia as his province. As legate of the deified Augustus a second time, he governed Syria and Phoenicia” (see Schaff, Hist. Christ. Church, 1:122–23).

Christ’s Confirmation. There is a direct implication of Christ’s loyalty, as “one of Caesar’s subjects,” to “the powers that be,” as on the notable occasion when He met the Jews with the answer “Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar’s” (Matt. 22:15–22). This wonderfully wise reply that silenced His adversaries is a record that is exactly accordant with the witness of the emperor, who as the head of the imperial government had in his possession, for reference, all the registrations of the Jews.

These, then, are the three principal arguments respecting the birth of Jesus, and therefore dating properly the Christian era at least four years earlier, namely: (1) that based upon the science of astronomy relating to the star of the magi, as developed by Kepler and improved by other astronomers; (2) the death of Herod the Great, dated by the eclipse of the moon; and (3) the argument based on history due to the researches of Zumpt in regard to the date of Cyrenius's registration of the Jews. Respecting this census, in distinction from a later registration by the same person as indicated by Luke, the patristic appeals made by Justin and Tertullian to the documents in the possession of the government; the assumption of fact in the declaration by the emperor Julian, who directly connects Christ with the census-taking of Cyrenius and His parents' registration; the confirmatory testimony of the secular historians Cassiodorus, Suidas, and John Malala of Antioch to a universal registration throughout the world; the monumental reference at Rome to the same transaction of Cyrenius; and Christ's own conduct in holding Himself to be "a subject of Caesar" by paying the usual imperial tribute to the receivers, are all so many facts corroborating the statement of Luke as historical and fixing the beginning of the Christian era at least four years earlier than our present chronology does.

Books of the New Testament. An approximate chronology of the dates of the NT books can be computed (tables 2, 3), although there is varied opinion among noted scholars concerning those dates. Eminent orthodox Christian writers have generally held to earlier dates for the writing of the gospels and the Acts than have those holding more or less liberal views respecting the Scriptures.

2. If the apostle John was banished to Patmos under the reign of Nero, as the internal evidence indicates, he wrote the Apocalypse about A.D. 68 or 69, which was after the death of that emperor; but the gospel and epistles some years later. This view is advocated or accepted by Neander, Lücke, Bleek, Ewald, DeWette, Baur, Higenfeld, Reuss, Düsterdieck, Weiss, Renan, Aubé, Sturart, Davidson, Cowles, Bishop Lightfoot, Westcott, and Schaff. The great majority of older commentators, and among the later ones Elliott, Alford, Hengstenberg, Ebrard, Lange, Hofmann, Godet, Lee, and others, favor the traditional date, as the external evidence indicates, which is after Domitian's death in A.D. 96. John is said to have died a natural death in the reign of Trajan, about A.D. 98 (see Schaff, Hist. Christ. Church, 1:429, 843). S.L.B.

CHRONOLOGY, OLD TESTAMENT. Of great importance is the location of events recorded in the OT in the frame of extrabiblical history. Although many great problems still exist in this correlation, substantial strides in archaeological research have set the OT fairly accurately in the ancient biblical world in general.

Early Chronology of Genesis. The initial chapters of the Bible do not indicate the date of the creation of the world or of man. Genesis 1:1 evidently puts the origin of the universe in the dateless past. According to Genesis, the appearance of man upon the earth is set forth as a result of a direct creative act of God and occurred at least over four millennia B.C. and perhaps as early as 7,000–10,000 years B.C. Byron Nelson, a conservative, argues for even greater antiquity of man (Before Abraham, Prehistoric Man and Bible Life [1948], p. 95). This, however, seems scarcely in focus with the indications of the Genesis account. On the other hand, the compressed chronology of Archbishop Ussher, who assumes unbroken succession of father-son relationship in the genealogical lists of Gen. 5 and 11, and who places the creation of man around 4,000 B.C., is untenable in the light of attested archaeological facts. For discussion of the problems involved see B. Ramm, The Christian View of Science and Scripture (1955).

Pre-Patriarchal Chronology. The Neolithic, Chalcolithic, and Early Bronze ages.

Neolithic Age (c. 8000–4500 B.C.) The first appearance of pottery (c. 5500 B.C.).

Chalcolithic Age (c. 4000–3000 B.C.). Introduction of copper and of stone implements, advance in pottery, early building activity, simple writing in Babylonia on clay (c. 3400 B.C.), irrigation cultures.

Early Bronze Age (3000–2000 B.C.). The beginning of first great states, Babylonia and Egypt.

Babylonia. Three Periods:

1. Early Dynastic Period (c. 2800–2360 B.C.).
2. Old Akkadian Period (c. 2360–2180 B.C.). Mesopotamian Period of the great empire of Sargon I followed by Rimush, Manishtusu, Naram-Sin, and Shargalisharri.
3. The Gutian Period (c. 2180–2070 B.C.) and Sumerian renaissance under the Third Dynasty of Ur (c. 2070–1960 B.C.).

Egypt. Four Periods:

1. Predynastic Period (c. 5000–2900 B.C.).
2. Protodynastic Period (Dynasties I-II, c. 2900–2700 B.C.).
3. The Old Kingdom (Dynasties III-IV, c. 2700–2200 B.C.), the great pyramids, vast imperial power.
4. First Intermediate Period (Dynasties VII-XI, c. 2200–2000 B.C.).

Patriarchal to Davidic Era (c. 2000–1000 B.C.). The Middle Bronze Age and the Late Bronze Age.

Middle Bronze Age (c. 2000–1500 B.C.). Developments in Mesopotamia, Egypt, and Palestine:

Mesopotamia. Abraham's birth at Ur (c. 2160 B.C., according to the OT chronology preserved in the MT); Abraham's entrance into Canaan (c. 2086 B.C.); Amorite invasion; establishment of Amorite dynasty from Mediterranean to Babylonia (c. 2000–1700 B.C.), the Mari Age, revealed by excavations at the Middle Euphrates city (c. eighteenth century B.C.); First Dynasty of Babylon (c. 1850–1550 B.C.), the great Hammurabi (c. 1700 B.C.), Indo-Iranian-Hurrian invasion (eighteenth and seventeenth centuries B.C.), destruction of Babylon (c. 1550 B.C.) by Hittites.

Egypt. The Great Middle Kingdom, Dynasty XII (c. 1990–1775 B.C.), Egyptian control of Palestine-Syria, Egyptian sojourn of Israel (c. 1870–1440 B.C., chronology of MT), Joseph becomes prime minister, and Jacob stands before one of the powerful pharaohs of this dynasty (Amenemes I-IV or Senwosret I-III); Israel continues in Egypt during the Hyksos period of foreign domination (c. 1775–1546 B.C.), is oppressed by the great Thutmose III (c. 1482–1450 B.C.) of the New Kingdom (Dynasty XVIII), and quits the country under Amenhotep II (c. 1450–1425 B.C.).

Palestine. Abraham enters Canaan (c. 2086 B.C.), Patriarchal Period (2086–1871 B.C., chronology of the MT).

Late Bronze Age (c. 1500–1200 B.C.). Developments in Egypt, Mesopotamia, Asia Minor, Palestine, and Greece:

Egypt—New Kingdom. Two Dynasties:

1. Dynasty XVIII (c. 1570–1319 B.C.), Thutmose III (c. 1482–1450 B.C.), Amenhotep II (c. 1450–1425 B.C.), Israel quits Egypt (c. 1440), enters Canaan (c. 1400 B.C.). Important pharaohs of Amarna Period, Amenophis III (c. 1413–1377), Amenophis IV (Akhnaton; c. 1377–1360 B.C.); solar monotheism.
2. Dynasty XIX (c. 1319–1200 B.C.), principal pharaohs Seti I (c. 1319–1301 B.C.), Rameses II the Great (c. 1301–1234 B.C.), wars with the Hittites at Kadesh (c. 1298), treaty with them (c. 1280), reign of Merenptah (c. 1235–1227), first mention of Israel in his stela (c. 1230).

Mesopotamia. Kassites in Babylonia (c. 1500–1150 B.C.), Mitannian state in northern Mesopotamia (c. 1500–1370), war between Egypt and Mitanni, conquests of Hittites (c. 1375).

Asia Minor. Hittite Empire (c. 1600–1200 B.C.), clash with Egypt at Kadesh (c. 1298 B.C.), treaty with the Egyptians (c. 1280).

Palestine. Two Major Periods:

1. Amarna Period (c. 1400–1360), destruction of Jericho (c. 1400), entrance of Hebrews into Palestine (c. 1400), conquest of Palestine (c. 1400–1360, Masoretic chronology).

2. Early Period of the Judges (c. 1360–1200 B.C.), oppression of Cushan-Rishathaim (c. 1361–1353 B.C.), deliverance by Othniel, period of peace (c. 1353–1313 B.C.; Judg. 3:11), oppression by Eglon of Moab (c. 1319–1295 B.C.), period of peace after Ehud (c. 1295–1215; Judg. 3:12–30), oppression by Jabin (c. 1215–1195 B.C.; Judg. 4:1–24).

The Greek World. Height of Minoan Civilization (fifteenth century), downfall of Crete (c. 1400 B.C.), Mycenaean Civilization in Greece, trade with Asia (c. 1400–1300 B.C.).

Early Iron Age (c. 1200–1000 B.C.). Developments in Egypt, Mesopotamia, and Palestine:

Egypt. Dynasty XX (c. 1200–1085 B.C.), Rameses III (c. 1198–1167 B.C.) stems invasion of sea peoples (c. 1191 B.C.), Philistines settle in large numbers in southwestern Palestine, Egypt loses hold on Palestine (after c. 1150 B.C.).

Mesopotamia. General weakness of rulers with the oppression of the great Tiglath-pileser I, who held northern Syria from c. 1105 to 1100 B.C.

Palestine. Middle part of the period of the Judges, deliverance by Deborah (Judg. 4–5), an era of peace for forty years (c. 1195–1155 B.C.), Midianite oppression for seven years (c. 1155–1148 B.C.), era of peace under Gideon (c. 1148–1108), Abimelech king at Shechem (c. 1108–1105 B.C.), Philistine ascendancy (c. 1089–1059 B.C.), Samson (c. 1085–1065 B.C.), judgeship of Eli (c. 1065–1050 B.C.), Saul and beginning of the monarchy (c. 1020–1004 B.C.), David king (c. 1004).

1. Dates are adapted from the chronology of E.R. Thiele and include coregencies.

The Era of the Hebrew Kings (c. 1000–586 B.C.). Developments in Palestine, Egypt, and Mesopotamia.

Palestine. (1) The United Monarchy: David (c. 1004–965 B.C.), Solomon (c. 965–926 B.C., according to J. Begrich); and (2) the Dual Monarchy (c. 926–586 B.C.; see table 4, “Kings of Judah and Israel”).

Egypt. Libyan, Ethiopian, and Saite Dynasties:

Libyan Dynasties XXII–XXIV (c. 935–712 B.C.), Pharaoh Shishak, who invaded Palestine.

Ethiopian Dynasty XXV (c. 712–663 B.C.), Assyria conquered Egypt (c. 760 B.C.).

Saite Dynasty XXVI (c. 663–525 B.C.), Pharaoh Neco (c. 609–597 B.C.), Hophra (c. 588–569 B.C.); Neco defeated by Chaldeans at Haran (c. 609 B.C.) and at Carchemish (c. 605 B.C.).

Mesopotamia. Assyrian Empire and Chaldean Period.

Assyrian Empire in a weakened form (c. 1000–880 B.C.), great conqueror Ashurnasirpal II (883–859 B.C.), Shalmaneser III (858–824 B.C.), Battle of Qarqar (853 B.C.), Assyrian push stopped by Ahab and Assyrian coalition. Tiglath-pileser III (747–727 B.C.) conquered coastal plain of Galilee, Gilead, and Damascus (733–732 B.C.); Samaria besieged by Shalmaneser V (727–722 B.C.), captured by Sargon II (721 B.C.), 27,290 leading citizens being carried into exile; Sennacherib (705–681 B.C.) invaded Judea at the time of Hezekiah (c. 701 B.C.), Assyrian world power, Esarhaddon (681–669 B.C.) conquered Egypt, Ashurbanipal (669–626 B.C.), decline of Assyria, fall of Asshur to the Medes (614 B.C.), Nineveh destroyed by the Medes and Babylonians (612 B.C.).

The Chaldean Period (c. 612–539), defeat of Assyria and Egypt under Neco at Haran (c. 609 B.C.), Nebuchadnezzar II (c. 605–562 B.C.), captivity of Judah, destruction of Jerusalem (c. 586 B.C.).

The Era of the Exile and Return (587–400 B.C.). Developments in Palestine, the Persian Empire, and Greece.

Palestine. Deportation of the leading citizens of Judah including Daniel (605 B.C.) and Ezekiel (597 B.C.), destruction of Jerusalem (587 B.C.), Cyrus’s proclamation (538 B.C.), return under Zerubbabel (536 B.C.), Temple rebuilt (520–515 B.C.), Ezra’s return (458 B.C.), Nehemiah’s return (444 B.C.), Malachi (435 B.C.).

Persian Empire. Persia conquers Babylon (539 B.C.), death of Cyrus (530 B.C.), Cambyses (530–522 B.C.), conquers Egypt (525 B.C.), Darius I the Great (522–486 B.C.), Behistun Inscription; defeat at Marathon (490 B.C.), Ahasuerus (486–465 B.C.), campaign against Greece, defeat at Salamis (480 B.C.), Artaxerxes I (465–424 B.C.), Xerxes II (424–423 B.C.), Darius I (423–404 B.C.), Artaxerxes II (404–358 B.C.), Artaxerxes III (358–338 B.C.), Arses (338–336 B.C.), Darius III (336–331 B.C.).

Greece. The Greeks defeat the Persians at Marathon (490 B.C.), Salamis (480 B.C.), golden age at Athens, Pericles (460–429 B.C.), Herodotus (485–425 B.C.), Socrates (469–400 B.C.), Plato (430–350 B.C.), Aristotle (384–322 B.C.).

The Greek Era (333–63 B.C.). Developments in the Macedonian Empire and in the kingdoms that emerged from that empire by 275 B.C., following the death of Alexander the Great in 323, B.C.

Macedonian Empire. The reigns of Philip II of Macedonia (359–336 B.C.) and his son Alexander the Great (336–323 B.C.); Alexander the Great's conquest of Persia, arrival in India (327 B.C.), death in Babylon (323 B.C.), Macedonian Kingdom. Rule of Macedonia by a line of kings followed by the establishment of the country as a Roman province in 146 B.C.

Egypt. Rule of Egypt by a dynasty begun by Ptolemy I (Soter), a general of Alexander the Great. Maintenance of the kingdom in relative strength through Ptolemies I-V, but a decline afterward; establishment of Egypt as a Roman province in 30 B.C. The Ptolemies from 323 B.C. to 180 B.C.:

Ptolemy I	323–285 B.C.
Ptolemy II	285–246 B.C.
Ptolemy III	246–221 B.C.
Ptolemy IV	221–203 B.C.
Ptolemy V	203–180 B.C.

Syria. Following the death of Alexander the Great, the rule of Syria by a dynasty founded by Seleucus I Nicator, an officer in Alexander's army; the conquest of Babylon by Seleucus in 312 B.C. and the beginning of the formal counting of the Seleucid Dynasty; maintenance of the kingdom in relative strength through Antiochus VII; following that ruler, continuation of the kingdom in a weak form until Pompey's conquest; the establishment of Syria as a Roman province in 64 B.C. The Seleucid rulers from 312 B.C. to 129 B.C.:

Seleucus I	312–280 B.C.
Antiochus I	280–261 B.C.
Antiochus II	261–247 B.C.
Seleucus II	247–226 B.C.
Seleucus III	226–223 B.C.
Antiochus III (The Great)	223–187 B.C.
Seleucus IV	187–175 B.C.
Antiochus-Epiphanes IV	175–163 B.C.
Antiochus-Epiphanes V	163–162 B.C.
Demetrius I	162–150 B.C.
Alexander Balas	150–145 B.C.
Antiochus VI	145–141 B.C.
Demetrius II	141–138 B.C.
Antiochus VII	139–129 B.C.

Pergamum. Under the Attalids until Attalus III (139–133 B.C.), who bequeathed his kingdom to Rome.

Bithynia. Under kings until Nicomedes III (94–74 B.C.) bequeathed his kingdom to Rome.

Pontus. Under Mithridates I (337–301) and his successors until conquered by Rome (50 B.C.).

Galatia. Came under Roman rule on the death of Amyntas (37–25 B.C.).

Parthian Kingdom (248 B.C.). Extended sway to India. Defeated Crassus and threatened Syria and Asia Minor; repulsed by the Romans (39 B.C.), the kingdom continued, but with declining power until A.D. 224.

Greek Cities. Allied with Rome against Macedonia, but Rome gradually absorbed Greece; destruction of Corinth (146 B.C.) ended resistance, Greece organized as separate Roman province (27 B.C.).

Palestine. Under strong Egyptian power until 198 B.C., when Syria gained ascendancy. Maccabean revolt against Greek paganizing civilization 167 B.C. The Maccabean rulers from 166 to 63 B.C.:

Judas Maccabaeus	166–160 B.C.
Jonathan	160–142 B.C.
Simon	142–134 B.C.
John Hyrcanus	134–104 B.C.
Aristobulus	104–103 B.C.
Alexander Jannaeus	103–76 B.C.
Alexandra	76–67 B.C.
Aristobulus II	66–63 B.C.

Nabataean Kingdom. By 300 B.C. the Nabataeans were in possession of ancient Edom. From Petra, their capital, their power extended in all directions. Their control was limited by the Romans from 63 B.C. on, but they did not become a Roman province until A.D. 106. M.F.U.

CHUB (kûb; only Ezek. 30:5, KJV). A nation in alliance with Egypt, and probably near it. Some read Lub (or, NIV, “Libya”), a singular form of Lubîm (Libyans), which elsewhere occurs only in the plural. Some propose Nûb (Nubia), as the Arab. version has Noobeh. But these emendations are only conjectures.

CHURCH (Gk. ekklesiá, “called out,” ek “out,” kaleo “to call”).

The Term, General Use. The word church is employed to express various ideas, some of which are scriptural, others not. It may be used to signify: (1) The entire body of those who are saved by their relation to Christ. (2) A particular Christian denomination. (3) The aggregate of all the ecclesiastical communions professing faith in Christ. (4) A single organized Christian group. (5) A building designated for Christian worship.

Simple New Testament Usage. In the NT the church comprehends the whole number of regenerated persons specifically from Pentecost to the first resurrection (1 Cor. 15:52; 1 Thess. 4:13–17) united organically to one another and to Christ by the baptizing work of the Holy Spirit (Rom. 6:3–4; 1 Cor. 12:12–13; Gal. 3:27; Eph. 4:5; Col. 2:10–12). According to the NT definition the church is the mystical Body of Christ of which He is the head (Eph. 1:22–23), being a holy temple for the habitation of God through the Spirit (2:21–22), “one flesh” with Christ (5:30–31), and espoused to Him as a pure virgin to one husband (2 Cor. 11:2–4). The word ekklēsia, however, is employed of any assembly, and the word in the Gk. language implies no more; for example, the town meeting or “assembly” (ekklēsia) at Ephesus (Acts 19:39), and Israel called out of Egypt and spoken of as a “congregation,” ekklēsia, in the wilderness (Acts 7:38), but in no sense was it a NT church except as a type of that which was to come. In addition to the church as the Body of Christ, we find other meanings attached to the word in the NT. It refers sometimes to the company of believers in a single province or city (cf. Rev. 2–3), or those meeting in a particular place of worship. It is applied even to bodies of professed believers who have largely departed from the true faith and practice, though in such cases the title is no longer appropriate except as a reminder of what they once were or professed to be, or only as a convenient designation, the significance of which in such cases is wholly lost.

The Beginning of the Church. That the true church as the Body of Christ began on the Day of Pentecost may be demonstrated in various ways. (1) Christ Himself declared it to be yet future. (2) It was founded upon the death, resurrection, and ascension of Christ, and such an accomplished fact was not possible until Pentecost (Gal. 3:23–25). (3) There could be no church until it was purchased with Christ’s precious blood (Eph. 5:25–27), until He arose to give it resurrected life (Col. 3:1–3), until He ascended to be head over all things to the church (Eph. 1:20–23), and until the Spirit came on Pentecost, through whom the church would be formed into one body by the baptism of the Spirit. (4) The baptism of the Spirit prophesied by John (Matt. 3:11; Mark 1:8; Luke 3:16–17; John 1:33) was still future at Acts 1:5. That it occurred between 1:5 and 11:16 is evident by a comparison of these two verses. It is obvious that the Holy Spirit, who came at Pentecost, arrived to perform among His various ministries of regenerating, sealing, indwelling, and filling, His distinctive ministry for this age of baptizing into Christ, that is, into His Body, the church (1 Cor. 12:13). It was just as impossible, considering the baptizing work of the Holy Spirit, that the church would have been formed before Pentecost as it was impossible that it should not have been formed after that date. Other views as to the time of the founding of the church include the period of Christ’s earthly ministry, the days of Abraham, and the lifetime of Adam.

Purpose and Completion of the Church. There is abundant Scripture that points to God’s principal purpose in this particular age as the outcalling of the church, the Body of Christ, from both Gentiles and Jews (Acts 15:14–18). This pivotal passage from Acts indicates God’s divine purpose for this age in taking out from among the Gentiles a people for His name. The gospel has never anywhere saved all but in every place it has called out some. The church is thus still in the process of formation, principally from among Gentiles with comparatively few Jews, who constitute the remnant according to the election of grace (Rom. 11:5). When the Body of Christ is complete, it will be removed, or translated, from the earthly scene (1 Cor. 15:51–53; 1 Thess. 4:15–17; 2 Thess. 2:1; Rev. 3:10). After the out-taking of the church, the end-time apocalyptic judgments will fall upon Gentiles and unbelieving Jews. However, a remnant will be saved out of this “time of Jacob’s distress” (Jer. 30:7), and the advent of Christ in glory will mark the setting up of the millennial kingdom with the nation Israel reinstated in priestly communion and blessing (Zech. 3:1–10) as the light of the world (4:1–14). Three views are held among premillennialists as to the time of Christ’s return: before, in the middle of, and at the end of the Tribulation.

Relation Between Christ and the Church. Seven NT figures set forth this relation: (1) the Shepherd and the Sheep (John 10); (2) the Vine and the Branches (John 15); (3) the Cornerstone and the Stones of the Building (1 Cor. 3:9; Eph. 2:19–22; 1 Pet. 2:5); (4) High Priest and the Kingdom of Priests (Heb. 5:1–10; 6:13–8:6; 1 Pet. 2:5–9; Rev. 1:6); (5) the Head and the Many-Membered Body (1 Cor. 12:12–13, 27; Eph. 4:4); (6) the Last Adam and the New Creation (1 Cor. 15:22, 45; 2 Cor. 5:17); (7) the Bridegroom and the Bride (John 3:29; 2 Cor. 11:2; Eph. 5:25–33; Rev. 19:7–8).

The Unity of the Church. Our Lord's remarkable intercession for Christian unity in John 17:11, 20–23 was answered in the outpouring of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost and the Spirit's advent to baptize all who believe in Christ into one Body. Christian unity is thus a reality—a position as a result of being “in Christ.” It is not organizational unity but the unity of a living organism. The task of Christians is to realize this positional unity as an actuality by Christlike conduct (Eph. 4:1–3) based on sound doctrine (4:4–6). Only then can positional unity become experiential.

Roman Catholic and Protestant Statements. The authoritative utterances of Catholics and of Protestants illustrate this difference of view. For example, the Catechism of Trent (Roman Catholic) says: “The church is one, because, as the apostle says, there is ‘one Lord, one faith, one baptism;’ but more especially because it has one invisible ruler, Christ, and one visible, viz., the occupant for the time being of the chair of St. Peter at Rome.” Luther's Larger Catechism says: “I believe that there is upon earth a certain community of saints composed solely of holy persons, under one Head, collected together by the Spirit; of one faith and one mind, endowed with manifold gifts, but united in love and without sects and divisions.” The Church of England (Art. 19) says: “A congregation of faithful men, in which the pure word of God is preached, and the sacraments duly administered according to Christ's ordinance, in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same.” This is also the definition given by the Methodist church. These quotations might be greatly multiplied; but enough is given to show the main line of divergence and the position and trend of Protestant doctrine upon this subject.

The Ethics of the Church. As visible institutions churches must exercise government over their members. What rules of conduct they may properly impose and enforce is, however, a question of great importance. If the church is, as Roman Catholics hold, infallible, because divinely inspired, then all that the church may require is of divine obligation. If the churches, as some seem to hold, are merely voluntary human societies formed for Christian purposes, then such rules as from a human standpoint may seem appropriate are binding upon those who enter and remain in their communion; though at the same time the obligation of entering or remaining becomes, to say the least, greatly reduced. But if, according to the Protestant view, the churches are divine-human institutions, and not infallible, the rules of conduct must accord with the teachings of the infallible Word. The ethical standard of the visible church must be simply that of the Holy Scriptures, otherwise the true idea of the church is lost sight of and the church assumes either too much or too little. Only by adhering to the Word of God as the “rule of faith and practice” can the churches save themselves from the two extremes: on the one hand, that of unduly magnifying the authority of the visible church, or, on the other, that of laying aside its highest claim to recognition and obedience. CHURL (Heb. kîlay, “withholding,” Isa. 32:5, 7). A fraudulent person, a deceiver. The NIV renders “scoundrel.”

CHURLISH (Heb. qâsheh, “severe”). A KJV word descriptive of a coarse, ill-natured fellow (1 Sam. 25:3). The NASB renders “harsh,” the NIV “surly.”

CHU'SHAN-RISHATHA'IM. See Cushan-rishathaim.

CHU'ZA (koo'za; Aram. chuzâ, “jug”), Ku'za (NIV). The “steward” of Herod (Antipas), whose wife, Joanna (which see), having been cured by our Lord either of possession by an evil spirit or of a disease, became attached to that body of women who accompanied Him on his journeyings (Luke 8:3).

CILICIA (si-lish-a). The southeasterly province of Asia Minor along the Mediterranean Sea, with Tarsus, the birthplace of Paul, its capital. A Roman province, 67 B.C. The Jews of Cilicia had a synagogue at Jerusalem (Acts 6:9). Paul learned his trade of tent making here, and visited it soon after his conversion (Gal. 1:21; Acts 9:30). It was famous for its goats' hair. Cicero was once consul of it. Its climate was pleasant and attracted Greek residents (15:41; 21:39).

CIN'NERETH. See Chinnereth.

CIRCLE. See Vault.

CIRCUIT. (1) In 1 Sam. 7:16 (Heb. sābab, to “revolve”), a regular tour of inspection by Samuel when he “judged” Israel. (2) In Job. 22:14 (KJV; NASB marg.) the Heb. word hûg, “circle,” appears in reference to the heavens. See Vault. (3) The act of going around (Heb. t□qûfâh, “revolution”), the apparent diurnal revolution of the sun around the earth (Ps. 19:6). The word in Ex. 34:22 and 2 Chron. 24:23 is rendered “turn of the year”; in 1 Sam. 1:20 it refers to the term of pregnancy (NASB marg., “the circuit of the days”; NIV, “the course of time”).

CIRCUMCISION (Heb. mûlâ; Gk. peritomē, a “cutting around”). The ceremony of circumcision consisted in cutting away the foreskin, i.e., the hood or fold of skin covering the head of the male organ. This is generally done by means of a sharp knife, but in more primitive times sharp stones were used (Ex. 4:25; Josh. 5:2, “flint knives”). As a rule this act was performed by the father (Gen. 17:23), although it might be done by any Israelite, and, if necessary, women as well (Ex. 4:25), but never by a Gentile. In later times the operation was, in the case of adults, performed by a doctor. The Jews of the present day entrust it to a person called a mohel appointed especially for the purpose. In later times the naming of the child accompanied the act of circumcision (Luke 1:59).

History. After God had made a covenant with Abraham (Gen. 15) He commanded that, as a token of the covenant, every male should be circumcised; not merely the children and bodily descendants of Abraham, but also those born in his house and purchased slaves, and that in the case of children it occur on the eighth day after birth. Every one not so circumcised was to be “cut off from his people” as having “broken My covenant” (17:14).

Circumcision was formally enacted as a legal institute by Moses (Lev. 12:3; John 7:22–23) and was made to apply not only to one's own children, but to slaves, home-born or purchased, and to foreigners before they could partake of the Passover or become Jewish citizens (Ex. 12:48).

During the wilderness journey circumcision fell into disuse. This neglect is most satisfactorily explained as follows: the nation, while bearing the punishment of disobedience in its wanderings, was regarded as under temporary rejection by God and was therefore prohibited from using the sign of the covenant.

As the Lord had only promised His assistance on condition that the law given by Moses was faithfully observed, it became the duty of Joshua, upon entering Canaan, to perform the rite of circumcision upon the generation that had been born in the wilderness. This was done immediately upon crossing the Jordan, at or near Gilgal (Josh. 5:2–8).

From this time circumcision became the pride of Israel, they looking with contempt upon all those people not observing it (Judg. 14:3; 15:18; 1 Sam. 14:6; Isa. 52:1; etc.). It became a rite so distinctive of them that their oppressors tried to prevent their observing it, an attempt to which they refused to submit (1 Macc. 1:48, 50, 60, 62).

The process of restoring a circumcised person to his natural condition by a surgical operation was sometimes undergone from a desire to assimilate themselves to the heathen around them, or that they might not be known as Jews when they appeared naked in the games. Paul cautions the Corinthians against taking recourse to this practice from an excessive anti-Judaistic tendency (1 Cor. 7:18–19). The attitude that Christianity, at its introduction, assumed toward circumcision was one of absolute hostility so far as the necessity of the rite to salvation or its possession of any religious or moral worth were concerned (Acts 15:5; Gal. 5:2).

Pagan. Circumcision was practiced by the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, and Egyptians, but among the last only by the priests and those who wanted to be initiated into the sacred mysteries. The practice has also been found to exist among the Ethiopians, Colchians, Congo blacks, and many savage tribes in the heart of Africa; also among American Indian tribes, e.g., the Salivas, the Guamos, the Octamotos on the Orinoco, among the inhabitants of Yucatan and of Mexico, and further, among the Fiji Islanders.

Significance. With respect to the symbolical significance of circumcision, it is said to have originated in phallus worship, but if so this would have no bearing on the Israelite view of the rite. It was practiced, according to some, because of its medical advantages, such as the warding off of disease through ease in cleanliness, or that it served to increase the generative powers, but these can hardly be received as proper explanations, for whole nations not practicing circumcision appear as healthy and fruitful. Nor can the rite be brought into connection with the idea of sacrifice, “the consecration of a part of the body for the whole,” or even “as an act of emasculation in honor of the Deity, that has gradually dwindled down to the mere cutting away of the foreskin.”

We must rather look for the significance of this rite in the fact that the corruption of sin usually manifests itself with peculiar energy in the sexual life, and that the sanctification of the life was symbolized by the purifying of the organ by which life is reproduced. But, as spiritual purity was demanded of the chosen people of God, circumcision became the external token of the covenant between God and His people. It secured to the one subjected to it all the rights of the covenant, participation in all its material and spiritual benefits; while, on the other hand, he was bound to fulfill all the covenant obligations. It had not, however, of a sacramental nature; it was not a vehicle through which to convey the sanctifying influences of God to His people, but was simply a token of the recognition of the covenant relation existing between Israel and God.

The circumcision of the child on the eighth day seems to have been founded on the significance attached to the number seven, so far as that number denotes a period of time. On the eighth day, when a new cycle of life began, the child entered into covenant with God. Again, it was not until the eighth day that the child was supposed to possess an independent existence.

Figurative. Circumcision was used as a symbol of purity of heart (Deut. 10:16; 30:6; cf. Lev. 26:41; Jer. 4:4; 9:25; Ezek. 44:7). “Who am of uncircumcised lips” (Ex. 6:12, KJV; NASB, see marg.; NIV, “faltering lips”). Here Moses would seem to imply that he was unskilled in public address, as the Jews considered circumcision a perfecting of one’s powers. Circumcision is also figurative of a readiness to hear and obey (Jer. 6:10, NASB, see marg.).

Christian Circumcision. Christians are said to be circumcised in Christ (Col. 2:11). This circumcision is asserted to be “circumcision made without hands,” that is, a spiritual reality and not a physical rite, the antitype and not the type. Physical circumcision was a putting off of a part of the flesh as a symbol of covenant relationship of God’s people with a holy God. Christian circumcision is “removal of” not a part, but the entire “body of the flesh.” “The body of the flesh” is the physical body controlled by the old fallen nature that all possess, saved as well as unsaved. The “removal of” is positional truth, that is, truth that arises as a result of the believer’s being placed in Christ by the Spirit’s baptizing work. Because the sin nature was judged by Christ in His death, so the believer by virtue of his organic union and identification with his Lord shares that “removal” that Christ accomplished, just as he shares Christ’s fullness and is declared to be “complete” in Him. (2:10). The believer’s circumcision is not only a spiritual reality consisting in the putting off of the body of the flesh; it is more precisely Christ’s circumcision, effected by Him and imputed to the believer: “In Him you were also circumcised ... by the circumcision of Christ” (2:11). Our Lord’s circumcision mentioned in this passage has no reference to His physical circumcision when He was eight days old, but is a meaningful term the apostle applies to Christ’s death to the sin nature. It is the truth enunciated in Rom. 6:10, “For the death that He died, He died to sin, once for all,” and 8:3, “For what the Law could not do, weak as it was through the flesh, God did: sending His own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh and as an offering for sin, He condemned sin in the flesh.” It is thus apparent that the baptizing work of the Holy Spirit (Rom. 6:3–4; 1 Cor. 12:13; Col. 2:12) effects spiritual circumcision.

CISTERN (Heb. b.ōr, or bôr, “a dug place”). A receptacle for holding water (Prov. 5:15; Eccles. 12:6; Isa. 36:16; Jer. 2:13). Sometimes these were dug around a spring to retain the water coming from it. Those that generally bore the name of cisterns were covered reservoirs dug out of the earth or rock, into which, in the rainy seasons, the rain or a flowing stream was conducted for storage. The absence of rain during the summer months (May to September) makes it necessary to collect and preserve the water, which falls in abundance during the remainder of the year. These cisterns were usually large pits, but sometimes were extensive vaults open only by a small mouth. The mouth was closed with a large flat stone, over which sand was spread to prevent easy discovery (song of Sol. 4:12, “rock garden”). Mud would naturally accumulate at the bottom of these cisterns, so that anyone falling would be likely to perish (Jer. 38:6; Ps. 40:2).

In cities, the chief dependence for water being upon cisterns, they were carefully made, either hewn out of the rock or constructed of masonry.

Empty cisterns were sometimes used as prisons; thus Joseph was cast into a pit (Gen. 37:22); and Jeremiah was also thrown into one (Jer. 38:6).

Figurative. (1) The crushing of the wheel at the cistern, used to draw up the bucket, is used (Eccles. 12:6) as an image of the dissolution of the bodily powers. (2) To “drink water from your own cistern” (Prov. 5:15) means to confine one’s self to pleasures legitimately his own. (3) “Broken cisterns” (Jer. 2:13), tanks not only without feeding springs, but unable even to retain the water flowing into them, are symbols of all earthly, as compared with heavenly, means of satisfying man’s highest needs.

CITADEL (Heb. bĕrāh). A specially fortified defensive structure usually located within a city (2 Sam. 12:26; 1 Kings 16:18; 2 Kings 15:25; Esther 1:2, 5; 2:3, 5, 8). See Fortified City.

CITIES OF REFUGE. When the Israelites had come into the land of Canaan they were to choose towns conveniently situated as “cities of refuge,” to which the manslayer who had killed a person by accident might flee. Three of these cities were located on each side of the Jordan (six in all). Those on the W of the Jordan were Kedesh in Galilee (1 Chron. 6:76), Shechem in Ephraim (Josh. 21:21; 1 Chron. 6:67), Hebron in Judah (Josh. 21:11; 2 Sam. 5:5; 1 Chron. 6:55); on the E of the Jordan were Bezer, in the plain of Moab (Deut. 4:43; Josh. 20:8); Ramoth in Gilead, in the tribe of Gad (Deut. 4:43; Josh. 21:38; 1 Kings 22:3); and Golan, in Bashan, in the half tribe of Manasseh (Deut. 4:43; Josh. 21:27; 1 Chron. 6:71). They were also Levitical cities. See Levite.

The following were the regulations respecting the asylum offered by the cities of refuge. The Avenger of Blood (which see, under Blood, Avenger of) was allowed to kill the manslayer if he overtook him before reaching the city (Num. 35:19). Before he could avail himself of the shelter the fugitive had to undergo a trial and prove to the congregation that the killing was accidental (35:12, 24); if acquitted of intentional killing he had to remain within the city or its suburbs until the death of the high priest, and if found outside its limits he might be put to death by the blood avenger (35:25–28).

According to the rabbis, in order to aid the fugitive it was the business of the Sanhedrin to keep the roads leading to the cities of refuge in the best possible repair. No hills were left, every river was bridged, and the road itself was to be at least thirty-two cubits broad. At every turn were guideposts bearing the word “Refuge,” and two students of the law were appointed to accompany the fleeing man and to pacify, if possible, the avenger, should he overtake the fugitive.

CITIES OF THE VALLEY. These cities were five in number: Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboiim, and Bela or Zoar (Gen. 13:12; 19:29). The biblical notices that the district of the Jordan where these cities were situated was extremely fertile and well peopled (c. 2065 B.C. according to the preserved chronology of the MT), but that not long afterward was abandoned, are in agreement with archaeological facts (see W. F. Albright, The Archaeology of Palestine and the Bible, pp. 133ff.). It is now fairly certain that these cities were located in the valley of Siddim (14:3) and that this was the region in the southern portion of the Dead Sea now covered with water. The ruins of Bab ed-Dra' E of the Dead Sea probably belong to the age of Sodom and Gomorrah. The town probably came to an end in the twenty-third century B.C., but tombs in the area continued to be used down into the twenty-first century. The valley of Siddim with its towns was overtaken by a great catastrophe around the middle of the twenty-first century B.C (19:23–28). It was “full of tar pits” (14:10); petroleum deposits are still found in the area. Being on a great fault that forms the Jordan Valley and the Dead Sea of the Arabah, this region has been noted throughout history for its earthquakes. The cataclysm, although Scripture records only the miraculous elements, was doubtless due to violent earthquakes in which the salt and free sulphur of this area were mingled, which resulted in a gigantic explosion, hurling into the sky red-hot salt and sulphur, literally raining fire and brimstone over the whole plain (19:24–28). The instance of Lot’s wife being turned into a pillar of salt is reminiscent of the great salt mass in the valley, the Mount of Sodom, called by the Arabs “Jebel Usdum.” It is a spur some five miles long extending N and S at the SW end of the Dead Sea. Somewhere, inundated by the slowly rising water of the southern part of the salt lake, the cities of the valley are evidently to be found. In NT times their ruins were still visible, not yet being covered with water (Tacitus History 5.7; Josephus Wars 4.4).

CITIZENSHIP (Gk. politeia). The rights and privileges of a native or adopted citizen as distinguished from a foreigner.

Hebrew. As the covenant people, and according to the Mosaic constitution (which was framed on a basis of religious rather than of political privileges and distinctions), the idea of the commonwealth (Eph. 2:12) was merged into that of the congregation (which see).

Roman (Lat. civitas). In the fullest sense citizenship included the right of voting, of being elected to a magistracy, of appeal to the people, of contracting a legal marriage, and of holding property in the Roman community. “As a rule, the Jewish communities in Roman cities are to be regarded in the light of private associations of settlers, which were recognized by the state and on which certain rights were conferred, but the members of which did not enjoy the rights of citizenship” (Schürer, History of the Jewish People, 2:270). Still there were quite a large number of towns in which the Jews enjoyed the rights of citizenship, as enumerated above. Individual Jews also had the rights of citizenship conferred upon them, such as Paul (Acts 21:39; 22:28).

CITRON WOOD. A prized ornamental fragrant wood of the cypress family enumerated as a luxury product of Babylon (Rev. 18:12, NASB; “thyine wood,” KJV). See Vegetable Kingdom.

CITY (Heb. âr, poetical qiryâ). In the most ancient times the only distinction between village and city was that an assemblage of houses and buildings surrounded by a wall was reckoned a city and one without such surroundings was a village (Lev. 25:29–31; 1 Sam. 6:18; Ezek. 38:11).

Later, cities became distinguished by a large number of houses, as well as by the size, solidity, and magnificence of the buildings. “Cities and their villages” are commonly mentioned in the apportionment of the land to the tribes of Israel (Josh. 13:23, 28; 15:32, 36, 41; etc.), from which we infer that some villages belonged to and were dependent upon the cities. Naturally, with increased population and extension, villages and towns developed into cities, e.g., Hazaraddar (Num. 34:4), which was perhaps Hezron and Addar (Josh. 15:3); the two places being, probably, near together and growing into one. This may account for the fact that many places are designated now cities, not villages, as Bethlehem (John 7:42, “village”; Luke 2:4, “city”).

The earliest notice in Scripture of city-building is the reference in Genesis to the city built by Cain and named after his son, Enoch (Gen. 4:17). After the confusion of tongues the descendants of Nimrod founded Babel, Erech, etc., in the land of Shinar; as well as Nineveh, Rehoboth-Ir, etc. (10:10–12, 19). Such cities as Ur, Nippur, Kish, Eridu, Lagash, Nineveh, Asshur, etc., have been excavated and go back to 3,000 B.C. or earlier. The earliest biblical description of a city is that of Sodom (19:1–22), but cities existed in early times on the sites of Jerusalem, Hebron, and Damascus; and it is plain that the Canaanite, who was “in the land” before the coming of Abraham, had already built cities. We read that the Israelites during their sojourn in Egypt were employed in building or fortifying the “storage cities” of Pithom and Rameses (Ex. 1:11).

Hebrew Cities. The cities of Palestine were, judging from the large number mentioned in Joshua, relatively small, like most cities of ancient times. They were like oriental cities of today, built with narrow, crooked streets (Eccles. 12:4; song of Sol. 3:2) with many squares near the gates, where markets and courts were held (Gen. 23:10; Ruth 4:1; Matt. 6:5; etc.). Few of the streets were paved, although, according to Josephus (Ant. 8.7), Solomon had the roads leading to Jerusalem laid with black stone. More certain are the statements that Herod the Great paved the main street in Antioch, and Herod Agrippa III paved Jerusalem with white stones. Many cities were surrounded with high walls, having strong gates and bronze or iron bars (Deut. 3:5; 1 Kings 4:13), and provided with watchtowers (2 Sam. 18:24; 2 Kings 9:17).

Later, especially under the kings, many places, particularly frontier towns and chief cities, and above all, Jerusalem, were strengthened by the erection of thick walls with battlements (2 Chron. 26:6; Zeph. 1:16) and high towers raised partly over the gates (2 Sam. 18:24; 2 Kings 9:17), partly at the corners of the walls (2 Chron. 14:7; 32:5). Ditch and rampart were provided for the outside of the walls (2 Sam. 20:15; Isa. 26:1). Jerusalem’s walls have been uncovered dating back to Jebusite times before 1000 B.C.

Government. The government of Jewish cities was vested in a council of officers with judges (Deut. 16:18), who were required to be priests. Under the kings we find mention of a “governor” (1 Kings 22:26; 2 Chron. 18:25). After the captivity Ezra made similar arrangements for the appointment of judges (Ezra 7:25). See Citizenship.

CITY, FENCED. See Fortified City.

CITY, HOLY. Another name of Jerusalem (Neh. 11:1; Dan. 9:24), probably from the feeling that the sacredness of the Temple extended in some measure over the city. It is so distinguished in the East to the present day.

CITY, LEVITICAL. See Levitical Cities.

CITY, SACERDOTAL. See Priest.

CITY, STORAGE. Two such cities, Pithom and Raamses (see Rameses), were built by the Israelites while in Egypt (Ex. 1:11), in which the produce of the land was housed. The Jewish kings had similar places of public deposit (1 Kings 9:19; 2 Chron. 8:4, 6; 16:4).

CITY, TREASURE. See City, Storage.

CITY OF DAVID. A portion of the SE hill of Jerusalem, including Mt. Zion, where the fortress of the Jebusites stood. This fortress was reduced by David, who built a new palace and city, named after him (1 Chron. 11:5).

Bethlehem, the native town of David, is also called, from that circumstance, the city of David (Luke 2:11).

CITY OF DESTRUCTION; (ḥr haheres; “city of destruction”; “Ir-hahares,” KJV).

This place is mentioned only in Isa. 19:18. Various explanations are given as to the meaning of the word the NASB and NIV render “City of Destruction”:

1. “The city of the sun,” a translation of the Egyptian sacred name of Heliopolis. This is the reading in a number of ancient manuscripts and is the marginal reading for the verse in the NASB and NIV.

2. “The city of Heres,” a transcription in the second word of the Egyptian sacred name of Heliopolis, Ha-ra, “the abode [lit., “house”] of the sun.”

3. “A city destroyed,” meaning that one of the five cities mentioned would be destroyed, according to Isaiah’s idiom.

4. “A city preserved,” meaning that one of the five cities mentioned would be preserved. A careful examination of the nineteenth chapter of Isaiah, and the eighteenth and twentieth, which are connected with it, makes the third explanation and the NASB and NIV rendering most likely.

CITY OF GOD. A name given to Jerusalem (Ps. 46:4; cf. 48:1, 8), the appropriateness of which is evident from Deut. 12:5: “The place which the Lord your God shall choose from all your tribes, to establish His name there for His dwelling, and there you shall come.”

CLAU’DA (klaw’da). A small island twenty-two miles S of the W end of Crete.

Pliny calls it Gaudos. Ptolemy calls it Klaudos; it is now called Gavdos. Paul passed this island on his voyage to Rome (Acts 27:16).

CLAU’DIA (klaw’di-a; feminine of “Claudius”). A Christian woman mentioned in 2 Tim. 4:21. By some she is thought to have been the daughter of the British king Cogidunus, and the wife of Pudens (mentioned in the same verse), having been sent to Rome to be educated; that there she was the protégée of Pomponia (wife of the late commander in Britain, Aulus Plautius) and became a convert to Christianity. On the other hand, it may be said that this attempt at identification rests on no other foundation than the identity of the names of the parties, which, in the case of names so common as Pudens and Claudia, may be nothing more than a mere accidental coincidence (Conybeare and Howson, The Life and Epistles of St. Paul, 2:484, n.).

CLAU'DIUS (klaw'di-us; Gk. perhaps from claudus, "lame").

1. The fourth Roman emperor (excluding Julius Caesar), who succeeded Caligula, January 25, A.D. 41. He was the son of Drusus and Antonia, and was born August 1, 10 B.C. at Lyons, in Gaul. Losing his father in infancy, he was left to the care and society of domestics, and despised by his imperial relatives. Notwithstanding the weakness of intellect resulting from this neglect, he devoted himself to literary pursuits and was the author of several treatises. On the murder of Caligula he hid himself through fear of a similar fate but was found by a soldier, who saluted him as emperor.

He was taken, almost by force, to the Senate, and constituted emperor chiefly by the pretorian guards, under the promise of a largess to each soldier. According to Josephus, the throne was, in a great measure, finally secured to him through the address and solicitation of Herod Agrippa. This obligation he returned by great favors to Agrippa, enlarging his territory, and appointing his brother to the kingdom of Chalcis (Josephus Ant. 19.5.1), giving to this latter also, after Agrippa's death, the presidency over the Temple at Jerusalem (Ant. 20.1.3). The Jews were generally treated by him with indulgence, especially those in Asia and Egypt (Ant. 19.5.2-3; 20.1.2), although those in Palestine seem to have, at times, suffered much oppression at the hands of his governors. About the middle of his reign all Jews who lived at Rome were banished (Acts 18:2), probably A.D. 49. The conduct of Claudius during his reign insofar as it was not under the influence of his wives and freedmen, was mild and popular, and he made several beneficial enactments. Having married his niece, Agrippina, she prevailed upon him to bypass his own son, Britannicus, in favor of her son, Nero, by a former marriage; but discovering that he regretted this step she poisoned him, A.D. 54.

2. Claudius Lysias (Acts 23:26) See Lysias.

CLAW. The sharp hooked end of the foot of a bird (Dan. 4:33). The KJV uses "claw" where the NASB and NIV render "hoofs" (Zech. 11:16) or are silent (KJV, "cleft into two claws," versus NASB, "hoof split in two"; both Deut. 14:6). See Hoof; Nail, no. 4.

Figurative. The expression "tear their claws in pieces" (Zech. 11:16; NASB and NIV, "tear off their hoofs") means to seize upon and eat the last morsel of flesh or fat.

CLAY. See Mineral Kingdom.

CLEAN, CLEANNESS. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words, having the primary meaning of freedom from dirt or filth, and then of moral purity. Generally, however, they signify freedom from ceremonial defilement. See Purification; Purity; Uncleaness.

CLEFT. The rendering of several Heb. words.

1. A space or opening made by cleavage, as a fissure in a building (Isa. 22:9, "breaches"; Amos 6:11, KJV); crevice in a rock (song of Sol. 2:14; Isa. 2:21; Jer. 49:16).

2. The split in the hoof of an animal (Deut. 14:6, KJV; NASB and NIV, “split”). CLEMENT (klem-ent; “merciful”). A person (apparently a Christian of Philippi) mentioned by Paul (Phil. 4:3) as one whose name was in the Book of Life. This Clement was, by the ancient church, identified with the bishop of Rome of the same name.

CLE’OPAS (klē’ō-pas; contraction of Gk. kleopatros, “of a renowned father”). One of the two disciples who were going to Emmaus on the day of the resurrection, when Jesus drew near and conversed with them (Luke 24:18). He questioned them as to the subject of their conversation, chided them for their ignorance and unbelief, and expounded to them the Scriptures that foretold His sufferings and glory. Arriving at Emmaus, they secured His presence at the evening meal, during which He was made known to them. They hastened back to Jerusalem and acquainted the disciples with what they had seen and heard. Cleopas must not be confounded with Clopas of John 19:25.

CLE’OPHAS. See Clopas.

CLERK (Acts 19:35). See Town Clerk.

CLOAK. An article of dress (which see). KJV and NIV “cloak” is sometimes rendered “coat” (Matt. 5:40; Luke 6:29) or “garment” (Isa. 59:17) in the NASB. Conversely, KJV “raiment” (Ex. 22:26, 27; Deut. 24:13; Judg. 3:16), “veil” (Ruth 3:15), and “garment” (Matt. 9:20; 14:36; Mark 5:27, 6:56; Luke 8:44; Acts 12:8) are often given in the NASB and NIV as “cloak.” The Gk. word for cloak in 2 Tim. 4:13 is a different word for cloak than in other NT passages (NASB).

Figurative. In the KJV “cloak” appears for that which conceals, or for a pretext or excuse (cf. NASB Isa. 59:17; John 15:22; 1 Thess. 2:5; 2 Tim. 4:13; 1 Pet. 2:16).

CLO’PAS (Gk. klō’pas). The husband of Mary (which see), the sister of Christ’s mother (John 19:25); probably a Grecized form of Alphaeus (which see). He is the father of James the Less and his brother Joseph, or Joses (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13; cf. Mark 15:4).

CLOSET (Heb. hūppâ, “canopy”; Gk. tameion). A KJV term rendered in the NASB by “bridal chamber” (Joel 2:16; Ps. 19:5) and “inner room” (Matt. 6:6; Luke 12:3). The NIV renders Joel 2:16 by “chamber”; Ps. 19:5 by “pavilion”; Matt. 6:6 by “room”; and Luke 12:3 by “inner rooms.”

CLOUD. The allusions to clouds in Scripture, as well as their use in symbolical language, can only be understood when we remember the nature of the climate, where there is hardly a trace of cloud from the beginning of May to the close of September. During this season clouds so seldom appear and rains so seldom fall as to seem phenomenal, as was the case with the harvest rain invoked by Samuel (1 Sam. 12:17–18) and the little cloud, not larger than a man’s hand, which Elijah declared to be a sure promise of rain (1 Kings 18:44).

Clouds are referred to as showing the power and wisdom of God in their formation (Pss. 135:6–7, NASB, “vapors,” 147:8), and causing them to hold and dispense rain (Job 37:10–12; Prov. 3:20). They are called the “clouds of heaven” (Dan. 7:13), “clouds of the sky” (Matt. 24:30), “floodgates of the sky” (Gen. 7:11), “windows above” (Isa. 24:18), “water jars of the heavens” (Job 38:37), God’s “upper chambers” (Ps. 104:3, 13), “dust beneath His feet” (Nah. 1:3).

Man's ignorance is illustrated by his inability to number the clouds (Job 38:37), to account for their spreading (36:29), to understand how God "establishes" and "layers" them (37:15–16), to cause them to rain (38:34), or stay them (38:37).

Figurative. Living much in the open air and being of a poetical nature, the people of the East would naturally make clouds figurative of many things. Thus clouds are the symbol of armies and multitudes of people (Isa. 60:8; Jer. 4:13; Heb. 12:1). The sudden disappearance of threatening clouds from the sky is a figure for the wiping out of transgressions (Isa. 44:22). A day of clouds is taken for a season of calamity and of God's judgment (Ezek. 30:3; 34:12; Joel 2:2). Naturally the cloud is a symbol of transitoriness (Job 30:15; Hos. 6:4). The cloud without rain is the proverb for the man of promise without performance (Prov. 25:14; Isa. 25:5; Jude 12). A wise ruler is said to be as the "light of ... a morning without clouds" (2 Sam. 23:4), while the favor of a king is compared to "a cloud with the spring rain" (Prov. 16:15). "Clouds that return after the rain" is figurative of the infirmities of old age; i.e., as after a rain one expects sunshine, so after pains one longs for comfort. As clouds in hot countries veil the oppressive glories of the sun, they are used to symbolize the divine presence, which they entirely or in part conceal (Ex. 16:10; 33:9; Num. 11:25; Job 22:14; Ps. 18:11–12; Isa. 19:1). See Pillar of Cloud; Shekinah.

CLOUD, PILLAR OF. See Pillar.

CNI'DUS (nî'dūs). A town at the extreme SW of Asia Minor, upon land jutting out between the islands of Rhodes and Cos (Acts 21:1). Venus was worshiped there; Paul sailed by this place (27:7).

COAL. Two Heb. words are rendered "coal" or "coals":

1. One (peḥām) would seem to be applied to coals not yet lighted. It occurs three times—twice when the smith working with the coals is mentioned (Isa. 44:12; 54:16), and in Proverbs (26:21, "as coals are to burning coals," KJV; NASB and NIV render "charcoal"), where unlighted coals must be meant.

It has been disputed whether the Hebrews had mineral coal or merely charcoal. There is strong reason, however, to believe that the former was used in ancient times. The mountains of Lebanon contain seams of coal that have been worked in recent times and were probably known to the Phoenicians. Charcoal was the "coal" in common use; thus coals of juniper or broom are mentioned (Ps. 120:4).

2. The other word (gaḥelet, "kindling") signifies an ignited or live coal, and is mentioned frequently (2 Sam. 14:7; Job 41:21; Ps. 18:8; Isa. 44:19; Ezek. 24:11; etc.); often with the addition of "burning" or of "fire" (Lev. 16:12; 2 Sam. 22:13; Isa. 6:6; etc.).

The term "live coal" (Heb. riṣpâ, Isa. 6:6, KJV) appears to have been a hot stone used for baking upon (see 1 Kings 19:6, "a bread cake baked on hot stones," Heb. reṣep).

In the NT "charcoal fire" (John 18:18) was probably made on a chafing dish, used in the East for the sake of warmth. See Fuel.

Figurative. The expression "They will extinguish my coal which is left" (2 Sam. 14:7) refers to the burning coal with which one kindles a fire and is obviously a metaphor for extinguishing one's family.

"Coals of fire" (2 Sam. 22:13; Ps. 18:12; etc.) is by some thought to be a figure for lightning proceeding from God. The flame of red-hot coals pours out of Him as out of a glowing furnace. This description is based entirely upon Ex. 19:18, where the Lord comes down upon Sinai in smoke and fire.

“You will heap burning coals on his head” (Prov. 25:22; Rom. 12:20) represents the shame and confusion which men feel when their evil is requited by good.

COAST. An inaccurate rendering of several terms, meaning border, except in the expression “sea coast.” See Seacoast, Seashore.

COASTLAND (Heb. אִי). Any maritime district; whether belonging to a continent or to an island; thus it is used of the shore of the Mediterranean (Isa. 20:6; 23:2, 6) and of the coasts of Elishah (Ezek. 27:7), i.e., of Greece and Asia Minor. Occasionally coastlands is specifically used of an island, as in Caphtos of Crete (Jer. 47:4); but more generally it is applied to any region separated from Palestine by water, as described in 25:22. The “many coastlands” (Ezek. 27:3) may have been the islands and coasts of Arabia, on the Persian Gulf and Erythraean Sea. The KJV renders this word “island” or “isle.”

COCK, THE. On tombs this is a Christian symbol of the resurrection, the herald of life after the night of death. It is also a symbol of vigilance. For the bird, see Animal Kingdom.

COCKATRICE. See Animal Kingdom: Serpent.

COCKCROWING. The habit of the cock in the East of crowing during the night at regular times gave rise to the expression “cockcrowing” to indicate a definite portion of time (Mark 13:35). The Romans called the last watch of the night, the break of day at about three o'clock, gallicinium; and the Hebrews designated the cockcrowing period by words signifying “the singing of the cock.” Among the Hebrews we find no mention of the flight of the hours of the night except the crowing of the cock. See Time.

CODE OF HAMMURABI. See Hammurabi.

COFFER. A KJV term referring to the small box the Philistines placed upon the cart with the Ark (1 Sam. 6:8, 11, 15), and in which they placed the golden mice and tumors that formed their trespass offering.

COFFIN (Heb. אָרוֹן, Gen. 50:26, “and he was ... placed in a coffin in Egypt”).

Undoubtedly a mummy chest made of sycamore wood that was deposited in a room, according to Egyptian custom, and carried away with Israel at the Exodus. See Burial; Dead, The.

The same Heb. word is rendered “chest” (2 Kings 12:10) and frequently “ark” (which see).

COIN. See Metrology: Measures of Value, or Money.

COL-HO'ZEH (kol-hō'zeh; “all-seeing”). A descendant of Judah, being the son of Hazaiah, and father of one Baruch (Neh 11:5), before 445 B.C. He also had a son named Shallum, who repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 3:15).

COLLAR. Any aperture as in Job 30:18 the opening by means of which the shirt was put on. Job, whom the Lord “smote ... with sore boils from the sole of his foot to the crown of his head,” would have found any garment painfully binding.

The term collars (from Heb. נֶזֶק) appears in the KJV of Judg. 8:26 but is replaced by “pendants” in the NASB and NIV. In Isa. 3:19 the same Heb. term is given as “chains” in the KJV, “dangling earrings” in the NASB, and “earrings” in the NIV.

COLLECTION.

1. Joash ordered a collection for the repairing of the Temple (2 Chron. 24:6, 9; NASB, “levy”; NIV, “tax”). A chest was placed by the high priest at the entrance of the Temple to receive the same. By making a distinction between this money and that given for the use of the priests a special appeal was made to the liberality of the people.

2. In the early age of the Christian church the Christians of Palestine suffered greatly from poverty, probably due to ostracism. Paul made appeals to the Gentile Christians for aid (Acts 24:17; Rom. 15:25–26; 2 Cor. 8–9; Gal. 2:10), recommending collections to be taken for this purpose on the “first day of every week” (1 Cor. 16:1–3).

COLONY. The city of Philippi was gifted by Caesar Augustus with the privileges of a colony (colonia). Antioch in Pisidia and Alexandria in Troas both possessed the same character, but Philippi is the first case to which Scripture (Acts 16:12) calls our attention to this distinction. When the Romans conquered a town they planted a body of their own citizens within it as a kind of garrison, usually to the number of three hundred. These constituted a “colony of Roman citizens” (Lat. colonia cibium Romanorum), a sort of little Rome. Such a colony was free from taxes and military duty, its position as an outpost being regarded as an equivalent. It had its own constitution (a copy of the Roman) and elected its own senate and other offices of state. To this constitution the original inhabitants had to submit (Seiffert, Dict. Class. Ant., s.v.).

COLORS. The color sense, i.e., the distinction of color impressions in sensation, perception, and nomenclature, follows the same law as all human development—the law of progress from coarse to fine. The Jews had not reached such an advanced state of art that we should expect a wide acquaintance with colors. There are not, therefore, many colors mentioned in Scripture, and these may be arranged in two classes—those applied to natural objects, and artificial mixtures employed in dyeing (which see) or painting (which see).

Natural These were five: white, black, red, yellow, and green.

White. This term embraces the relatively as well as the absolutely white. In the full sense of the word the rays of the sun and those proceeding from a body raised to white heat are white, because all the colors of the spectrum are united in them. But even the daylight is not absolutely colorless, and the direct light of the sun seems yellowish or, to speak poetically, golden. We are, therefore, prepared for a varied use of the term “white.” Thus Matthew (17:2) writes, “His garments became as white as light”; and our Lord said, “Look on the fields, that they are white (NIV, “ripe”) for harvest” (John 4:35); the ripening ears are white as distinguished from the green blade. The most common term is Heb. lābān, which is applied to such objects as milk (Gen. 49:12), manna (Ex. 16:31), snow (Isa. 1:18), horses (Zech. 1:8), and clothing (Eccles. 9:8). Hebrew ṣaḥ, “sunny,” dazzling white, is applied to the complexion (song of Sol. 5:10; NIV, “radiant”); ḥiwwār, a term of a later age, to snow (Dan. 7:9

only) and to the paleness of shame (Isa. 29:22); ṣîb, to the hair alone. Another class of terms arises from the textures of a naturally white color. These were, without doubt, primarily applied to the material; but the idea of color is also prominent, particularly in the description of the curtains of the Tabernacle (Ex. 26:1) and the priests' vestments (28:6).

Black. Black and white are the extremest contrasts in Scripture, the former being where light and its colors have vanished. But the term is used relatively and includes the dark hues that approach black. The shades of this color are expressed in the terms shḥôr, "dusky," applied to the hair (Lev. 13:31; song of Sol. 5:11); the complexion (1:5; NIV, "dark"), particularly when affected with disease (Job 30:30); horses (Zech. 6:2, 6); ḥûm, lit., "scorched," is applied to sheep (Gen. 30:32) and expresses the color produced by influence of the sun's rays; qâdar, lit., "to be dirty," is applied to a complexion blackened by sorrow or disease (Job 30:30), a clouded sky (1 Kings 18:45), night (Mic. 3:6; Jer. 4:28; Joel 2:10; 3:15), a turbid brook (whence possibly Kidron), particularly when rendered so by melted snow (Job 6:16). In many of these passages the NIV renders "dark" or "darkened" for "black."

Red (Heb. ādôm) is applied to blood (2 Kings 3:22), a garment sprinkled with blood (Isa. 63:2), a heifer (Num. 19:2), stew made of lentils (Gen. 25:30), a horse (Zech. 1:8; 6:2), wine (Prov. 23:31), the complexion (Gen. 25:25; song of Sol. 5:10; Lam. 4:7, NASB and NIV, "ruddy"). Reddish is applied to a leprous spot (Lev. 13:19; 14:37). Śārōq, lit., "fox-colored," "bay," is applied to a horse (KJV, "speckled"; NIV, "red," Zech. 1:8) and to a species of vine bearing a purple grape (Isa. 5:2, NASB, see marg.). This color was symbolical of bloodshed (Zech. 6:2; Rev. 6:4; 12:3).

Yellow. This seems to have been regarded as a shade of green, for the same term greenish is applied to gold (Heb. yfraqaq, Ps. 68:13; NIV, "shining gold"), and to the leprous spot (Lev. 13:49).

Green, though frequently used, seldom refers to color. The Heb. terms are raʿānān, applied to what is "vigorous" and "flourishing" (Job 15:32; Ps. 52:8); also used of that which is "fresh," as oil (Ps. 92:10); and yereq, having the radical signification of "putting forth," "sprouting," and is used indiscriminately for all food products of the earth (Gen. 1:30; 9:3; Ex. 10:15; Isa. 15:6). Sometimes it is used for the sickly yellowish hue of mildewed grain (see Mildew), and also for the entire absence of color produced by fear (Jer. 30:6, "pale"). "Green" is used incorrectly in the KJV for white (Gen. 30:37; Esther 1:6), young or new (Lev. 2:14; 23:14), moist or fresh (Judg. 16:7–8), sappy or well watered (Job 8:16), and unripe or early (song of Sol. 2:13).

Artificial. These were four: purple, blue, red (or crimson), and vermilion. Dyeing, although known at an early period (Gen. 38:28; Ex. 26:1), is not noticed as a profession in the Bible; and the Jews were probably indebted to the Egyptians and Phoenicians for their dyes and the method of applying them. These dyes were purple (light and dark, the latter being the "blue" of the NASB and KJV) and crimson; vermilion was introduced later.

Purple (Heb. argāmān). A brilliant red-blue color prized by the ancients for dyeing garments (Prov. 31:22; Jer. 10:9). The chief source of the famous Tyrian purple was the tiny mollusk (Murex trunculus) found along the coast of Phoenicia and adjacent lands. It was exported far and wide as a staple commodity of Phoenician commerce (Ezek. 27:7, 16). Murex shells were found at the seaport of ancient Ugarit (modern Ras Shamra) demonstrating that purple was manufactured there about 1400 B.C. Great labor was required to extract the purple dye and hence only royalty and the wealthy could afford the resulting richly colored garments (Esther 8:15; Dan. 5:7; 1 Macc. 10:20, 62, 64; 2 Macc. 4:38; Luke 16:19; Rev. 17:4). Such a robe was placed on Jesus as a jest, making mockery of His claims to kingship. Purple prefiguring Christ's kingship was largely used in the Mosaic Tabernacle (Ex. 25:4; 26:1, 31, 36) and in the high priest's dress (28:5–6, 15; 39:29).

“The dye taken from these shellfish is not their blood, but the slimy secretion of a gland which they have in common with all snails. This secretion is not at first red or violet, but whitish. When exposed to the sunlight, however, it begins to color like a photographic surface, and, passing through shades of yellow and green, settles into the purple color, which is a combination of red and violet light; this mixed color, having sometimes more of a blue, sometimes more of a red hue, is ineffaceable. Purple was a monopoly of the Phoenicians. They, not only on their own but on other coasts, discovered shellfish yielding purple; but the oldest site of the purple trade was Tyre itself. At the present day, in the neighborhood of the miserable ruined village that bears the name of Tyre, there are found traces of these purple dyeworks that were celebrated far into the Christian era. Purple was still costly in the time of the Roman supremacy. A mantle of the best purple of Tyre, such as the luxurious habits of the empire required, cost ten thousand sesterces, i.e., over five hundred dollars” (Delitzsch, Iris, p. 65). Robes of a purple color were worn by kings (Judg. 8:26) and by the highest officers, civil and religious. They were also worn by the wealthy (Jer. 10:9; Ezek. 27:7; Luke 16:19; Rev. 17:4; 18:16).

Blue (Heb. tāqēlet). This dye came from a species of shellfish found on the coast of Phoenicia and called by modern naturalists Helix Ianthina. The tint is best explained by the statements of Josephus (Ant. 3.7.7) and Philo that it was emblematic of the sky, in which case it represents, not the light blue of our northern climate, but the deep dark hue of the eastern sky. The KJV has rightly described the tint in Esther 1:6 (marg.) as violet. This color was used in the same way as purple. Princes and nobles (Ezek. 23:6; Ecclus. 40:4) and the idols of Babylon (Jer. 10:9) were clothed in robes of this color; the tassles of the Hebrew dress were to be of this color (Num. 15:38).

Red or Crimson (Isa. 1:18; Jer. 4:30; etc.). This color is expressed in Heb. by several different terms: Shānî (Gen. 38:28–30), tôlacat-shānî (Ex. 25:4), or simply tôlacat (Isa. 1:18); karmîl (NASB and NIV, “crimson,” 2 Chron. 2:7, 14; 3:14) was introduced at a late period, probably from Armenia, to express the same color. The first term expresses the brilliancy of the color, the second the worm or grub from which the dye was procured. This is a small insect the size of a pea, which draws its nourishment from the oak and other plants by piercing them, the tint produced being crimson rather than scarlet. The only natural object to which it is applied in Scripture is the lips, which are compared to a “scarlet thread” (song of Sol. 4:3). Robes of this color were worn by the wealthy (2 Sam. 1:24; Prov. 31:21; Jer. 4:30; Lam. 4:5, NASB, see marg.; Rev. 17:4). This color was among the Greeks and Romans the proper color for the military cloak; and so it is a scarlet cloak which, according to Matthew, is put on Jesus by the soldiers in Pilate's judgment hall. Mark and John say “purple,” for the language of the people did not distinguish the two kinds of red. See article Scarlet.

Vermilion (Heb. shāshēr). This was a pigment used in fresco paintings, either for drawing figures of idols on the walls of temples (Ezek. 23:14; NIV, “red”), for coloring the idols themselves (Wisdom of Sol. 13:14), or for decorating the walls and beams of houses (Jer. 22:14, NASB and NIV, “red”). Vermilion was a favorite color among the Assyrians, as is still attested to by the sculptures of Nimroud and Khorsabad.

Sacred, or Sacerdotal. Purple, blue, scarlet, and white were the four colors prescribed by Moses. Of four colors were the ten curtains of the Tabernacle, the veil, the curtain that hung at the entrance of the Holy Place, and the entrance into the court; the ephod, the girdle, and the breastplate of the high priest. Of three colors, namely, blue, purple, and scarlet, were the pomegranates that adorned the robe of the ephod. Of one color, white, were his under robe and miter, or turban; of blue were the fifty loops of the curtain, the cord by which the breastplate was fastened to the ephod, and that by which the diadem was attached to the miter. Of one color also, sometimes blue, sometimes purple, were the coverings of the sacred furniture of the Tabernacle when it was carried from place to place; and of one color, white, were the clothes of the ordinary priests, with, probably, the exception of the varicolored girdle or sash.

Figurative. White has a direct significance because light is white. White denotes purity or, what is nearly the same, holiness. The priests wore white as servants of the Holy One and as examples in holiness. White was also the ground color of the veil that divided the sanctuary, of the curtains, and of the attire of the high priest. Garments of salvation are certainly garments of light (Ps. 27:1, “The Lord is my light and my salvation”; cf. Rev. 19:8). White was also the sign of festivity (Eccles. 9:8) and triumph (Zech. 6:3; Rev. 6:2). As the color of light (cf. Matt. 17:2), white was the symbol of glory and majesty (Dan. 7:9; Ezek. 9:3; Matt. 28:3; John 20:12).

Black, as the opposite of white or light, denotes mourning, affliction, calamity, and death (KJV, Jer. 14:2; Lam. 4:8; 5:10). It was also the sign of humiliation (Mal. 3:14, lit., “in black”) and the omen of evil (Zech. 6:2; Rev. 6:5).

Red is the color of fire, and therefore of life; the blood is red because life is a fiery process. But red, as contrasted with white, is the color of selfish, covetous, passionate life. Sin is called red inasmuch as it is a burning heat that consumes man (Isa. 1:18). Red (crimson), as representing blood, designates the life principle of man and beast (Gen. 9:4–6) and the essential element of atonement (Isa. 63:2; Heb. 9:22).

Green was the emblem of freshness, vigor, and prosperity (Pss. 52:8; 92:14).

Blue. The purple blue, or hyacinth, points to heaven, and was the symbol of revelation. Among the Hebrews it was the Jehovah color, the symbol of the revealed God (cf. Ex. 24:10; Ezek. 1:26). Delitzsch says: “Blue denotes the softened divine majesty condescending to man in grace” (Iris, p. 48). It also represented reward.

Purple, the dress of kings, was associated with royalty and majesty (Judg. 8:26; Esther 8:15; song of Sol. 3:10; 7:5; Dan. 5:7, 16, 29). M.F.U.

COLOS’SAE, or Colos’se (ko-lo-se). A city of mercantile importance on the Lycus, in Phrygia, about twelve miles above Laodicea. The most competent commentators think that the Christian church there was founded by Epaphras (Col. 1:2, 7; 4:12) and believe 2:1 proves that Paul had not been there previous to writing the epistle. The city was destroyed by an earthquake in the ninth year of Nero and was then rebuilt.

The modern town Chonas is near the ruins. See Sherman E. Johnson, "Laodicea and Its Neighbors," Biblical Archaeologist 13, no. 1 (1950): 5–7.

COLOS'SIANS, BOOK OF. An epistle of Paul written apparently from his Roman imprisonment (Acts 28:30–31; Col. 4:3, 10, 18). Belonging also to this third group of Pauline epistles are Philemon, Ephesians, and Philipians.

Occasion and Date. The epistle is a strong polemic against a Judaic-Gnostic heresy with its ceremonialism and doctrine of emanations. This unsound teaching sought to reduce Christianity to a legal system and Christ to the position of a lesser god. Paul directed the impact of revealed truth against the Jewish element (circumcision, meats, drinks, fast days, new moons, and Sabbaths; 2:11–16), an ascetic element (2:20–23), and a false philosophical and speculative element (2:8), with the worship of intermediary beings (2:18–19). Apparently, Epaphras and his colleagues were unable to handle this situation and went to Rome to consult Paul about it (1:7–8). The letter of reply was sent by Tychicus and Onesimus (4:7–9) toward the middle of Paul's two-year imprisonment at Rome, about A.D. 60.

Plan. Paul attacks the errors at Colossae by the clear presentation of counter truths. After first giving thanks for the Colossians' achievements and interceding for their progress (1:1–12), he expounds the supremacy of Christ over all principalities and powers (1:13–19), the fullness of His redemption (1:20–23), and his own hardship in making known the gospel message (1:24–2:3). He warns the Colossian church against philosophic errors that set aside the provision of full deliverance from sin and freedom from legalism (2:4–15). He warns them accordingly to reject ritual prescriptions and the worship of inferior beings (2:16–19), emphasizing their complete position in Christ (2:20–3:4). He urges them to appropriate Christ's death and resurrection in practical Christian living (3:5–17) and in discharging the various special relations of life (3:18–4:6). He explains the mission of Tychicus and Onesimus (4:7–9) and sends salutations (4:10–17), ending with a benediction (4:18).

COLUMNS OF A BOOK (Heb. delet). In Jer. 36:23 it is said that “when Jehudi had read three or four columns, the king cut it [the roll] with a scribe's knife.” The columns were the four-cornered squares into which the rolls were divided.

COMFORT (Heb. nāham, “to comfort,” “give forth sighs”; Gk. parakaleō, to “call alongside,” “help”). Our English word is from Lat. confortare (con fortis), “to strengthen much,” and means to ease, encourage, inspire, enliven.

As pertaining to the life of the believer it is the consolation and support that results from the gracious work of the indwelling Comforter, making clear to him his part in the great redemption, assuring him of the Savior's love, and imparting peace and joy. The Gk. noun is often translated Helper (which see) in the NT. See also Holy Ghost.

COMFORTER, THE See Holy Spirit.

COMING OF CHRIST, THE. This great event, so prominent in both the OT and the NT, is a subject of much controversy, hostility, and ignorance. It has been commonly set forth as one great cataclysmic event ending time and ushering in eternity with a concomitant so-called general resurrection and general judgment. This view, however, involves insuperable difficulties when the aggregate teaching of the Word is approached inductively. The various scriptural statements can only be reconciled under the view that the coming of the Christ will consist of two phases—a coming for His church, the Body of Christ (1 Thess. 4:13–18; 1 Cor. 15:53; 2 Thess. 2:1; Rev. 3:10), and a coming with His church (Rev. 19:11–16). His coming for His church will result in its removal from the earthly scene to heaven. This climactic event will usher in a period of trouble at the end of the age, known as Daniel's seventieth week. At the conclusion of this period (at least seven years in length) in which human wickedness and rebellion will reach their height, Christ will return with His glorified saints to conquer His enemies (Ps. 2; Zech. 14; Isa. 11) and to set up His millennial kingdom. This mediatorial Davidic kingdom will be the last of God's ordered ages in time. Only after it has run its course and Satan is loosed and all sinners judged (Rev. 20:11–15) will the eternal state be brought in. M.F.U.

COMMERCE. The exchange of products among men must have begun with the earliest history of mankind. The descendants of Cain in Gen. 4 initiated urban living, articles of art and craftsmanship (4:21–22), and engaged in commerce. The construction of the Noahic ark implied interchange of goods.

Babylonia. Among the early pre-Semitic Sumerians artistic craftsmanship and trade flourished as revealed by the exquisite jewelry and art objects recovered from the royal tombs at Ur dating no later than 2500 B.C. From the earliest levels of Mesopotamian cities evidences of extended commerce are recovered. Babylonia was from most ancient times a great merchant nation dispensing wares by canal and riverboat and by desert caravan. The city of Ur was a center of all kinds of manufacture, especially woolen goods. Babylonian merchants scattered widely, not only trafficking in their goods but peddling their arts and cuneiform system of writing. The Assyrian merchants invented the idea of checks—clay tablets denominating equivalent worth in silver. Ancient Sumerian and Akkadian kings imported cedarwood from Lebanon. The Fertile Crescent was a veritable beehive of camel caravans and river-going ships. Early syndicates of merchants controlled these trade routes stretching between Ur on the Lower Euphrates, Mari on the Middle Euphrates, and Palmyra and Damascus westward, linking the lucrative trade marts of Egypt via Palestine-Syria.

Phoenicia. It was one of the greatest merchant nations of antiquity. Probably before 2400 B.C. they sailed boats between the coastal emporiums and Egypt; through the centuries there was a continuous flow of commerce between Tyre, Sidon, Gebal (Byblos), and Egypt. The latter city was especially known for the papyrus trade, lucrative commerce in Tyrian dyes and other commodities, as well as images of the goddess Astarte and the “Lady of Byblos.” Tyre and Sidon as great commercial markets appear prominently in the OT (Isa. 23:8; Ezek. 27).

Egypt. Egyptians engaged early in land and sea traffic. They imported cedarwood from Lebanon, pine from Cilicia, amber from the shores of the Baltic, and tin to alloy copper for making bronze. Tiny Palestine was the bridge over which the ceaseless camel-caravan traffic flowed. Such a caravan laden with spices and perhaps nuts, balm, and other commodities carried Joseph into Egypt (Gen. 39:1). Egyptian sailors plied the Red Sea. Caravan routes extended S carrying Egyptian grain in exchange for many exotic products.

Israel. Until Solomon’s time the Hebrews were a simple agricultural and pastoral people. Solomon’s diplomacy, foreign marriages, his control of the trade routes, his traffic in horses and chariots (1 Kings 10:28–29) between Kue (Cilicia) and Egypt, his construction of chariot cities, and his voyages with Hiram of Tyre to Ophir (9:26–28; 10:22) yielded the king an immense revenue and greatly extended Hebrew commerce. It is now known that Solomon’s smelteries had their counterparts in Phoenician metal refineries of Sardinia and Spain. Solomon’s fleets putting out from Ezion-Geber laden with smelted ore brought back valuable goods obtainable in Arabian ports or from the adjacent coasts of Africa. Solomon’s affluence was perhaps never equaled by his successors, but thereafter trade not only flourished through Palestine but the Jews enjoyed in their markets, or suks, exotic wares from Babylonia, Assyria, the Land of the Hittites, Egypt, Arabia, and far-off Ophir. After the Babylonian captivity the commercial bent of the people was even more permanently fixed, and they never regained the simple pastoral nature or their economy of the earlier period.

Greece (c. 700 B.C.). The Greeks became noted as great seagoing merchants in the Mediterranean world. As early as 650 B.C. they had trading posts in Egypt. Oil, wine, honey, and exquisite Greek pottery were transported wherever ships could sail in the ancient civilized world. In this commercial activity they were preceded in the Aegean area by the highly developed culture and commerce of the Minoans and Mycenaeans—roughly contemporary with Moses and the period of the Judges.

Aramaeans. From the sixth century on Aramaean merchants became prominent all over the Fertile Crescent, and they extended their commodities, culture, and language so that the cumbersome cuneiform language was pushed out, and later even Heb. became a virtually dead language. As a result, by the first century A.D. Aram. was the lingua franca of all SW Asia; it was therefore the native language of Jesus and His disciples.

COMMISSIONER (Aram. sārak, for the Heb. shōtēr, and used only in Dan. 6; the KJV reads “presidents,” and the NIV, “administrators”). According to Dan. 6:2 Darius not only appointed 120 satraps for all the provinces and districts of his kingdom, but he also placed the whole body of satraps under a government council consisting of three commissioners who were to deal with the individual satraps. This triumverate, or higher authority of three, was not newly instituted by Darius, but already existed in the Chaldean kingdom under Belshazzar (5:7) and was only continued by Darius. Daniel was one of the commissioners.

COMMUNION. See Lord’s Supper.

COMMUNITY OF GOODS, CHRISTIANITY versus Communism. The infant church in Acts presents us with a type of Christian community of goods that was the result of spiritual revival. “And all those who had believed were together, and had all things in common,” etc. (Acts 2:44). “And the congregation of those who believed were of one heart and soul; and not one of them claimed that anything belonging to him was his own; but all things were common property to them,” etc. (4:32). Some have construed this as a picture of Christian Communism. In view of the widespread advance of Marxist Communism in the world today it is necessary to see the unique features of this early Christian community of goods in the book of Acts.

First, it took place only in Jerusalem and was probably the result of the abysmal poverty of the church in that city on one hand and spiritual revival on the other. There is no trace of it in any other church. On the contrary, the rich and poor continued to live side by side in what was evidently a free capitalistic society (1 Cor. 16:2; 2 Cor. 9:5–7; 1 Tim. 6:17; James 5:1–2).

This community of goods was not ordained as a legal necessity in contrast to the contemporary Essenes (which see). It was purely voluntary as it developed from the free working of the Holy Spirit in revival power (Acts 5:3–4).

Ananias’s sin was in his pretending to give more than he really had, an exhibition of base hypocrisy in the midst of heaven-sent revival. The community of property practiced by the infant church was a reflection of that community of goods that existed in the case of Jesus Himself and His disciples, the want of all being paid for from a common treasury. Modern-day Communism is an attempt to achieve a classless society where all exploitation of man by man will disappear, each one contributing according to his ability and receiving according to his need in an environment of plenty for all, in the process of the development of which the state, essentially a coercive agency in the hands of an oligarchy, will pass away.

The tragic blunder of Marxist Communism is its anti-God, anti-Christ program devoid of any morality, lacking respect for individual personality, and bereft of the fine ethical and spiritual qualities that only the Jewish-Christian spiritual heritage contained in the OT and NT can supply. A definition of Communism specifies a type of highly socialized civilization that has never yet been attained, but toward which the communist party of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics strives. To understand Marxist Communism fully, one must scrutinize the type of society that is the communist dream and the underlying philosophy motivating Communists to seek the realization of that society.

Karl Marx (1818–83) and Freidrich Engels (1820–95) created a theory of Communism, borrowing various philosophical ideas from Hegel, David Smith, Claude St. Simon, and Francois Fourier. Lenin and Stalin, somewhat revising the Marx-Engels definition of the state to come, gave a description that is now cited by communist parties of the USSR and other countries. This system would include the public and collective ownership of productive means in contrast to private ownership, a highly planned industrial and agricultural economy, replacement of class distinctions and state power by free association of city and farm workers, abandonment of Socialism “from each according to his ability, from each according to his work” for Communism “from each according to his ability to each according to his needs,” a free realization of personality for the individual because of elimination of personal economic concern, and encouragement of art and science.

The blunders of Marxist (rather, Soviet) Communism are these: (1) a realization of the blessings of God without God; (2) a realization of material blessings without spiritual values; (3) a realization of freedom through slavery; (4) the dream that artistic, scientific advancement and economic security can solve all man’s difficulties; (5) asserting the highest collective good by denying the worth of the individual human personality.

To the purely natural, materialistic-minded person Communism is attractive. However, it strikes violently at Jesus’ teaching: “For what will a man be profited, if he gains the whole world and forfeits his soul? Or what will a man give in exchange for his soul?” (Matt. 16:26). In its advocacy of the violent, bloody overthrow of capitalistic society, communist theory acknowledges and its practices show a complete disregard of ethical and moral restraint in its subversive activities, its home administration, its international diplomacy, or any phase of its dealings. Murder, hatred, dishonesty, deceit, and treachery—anything that actually forwards their cause is acceptable to them. Their materialism completely disregards spirituality. Soviet Communism in its growing power is a massive demoniacal system that constitutes perhaps the greatest threat to the Christian church that has ever arisen.

Many teach that the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth chapters of Ezekiel give the prophetic name of the last Soviet dictator, Gog, head of the great northern confederacy (Ezek. 38:1–6), including Turkey and oil-rich Iran, called Persia in prophetic Scripture. They hold that in the last days this Russian leader will inaugurate a gigantic invasion against the land of Palestine where Israel will be reinstated and regathered. This battle evidently takes place after the beginning of Daniel’s seventieth week (Dan. 9:27) and about the middle or just before the middle of the seventieth week.

What a delusion this is that promises man happiness, freedom, and security without God. It is another of man’s utopian dreams vainly envisioning full realization of a desired destiny apart from his Creator and Redeemer. Whatever high-tide spiritual revival cannot accomplish in this present sinful world, Communism vainly tries to accomplish apart from God and in open opposition to God. What tragic pitfalls it offers to poor, sin-laden humanity! What a rebuke its zeal and consecration constitute to present-day, lackadaisical, worldly, materialistic-minded Christianity. M.F.U.

COMPASS (Heb. mēḥûgâ). An architect's tool which, as the Heb. word suggests ("circle"), was used to define round or circular measurement (Isa. 44:13).

COMPASSION. In many instances compassion is the rendering of Heb. words elsewhere translated mercy (which see). It is also the rendering of the Heb. ḥāmal (to "be gentle, clement"; "concern" in the NIV), as in 1 Sam. 23:21. In Ex. 2:6 the rendering is "pity" and in 1 Sam. 15:3, 15; 2 Sam. 21:7 it is rendered "spared," as in 2 Chron. 36:15, 17 where we read that God "had compassion on His people and on His dwelling place," i.e., He spared them. It is written that "the Lord is full of compassion" (James 5:11), and that "just as a father has compassion on his children, so the Lord has compassion on those who fear Him" (Ps. 103:13).

CONANI'AH (cō-na-nī'ah). The Levitical brother of Shemei who was charged with preparing storage space in the Temple and caring for the contributions placed therein according to the command of King Hezekiah (2 Chron. 31:12, 13; 35:9).

CONCISION (Gk. katatomē, "cutting down, mutilation"). A contemptuous term used by Paul (Phil. 3:2, KJV) to denote the zealous advocates of circumcision, as though he would say, "Keep your eye on that boasted circumcision, or, to call it by its true name, 'concision,' or 'mutilation.'" The NASB renders "false circumcision," marg., lit., "mutilation."

In Gal. 5:12 Paul speaks more pointedly; "Would that those who are troubling you would even mutilate themselves," marg., "cut themselves off."

CONCUBINE (Heb. pīlegesh, derivation uncertain). A secondary or inferior wife.

Roman and Greek. Among the Romans it was only at a comparatively late period that concubinage acquired any kind of legal sanction, and the concubine came to be substituted for the mistress. Among the Greeks, however, the distinction between wife and concubine was established early, the former being for the begetting of legitimate children and taking charge of the affairs of the house, the other for performing daily ministrations about the person.

Hebrew. Concubinage came early into general practice, for we read (Gen. 22:24) of Bethuel, the father of Rebekah, having not only his wife Milcah, but also a concubine, Reumah, who bore him four children. Indeed, concubinage substantially appeared when Abraham took Hagar as a sort of wife, by whom Sarah hoped he would have children—to be reckoned, in some sense, as her own, and to take rank as proper members of the family (16:1–3). In the next generation of the chosen family we find no mention of a state of concubinage; Isaac seems to have had no partner to his bed but Rebekah and no children but Esau and Jacob. But the evil reappears in the next generation in an aggravated form: Esau multiplying wives at pleasure, and Jacob taking first two wives and then two concubines.

Nor was the practice ever wholly discontinued among the Israelites, for we see that the following men had concubines, namely, Eliphaz (Gen. 36:12), Gideon (Judg. 8:30–31), Saul (2 Sam. 3:7), David (5:13), Solomon (1 Kings 11:3), Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:21), Abijah (13:21). Indeed, in process of time concubinage appears to have degenerated into a regular custom among the Jews, and the institutions of Moses were directed to prevent excess and abuse by wholesome laws and regulations (Ex. 21:7–9; Deut. 21:10–14). The unfaithfulness of a concubine was considered criminal (2 Sam. 3:7–8) and was punished with scourging (Lev. 19:20). In Judg. 19 the possessor of a concubine was called her “husband,” her father is called the “father-in-law,” and he the “son-in-law,” showing how nearly the concubine approached to the wife.

Sometimes, to avoid debauchery, a female slave would be given to the son, was then considered as one of the children of the house, and retained her rights as concubine even after the marriage of the son (Ex. 21:9–10).

Christianity restores the sacred institution of marriage to its original character, and concubinage is ranked with fornication and adultery (Matt. 19:5; 1 Cor. 7:2). Still the practice of concubinage yielded only in the slowest and most gradual manner even to our Lord’s explicit teachings.

CONCUPISCENCE (Gk. ἐπιθυμία, a “longing,” Rom. 7:8; Col. 3:5; 1 Thess 4:5). A KJV term referring to evil desire, generally in the sense of indwelling sin. The NASB renders “coveting,” “evil desire,” and “lustful passion.” The NIV translates “covetous desire,” “evil desires,” and “passionate lust.”

CONDEMNATION. The Gk. word krima is translated “judgment” and (often wrongly) “damnation.” Condemnation signifies the declaring of an evildoer to be guilty; the punishment inflicted (1 Cor. 11:32, 34); testimony by good example against malefactors (Matt. 12:41–42). We use the word with the lighter meaning of censure, disapproval, blame, etc. As far as the justified believer is concerned, he faces no condemnation or judgment (Rom. 8:1). The guilt of his sin has been removed (Rom. 3:7), and he stands positionally “in Christ” and hence accepted “in the Beloved” (Eph. 1:6).

CONDUIT (Heb. תְּעָלָה, a “channel,” Job 38:25; “trench,” 1 Kings 18:32–38). The aqueduct made by Hezekiah to convey the water from the upper spring of Gihon into the western part of Jerusalem (2 Kings 18:17; 20:20; Isa. 7:3; 36:2). It was a tunnel (discovered in 1880) cut through solid rock from both ends for a total of about seventeen hundred feet. Evidently it was constructed just before the attack of Sennacherib of Assyria in 701 B.C. It seems to have been at first an open trench, but closed with masonry at the approach of the Assyrians. The aqueduct, though much injured and not serviceable for water beyond Bethlehem, still exists; the water is conveyed from about two miles S of Bethlehem, crossing the valley of Hinnom on a bridge of nine arches.

CONEY. See Animal Kingdom: Rock Badger.

CONFECTION. A KJV term for perfume (so NASB, Ex. 30:55) made for use in the Temple. In the NIV (Ezek. 27:17), a word that may refer to a kind of cake (cf. NASB marg.).

CONFECTOR. See Handicrafts: Perfumer; Oils and Ointment; Perfume.

CONFESSION (Heb. from yādâ, lit., to “use,” i.e., extend the hand). Used in the OT in the sense of acknowledging one’s sin (Lev. 5:5; Job 40:14; Ps. 32:5). In the prayer of Solomon at the dedication of the Temple he uses the expression “confess Thy name” (1 Kings 8:33, 35; 2 Chron. 6:24, 26), doubtless meaning the acknowledgment of Jehovah as the one against whom the Israelites might sin, and the justice of punishment meted out by Him.

The Gk. word rendered “confession” is homologeō, lit., to “say the same thing,” i.e., not to deny and so to admit or declare one’s self guilty of what he is accused. It is also used in the sense of a profession, implying the yielding or change of one’s conviction (John 12:42; Rom. 10:9–10; 1 Tim. 6:13; etc.).

CONFUSION OF TONGUES. See Babel; Tongues, Speaking in.

CONGREGATION (Heb. ēdā, “assembly,” môēd, “festive gathering”).

The Hebrew People. The term referred to the Hebrew people in a collective capacity under their peculiar aspect as a holy community, held together by religious rather than political bonds. Sometimes it is used in a broad sense as inclusive of foreign settlers (Ex. 12:19); but more properly as exclusively appropriate to the Hebrew element of the population (Num. 15:15, NASB, “assembly”; NIV, “community”). Every circumcised Hebrew was a member of the congregation and took part in its proceedings, probably from the time that he bore arms. It is important, however, to observe that he acquired no political rights in his individual capacity, but only as a member of a house; for the basis of the Hebrew polity was the house, from which was formed in an ascending scale the family or collection of houses, the tribe or collection of families, and the congregation or collection of tribes.

The Comitia, or Legislative Assemblies. The persons composing the Comitia were judges, heads of families, genealogists (Heb. shōtīm), elders, and the princes of the tribes. These representatives formed the congregation. Cf. Ex. 12:3, “the congregation of Israel”; v. 21, “the elders of Israel”; further, Deut. 31:28, where we read, “the elders of your tribes and your officers”; and in v. 30, “all the assembly of Israel” (KJV, “all the congregation of Israel”). Thus both expressions are in every case identical, and congregation or assembly of Israel means the people of Israel present in their representatives.

Meetings. The Comitia was convened by the judge or ruler for the time being, or, in case of his absence, by the high priest (Josh. 23:1–2; Num. 10:2–4). The place of assembling appears to have been at the door of the Tabernacle (Num. 10:3; 1 Sam. 10:17); although some other place, commonly of some celebrity, might be selected (Josh. 24:1; 1 Sam. 11:14–15; 1 Kings 12:1). While in the wilderness the summons was given by blowing the holy trumpets; the blowing of one trumpet being the signal for a select convention, composed merely of the heads of the clans or associated families, and of the princes of the tribes; the blowing of two trumpets, the signal for convening the great assembly, composed not only of the above, but also of the elders, judges, genealogists, and, in some instances, of the whole body of the people (Num. 10:2–4). When Israel was settled in Palestine, notification of the assembly was sent by messengers.

Powers. In the congregation the rights of sovereignty were exercised, such as declaring war (Judg. 20:1, 11–14), making peace (21:13–20), and concluding treaties (Josh. 9:15–21). Civil rulers and generals, and eventually kings, were chosen (1 Sam. 10:17–24; 2 Sam. 5:1–3; 1 Kings 12:20). The congregation acted without instructions from the people, on its own authority, and according to its own views; still it was in the habit of proposing to the people its decisions for ratification (1 Sam. 11:14–15; cf. Josh. 8:33).

In the later periods of Jewish history the congregation was represented by the Sanhedrin (which see), and the term Synagogue (which see), applied in the LXX exclusively to the congregation, was transferred to the place of meeting. In Acts 13:43, however, it is used in a modern sense of an assemblage.

CONI'AH (cō-nī'a). Another form of Jehoiachin (which see).

CONSCIENCE (Lat. conscientia, “consciousness”; Gk. suneidēsis). The awareness that a proposed act is or is not conformable to one’s ideal of right and manifesting itself in the feeling of obligation or duty. The OT usually expresses the idea as “having [something] on the heart” (so the NIV in Gen. 20:5, 6; 1 Sam. 25:31; Job 27:6). Conscience is not so much a distinct faculty of the mind, like perception, memory, etc., as an exercise of the judgment and the power of feeling, as employed with reference to moral truth. It implies the moral sense “to discern good and evil” (Heb. 5:14) and a feeling, more or less strong, of responsibility. Thus it will appear to be wrong to name conscience “the voice of God,” although it is true that the testimony of conscience certainly rests on the foundation of a divine law in man, the existence of which, its claims and judgments, are removed from his subjective control.

If a man knows his doing to be in harmony with this law his conscience is good (Acts 23:1; 1 Tim. 1:5, 19; Heb. 13:18; 1 Pet. 3:16, 21), pure (1 Tim. 3:9; 2 Tim. 1:3), and void of offense. If what he does is evil, so also is his conscience, inasmuch as it is conscious of such evil (Heb. 10:22); it is defiled (Titus 1:15; 1 Cor. 8:7) when it is stained by evil deeds; or seared with a branding iron (1 Tim. 4:2) when it is branded with its evil deeds, or cauterized, i.e., made insensible to all feeling.

Paul lays down the law that a man should follow his own conscience, even though it be weak; otherwise moral personality would be destroyed (1 Cor. 8:10–13; 10:29).

CONSECRATION. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words. It is the act of setting apart any person or thing to the worship or service of God.

The Law of Moses. This law ordained that the firstborn, both of man and beast, should be consecrated to Jehovah; also that all the race of Abraham was in a peculiar manner consecrated to His worship, whereas the tribe of Levi and family of Aaron were more immediately consecrated to His service (Ex. 13:2; Num. 3:12; 1 Pet. 2:9). There were also consecrations, voluntary and of temporary or abiding nature (see Vow). Thus Hannah devoted her son Samuel to a lifetime of service in the Tabernacle (1 Sam. 1:11); and David and Solomon appointed the Nethinim or Temple servants to a similar service in the Temple (Ezra 8:20). The Hebrews sometimes devoted to the Lord their fields and cattle, spoils taken in war (Lev. 27:28–29), vessels (Josh. 6:19), profits (Mic. 4:13), individuals (Num. 6:2–13; 1 Sam. 1:11; Luke 1:15), and nations (Ex. 19:6).

In the NT all Christians are consecrated persons. They are not only “a holy nation” but also “a royal priesthood” (1 Pet. 2:9). The NT also recognizes special consecrations, as to the work of the Christian ministry or to some particular service connected with it (Acts 13:2–3; 1 Cor. 12:28). See Ordination.

CONSOLATION. See Comfort; Holy Ghost.

CONSTELLATIONS. See Astronomy; Star.

CONSUMPTION. The translation in the KJV of two Heb. words, one referring to a wasting disease (cf. KJV, NIV, and NASB of Lev. 26:16; Deut. 28:23) and the other to an end or consummation of things (Isa. 10:22–23; 28:22; NIV, “destruction”).

CONTAMINATION (Heb. nega; Gk. alisgēma), a Hellenistic word (Acts 15:20).

The contamination referred to here alludes to meat sacrificed to idols. After the sacrifice was concluded, a portion of the victim was given to the priests, the rest being eaten in honor of the gods, either in the temples or a private house. Some salted the flesh and laid it up for future use, while others sold it in the market (1 Cor 10:25; cf. 8:1, 7, 10). Of course this flesh, having been offered to idols, was an abomination to the Jews; any use of it was thought to infect the user with idolatry. The Council of Jerusalem directed that converts decline invitations to such feasts and refrain from the use of such meat, that no offense might be given (Acts 15:28–29). The OT use (so translated only in the NIV) refers to objects that have become impure ceremonially by mildew or other means (Lev. 13:47, 49, 52, 54). The NASB renders the Heb. nega “mark.”

CONTENTMENT (Gk. autarkeia). The word means “sufficiency” and is so rendered in 2 Cor. 9:8. It is that disposition of mind in which one is, through grace, independent of outward circumstances (Phil. 4:11; 1 Tim. 6:6, 8), so as not to be moved by envy (James 3:16), anxiety (Matt. 6:24, 34), and discontent (1 Cor. 10:10).

CONTRACT. See Covenant.

CONVERSION (Gk. epistrophē, Acts 15:3, rendered “conversion,” lit., “turning toward”). A term denoting, in its theological use, the “turning” of a soul from sin to God. The verb (epistrephō) is sometimes rendered in the NT “to convert,” sometimes simply “to turn.” In its active sense it represents the action of one who is instrumental in “turning” or “converting” others (Luke 1:16; Acts 26:18; James 5:19–20); intransitively, the action of men in their own conversion, i.e., the action of men empowered by divine grace to “turn” from sin “toward” God (Acts 3:19).

The Heb. terms of the OT have a similar significance and use (Pss. 19:7; 51:13; Jer. 31:18; Ezek. 33:11). There is a measure of freedom in Scripture in the use of these terms that should put us on our guard against attempts at too rigid a definition. But in a general way it may be said that conversion in the Scriptures has a more exact and restricted meaning than is ascribed to it in common religious phraseology. Conversion is not justification, or regeneration, or assurance of reconciliation, however closely these blessings may be connected with true conversion. Like repentance and faith, both involved in conversion, conversion is an act of man which he is enabled to perform by divine grace.

Justification and regeneration are acts of God, which He invariably accomplishes for those who are converted, i.e., for those who, with repentance and faith, “turn” away from sin “toward” Him (Acts 3:19). For a full and discriminating statement of the doctrine of conversion, see Pope, Comp. Christian Doc., 3:367–71. See Repentance.

CONVICTION (Gk. elegchō, to “convict,” “reprove,” John 8:46, KJV, “convinceth”; NIV, “prove”; in 1 Cor. 14:24, KJV and NIV, “convinced” is in RV “reproved”; etc.). The meaning of conviction as a law term is being found guilty. In common language it means being persuaded or convinced. In theology it means being condemned at the bar of one’s own conscience as a sinner in view of the law of God. It is the antecedent to repentance and is often accompanied by a painful sense of exposure to God’s wrath. It is the work of the Holy Spirit, showing the heinousness of sin and the soul’s exposure to divine wrath. The means of conviction are various: gospel truth, the law read or heard, reflection, affliction, calamity, etc. It often comes suddenly, and may be stifled, as it surely is if not heeded.

CONVOCATION (Heb. miqrāc, a “holy assembly”). A meeting of the people for the worship of Jehovah (Ex. 12:16; etc.). The following occasions were to be held as convocations: the Sabbaths (Lev. 23:2–3); the Passover, the first and the last day (Ex. 12:16; Lev. 23:7–8; Num. 28:18, 25); Pentecost, the feast of Weeks (Lev. 23:21; Num. 28:26); the feast of Trumpets (Lev. 23:24; Num. 29:1); the feast of Tabernacles, first and last day (Lev. 23:35–36; Num. 29:12); the one great fast, the annual Day of Atonement (Lev. 23:27; Num. 29:7).

One great feature of the convocation was that no work was to be done on these days, except what was necessary for the preparation of food; on the Sabbath even this was prohibited (Ex. 35:2–3).

CORBAN (kor‘ban; Gk. korban, an “offering”). A name common to any sacred gift; the term in general use to denote sacrifice, its equivalent (Ex. 28:38) being “holy gifts.” All things or persons consecrated (or vowed) for religious purposes became corban and fell to the sanctuary. The Pharisees taught that “if a man says to his father or his mother, anything of mine you might have been helped by is Corban [i.e., devoted]” (Mark 7:11), he thereby consecrated all to God and was relieved from using it for his parents. This Jesus declared to be contradictory of the command that taught children to honor their parents. See Vows.

CORD. The rendering of several Heb. words, the most comprehensive of which is hibbēl, from the root meaning to “twist,” hence the English “cable.” The term cord includes in its meaning rope, twine, thread, thongs, etc.

Material. The material of which cord was made varied according to the strength required. Flax was used for making ropes, string, and various kinds of twine; date tree fibers for large ropes; and strips of camel hide for strongest rope.

Uses. The following uses of cord are mentioned: (1) For fastening a tent (Ex. 35:18; 39:40; Isa. 54:2). (2) For leading or binding animals, as a halter or rein (Ps.

118:27; Hos. 11:4). (3) For yoking them either to a cart (Isa. 5:18) or a plow (Job 39:10). (4) For binding prisoners (Judg. 15:9, 11–12; Pss. 2:3; 129:4; Ezek. 3:25). (5) For bowstrings (Ps. 11:2) made of catgut; such are spoken of in Judg. 16:7 (“fresh cords [NIV, “thongs”] that have not been dried”). (6) For the ropes or “tackle” of a vessel (Isa. 33:23). (7) For measuring ground (2 Sam. 8:2; Ps. 78:55; Amos 7:17; Zech. 2:1); hence cord or line became an expression for an inheritance (Josh. 17:14; 19:9; Ps. 16:6; Ezek. 47:13) and even for any defined district (Deut. 3:4). (8) For fishing and snaring. (9) For attaching articles of dress, as the chains of “twisted cordage work” and the “blue cord” worn by the high priests (Ex. 28:14, 22, 24, 28, 37; 39:15, 17, 21, 31; Num. 15:38). (10) For fastening awnings (Esther 1:6). (11) For attaching to a plummet. (12) For drawing water out of a well or raising heavy weights (Josh. 2:15; Jer. 38:6, 13).

CORINTH (kor'inth). A prominent Gk. city evangelized by Paul.

Physical Description. As Greece's most splendid commercial city, Corinth was located just S of the narrow isthmus connecting central Greece with the Peloponnesus. Its strategic situation made it the mecca of trade between the East and West. Its eastern port was Cenchrae (cf. Rom. 16:1) and its western emporium Lechaem. The city derived rich income from the transport of cargoes across the narrow isthmus (a distance less than five miles). Not until A.D. 1881–93 was the present canal dug, saving a perilous two-hundred-mile trip around the stormy Cape Malea. Alexander the Great, Julius Caesar, and Nero (who turned the first spade of dirt with a golden shovel) realized the practicality of such a waterway. But all ancient attempts came to nought and were abandoned. The modern engineering feat is four miles in length, spanned by the 170-foot-high bridge.

History. The occupation of the site goes back to Neolithic times (cf. John G. O'Neill, Ancient Corinth, part I: From the Earliest Times to 404 B.C. [1930]). The cult of Aphrodite was cultivated there early. Corinth was an aggressive colonizing city in the eighth and seventh centuries B.C.; Corinthian bronze and pottery became proverbial. The Romans completely destroyed it in 146 B.C. Julius Caesar restored it (46 B.C.), and it grew so rapidly that it was made Achaia's capital and the seat of the proconsulship by Augustus (cf. Acts 18:12). Its prosperity continued until the city was taken by the Turks in 1458. A terrific earthquake destroyed the old city in 1858, and a new city was constructed about three and one-half miles from the old city.

Archaeology. The American School of Classical Studies has been excavating at Corinth since 1896, except for war years. Much of their attention has centered on the agora, which was seven hundred feet from E to W and three hundred feet from N to S. Following the natural configuration of the land, the southern section was about thirteen feet higher than the northern part. At the dividing line of the two levels stood the bema where public officials could address crowds and render judgment; no doubt Paul stood before Gallio there (Acts 18:12–13). The bema was flanked by a row of central shops. Along the S side of the agora lay an immense stoa filled with shops of meat and wine merchants, probably the “shambles” (1 Cor. 10:25) where Paul told the Corinthians they could buy meat with a clear conscience. At the E end of the agora and S of the stoa stood two similar basilicas used as law courts. Built in the first century A.D., they may well have been the places where the litigious Corinthian Christians went to court against their brethren (1 Cor. 6).

On a rocky terrace overlooking the western side of the agora stood a temple of Apollo. Built during the sixth century B.C., it measured 174 feet long by 69 feet wide, and the 38 columns of its peristyle stood almost 24 feet in height. These were especially impressive because they consisted of single shafts of stone instead of being built up with drums, as was the usual practice. In the 1980s work has been going on at the theater, just to the NW of the agora.

The American School has also been working at the site of the Isthmia (about six miles from ancient Corinth), where the Isthmian Games were held in honor of Poseidon (cf. 1 Cor. 9:24–27). The excavators have uncovered the temple of Poseidon, the 650-foot stadium, the theater, an impressive propylaea to the sanctuary, and Roman baths of a period later than the NT. H.F.V.

CORINTHIANS, FIRST EPISTLE.

Authorship. The Pauline authorship of 1 Corinthians is abundantly attested to from the first century onward. Clement of Rome, the Didache, Ignatius, Polycarp, Hermas, Justin Martyr, and Athenagoras all lend their voice in support of the genuineness of the epistle. Irenaeus contains more than 60 quotations from 1 Corinthians; Clement of Alexandria quotes it more than 130 times; Tertullian quotes some 400 times. First Corinthians stands at the head of the Pauline epistles in the Muratorian canon. Internal evidence is also abundant (cf. 1:1; 3:4; 9:1; 16:21). The way the book dovetails with the history in Acts also confirms it.

Occasion and Date. The occasion of the epistle was a letter of inquiry from Corinth concerning marriage and the eating of meats offered to idols (1 Cor. 7:1; 8:1–13). This led the apostle to write concerning the deepening divisions, increasing contentions, and unjudged sin in the church (1:10–12; 5:1). The factions were due not to open heresies, but to the carnality of the Corinthians and to their being carried away by admiration for Gk. wisdom and eloquence. The moral pollution of their city, which was notorious, was a continual temptation to them. Minor disorders took the form of abuse of spiritual gifts, particularly tongues and the sign gifts (14:1–28). False ideas concerning the resurrection were also corrected (chap. 15). The date of the epistle varies with critical opinion. We know it was written from Ephesus (16:8). It was seemingly written in the latter half of Paul's three-year ministry in that city (Acts 20:31; cf. 19:8–22). The spring of A.D. 54 or 55 is perhaps correct, although some would date it as late as A.D. 59.

Outline. In correcting the current evils in the church, the apostle presents the contents in the following plan:

- I. Introduction (1:1–9)
- II. Rebuke of their divisions (1:10–4:21)
- III. The problem of their sensual immorality (5–7)
 - A. Judgment of incest (5:1–13)
 - B. Parenthetical—the lawsuits in heathen courts (6:1–11)
 - C. Fornication and the sacredness of the body (6:12–20)
 - D. Marriage and divorce (7)
- IV. The problem of food offered to idols (8:1–11:1)
 - A. General tenets (8)
 - B. The precept of forbearance (9)
 - C. Illustration from ancient Israel (10:1–13)

- D. Rebuke of idolatry (10:14–22)
- E. Christian liberty (10:23–11:1)
- V. Problem of public worship (11:2–14:40)
 - A. Dress of women in public worship (11:2–16)
 - B. Regulations of the Lord’s Supper (11:17–34)
 - C. Regulations concerning spiritual gifts (12–14)
- VI. Doctrine of the resurrection (15)
- VII. Practical concerns of Paul (16:1–8)
- VIII. Conclusion (16:19–24)

CORINTHIANS, SECOND EPISTLE. This great epistle presents the vindication of Paul’s apostleship and sets forth in a remarkable way the glory of the Christian ministry. The epistle discloses the heart of Paul and his conduct under physical weakness and persecution from the legalizers.

Authenticity. The internal evidence of 2 Corinthians vividly attests its genuineness. The distinctive elements of Pauline theology and eschatology are clearly seen throughout. However, the letter is not doctrinal or didactic, but intensely personal. Its absorbing interest is a recital of the events with which the apostle and the Corinthians were struggling at the time. A great deal is lacking concerning the circumstances calling forth the epistle, but the references to these events that do exist are so manifestly made in good faith that it is difficult to reject Pauline authorship. External evidence, while not so clear as in the case of 1 Corinthians, yet is unambiguous in establishing the existence and the use of the letter, especially in the second century. Although Clement of Rome is silent, the epistle is quoted by Polycarp. It is referred to in the epistle of Diognetus 5:12. It is sufficiently corroborated by Irenaeus, Theophilus, Athenagoras, Tertullian, and Clement of Alexandria.

Date and Connection with First Corinthians. It was written from Macedonia, likely from Philippi, in the fall of A.D. 54 or 55, the same year in which 1 Corinthians was written or in the autumn of the succeeding year. After Paul sent 1 Corinthians, it seems evident that news reached the apostle of growing opposition led by the Judaizing party. Paul was constrained to pay an immediate visit and found the reports only too true. Perhaps he was openly flouted before the congregation at Corinth. Returning to Ephesus he wrote a severe epistle that he sent on through the hand of Titus. Before Titus could return, events took a disastrous turn at Ephesus, and Paul had to flee at the peril of his life. He went to Troas but, unable to await patiently there for tidings of the Corinthian issue, he crossed into Macedonia and met Titus there, possibly in Philippi. The news, happily, was reassuring. He then wrote a second epistle and sent it on by Titus and others.

Value. The letter is chiefly of value in showing us the concern of the apostle for his converts. In the circumstances of the epistle we find the intensity of his emotions and his great love for them. Second Corinthians is also extremely valuable in setting forth the lofty character and the challenge of the Christian ministry. Paul sets forth his high calling as the most glorious work in which a man can engage. The apostle himself received the ministry as divine, and he accepted it with supreme devotion. Through all the sufferings, testings, and buffetings that he suffered, we yet discern his triumphing in Christ.

Outline. The epistle may be divided into three parts:

- I. Paul's guiding principle of conduct (1:1–7:16)
- II. The collection for the poor saints at Jerusalem (8:1–9:15)
- III. Paul's defense of his apostolic ministry (10:1–13:14)

CORNELIUS (kor-nē'li-us). A devout Roman proselyte, the first representative Gentile introduced to the gospel of grace.

Personal History. He was probably of the Cornelii, a noble and distinguished family at Rome (Acts 10:1–2).

His Spiritual Status. Was Cornelius saved before Peter's visit? A careful answer to this must be that he was not saved (Acts 11:14), his devotion, alms, prayers, and visions (10:2–3) merely signifying that he was a Jewish proselyte. If he were regenerated, he most certainly was not baptized, indwelt, and sealed by the Holy Spirit as is every believer in this age.

Dispensational Importance. The case of Cornelius marked the giving of the Holy Spirit to the Gentiles to undertake for them every ministry committed to Him in this present age, namely, the ministry of regeneration, baptism, indwelling, sealing, and filling. The scene at Caesarea pictures the first representative Gentiles being baptized into the mystical Body of Christ and becoming "fellow heirs" with the Jews and partakers of His promise in Christ by the gospel (Eph. 3:6). In the book of Acts the gospel had now gone to the Jew (chap. 2), to the racially mixed Samaritan (chap. 8), and now to the Gentile (chap. 10). With the introduction to the latter the normal order of the age is established, when every believer, upon no other condition than simple faith in the finished redemptive work of Christ, is regenerated, baptized into the Body of Christ, indwelt perpetually, and sealed eternally, with the added privilege and duty of being filled continually as conditions for filling are complied with. Moreover, Cornelius's case marked the introduction of the gospel to the Gentiles. For the last time Peter used the "keys of the kingdom of heaven" (cf. 2:14; 8:14–15). He is the one who was sent to Cornelius, preached the sermon, and unlocked the message of grace (10:34–35). When this simple dispensational distinction in the case of Cornelius as well as in the case of the pivotal passages, Acts 2 and Acts 8, has not been made, the doctrine of the Holy Spirit in the Acts has become a grand jumble in modern cultism. CORNER GATE. This gate was at the NW corner of Jerusalem (2 Kings 14:13; 2 Chron. 25:23). See Jerusalem.

CORNERSTONE (Job 38:6; Isa. 28:16). The stone at the corner of two walls that unites them; specifically, the stone built into one corner of the foundation of an edifice as the actual or nominal starting point of a building. From a comparison of passages we find mention of “a costly cornerstone for the foundation” (Isa. 28:16), “a stone for a corner” (Jer. 51:26, from which it would appear that cornerstones were placed in different positions as regards elevation). The expressions “the chief corner stone” (Ps. 118:22; “capstone” in NIV) and the “top stone” (Zech. 4:7; “capstone” in NIV) seem to warrant the conclusion that the “cornerstone” is a term equally applicable to the chief stone at the top and that in the foundation.

Figurative. The term “cornerstone” is sometimes used to denote any principal person, such as the princes of Egypt (Isa. 19:13). Christ is called the “corner stone” in reference to His being the foundation of the Christian faith (Eph. 2:20) and the importance and conspicuousness of the place He occupies (Matt. 21:42; 1 Pet. 2:6).

CORNET. See Music.

COROS. A foreign measure of capacity. See Metrology.

CORRECTION (Heb. yāsar, to “instruct,” “chastise”; yākah, to “manifest,” “reason with,” “reprove”). In “He that chastiseth the heathen, shall not he correct?” (Ps. 94:10, KJV, italics added; NASB, “He who chastens the nations, will He not rebuke?” italics added) both Heb. words are used in the above order. The man is considered happy whom God thus correcteth (Job 5:17, KJV; NASB, “reproves”). The Scriptures are for correction (2 Tim. 3:16). In the Bible the word has the same double meaning as in other English literature, namely, to reform, rectify, free from errors, and to chastise or punish; the act of correcting. See Discipline.

CORRUPTION. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words, signifying (1) the decay of the body (Job 17:14; Ps. 16:10, KJV; NASB renders “the pit,” NIV “decay”); (2) the blemishes that rendered an animal unfit for sacrifice (Lev. 22:25); (3) the demoralization of heart and life through sin (Gen. 6:12; Deut. 9:12), resulting in those sinful habits and practices that defile and ruin men (Rom. 8:21; 2 Pet. 2:19); (4) everlasting ruin (Gal. 6:8; NIV, “destruction”).

CORRUPTION, MOUNT OF. See Destruction, Mount of.

COS (kōs), Co’os. A small island (111 sq. miles) in the Aegean Sea; the birthplace of Hippocrates; celebrated for wines and beautiful fabrics. It is now called Kos and has a population of more than twenty thousand. Paul spent the night on the island while on his voyage to Judea from Miletus (Acts 21:1).

CO’SAM (kō’sam). The son of Elmadam and father of Addi, in the line of Joseph the husband of Mary (Luke 3:28).

COTTAGE. A KJV term for a shelter, replaced in the NASB and NIV by “shelter” (Isa. 1:8; Heb. sūkkâ), “shack,” or “hut” (Isa. 24:20; Heb. m□lûnâ), and “caves” (Zeph. 2:6; Heb. k□rôt). The sūkkâ, frequently rendered “booth,” was a hut made of boughs for the purpose of temporary shelter. Being of slight structure, when the fruits were gathered the shelters were either taken down or blown down by the winds of winter (Job 27:18, “booth,” KJV; “hut,” NASB and NIV).

The mflûnâ was a night lodge, or impermanent place of dwelling (from lûn, “to spend the night”). Usually it was merely the rough hut in which the vintager was sheltered (Isa. 1:8, “lodge,” KJV; “hut,” NASB and NIV). In Isa. 24:20 it is a hanging bed.

The kfrôt, lit., “diggings,” were probably excavations made by the shepherds as a protection against the sun (Zeph. 2:6). The NIV takes it as a reference to the Kerethites (see Cherithites).

COTTON. See Vegetable Kingdom.

COUCH. See Bed.

COULTER (Heb. šēt, 1 Sam 13:20–21, KJV). The term coulter is replaced in the NASB and NIV by mattock, but the Heb. word behind it is elsewhere rendered “plowshare” in the KJV, NIV and NASB (Isa. 2:4; Mic. 4:3; Joel 3:10), as it is in the majority of the ancient versions. See Mattock; Plowshare.

COUNCIL. In the OT council is the rendering of the Heb. rigmâ, lit., a “heap” (Ps. 68:27, KJV; NASB, NIV, “throng”), a group or company of persons. Two Gk. words are thus rendered in the NT:

1. A consultation of persons (Matt. 12:14, sumboulion). In Acts 25:12 reference is made to a board of assessors or advisers, with whom the governors of the provinces took counsel before rendering judgment.

2. Any assembly for the purpose of deliberating or judging (sunedrion, a “sitting together”). Among the Jews these councils were: (1) The Sanhedrin. (2) The lesser courts (Matt. 10:17; Mark 13:9, see marg.), of which there were two at Jerusalem and one in each town of Palestine. See Law, Administration of.

COUNSELOR. In general, an adviser upon any matter (Prov. 11:14; 15:22; 2 Chron. 25:16; etc.), especially the king’s state adviser (2 Sam. 15:12; Ezra 7:28; 1 Chron. 27:33; etc.), and one of the chief men of the government (Job 3:14; 12:17; Isa. 1:26; 3:3; etc.). In Mark 15:43 and Luke 23:50 the word probably designates a member of the Sanhedrin.

COUPLING (Heb. ḥābar, “to join”). The wooden beams for fastening a building (2 Chron. 34:11). The NIV renders “joists.”

COURIER (Heb. rûš, a “runner”). Complete establishments of couriers formed a part of royal establishments (2 Chron. 30:6, 10; “posts,” KJV), their purpose being to carry by foot messages as swiftly as possible. Jeremiah shows that a regular postal service of this sort existed in his time (Jer. 51:31, “One courier runs to meet another”), clearly implying that couriers were wont to be maintained by relays of special messengers regularly organized for their work. The same sort of postal communication is referred to in Esther 3:15; 8:13–14.

COURSE. This word is used in Scripture in the sense of advance, progress (2 Thess. 3:1, KJV; NASB and NIV, “spread rapidly”), race, a career (2 Tim. 4:7), path, direction (Jer. 23:10), running, as of a horse (Jer. 8:6).

COURSE OF PRIESTS AND LEVITES. See Division of the Priests and Levites.

COURT (Heb. usually ḥāšēr). An open enclosure; applied in Scripture mostly to the enclosures of the Tabernacle and Temple (both which see). It also means a yard of a prison (Neh. 3:25; Jer. 32:2), a private house (2 Sam. 17:18), or a palace (2 Kings 20:4; Esther 1:5; etc.).

“Court for owls” (Isa. 34:13, KJV) is rendered by Delitzsch (Com., ad loc.) “pasture for ostriches” (cf. NASB). He says that the Heb. word corresponds to the Arab. for green, a green field, and takes it in the sense of a grassy place such as is frequented by ostriches. In Amos 7:13 the Heb. word for “house” is rendered “court” in the KJV, “residence,” in the NASB (marg., lit. “house”), and “sanctuary” in the NIV. See House.

In the NT the Gk. aulē designates an open court (Rev. 11:2), whereas “kings’ courts” is the rendering of the Gk. word basileion, a “palace.”

COURTS, JUDICIAL. See Law, Administration of.

COUSIN. The rendering of the Gk. sungenēs, a blood relative or “kinsman,” as translated elsewhere.

COVENANT (Heb. bῑrīt, “cutting”). The term applied to various transactions between God and man, and man and his fellowman. In Obadiah (v. 7) it is rendered “allied.” In the NT the word diathēkē, “disposition” or “will” respecting a person or thing, is used; sometimes it is translated “Testament” (which see), at other times “covenant.”

Application of the Term. Properly used of a compact between man and man; either between tribes or nations (1 Sam. 11:1; Josh. 9:6, 15), or between individuals (Gen. 21:27), in which each party bound himself to fulfill certain conditions and was promised certain advantages. In making covenants God was solemnly invoked as a witness (31:53), whence the expression “a covenant of the Lord” (1 Sam. 20:8; cf. Jer. 34:18–19; Ezek. 17:19), and an oath was sworn (Gen. 21:31). Accordingly, a breach of covenant was regarded as a heinous sin (Ezek. 17:12–20). The marriage contract is called “the covenant of ... God” (Prov. 2:17). As a witness to the covenant a gift was presented (Gen. 21:30) or a heap of stones set up (31:52).

It is also improperly used of a covenant between God and man. As man is not in the position of an independent covenanting party, such a covenant is not strictly a mutual compact but a promise on the part of God to arrange His providences for the welfare of those who should render Him obedience.

Covenants Mentioned. The following covenants are mentioned in Scripture:

The Covenant with Noah. In this covenant God assured Noah that judgment would not again come to men in the form of a flood; and that the recurrence of the seasons and of day and night should not cease (Gen. 9; Jer. 33:20).

The Covenant with Abraham. The condition of this covenant was that Abraham was to leave his country, kindred, and father’s house, and follow the Lord into the land that He would show him. The promise was a fourfold blessing: (1) increase into a numerous people; (2) material and spiritual prosperity—“I will bless you”; (3) the exaltation of Abraham’s name—“make your name great”; (4) Abraham was not only to be blessed by God, but to be a blessing to others, implicitly by the coming of the Messiah through his descendants (Gen. 12:1–3). Later this covenant was renewed, and Abraham was promised a son and numerous posterity (chap. 15). About fourteen years after the making of the covenant it was renewed, with a change of his name and the establishment of circumcision, which was to be the sign of accepting and ratifying the covenant (chap. 17).

The Covenant with Israel. This took place at Sinai, when the people had intimated their acceptance of the words of the covenant as found in the Ten Commandments (Ex. 34:28; 24:3) and promised to keep the same. Their obedience to the commands of the law was to be rewarded by God’s constant care of Israel, temporal prosperity, victory over enemies, and the pouring out of His Spirit (Ex. 23:20–33). The seal of this covenant was to be circumcision and was called “His covenant” (Deut. 4:13). It was renewed at different periods of Jewish history (chap. 29; Josh. 24; 2 Chron. 15, 23, 29, 34; Ezra 10; Neh. 9–10).

The Covenant with David. This was in reality but another and more specific form of the covenant with Abraham; its main object was to mark with greater exactness the line through which the blessing promised in the Abrahamic covenant was to find accomplishment. The royal seed was from then on to be in the house of David (2 Sam. 7:12; 22:51), and, especially in connection with the One who was to be preeminently the child of promise in that house, all good, first to Israel and then to all nations, should be realized (Pss. 2; 22; Isa. 9:6–7; etc.).

In adaptation to human thought such covenants were said to be confirmed by an oath (Deut. 4:31; Ps. 89:3).

Ceremonies. Covenants were not only concluded with an oath (Gen. 26:28; 31:53; Josh. 9:15; 2 Kings 11:4), but, after an ancient custom, confirmed by slaughtering and cutting a victim into two halves between which the parties passed, to intimate that if either of them broke the covenant it would fare with him as with the slain and divided beast (Gen. 15:9–10, 17–18; Jer. 34:18–20). Moreover, the covenanting parties often partook of a common meal (Gen. 26:30; 31:54; cf. 2 Sam. 3:20 with v. 12), or at least of some grains of salt. See Covenant of Salt.

According to the Mosaic ritual, the blood of the victim was divided into halves; one-half was sprinkled upon the altar and the other upon the people (Ex. 24:6–8). The meaning of this seems to be that, in the sprinkling of the blood upon the altar, the people were introduced into gracious fellowship with God and atonement made for their sin. Through the sprinkling of the blood upon the people Israel was formally consecrated to the position of God's covenant people.

COVENANT OF SALT (Heb. bᵿrît melah). Covenanting parties were accustomed to partake of salt, thus making a covenant of salt (Num. 18:19; 2 Chron. 13:5), i.e., one that was inviolably sure. The meaning appears to have been that the salt, with its power to strengthen food and keep it from decay, symbolized the unbending truthfulness of that self-surrender to the Lord embodied in the sacrifice, by which all impurity and hypocrisy were repelled.

COVENANT, THE NEW. In the NT we read of only two covenants—the New and the Old, the former brought in and established by Christ, and the latter in consequence ceasing to exist. The Old, i.e., the covenant of law, with all its outward institutions and ritualistic services, is regarded as the Old because its full and formal ratification took place before the other. In germ the New Covenant (or that of grace) existed from the first; and partial exhibitions of it have been given all through the world's history. It was involved in the promise of recovery at the Fall.

COVERED WAY FOR THE SABBATH. See Sabbath, Covered Way for.

COVERING THE HEAD IN PRAYER (1 Cor. 11:4–6). “The Jewish men prayed with the head covered, nay, even with a veil before the face. Greek usage required that the head should be bare on sacred occasions; and this commended itself to Paul as so entirely in accordance with the divinely appointed position of man (v. 3) that for the man to cover his head seemed to him to cast dishonor on that position. His head ought to show to all (and its being uncovered is the sign of this) that no man, but, on the contrary, Christ, and through Him God Himself, is Head (Lord) of the man.... A woman, when praying, was to honor her head by having a sign upon it of the authority of her husband, which was done by having it covered; otherwise she dishonored her head by dressing, not like a married wife, from whose headdress one can see that her husband is her head, but like a loose woman, with whose shorn head the uncovered one is on a par” (Meyer, Com., ad loc.). The above command does not refer to private or family prayer.

COVETOUSNESS (Heb. ḥāmad, to “desire”; beṣac, “dishonest gain”; Gk.

pleoneksia, “the wish to have more”). An inordinate desire for what one has not; in NASB this word is translated “greed”; its basis lies in discontentment with what one has. It has an element of lawlessness and is sinful because it is contrary to the command “Being content with what you have” (Heb. 13:5), because it leads to trust in “the uncertainty of riches,” to love of the world, to forgetfulness of God, and is idolatry (Col. 3:5), setting up wealth instead of God. It ranks with the worst sins (Mark 7:22; Rom. 1:29). Our Lord especially warns against it (Luke 12:15), as does Paul (Eph. 5:3; etc.). A man may be covetous, eager to obtain money, and not avaricious or penurious, i.e., unwilling to part with money, or sordid and niggardly, i.e., mean in his dealings. He may or may not be miserly.

The verb is also used in a good sense (1 Cor. 12:31, KJV, NIV; NASB, “but earnestly desire the greater gifts”).

COW, COWS. See Animal Kingdom: Ox.

Figurative. Cows are used figuratively of proud and wealthy rulers (Amos 4:1); and of years of plenty (“fat,” Gen. 41:2; 26:29) and years of scarcity (“lean”).

COZ. See Koz.

COZ’BI (kos’bi; “false”). The daughter of Zur, a Midianite leader. While in the act of committing lewdness with Zimri, an Israelite leader, she was slain by Phinehas, who thrust a spear through them both (Num. 25:6–8, 15, 18), about 1401 B.C.

COZE’BA (ko-zē’ba; “deceitful”). A city in the lowlands of Judah, “the men” of which are named among the descendants of Shelah (1 Chron. 4:22). The same as Chezib (Kezib) and Achzib (Akzib; Gen. 38:5; Josh. 15:44).

CRACKLING (Heb. qôl, “voice,” i.e., noise). “The crackling of thorn bushes under a pot” (Eccles. 7:6) is a proverbial expression for a roaring but quickly extinguished fire.

CRACKNEL. See Bread.

CRAFT, CRAFTSMAN. See Handicrafts.

CRAFTINESS, CRAFTY (Heb. āram, to “be bare,” “cunning,” “subtlety”; Gk.

panourgia, “adroitness,” “unscrupulousness”). The terms used in the Bible as applied to the sly, subtle, wily, deceitful, and fraudulent. The NASB also renders “shrewd,” “crafty,” etc. (Job 5:12–13; Ps. 83:3; Luke 20:23; 1 Cor. 3:19; 2 Cor. 4:2; 12:16; etc.).

CRANE. See Animal Kingdom.

CREATION. The work of God in bringing into existence the universe, including both the material and the spiritual worlds; in a more restricted sense, the bringing into existence and into its present condition the earth and the system to which it belongs.

Christian View. According to Christian doctrine, God alone is eternal. The system or systems of the material universe, as well as matter itself, also spiritual beings, except God, had a beginning. They were absolutely created, made “out of nothing,” by the power of the almighty will. The first sentence of the Apostles’ Creed is to be taken in its broadest and deepest sense, “I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth.”

The record of the creation in Genesis relates principally in its details to the creation of the earth, or the system to which the earth belongs, and to the creation of man. The first words of the record, however, suggest a still broader conception. Taking the account as a whole, we have revealed a succession of creative acts, constituting together one great process of creation. And whatever interpretations have been given as to the various stages of this process, or the “days” of creation, or of other particulars, the fact of chief import remains unclouded—that to God is ascribed the work of bringing into existence, by the free exercise of His creative power, the world and all orders of beings that live within it. This is the uniform teaching of the OT Scriptures (Ps. 33:6; Isa. 45:18; Jer. 10:12; etc.). The doctrine of the NT upon this subject is not merely a repetition but in some respects a development, or further unfolding, of that contained in the OT. Thus, with greater explicitness the existence of superhuman intelligence is attributed in the NT Scriptures to divine creative power. As the heavenly and spiritual world comes more clearly into view in the NT, along with this comes the declaration that all spiritual beings outside of God owe their origin to Him. Also, that creative “Word of the Lord,” upon which such stress is laid in the OT, is identified in the NT with Christ. The second Person of the Trinity is revealed as the One most directly connected with the work of creation. In Him creation has its explanation and its end (see John 1:3; 1 Cor. 8:6; Eph. 3:9–11; Col. 1:16; Heb. 1:2; 2:10).

Babylonian View. This polytheistic version of creation is contained in the seven-tablet Enuma elish, recovered mainly from the library of Ashurbanipal (668–626 B.C.) at Nineveh. It hopelessly confuses divine spirit and cosmic matter by an irrational mythological identification of the two. Apsu and Tiamat, the parents of the gods, are personifications of cosmic matter (the primordial sweet and salt water oceans respectively). Their offspring personify cosmic spaces and natural forces. Spirit and cosmic matter are made coexistent and coeternal in an account spiritually, morally, and philosophically confusing and incomparably inferior to the Genesis account of beginnings.

Importance of Doctrine. True doctrine upon this subject is both theoretically and practically of fundamental importance. (1) In relation to God, whose eternal greatness and majesty can be felt by us only when we conceive of Him as “before all worlds” and the Creator of all. (2) Here, first of all, true religion establishes its claim upon us; for He who has created us and all things may rightfully require our worship and service. (3) In the creation we find also a true revelation, and he who recognizes this must admit the possibility and even the probability of more particular revelations. The objection to miracles in connection with revelation vanishes when one begins by accepting the miracle of creation. (4) This doctrine underlies all true repose of faith; for only when we apprehend the broad and wholesome teaching of the Scriptures upon this subject can we fully commit ourselves unto God as unto “a faithful Creator.”

Concordant Views and Modern Science. Acute present-day problems hinge on the interpretation of the creative six days of Gen. 1 in the light of modern scientific findings, especially in the field of geology (cf. Bernard Ramm, The Christian View of Science and Scripture [1955], pp. 173–299). (1) The Twenty-Four-Hour-Day View holds that creation was effected in six days. (2) The Purely Religious View divorces the theological account in Genesis from scientific relevance or reconciliation. In making apparent peace with geology this view tends to make theology irrelevant and thus unnecessary and inconsequential. (3) The New Diluvial View of George McCready Price (The New Geology [1923]), attempts to explain geological phenomena by the Noahic Flood (cf. also Byron Nelson, The Deluge Story in Stone [1931]; A. M. Rehwinkel, The Flood [1951]); and H. W. Clark, The New Diluvialism [1946]). This so-called New Catastrophism clashes with present-day uniformitarian geology (but cf. 2 Pet. 3:1–10) and is a modern modification of the older views of successive catastrophes of Cuvier and Agassiz. (4) The Local Creation View of John Pye Smith limits Gen. 1 to the re-creation of the general Middle Eastern World (On the Relation Between the Holy Scriptures and Certain Parts of Geological Science [1840]). Smith, however, in trying to reconcile Scripture with geology in this way cheapens the Genesis account. (5) The Gap Theory postulates creation in Gen. 1:1, followed by catastrophe (1:2), succeeded by re-creation (1:3–31). This view, popularized by G. H. Pember (Earth's Earliest Ages [1876]), Harry Rimmer (Modern Science and the Genesis Record [1937]), and the Scofield Reference Bible, goes back at least to Thomas Chalmers (Works, 1:228; 12:369), J. H. Kurtz (Bible and Astronomy, 3d ed. [1857]), and J. G. Rosenmuller (Antiquissima Telluris Historia a Mose [1736–1815]). It provides time but fails to account for geological sequence, besides being exegetically weak. (6) The Age-Day View considers the Genesis days to be geologic eras and has been defended by the geologist J. W. Dawson and more recently by E. K. Gedney (Modern Science and the Christian Faith, 2d ed. [1950]). Gedney affirms that the theory of progressive creationism with the age-long interpretation of the term day can account for the facts of geology. (7) Pictorial Day and Moderate Concordism coupled with progressive creationism. This is Bernard Ramm's view (op. cit., pp. 218–29). (8) Re-creation-Revelation View holds that Gen. 1:1–2 does not describe primeval creation ex nihilo celebrated by the angels (Job 38:7; Isa. 45:18) but a much later refashioning of a judgment-ridden earth in preparation for a new order of creation—man. The six days that follow are re-creation, revealed to man in six literal days (cf. Merrill F. Unger, “Rethinking the Genesis Account of Creation,” Bibliotheca Sacra 115 [Jan. 1958]: 27–35).

P. J. Wiseman (Creation Revealed in Six Days [1948]) espouses the view of revelation of creation (not re-creation) in six twenty-four-hour days.

CREATURE (Heb. nepesh, a “breathing” creature; Gk. ktisis, a “making,” “thing made”; ktisma, “formation”).

1. In the OT “creature” is a general term for any animal (Gen. 1:21, 24, etc.).

2. In the NT, the NASB renders “creation”; it is used as: (1) A term for the whole creation or for any created object, e.g., “Everything created by God is good; NIV, “Everything God created is good”);” (1 Tim. 4:4, NASB; KJV, “Every creature of God is good”; NIV, “Everything God created is good”); “Nor height, nor depth, nor any other created thing” (Rom. 8:39; etc.). (2) Humanity individually or collectively. “Preach the gospel to all creation” (Mark 16:15); “The creation was subjected,” etc. (Rom. 8:20).

CREATURES, LIVING. A term appearing frequently in the KJV (cf. Ezek. 1:5, 13–15, 17, 19–20; where the NASB renders “living creature” or “living creatures”) and the NASB and NIV (cf. Rev. 4:8, 14–15, 19; where the KJV renders “beasts”). See Cherub, Cherubim.

CREDITOR. See Debt; Loan.

CREEPING LOCUST. See Animal Kingdom: Locust.

CREEPING THINGS (Heb. shereš, an active mass of minute animals; or, Heb. remeš, “creeping”), a term used in Scripture (Gen. 1:24; 6:7; etc.) to designate reptiles, insects, aquatic creatures, and the smaller mammals.

CRES’CENS (kres’enz; “growing”). An assistant of the apostle Paul, who left Rome for Galatia (2 Tim. 4:10). Nothing further of him is known for certain (Ellicott, Com., ad loc.).

CRESCENT ORNAMENTS. See Dress.

CRE’TANS (krē’tans). See Crete.

CRETE. A large island in the Mediterranean, about 150 miles in length and from 6 to 35 miles wide. It lies 60 miles S of Cape Malea in the Peloponnesus. Anciently it was the home of the great Minoan civilization. It is mountainous, and its famous peak is Mt. Ida. The vessel carrying Paul on his way to Rome sailed along the southern coast of the island, where it was overtaken by a storm (Acts 27:7–21). Cretans were among those specially mentioned as attending the great feast of Pentecost (2:11). The Cretans had a name in ancient times for being good sailors, skilled archers, and experts in ambush.

The ancient notices of their character fully agree with the quotation that Paul produces from “a prophet of their own” (Titus 1:12): “Cretans are always liars, evil beasts, lazy gluttons.” The classics abound with allusions to the untruthfulness of the Cretans; and it was so frequently applied to them that krētizein, “to act the Cretan,” was a synonym for to play the liar. Paul sent Titus to organize the church there.

Though archaeological work on Crete is extensive, it concerns the Minoan civilization and is not germane to biblical studies. Caphtor (which see), home of the Philistines, is usually identified with Crete.

CRIB. A KJV term replaced by manger (which see).

CRISPING PIN. See Purse.

CRIS'PUS (kris'pus; "curled"). Chief of the Jewish synagogue at Corinth (Acts 18:8), converted and baptized by the apostle Paul (1 Cor. 1:14). According to tradition, he afterward became bishop of Aegina.

CROCODILE. See Animal Kingdom.

CROCUS. See Vegetable Kingdom.

CROOKBACKED (Heb. gibbēn, to be "arched," or "contracted"). A humpback (Lev. 21:20, 21) was one of the blemishes that unfitted a priest for the sacred service of the sanctuary. See also Diseases: Hunchback.

CROP. That part of the bird that held the food and that, with its feathers, was cast among the ashes at the side of the altar and not burned with the rest of the fowl (Lev. 1:16). See Sacrifice.

CROSS (Gk. stauros, a "stake"; Lat. crux). The cross that was used as an instrument of death (see Crucifixion) was either a plain vertical stake to which the victim was fastened, with the hands tied or nailed above the head, or such a stake provided with a crossbar, to which the victim was fastened with the arms outstretched. Of this latter kind three varieties were known, so that there were four forms of the cross: (1) simple (Lat. simplex), ; (2) St. Andrew's (decussata), ; (3) St. Anthony's (commissa), ; (4) the Latin (immissa), .

Other forms have been invented and used as emblems, e.g., the Greek cross, consisting of four equally long arms, ; double cross, whose upper bar refers to the inscription by Pilate on the cross of Jesus; and the triple, , , of which the first is used by the pope, the second by the Raskolniks.

In addition to the transverse bar there was sometimes a peg or other projection, upon which the body of the sufferer rested, to prevent his weight from tearing away the hands.

Emblem. That the cross was widely known as an emblem in pre-Christian times has been clearly shown by independent investigators. Indeed, it was a well-known heathen sign. The vestments of the priests of Horus, the Egyptian god of light, are marked . At Thebes, in the tombs of the kings, royal cows are represented plowing, a calf playing in front. Each animal has a marked in several places on it. Rassam found buildings at Nineveh marked with the Maltese cross. Osiris, as well as Jupiter Ammon, had for a monogram a . The cross is found marked on Phoenician monuments at an early date.

In Christian times the cross, from being in itself the most vile and repulsive of objects, became in the minds of believers the symbol of all that is holy and precious. As Christ is "the power of God and the wisdom of God" unto salvation, it is but natural that those who experience the power of this salvation should glory in the cross. The exact time of its adoption as a Christian emblem is unknown. In the pre-Constantine period the sign of the cross seems to have been quite generally recognized by primitive Christians. They appear to have contemplated it only as a symbol, without any miraculous energy, and associated it with that which was hopeful and joyous. On the tombstones of the early Christians the cross was the emblem of victory and hope. It was only after superstition took the place of true spiritual devotion that the figure of the cross was used or borne about as a sacred charm.

In the latter part of the third century people signed the cross in token of safety and laid stress on figures of it as a preservative against both spiritual and natural evil. This superstitious feeling was stimulated by the discovery of what was held to be the real cross upon which our Lord suffered. The empress Helena, mother of Constantine, about A.D. 326 visited Palestine and was shown three crosses by a Jew. In order to know which was the genuine one, Macarius, bishop of Jerusalem, suggested that they be tested by their power of working miracles. Only one being reported as possessing this quality, it was declared to be the real cross.

As Signature. As early as the sixth century it had become the custom to place three crosses () near the signature of important documents, these having the value of an oath on the part of the signer. Priests added it to their signatures, and bishops, as a sign of the dignity of their office, placed it before their signatures. Crosses were used in diplomatic documents as early as the fifth century. By tradition the cross is now used as a signature by those unable to write.

Figurative. The cross is used in Scripture, in a general way, for what is painful and mortifying to the flesh (Matt. 16:24). After the resurrection of our Lord the cross is spoken of as the representative of His whole sufferings from His birth to His death (Eph. 2:16; Heb. 12:2) and for the whole doctrines of the gospel (1 Cor. 1:18; Gal. 6:14); whereas the opposers of the gospel were spoken of as enemies of the cross (Phil. 3:18). “The cross of Christ” (1 Cor. 1:17) represents that Christ was crucified for man and thereby procured His salvation.

CROWN. This ornament, which is both ancient and universal, probably originated from the headbands used to prevent the hair from being disheveled by the wind. Such headbands are still common, and they may be seen on the sculpture of Persepolis, Nineveh, and Egypt; they gradually developed into turbans, which by the addition of ornamental or precious materials assumed the dignity of miters or crowns. The use of them as ornaments probably was suggested by the natural custom of encircling the head with flowers in token of joy and triumph (Wisd. of Sol. 2:8; Judith 15:13).

Several words in Scripture are rendered “crown”:

Nēzer (lit, something “set apart,” “consecration”; hence consecrated hair, as of a Nazirite) is supposed to mean a “diadem.” It was applied to the plate of gold in front of the high priest’s miter (Ex. 29:6; 39:30); also to the diadem that Saul wore in battle and which was brought to David (2 Sam. 1:10), and that which was used at the coronation of Joash (2 Kings 11:12). The crown was in universal use by priests and in religious services. Egyptian crowns such as that worn by Tutankhamen were elaborate and richly adorned with royal emblems. The crown worn by the kings of Assyria was a high turban frequently adorned with flowers, etc., and arranged in bands of linen or silk. Originally there was only one band, but later there were two, and the ornaments were richer.

Āṭārâ, “circlet”; (Gk. stephanos). A more general word for crown and used for crowns and head ornaments of various sorts. When applied to the crowns of kings it appears to denote the state crown as distinguished from the diadem, as, probably, the crown taken by David from the king of Ammon at Rabbah and used as the state crown of Judah (2 Sam. 12:30). As to the shape of this Hebrew crown we can form an idea only by reference to ancient crowns. The diadem of two or three headbands may have signified dominion over two or three countries. In Rev. 12:3; 13:1; 19:12, allusion is made to many “crowns” (KJV; NASB, “diadems”) worn in token of extended dominion.

Kether, “diadem,” refers to the ancient Persian crown (Esther 1:11; 2:17; 6:8), which was, doubtless, the high cap or tiara so often mentioned by Greek historians.

Other Heb. terms rendered “crown” are zēr, a wreath or border of gold around the edge of the Ark of the Covenant (Ex. 25:11, KJV, etc.; NIV, “molding”); and godqōd, the crown of the human head (Gen. 49:26; etc.). The Gk. word stemma is used only once in the NT (Acts 14:13) for the “garlands” (NIV, “wreaths”) used with victims.

Figurative. The crown was a symbol of victory and reward, victors being crowned in the Grecian games. These crowns were usually made of leaves that soon began to wither. In opposition to these is the incorruptible crown (1 Cor. 9:25, NASB, “wreath,” cf. 2 Tim. 2:5), a crown of life or of glory (James 1:12; 1 Pet. 5:4; Rev. 2:10). The meaning of the crown of thorns placed on the head of Jesus (Matt. 27:29) was to insult Him under the character of the king of the Jews. The crown is also used as an emblem of an exalted state (Prov. 12:4; 17:6; Isa. 28:5; Phil. 4:1; etc.).

CROWN OF THORNS. The Roman soldiers made a crown out of some thorny plant and crowned our Lord in mockery (Matt. 27:29). “The object was not to cause suffering, but to excite ridicule; so that while we cannot altogether dissociate the idea of something painful from this crown of thorns we must not conceive of it as covered with prickles, which were intentionally thrust into the flesh. It is impossible to determine what species of thorn it was” (Meyer, Com., ad loc.). See also Vegetable Kingdom: Thistle, Thorns.

CRUCIFIXION. This form of punishment was in use among the Egyptians (Gen. 40:19), the Carthaginians, the Persians (Esther 7:10), the Assyrians, Scythians, Indians, Germans, and from earliest times among the Greeks and Romans. After the conquest of Tyre, Alexander the Great ordered two thousand Tyrians to be crucified as punishment for the resistance which that city made. Crucifixion was abolished by Constantine, probably toward the end of his reign, owing, doubtless, to his increasing reverence for the cross. Punishment by the cross was confined to slaves or to malefactors of the worst class. Exemption from it was the privilege of Roman citizenship.

Among the Jews. Whether this mode of execution was known to the ancient Jews is a matter of dispute. The Heb. words apparently alluding to crucifixion are tālā and yāqa, generally rendered in the KJV “to hang” (Num. 25:4, NASB, “execute,” NIV, “kill”; Deut. 21:22; 2 Sam. 18:10). The Jewish account of the matter is that the exposure of the body tied to a stake by the hands took place after death. The placing of the head on an upright pole has been called crucifixion. Crucifixion after death was not rare, the victim being first killed in mercy. The Jews probably borrowed this punishment from the Romans.

Among the Jews, as well as among the Romans, crucifixion was considered the most horrible form of death; to a Jew it would seem the more horrible from the curse “He who is hanged is accursed of God” (Deut. 21:23). Our Lord was condemned to it by the popular cry of the Jews (Matt. 27:23) on the charge of sedition against Caesar (Luke 23:21–23).

Process. Crucifixion was preceded by scourging with thongs, to which were sometimes added nails, pieces of bone, etc., to heighten the pain, often so intense as to cause death. In our Lord’s case, however, this infliction seems neither to have been the legal scourging after sentence nor examination by torture (Acts 22:24) but rather a scourging before the sentence to excite pity and procure immunity from further punishment (Luke 23:22; John 19:1). The criminal carried his own cross, or a part of it, in which case another person was compelled to share the burden (Luke 23:26). The place of execution was outside the city (1 Kings 21:13; Acts 7:58; Heb. 13:12); arriving there, the condemned was stripped of his clothes, which became the property of the soldiers (Matt. 27:35); and the cross having been previously erected, he was drawn up and made fast to it with cords or nails, although sometimes he was first fastened to the cross and then raised. The limbs of the victim were generally three or four feet from the earth. Before the nailing or binding took place a medicated cup was given out of kindness to confuse the senses and deaden the pangs of the sufferer (Prov. 31:6), usually of “wine mixed with myrrh,” because myrrh was soporific. The Lord refused it that His senses might be clear (Matt. 27:34; Mark 15:23).

If the nailing was the most painful mode in the first instance, the other was more so in the end, for the sufferer was left to die of sheer exhaustion, and when simply bound with thongs, it might take days to accomplish the process. Instances are on record of persons surviving for nine days. Owing to the lingering character of this death our Lord was watched, according to custom, by a party of four soldiers (John 19:23), with their centurion (Matt. 27:54), to prevent His being taken down and resuscitated. Fracture of the legs was resorted to by the Jews to hasten death (John 19:31). This was done to the two thieves crucified with Jesus but not to Him, for the soldiers found that He was dead already (19:32–34). The unusual rapidity of the Lord’s death was due to the depth of His previous agonies or may be sufficiently accounted for simply from peculiarities of constitution. Pilate expressly satisfied himself as to the actual death by questioning the centurion (Mark 15:44). In most cases the body was allowed to rot on the cross by the action of the sun and rain or to be devoured by birds and beasts. Interment was generally, therefore, forbidden, but in consequence of Deut. 21:22–23 an exception was made in favor of the Jews (Matt. 27:58).

CRUSE. The rendering in the KJV of three Heb. words:

1. Ṣappahat, lit., “spread out,” usually thought to be a flask, but more likely a shallow cup for holding water (1 Sam. 26:11, 12, 16; 1 Kings 19:6) or oil (1 Kings 17:12, 14, 16), although the NASB and NIV consistently render the term as “jar” or “jug.” “In a similar case in the present day this would be a globular vessel of blue porous clay, about nine inches diameter, with a neck of about three inches long, a small handle below the neck, and opposite the handle a straight spout, with an orifice about the size of a straw, through which the water is drunk or sucked” (Smith, Bib. Dict., s.v.).

2. Baqbuq, so called from the gurgling sound in emptying (1 Kings 14:3; NASB, NIV, “jar”), an “earthenware jar” (Jer. 19:1, 10, NASB).

3. Ṣlōhūt, perhaps from the root ṣlh, occurs in the Bible only in 2 Kings 2:20. It probably described a shallow dish or a flat cooking pan. The NIV renders it “bowl.”

CUN (kūn; 1 Chron. 18:8). A city of Hadadezer, king of Syria, in Zobah, on the way to the Euphrates, and plundered by David for bronze with which to build the Temple.

It was called Berothai (2 Sam. 8:8); probably the same as Berothah (Ezek. 47:16; which see).

CUNEIFORM. See Assyria.

CUP. The rendering, mostly in the OT, of the Heb. kōs; in the NT, of the Gk.

protērion. Note that other Heb. terms are so translated as well.

Egyptian. These were varied in form, the paintings upon the tombs representing many of elegant design, while others are deficient in both form and proportion. Many were of gold and silver (Gen. 44:2; cf. Num. 7:84), some being richly studded with precious stones, inlaid with vitrified substances in brilliant colors, and even enameled. They were also made of hard stones, pottery, glass, and porcelain.

Assyrian. Cups and vases among the Assyrians were even more varied in form and design than those of the Egyptians. The materials employed were about the same—precious metals, copper, bronze, glass, and pottery, both glazed and unglazed. Some of their drinking cups terminate in the head of a lion, with a handle. Other festal cups are more like bowls in form and are fluted.

Hebrew. The cups of the Jews, whether of metal or earthenware, were probably borrowed from Egypt or from the Phoenicians, who were celebrated in that branch of workmanship. In Solomon's time all his drinking vessels were of gold (1 Kings 10:21). The cups mentioned in the NT were often, no doubt, made after Greek and Roman models. In Isa. 22:24 the Heb. word translated "cups" (-aggān) in the KJV is given as "bowls" in the NASB and NIV; elsewhere it is rendered as "basins" (Ex. 24:6) and "goblet" (Song of Sol. 7:2). The cups in 1 Chron. 28:17 were bowls for libation ("pitchers," NASB and NIV; Heb. qaswâ); the same Heb. term is incorrectly rendered "covers" in the KJV of Ex. 25:29; 37:16; Num. 4:7. The NASB more correctly translates "jars," whereas the NIV translates "pitchers" except in Num. 4:7, where it has "jars."

Cup of Divination. The use of such cups was a practice common to Syria and Egypt as early as the time of the patriarch Jacob. Otherwise the question, "Is not this the one from which my lord drinks, and which he indeed uses for divination?" (Gen. 44:5) would have lost half its force with the brothers of Joseph. Among the Egyptians this sort of divination consisted of pouring clean water into a goblet and then looking into the water for representations of future events, or in pouring water into a goblet or dish, dropping in pieces of gold or silver or precious stones, and then observing and interpreting the appearance of the water. Melted wax was also poured into the water and the will of the gods interpreted by the variously shaped figures formed in this way. But we cannot infer from this that Joseph adopted this superstitious practice. The intention of the statement was simply to represent the goblet as a sacred vessel and Joseph as acquainted with the most sacred things.

Figurative. "Cup" is employed in both Testaments in some curious metaphorical phrases:

"The portion of their cup" is a general expression for the condition of life, prosperous or miserable (Pss. 11:6; 16:5; 23:5).

A "cup" is also the natural type of sensual allurements (Prov. 23:31; Jer. 51:7; Rev. 17:4; 18:6). Babylon is termed a "golden cup" to express its splendor and opulence.

"Cup of consolation" (Jer. 16:7). It was the oriental custom for friends to send dishes of food and wine (the cup of consolation) to console relatives in mourning (cf. 2 Sam. 3:35; Prov. 31:6).

“Cup of salvation” (Ps. 116:13) is probably the drink offering lifted in thanksgiving to God (Num. 15:5; 28:7).

“Cup of blessing” (1 Cor. 10:16; called the “cup of the Lord,” v. 21), i.e., the cup over which the blessing is spoken, when the wine contained in it is expressly consecrated by prayer to the sacred use of the Lord’s Supper. It is called in Jewish writings, just as by Paul, “the cup of blessing,” and is supposed to refer to the third cup of wine drunk at the Passover feast, over which a special blessing was spoken. In 10:21 it is contrasted with the “cup of demons,” i.e., the cup drunk at heathen feasts.

The “cup of His anger” (Isa. 51:17; Rev. 14:10), “cup of reeling” (51:22; Zech. 12:2), and “cup of horror and desolation” (Ezek. 23:33) are figures representing the effects of Jehovah’s wrath upon the wicked. God is represented as the master of a banquet, dealing madness and stupor of vengeance to guilty guests. There is in the prophets no more frequent or terrifying image, and it is repeated with pathetic force in the language of our Lord’s agony (Matt. 26:39, 42; John 18:11).

CUPBEARER (Heb. mashqeh, “one who gives drink to”). That officer of the household who tasted the wine and passed it to those at the table. He was often chosen for his personal beauty and attractions and in ancient oriental courts was always a person of rank and importance. From the confidential nature of his duties and his frequent access to the royal presence, he possessed great influence. The chief cupbearer, or butler, to the king of Egypt was the means of raising Joseph to his high position (Gen. 41:9). Rabshakeh appears from his name to have filled a like office in the Assyrian court (2 Kings 18:17). Nehemiah was cupbearer to Artaxerxes Longimanus, king of Persia (Neh. 1:11; 2:1). Cupbearers are mentioned among the attendants of Solomon (1 Kings 10:5; 2 Chron. 9:4).

CURE. See Diseases, Treatment of.

CURIOUS ARTS (Gk. ta peri erga, “devious works”). A KJV term referring to magic (so NASB, Acts 19:19; “sorcery,” NIV), spoken of the black art as practiced by the Ephesian conjurers. The allusion is doubtless to the Ephesian spells, i.e., charms, consisting of letters or monograms, written on parchment and worn like amulets. See Magic; Sorcery.

CURSE. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words. Many instances of cursing are recorded in Scripture. Thus God cursed the serpent that had seduced Eve (Gen. 3:14); Cain, who slew his brother (4:11). He promised Abraham that He would curse those who should curse him. These divine maledictions are not merely imprecations or the expressions of impotent wishes, but they carry their effects with them and are attended with all the miseries they denounce or foretell. Curses delivered against individuals by holy men (9:25; 49:7; Deut. 27:15; Josh. 6:26) are not the expressions of revenge, passion, or impatience; they are predictions, and, therefore, not such as God condemns.

The Mosaic law forbade the cursing of father or mother (Ex. 21:17) on pain of death, of the ruler of his people (22:28), of one that is deaf (Lev. 19:14) or perhaps absent so that he could not hear. Blasphemy, or cursing God, was a capital crime (24:11, 14–15). See Anathema.

CURTAINS. The rendering of three Heb. terms.

1. Yāraqâ, the ten “curtains” of fine linen, and also the eleven of goats’ hair that covered the Tabernacle (Ex. 26:1–13; 36:8–17). The charge of these curtains and of the other textile fabrics of the Tabernacle was laid on the Gershonites (Num. 4:4–25). Having this definite meaning, the word became a synonym for the Tabernacle (2 Sam. 7:2). Sometimes it means the sides of a tent (Isa. 54:2; Jer. 4:20; 10:20).

2. Māsāk, the “screen” for the doorway of the Tabernacle (Ex. 26:36; etc.), and also for the gate of the court around the Tabernacle (Ex. 27:16; etc.). See Tabernacle.

3. Daq, “fineness,” occurs in the expression “stretches out the heavens like a curtain” (Isa. 40:22; NIV, “canopy”) and appears to have been a fabric such as is used by rich orientals for a screen over their courts in summer.

CUSH (Heb. kûsh).

1. A son (probably the eldest) of Ham. In the genealogy of Noah’s children it is said, “Cush became the father of Nimrod” (Gen. 10:8; 1 Chron. 1:10). A number of his descendants are also mentioned.

2. A Benjamite, mentioned in the title of Ps. 7, of whom nothing more is known than that the psalm is there said to have been composed “concerning” him, 1000 B.C. He appears to have been an enemy of David and in search of an opportunity of injuring him but to have been unsuccessful (v. 15).

3. Land of. The ancient designation of Ethiopia, that section of Africa contiguous to Egypt and the Red Sea, now again known as Ethiopia (2 Kings 19:9; Esther 1:1, see marg.; Ezek. 29:10, marg.). In Gen. 2:13 and 10:8, the reference is to an earlier Asiatic (Mesopotamian) Cush, probably the Kassites (Cossaeans).

CU’SHAN (ku’shan). Another form of Cush or perhaps an Arabian country occupied by Cushites (Hab. 3:7).

CU’SHAN-RISHATHA’IM (ku’shan-rish-a-tha’-im). Evidently an obscure Hittite conqueror who, having annexed Mesopotamia (Mitanni), overran Palestine (Judg. 3:7–10). He left traces of his conquests at Bethshan, the stout Esdraelon fortress, and in other places (John Garstang, Joshua-Judges, pp. 62, 364). The event is likely to be placed c. 1361–1353 B.C., in the latter part of the reign of Tutankhamen (c. 1366–1357 B.C.) and the first years of the regime of his general Haremhab, when Egyptian influence in Syria-Palestine had waned. CU’SHI (ku’shi; “Cushite,” or “Ethiopian”).

1. The messenger sent by Joab to announce to David the success of the battle against Absalom and the death of the young prince (2 Sam. 18:21–23, 31–32), about 970 B.C.

2. The father of Shelemiah, and great-grandfather of Jehudi, which latter was sent by the Jewish magnates to invite Baruch to read his roll to them (Jer. 36:14), before 604 B.C.

3. The son of Gedaliah and father of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph. 1:1), before 620 B.C.

CUSHITE. See Cush.

CUSHITE WOMAN. Zipporah, the wife of Moses, is so described (Num. 12:1); elsewhere she is called the daughter of a Midianite (Ex. 2:21; cf. v. 16). Reference is probably made here to the Arabian Ethiopia or Cush. Ewald and Keil and Delitzsch think that allusion is made to another wife whom Moses married after the death of Zipporah (which see).

CUSHION. See articles Bed; Pillow.

CUSTOM (Heb. hālak, “way tax,” Ezra 4:13, 20; Gk. telos, “tax,” 1 Macc. 11:35; Matt. 17:25; Rom. 13:7). See Tax.

CUSTOM, RECEIPT OF (Gk. telōnion). A KJV term signifying “tollhouse” (Matt. 9:9; Mark 2:14; Luke 5:27).

CUṬHAH, or Cuthah (kuṭha). The name of a city of Babylonia mentioned only twice in the OT. In one passage (2 Kings 17:30) it is connected with the worship of the god Nergal; in the other (17:24) it is mentioned along with Babylon and other cities as furnishing the people who were deported and settled in Samaria. The city of Cuthah was located a short distance E of Babylon, where the village of Tell-Ibrahim now marks its former site. It was one of the most important cities of ancient Babylonia. In the opinion of some it was the capital city of an ancient kingdom that existed before the city of Babylon had risen to power in the country. However that may be, the city continued to be a center of power through the Assyrian period, and many Assyrian kings halted there to pay tribute of worship at the shrine of its great god Nergal, whose temple, known by the name of E-shid-Lam, has been found in the ruins at Tell-Ibrahim. After the taking of Samaria by the Assyrians, Sargon king of Assyria transported inhabitants from Avva, Babylon, Hamath, and Sepharvaim to Samaria to take the place of those who had been removed into captivity. These people became known as Samaritans in later times, and a long enmity existed between them and the Jews. Among them the people of Cuthah must have been prominent either because of numbers or of ability, for the new settlers were long called Cutheans. The history of Cuthah shows periods of power and of decay. Sennacherib, king of Assyria who destroyed Babylon, claims to have conquered Cuthah in one of his great campaigns; and Nebuchadnezzar in a later day rebuilt and otherwise restored and beautified its temple. Cuthah had two rivers or canals and therefore probably possessed some commercial importance. R.W.R.

CUTS (in the flesh, Lev. 19:28; 21:5; Jer. 48:37). Unnatural disfigurement of the body was prohibited by Moses and seems to refer to the scratching of the arms, head, and face, common in times of mourning among the people of the East. The law gave the further prohibition, “Nor make any tattoo marks on yourselves” (Lev. 19:28), a custom common among the savage tribes, and still seen in Arabia. This prohibition had reference to idolatrous usages but was intended to inculcate upon the Israelites a proper reverence for God’s creation.

The priests of Baal cut themselves with knives to propitiate the god “according to their custom” (1 Kings 18:28). Herodotus says the Carians, who resided in Europe, cut their foreheads with knives at festivals of Isis, in this respect exceeding the Egyptians, who beat themselves on these occasions (Herodotus 2.61). Lucian, speaking of the Syrian priestly attendants of this mock deity, says that, using violent gestures, they cut their arms and tongues with swords. Tattooing indicated allegiance to a deity, in the same manner as soldiers and slaves bore tattooed marks to indicate allegiance or adscription. This is evidently alluded to in the book of Revelation (13:16; 17:5; 19:20) and, though in a contrary direction, by Ezekiel (9:4), by Paul (Gal. 6:17), and perhaps by Isaiah (44:5) and Zechariah (13:6) (Smith, Bib. Dict., s.v.). See Mark.

CYPRUS (sī'prus). A large island in the Mediterranean sixty miles off the coast of Syria. Its length is about 138 miles and its greatest width 60 miles. It was once inhabited by the Phoenicians. In 447 B.C. the Greeks controlled it; in 58 B.C. it fell to the Romans. At the death of Alexander the Great it had been incorporated with Egypt, and it was an imperial province in 27 B.C. The first NT notice of Cyprus is in Acts 4:36, where it is mentioned as the native place of Barnabas. It appears prominently in connection with the early spread of Christianity (11:19–20). Paul and Barnabas visited it A.D. 44, and it was Paul's first missionary field (13:4–13). The Kittim of Gen. 10:4 and the Chittim of Isa. 23:1 (rendered "Cyprus" in the NIV) referred initially to the inhabitants of Citium and later to the inhabitants of the whole island. Cyprus was known as Elishah in Ezek. 27:7. Among the more important excavations on the island are those at Paphos (which see) and Salamis (which see).

CYRE'NE (sī'rē'nē). A city founded by the Greeks upon a beautiful tableland eighteen hundred feet above sea level. It was the capital of the district of Cyrenaica in Africa. It was a Greek city but contained many Jews. Cyrene was represented in Jerusalem at Pentecost (Acts 2:10). Simon, one of its people, helped Jesus bear His cross (Matt. 27:32). Cyrenian Jews had a synagogue at Jerusalem (Acts 6:9).

Cyrene was a great city in antiquity. The central part of the city was surrounded by a wall four miles in circumference, but large temples and other isolated structures stood far outside the walls. At its height it was said to have had a population of more than 100,000. It was noted among the ancients for its intellectual life, and its medical school was famous. The city was dealt an irreparable blow by the Jewish revolt of A.D. 115–16 and the measures taken by the Roman government to quell it. It was described as deserted in the fourth century. Several fine buildings and some excellent sculpture were excavated there early in this century. H.F.V.

CYRE'NIAN (sī'rē'ni-an; "of Cyrene," Matt. 27:32). A native of Cyrene, or Cyrenaica, in Africa (cf. Mark 15:21; Acts 11:20; etc.).

CYRE'NIUS (sī-rē'ni-us; whose full name was "Publius Silpicius Quirinus"). The second person bearing that name to be mentioned in Roman history, he was consul with M. Valerius Messala. Some years after (A.D. 6) he was made governor of Syria; he decreed that a census, or enrollment, take place there and in Judea. He was a favorite with Tiberius, and on his death (A.D. 21) he was buried with public honors by the Senate at the request of the emperor. The census mentioned above seems, in Luke 2:2, to be identified with one that took place at the time of the birth of Christ, when Sentius Saturnius was governor of Syria. From this has arisen considerable difficulty, which has been variously solved, either by supposing some corruption in the text of Luke or by giving some unusual sense to his words. But A. W. Zumpt, of Berlin, has shown it to be probable that Quirinus (as rendered in the NIV) was twice governor of Syria and, by striking and satisfactory arguments, fixes the time of his governorship from 4 B.C. to A.D. 1; the second A.D. 6–10. See Chronology, NT.

CY'RUS (sī'rus) II, the Great. The conqueror of Babylon and ruler of that city from 539 B.C. until his death in 530 B.C. and founder of the vast Persian Empire. This great humane ruler holds an important position both in biblical prophecy (Isa. 41:25; 44:28; 45:1–13) and history (Ezra 1:1–8; 4:3–5; 2 Chron. 36:22–23; Dan. 1:21; 10:1).

Early History. Cyrus II came to the throne of Anshan, an Elamite region, around 559 B.C. He clashed with a Median king, Astyages. When the Median army rebelled, Cyrus victoriously took Ecbatana, and the Persians became ascendant.

Conquests. Cyrus II extended his conquests with lightninglike rapidity, defeating Croesus, king of Lydia c. 546 B.C. Babylon fell to him in 539 B.C. Thus he laid the foundations for the vast Persian Empire under whose dominion Judea was to remain a province for the next two centuries. Cyrus established his capital at Pasargadae in the land of Parsa. On a ruined palace there the repeated inscription can still be read, “I, Cyrus, the king, the Achaemenid.” From this palace comes the earliest extant Persian relief, a four-winged genius, perhaps representing the deified Cyrus.

Decree. This edict recorded in 2 Chron. 36:22–23 and Ezra 1:2–3 gave permission to the Hebrew captives to go back to Palestine to rebuild their Temple. “Thus says Cyrus king of Persia, ‘The Lord, the God of heaven, has given me all the kingdoms of the earth, and He has appointed me to build Him a house in Jerusalem, which is in Judah. Whosoever there is among you of all His people, may his God be with him! Let him go up to Jerusalem ... and rebuild the house of the Lord.’”

Inscriptions. The famous cylinder of Cyrus found by Hormuzd Rassam in the nineteenth century is in remarkable agreement with the royal edict as set forth in the Bible. “From ... Ashur and Susa, Agade, Ashnunnak, Zamban, Meturnu, Deri, with the territory of the land of Gutium, the cities on the other side of the Tigris, whose sites were of ancient found—the gods, who dwell in them, I brought back to their places and caused them to dwell in a habitation for all time. All their inhabitants I collected and restored them to their dwelling places ... may all the gods whom I brought into their cities pray daily before Bel and Nabu for long life for me” (R. W. Rogers, Cuneiform Parallels to the Old Testament [1912], p. 383). This royal edict shows that Cyrus reversed the inhumane policy of displacing whole populations, as practiced by Assyrian and Babylonian conquerors. Thus his clemency and religious toleration with regard to the Jewish captives are readily understood. Further, it is clear how the Hebrew prophet sang of Cyrus as the deliverer whom Jehovah would raise up (Isa. 45:1–4). Although the Hebrew prophet spoke of the great conqueror as anointed by the Lord for the particular task of restoring the Jewish captives, Cyrus claimed to be commissioned by the god Marduk. The famous inscription of the victor, preserved on a clay cylinder, contains the amazing story of triumphs of one who plainly saw himself as a man of destiny and gives background to the prophetic message of the Hebrew seer. “Marduk ... sought a righteous prince, after his own heart, whom he took by the hand, Cyrus, king of Anshan, he called by name, to lordship over the whole world he appointed him ... to his city Babylon he caused him to go ... his numerous troops in number unknown, like the water of a river, marched armed at his side. Without battle and conflict he permitted him to enter Babylon. He spared his city Babylon a calamity. Nabunaid, the king, who did not fear him, he delivered into his hand” (Rogers, op. cit., p. 381).

His Capital. Cyrus established his main capital at Pasargadae, about forty-five miles NE of the later city of Persepolis. The royal complex seems to have consisted of several pavilions set among gardens and surrounded by a masonry wall about thirteen feet thick. Though archaeological soundings were made at the site earlier, the main work was done by Ali Sami, then director of the Archaeological Institute at Persepolis (1949–54) and David Stronach, director of the British Institute of Persian Studies in Tehran (1961–63). At the SW edge of Pasargadae stands the tomb of Cyrus. Its stepped base measures about 45 by 38 feet, and the tomb chamber itself about 17 by 17 feet and 19 feet high. Its gabled roof stands to a height of about 35 feet from the ground. About a half mile to the NE of the tomb stood a complex of palaces: an audience hall, a garden pavilion, a gatehouse, and a residential palace. About another half mile to the NE lay a citadel area, and approximately a half mile NE of that was a sacred area with two freestanding limestone plinths, which may have been fire altars, and a terraced mound that may have been a stage for sacrificial rites.

End. Cyrus was slain in battle 530 B.C. and buried in a still extant tomb at Pasargadae. In the small burial chamber a golden sarcophagus received Cyrus's body. Plutarch (A.D. 90) says the tomb bore this inscription: "O man, whosoever thou art and whencesoever thou comest, for I know that thou wilt come, I am Cyrus and I won for the Persians their empire. Do not, therefore, begrudge me this little earth which covers my body." M.F.U.; H.F.V.

D

DAB´AREH. This name is incorrectly spelled in the KJV and should be Daberath (which see).

DAB´BESHETH (dab´e-sheth; “hump”). A town on the border of Zebulun (Josh. 19:11). Its location has not been positively identified.

DAB´ERATH (dab´e-rath; “pasture”). A Levitical town of Issachar (Josh. 19:12; 21:28; 1 Chron. 6:72). It lay at the western foot of Mt. Tabor. It is the present insignificant village of Deburieh.

DAGGER. Any sharp instrument, especially a weapon of war (Judg. 3:16, 21–22). See Armor.

DAGON. See Gods, False.

DAILY. Occurs in the KJV as the rendering of the Gk. ἐπιούσιος, “necessary” (Matt. 6:11; Luke 11:3), so that the phrase really means “the bread of our necessity,” i.e., necessary for us.

DAILY OFFERING, or Sacrifice. See Sacrifice.

DALAI´AH. See Delaiah.

DALE, THE KINGS. See Shaveh, Valley of.

DA´LETH (ד) (da´leth). The fourth letter of the Heb. alphabet. From Semitic “daleth” came Gk. delta δ, whence Lat. and English “d.” See Ps. 119, section 4, where this letter begins each verse in the Heb.

DALMANU´THA (dal-ma-nū´tha). A place on the W coast of the Sea of Galilee, into parts of which Christ was said to have gone (“Magadan,” Matt. 15:39).

Dalmanutha itself is mentioned only in Mark 8:10. The place is identified with a village called Ain-el-Barideh—the “cold fountain.” The village proper is called el-Mejdel, possibly the “Migdal-el” of Josh. 19:38.

DALMA´TIA (dal-mā´shi-a). A district E of the Adriatic, being a Roman province; a place visited by Titus (2 Tim. 4:10). According to Rom. 15:19 Paul himself had once preached there, the place being referred to as Illyricum.

DAL´PHON (dal´fon). The second of the ten sons of Haman, killed by the Jews on the thirteenth of Adar (Esther 9:7).

DAM (Heb. אֵם, “mother”). A KJV term; see Mother.

DAMAGES. Remuneration or restitution prescribed in case of offense against the person, property, or name of another. See Law.

DAM´ARIS (dam´a-ris; “gentle”). An Athenian woman converted to Christianity by Paul’s preaching (Acts 17:34). Chrysostom and others believed her to have been the wife of Dionysius the Areopagite but apparently for no other reason than that she is mentioned with him in this passage.

DAM´ASCENES (dam´a-sēns). Inhabitants of Damascus (2 Cor. 11:32).

DAMAS´CUS (da-mas´kus). Said to be the oldest city in the East.

Situation. Damascus lies about seventy miles from the seaboard, just E of the Anti-Lebanon Mountains, in the valley of the Abana, a great plain about 2,300 feet above the sea and thirty miles by ten in extent. This plain is called the Ghutah and is generously watered by the Abana (modern Barada) and Pharpar (Awaj) rivers. It is fertile, abounding in gardens, orchards, and meadows. It is to Abana that Damascus chiefly owes her importance and stability. Another important factor is that the city lies on the border of the desert and that she is situated on the natural highway from the E to the W. Three great roads lead out of the city to the W, S, and E. The western, or southwestern, road travels by Galilee to the Levant and the Nile. The southern, which leaves the city by the “Gates of God,” takes the pilgrims to Mecca. The eastern is the road to Baghdad.

History. Josephus (Ant. 1.6.4) says that Damascus was founded by Uz, son of Aram. It is first mentioned in Scripture in connection with Abraham (Gen. 14:15), whose steward was a native of the place (15:2). We may gather from the name of this person, as well as from the statement of Josephus, which connects the city with the Aramaeans, that it was a Semitic settlement.

In the time of David the Syrians of Damascus supported Hadadezer king of Zobah, with whom David was at war (2 Sam. 8:5; 1 Chron. 18:5). But the Syrians were defeated, and David became master of the whole territory, garrisoning it with Israelites (2 Sam. 8:6). In the reign of Solomon, Rezon (which see) became master of Damascus (1 Kings 11:23–25). The family of Hadad appears to have recovered the throne, as we find Ben-hadad in league with Baasha of Israel against Asa (1 Kings 15:18–19; 2 Chron. 16:2–3), and later in league with Asa against Baasha (1 Kings 15:20). The defeat and death of Ahab at Ramoth-gilead (1 Kings 22:15–37) enabled the Syrians of Damascus to resume the offensive. Their bands ravaged Israel during Jehoram’s reign and laid siege to Samaria.

Hazael, the servant of Ben-hadad, murdered the king (2 Kings 8:15) and was soon after defeated by the Assyrians. He and his son waged successful war against Israel and Judah, but Joash defeated the Syrians three times and recovered the cities of Israel (2 Kings 13:3, 22–25). Jeroboam II (about 783 B.C.) is said to have recovered Damascus (2 Kings 14:28). Later (about 735 B.C.) Rezin, king of Damascus, and Pekah, king of Israel, laid unsuccessful siege to Jerusalem (2 Kings 16:5), but Elath—built by Azariah in Syrian territory—having been taken by Rezin, Ahaz sought the aid of Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings 16:7–8). Rezin was slain, the kingdom of Damascus brought to an end, the city destroyed, and its inhabitants carried captive into Assyria (v. 9; cf. Amos 1:5). It was long before Damascus recovered from this serious blow. We do not know at what time Damascus was rebuilt, but Strabo says that it was the most famous place in Syria during the Persian period. At the time of the gospel history and of the apostle Paul it formed a part of the kingdom of Aretas (2 Cor. 11:32), an Arabian prince, who held his kingdom at the pleasure of the Romans.

The mention of Damascus in the NT is in connection with the conversion and ministry of Paul (which see).

DAM´MIM (dam´im). See Ephes-dammim; Pasdammim.

DAMNATION (rendering of several Gk. terms, denoting judgment, destruction, etc.). A word used to denote the final loss of the soul, but not to be always so understood. Thus, in place of the KJV expression “damnation,” the NASB renders “destruction” (2 Pet. 2:1); “condemnation” (Rom. 13:2; 14:23); and “judgment” (1 Cor. 11:29). Just what it is to which the offender may be condemned lies with God. Some suppose temporal judgments from God and the censure of wise and good men. See Punishment.

DAMSEL. See Girl.

DAN (‘judge’). The fifth son of Jacob and the first of Bilhah, Rachel’s maid (Gen. 30:6).

Personal History. Of the patriarch himself no incident is preserved. By the blessing of Jacob on his deathbed it was settled that Dan and his other sons by handmaids should be legally entitled to a portion of the family inheritance.

Tribe of Dan. Only one son is attributed to Dan (Gen. 46:23), but it may be observed that “Hushim” is a plural form, as if the name not of an individual but of a family. At the Exodus the tribe of Dan numbered 62,700 warriors (Num. 1:39) and at the second census 64,400, holding their rank as second.

Position in Camp. Dan’s position in the journey was on the N of the Tabernacle, with Asher and Naphtali. The standard of the tribe was of white and red and the crest upon it an eagle, the great foe to serpents. Jacob had compared Dan to a serpent. Ahiezer substituted the eagle, the destroyer of serpents, as he shrank from carrying an adder upon his flag.

Prominent Persons. One who played a prominent part in the wandering was “Oholiab, the son of Ahisamach, of the tribe of Dan” (Ex. 31:6). Samson was also a Danite (Judg. 13:2).

Territory. Dan was the last of the tribes to receive its portion, which was the smallest of the twelve. It had, however, great natural advantages, was fertile, and had also a line of seacoast, which seems to have led the tribe to engage in fishing and commerce, for in the war of Sisera and Barak, Dan remained in ships (Judg. 5:17). It included the cities of Joppa, Lydda, and Ekron.

Capture of Laish. Crowded by the Amorites from the rich lowlands up into the mountains, the Danites turned their attention to territory in the N of Palestine. A force of 600 men was sent, who captured and burned Laish, afterward rebuilding it and naming it Dan (Judg. 18:14–29). This city, with others, was laid waste by Ben-hadad (1 Kings 15:20; 2 Chron. 16:4), and this is the last mention of the place. It is now called Tell el Kâdy (“mound of the judge”).

DAN, CAMP OF (Judg. 13:25; 18:12, “Mahaneh-dan”). The name given to the district in which the Danites pitched before emigrating northward; or perhaps the location of some Danite families that remained.

DAN, CITY OF.

1. Formerly Laish, but taken by the Danites and called Dan. Dan stood at the northern border of Canaan (Judg. 20:1) and the northern border of the Northern Kingdom during the period of the Divided Kingdom. Here Jeroboam instituted calf worship after he led the ten tribes out of the Hebrew monarchy (1 Kings 12:29–33). The sixty-five-foot-high mound covers about fifty acres. Avraham Biran began an Israel Department of Antiquities dig there in 1966, and work has gone on to the present. Excavations have demonstrated that the city was founded about 2500 B.C. Of special interest was the discovery of a high place dating to the Israelite period and evidently passing through two stages of construction. The lower, apparently constructed by Jeroboam I in the tenth century B.C., was about twenty by sixty-one feet in size. The upper, of Ahab's day, measured sixty by sixty-two feet and was approached by a monumental flight of steps twenty-seven feet wide. A great double gateway was uncovered on the E side of the Israelite city. It was probably built by Jeroboam I.

2. There is a reference in Ezek. 27:19 in the KJV to "Dan also" (Heb. wfdan), but the NASB has it correctly "Vedan," which has been believed to be Aden in Arabia, once the chief trading port of Arabia before the rise of Mochar. The NIV, however, renders "Danites." H.F.V.

"DAN TO BE ER-SHEBA." Dan being the northern boundary of Canaan and Beer-sheba its most southerly town, this proverbial saying expressed the extreme length of the land (Judg. 20:1; 1 Sam. 3:20).

DANCE.

Egyptian. Among the Egyptians the dance consisted mostly of a succession of figures in which the performers endeavored to exhibit a great variety of gesture. Men and women danced at the same time or in separate parties, but women were generally preferred for their superior grace and elegance. Some danced to slow airs, adapted to the style of their movement—the attitudes they assumed frequently partook of a grace not unworthy of the Greeks—and others preferred a lively step, regulated by an appropriate tune. Graceful attitudes and expressive gestures were the general style of their dance, but, as in other countries, the taste of the performance varied according to the rank of the person by whom they were employed, or their own skill. The dance at the house of a priest differed from that among the uncouth peasantry or the lower classes of townsmen.

It was not customary for the upper orders of Egyptians to indulge in this amusement, either in public or private assemblies, and none appears to have practiced it but the lower ranks of society and those who gained their livelihood by attending festive meetings.

The dresses of the female dancers were light and of the finest texture, showing by their transparent quality the form and movement of the limbs. They generally consisted of a loose-flowing robe, reaching to the ankles, occasionally fastened tight at the waist. Round the hips was a small narrow girdle, adorned with beads or ornaments of various colors. Slaves were taught dancing as well as music, and in the houses of the rich, besides their other occupations, that of dancing to entertain the family or a party of friends was required of them. Free Egyptians also gained a livelihood by performing. The dances of the lower orders generally had a tendency toward a species of pantomime; the peasantry were more delighted with ludicrous and extravagant dexterity than with gestures that displayed elegance and grace. The Egyptians also danced at the temples in honor of the gods, and in some processions, as they approached the precincts of the sacred courts.

Greek. Though the Greeks employed women who practiced music and dancing to entertain the guests, they looked upon the dance as a recreation in which all classes might indulge and an accomplishment becoming a gentleman. But if the dances became occasions for excess or effeminacy, the Greeks regarded them as indecent for men of wisdom and character.

Roman. The Romans, on the contrary, were far from considering dance worthy of a man of rank or of a sensible person. Cicero says: "No man who is sober dances, unless he is out of his mind, either when alone or in any decent society, for dancing is the companion of wanton conviviality, dissoluteness, and luxury.”

Hebrew. Among the Jews, dancing was always a favorite social pastime among girls and women (Jer. 31:4), imitated by children playing on the street (Job 21:11; Matt. 11:17; Luke 7:32), and was engaged in by female companies in honor of national joys, especially victories (1 Sam. 18:6) and religious festivities (Ex. 15:20; Judg. 21:21). On such occasions, at least in more ancient times, men also testified to the joy of their hearts by dancing (2 Sam. 6:5, 14). A religious meaning belonged also to the torch dance, which was performed later by men in the Temple on the first evening of the feast of Booths. The dances probably consisted only of circular movements with artless rhythmical steps and lively gesticulations and were accompanied by women beating tambourines (Judg. 11:34). At national festivities, other instruments were played (Pss. 68:25; 150:3–5). Of public female dancers, as are frequently found in the modern East, there is not a trace to be found in OT times. Such dancing as that of Herodias’s daughter before men at a voluptuous banquet (Matt. 14:6; Mark 6:22) was first introduced among the Jews through the influence of corrupt Greek customs. It was also a Jewish custom for young ladies to dance at private entertainments.

The Jewish dance was performed by the sexes separately. There is no evidence from sacred history that the diversion was promiscuously enjoyed, except perhaps when the deified calf had been erected in imitation of the Egyptian festival of Apis, and all classes of Hebrews intermingled in the frantic revelry. In the sacred dances, although both sexes seem to have frequently borne a part in the procession or chorus, they remained in distinct and separate companies (Ps. 68:25; Jer. 31:13). The dances of the virgins at Shiloh were certainly part of a religious festivity (Judg. 21:19–23).

A form of religious dancing was sometimes made part of the public worship of the early Christians. The custom was borrowed from the Jews, in whose solemn processions choirs of young men and maidens, moving in time with solemn music, always bore a part. It must not be supposed that the “religious dances” had any similarity to modern dance. They were rather processions, in which all who took part marched in time with the hymns that were sung. The custom was early laid aside, probably because it might have led to the adoption of such objectionable dances as were employed in honor of the pagan deities. Prohibitions of dancing as an amusement abound in the church Fathers and in the decrees of the councils.

Figurative. Dancing in the Scriptures is symbolic of joy in contrast with mourning (Ps. 30:11; etc.).

DANIEL (dan’yel; “God is my judge”). The name of the prophet (which see) who ministered in Bablylon, and of two other persons in the Bible.

1. The son of David, the second by the Carmelitess Abigail (which see; 1 Chron. 3:1). In the parallel passage (2 Sam. 3:3), this child is called Chileab.

2. A priest of the family of Ithamar who returned from the Exile with Ezra (Ezra 8:2), about 457 B.C. He is probably the same as the priest Daniel who joined in the covenant drawn up by Nehemiah (Neh. 10:6) in 445 B.C.

DAN’IEL (dan’yel; “God is my judge”). One of three persons in Scripture with this name (for the other two, see immediately above). The life and prophecies of this celebrated prophet and minister at the court of Babylon are contained in the book bearing his name. Nothing is known of his parentage or family, but he appears to have been of royal or noble descent (Dan. 1:3) and to have possessed considerable personal endowments (1:4).

Early Life. He was taken to Babylon while yet a boy, together with three other Hebrew youths of rank—Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah—at the first deportation of the people of Judah in the fourth year of Jehoiakim (604 B.C.).

Enters the King's Service. He and his companions were obliged to enter the service of the royal court of Babylon, on which occasion he received the Chaldean name Beltshazzar, according to the Eastern custom of taking a new name when a change takes place in one's condition of life, and more especially if his personal liberty is thereby affected (cf. 2 Kings 23:34; 24:17). Daniel, like Joseph, gained the favor of his guardian and was allowed by him to carry out his wise intention of abstaining from unclean food and idolatrous ceremonies (1:8–16). His prudent conduct and absolute refusal to comply with such customs were crowned with the divine blessing and had important results.

Interprets Dreams. After three years of discipline Daniel was presented to the king, and shortly afterward he had an opportunity to exercise his peculiar gift (2 Kings 1:17) of interpreting dreams—not only recalling the forgotten vision of the king but also revealing its meaning (2:14–45). As a reward he was made “ruler over the whole province of Babylon” and “chief prefect over all the wise men of Babylon” (2:48). Later he interpreted another of Nebuchadnezzar's dreams to the effect that he was to lose for a time his throne but was to be restored to it after his humiliation had been completed (chap. 4).

In Retirement. Under the unworthy successors of Nebuchadnezzar Daniel appears to have occupied an inferior position (Dan. 8:27) and no longer to have been “chief of the magicians” (4:8–9), probably living at Susa (8:2). In the first year of King Belshazzar (7:1), about 555 B.C., he was both alarmed and comforted by a remarkable vision (chap. 7), followed by another two years later (chap. 8), which disclosed to him the future course of events and the ultimate fate of the most powerful empires of the world, in particular their relations to the kingdom of God and its development to the great consummation.

Restored to Office. He interpreted the handwriting on the wall that disturbed the feast of Belshazzar (Dan. 5:10–28), and, notwithstanding his bold denunciation of the king, the latter appointed him the “third ruler in the kingdom” (5:29). After the fall of Babylon Darius ascended the throne and made Daniel the first of the “three commissioners” of the empire (6:2). In deep humiliation and prostration of spirit he then prayed to the Almighty in the name of his people for forgiveness of their sins and for the divine mercy in their behalf; and the answering promises that he received far exceeded the tenor of his prayer, for the visions of the seer were extended to the end of Judaism (chap. 9).

Persecution. His elevation to the highest post of honor and the scrupulous discharge of his official duty aroused the envy and jealousy of his colleagues, who conspired against him. They persuaded the monarch to pass a decree forbidding anyone for thirty days to offer prayer to any person save the king. For disobeying that order the prophet was thrown into a den of lions but was miraculously saved and again raised to the highest post of honor (chap. 6).

Patriotism. He lived to enjoy the happiness of seeing his people restored to their own land, and although his advanced age would not allow him to be among those who returned to Palestine, he never ceased to occupy his mind and heart with his people and their concerns (Dan. 10:12). At the accession of Cyrus he still retained his prosperity (1:21; 6:28).

Visions. In the third year of Cyrus he had a series of visions in which he was informed of the minutest details respecting the future and sufferings of his nation to a period of their true redemption through Christ, as also a consolatory notice to himself to proceed calmly and peaceably to the end of his days and then await patiently the resurrection of the dead (chaps. 10–12). It is not worthwhile to mention here the various fables respecting the later life and death of Daniel, as all accounts are vague and confused.

Character. In the prophecies of Ezekiel, mention is made of Daniel as a pattern of righteousness (Ezek. 14:14, 20) and wisdom (28:3), and, since Daniel was still young at that time (594–588 B.C.), some have believed that another prophet or the legendary Danel of the Ugaritic epic literature of the fourteenth century B.C. discovered at Ras Shamra, Syria, in 1929–37, must be referred to. But Daniel was conspicuous for purity and knowledge at an early age (Dan. 1:4, 17, 20), and he was probably more than thirty years of age at the time of Ezekiel’s prophecy. See Daniel, Book of.

DANIEL, BOOK OF. One of the most important prophetic books of the OT, indispensable as an introduction to NT prophecy dealing with the “times of the Gentiles” (Luke 21:24), the manifestation of the man of sin, the Great Tribulation, the second coming of Christ, the resurrection, and the judgments. Daniel’s visions encompass the whole period of Gentile world rule to its destruction and the setting up of the messianic kingdom.

 - Israel’s final tribulation and the second advent (9:27)
 - D. The vision of God’s glory (10:1–21)
 - E. Rule of the Ptolemies and Seleucidae; end-time events (11:1–45)
 - F. The Great Tribulation (12:1)
 - G. The resurrections (12:2–3)
 - H. Daniel’s concluding message (12:4–13)

The Danielic Authorship. A Maccabean date (c. 167 B.C.) and the rejection of the traditional Danielic authorship are alleged assured achievements of modern criticism. Those views, however, are built upon a number of highly plausible fallacies.

1. It is argued that Daniel’s prophecy was placed among writings in the third section of the Heb. canon and not among the prophets in the second division because it was not in existence when the canon of the prophets was closed, allegedly between 300 and 200 B.C. That conclusion is based upon the unsound critical theory of canonization and also fails to take into account the official status of the prophet as a determining factor in the formation of the Heb. canon. Although possessing the prophetic gift (Matt. 24:15), Daniel everywhere appears as a statesman and not as a prophet.

2. It is assumed that because Daniel is not mentioned in the list of writers in the book of Ecclesiasticus (c. 180 B.C.) that the book, therefore, did not exist at that time. Such an argument from silence is dubious, as neither Asa, Jehoshaphat, or Ezra is mentioned. Discovery of fragments of Daniel among the Dead Sea Scrolls dating to 150 B.C. or earlier has helped to question some of the liberal conclusions about authorship and date.

3. It is maintained that the author of Daniel makes erroneous statements about history of the sixth century B.C., which would be incredible on the part of one who really lived during that period. The campaign of Nebuchadnezzar referred to in 1:1 is given as an example. But that again is an argument from silence, for no extant source has proved that reference erroneous. Numbers of alleged discrepancies in chap. 5 have been obviated or cleared up by archaeological light, such as the existence of Belshazzar as king, who is called the son of (meaning nothing more than the royal successor of) Nebuchadnezzar.

4. Alleged literary features of Daniel are adduced to prove its late date. There is no reason at all to conclude, for instance, that the three Gk. words, names of musical instruments (Dan. 3:10), “demand a date” after the conquest of Palestine by Alexander the Great (332 B.C.), as S. R. Driver (Introduction to the Literature of the O.T., p. 508) contends. It is becoming increasingly evident that Greek culture penetrated the Near East at a much earlier date than had formerly been supposed. Nebuchadnezzar’s court was evidently highly cosmopolitan. If Jewish captives were required to furnish music (Ps. 137:3), why is it so incredible to believe that Greeks from Ionia, Lydia, Cilicia, and Cyprus were required to do the same? A slight Persian influence is certainly not astonishing since Daniel lived on into the Persian period. Neither is there anything decisive against Danielic authorship in the considerable Aram. portions of the book.

5. The critical claim that the reference to Daniel in Ezekiel (14:14, 20; 28:3) is to the ancient Semitic legendary figure of Danel, who renders justice in the Ras Shamra poems of the fourteenth century B.C., is highly plausible but certainly unsound. Why should Ezekiel classify a pagan figure with holy men such as Job and Noah? The fact is that the Ezekiel references furnish comparative historical evidence of the historicity of Daniel.

Interpretation. Considerable difference in interpretation of the great visions of Daniel is set forth by amillennial and premillennial commentators. Premillennialists contend that there will yet be established a future kingdom of Israel. Amillennialists generally view the first coming of Christ as an event initiating a spiritual messianic kingdom. Premillennialists, on the other hand, see this as a vision of the destruction of the Gentile world system, and consider the stone that “became a great mountain and filled the whole earth” of the monarchy vision (2:31–45) as being the establishment of the kingdom over Israel. Such a destruction of Gentile world governments did not occur at the first advent of Christ. The Roman Empire was then at its height. Since the crucifixion, the Roman Empire has followed out the history marked in Daniel’s great monarchy vision. Gentile world power still continues, and it will end only by catastrophic judgment at Armageddon (Rev. 16:14; 19:21). Likewise, in the great visions of chaps. 7 and 8, a difference of interpretation prevails. Premillennialists see the great beasts portrayed in chap. 7 as picturing the outward voracious nature of the same world empires and Gentile world rule as exhibited in the monarchy vision of chap. 2. The “lion” of Dan. 7:4 is Babylon; the “bear” (7:5) is Media-Persia; the “leopard” (7:6) is Greece under Alexander; the nondescript beast of 7:7 is the Roman Empire; 7:8 gives a vision of the end of Gentile world dominion. Gentile world dominion in the end time will have “ten horns” (that is, ten kings, Rev. 17:12), corresponding to the ten toes in the monarchy vision. The “little” horn of Dan. 7:8 prefigures Antiochus Epiphanes and through him the final beast (2 Thess. 2:4–8; Rev. 13:4–10). The second coming of Christ in glory to set up His earthly kingdom is described in Dan. 7:9–12. In Dan. 8 the vision of the “ram” with the two horns and the “male goat” with the one conspicuous horn symbolizes the transfer of world power from Media-Persia in the East to Greece under Alexander in the West. The little horn prefigures Antiochus Epiphanes and through him the final Antichrist. The vision of the seventy weeks of chap. 9 constitutes one of the pivotal prophecies of the Bible, whether the amillennial interpretation of it as historical or the premillennial view as prophetic is adopted. Many prophetic Bible teachers hold that the seventieth week (which see) is yet future and corresponds to the Great Tribulation discoursed upon by our Lord in Matt. 24:21. Premillennialists, accordingly, see a gap between 9:26 and 9:27 in which they place the church period between the first and second advents. Amillennialists deny the “gap theory” and interpret the seventy weeks as fulfilled in connection with the first advent and the death of Christ and events closely connected with it. Daniel 11:1–12:13 gives a prophetic panorama from Darius to the man of lawlessness (2 Thess. 2:3–4). The spirit of prophecy returns to Daniel’s day. Daniel traces the remaining history of the Persian Empire to Alexander, the “mighty king” of Greece (Dan. 11:3). The division of Alexander’s empire into four parts (11:4), as already predicted in 8:22, is here again foretold. Daniel 11:4–20, in a most amazing fashion, minutely traces the wars between the Ptolemies and the Seleucids of Syria. Antiochus Epiphanes occupies the vision down to v. 36. From 11:36 the interpretation broadens out to the final little “horn.” His prosperity continues until “the indignation” is accomplished (v. 36). “The indignation” is the Great Tribulation (12:1; Matt. 24:21). Daniel 11:38–45 portrays the little horn’s career as an irresistible conqueror (vv. 40–44). He establishes the headquarters of his authority in Jerusalem. From this period begins the Great Tribulation, which lasts for 3½ years (7:25; 12:7, 11; Rev. 13:5). Thus the book of Daniel, according to premillennialists, portrays the destruction of Gentile world power under the beast or little horn. That is effected by the second coming of Christ and the establishment of the kingdom over Israel. M.F.U.

DAN'TTE (Judg. 13:2; 18:1, 11; 1 Chron. 12:35). One of the tribe of Dan (which see).

DAN-JA'AN (dan-jā'an; 2 Sam. 24:6). The LXX and the Vulg. read "Dan in the woods." Opinions differ as to whether this is identical with Dan or Laish, or the ancient site called Danian in the mountains above Khan en-Nakura, S of Tyre, or a place near Gilead.

DAN'NAH (dan'na; "murmuring"). A city in the mountains of Judah, about eight miles from Hebron (Josh. 15:49).

DA'RA (da'ra). A contracted or corrupt form (1 Chron. 2:6) of the name Darda (which see).

DAR'DA (dar'da). A son of Mahol, one of the four men of great fame for their wisdom but surpassed by Solomon (1 Kings 4:31), before 960 B.C. In 1 Chron. 2:6, however, the same four names occur again as "sons of Zerah," of the tribe of Judah, with the slight difference that Darda appears as Dara. Although the identity of these persons with those in 1 Kings 4 has been much debated, they are doubtless the same.

DARIC, or Drachma. A weight and a unit of money. See Metrology.

DARI'US, THE KING OF PERSIA (da-rī'us; Darius Hystaspes in KJV; 521–486 B.C.; Ezra 4:5, 24; 5:5–7; 6:1, 12, 15; Hag. 1:1; 2:10; Zech. 1:1, 7; 7:1). The restorer of the Persian Empire founded by Cyrus the Great (see Cyrus). Cyrus was succeeded in 529 B.C. by his son Cambyses, who added first Phoenicia and Cyprus, and afterward Egypt, to the new empire. In part because Cambyses had been away too long on his campaigns and had lost touch with the people, Smerdis, the younger son of Cyrus, led a revolt in Persia. On hearing of this, Cambyses jumped on his horse to return and deal with the situation and apparently wounded himself with his own dagger. When he died from the wound, Darius, the son of Hystapes, headed an insurrection of the nobles against Smerdis, which succeeded in dethroning Smerdis. Darius was descended, collaterally with Cyrus, from the ancient royal line of Persia. The reign of Darius belongs more to general than to Bible history, but, as he had great influence on the history of the world as well as upon the fortunes of the Jews, we must notice the leading stages of his career. For our information we are indebted not only to the Greek historians but to his own inscriptions, written in the old Persian cuneiform alphabet, whose decipherment also gave the key to the more ancient and complex Assyrian and Babylonian system of ideograms and syllable signs.

Period of Revolt. The genius for universal rule possessed by Cyrus, his power of conciliation, and his generosity and tolerance had kept his heterogeneous empire in peace and contentment for seventeen years after the submission of the Lydians and Greeks of Asia Minor and nine years after the capture of Babylon. But during the reign of Cambyses discontent and misrule prepared the way for open revolt, which at the accession of Darius spread to all parts of his dominions. But the energy and military skill of Darius everywhere prevailed, and the whole formidable uprising was quelled after six years' work of stern repression, so that by 515 B.C. the sole authority of Persia was recognized in all the lands that had been subdued by Cyrus and Cambyses.

Period of Reorganization. Cyrus had made it his policy to interfere as little as possible with the modes of government followed by his several subject states. For example, in many countries the native kings were confirmed and encouraged in their autonomous administration upon the payment of a reasonable tribute, and in the smaller states native governors looked after the royal revenues and at the same time ruled their people in accordance with traditional methods. That system was changed by Darius, who abolished the local kingdoms and principalities and divided the empire into "satrapies," each satrap being a Persian official with supreme authority in civil affairs and a division of the imperial army to support him and maintain the government against all outside attacks. Judges were also appointed with fixed circuits. A system of posts was established, with royal roads extending everywhere for the transmission of dispatches and rescripts to and from the capital cities of Susa or Ecbatana or Pasargadae. This governmental system was an advance over the old Assyrian despotism, in that the sovereign ruled by delegated power. What is of particular importance to Bible readers is the application of the system to Palestine. There the returning exiles expected to find an autonomous principedom, but under Darius there was erected instead the Persian province of Judah, with imperial supervision over matters civil and religious.

Period of Foreign Conquests. Not content with the empire that fell to him by succession, Darius planned and carried out vast schemes of foreign conquest. The most important of those were the acquisition, about 512 B.C., of northwestern India and the subjection, about 508 B.C., of the coastland between the Bosphorus and the Grecian state of Thessaly. Once northwestern India was acquired, the navigation of the lower Indus was controlled and the trade of India opened up by way of the Persian Gulf, with an enormous increase of imperial revenue. The expedition that acquired the coastland crossed the Bosphorus and conquered maritime Thrace and Macedonia. Thus the Persian dominions extended from the Caucasus to the borders of northern Greece and "from India to Ethiopia" (Esther 1:1).

Period of the Grecian Wars. These, as is well known, were precipitated by disturbances among the Greeks of the Asiatic coast. The revolt of the subject cities, in 501 B.C., was supported for a time by the European states of Athens and Eretria. It lasted till 494 B.C., and after its complete suppression steps were immediately taken by Darius for vengeance upon the foreigners. The first great expedition by land and sea in 493 did not quite reach its destination, and the second by sea in 490 was frustrated by the world-famous defeat at Marathon. These expeditions were led by generals of Darius, and he made plans for a third that he was to command in person. A revolt in Egypt in 487 and his own death in 486 put an end to the designs. He was succeeded by his son Xerxes, the Ahasuerus of the book of Esther, whose mother was a daughter of Cyrus the Great.

Darius and the Jews. The exiles who returned under the protection of Cyrus (537 B.C.), having begun their political and religious life at Jerusalem, were thwarted in their efforts to rebuild the Temple by the Samaritans and other adversaries, who accused them of intrigue and sedition against the Persian government. Cyrus, being occupied with his eastern wards, did not take upon himself to interfere for the prosecution of the work. His successor, Cambyses, had little sympathy with his struggling subjects. Thus the restoration of the sanctuary, so essential in all ways to the progress of the little nation, was delayed for seventeen years (Ezra 4:24). The accession of Darius gave new hope to the leaders of the Jews. In 520 B.C. the prophets Haggai and Zechariah stirred up the people to renewed efforts, and under their inspiration Zerubbabel, the civil leader of the colony, set earnestly to work (5:1–2). An appeal to Darius by Tattenai, the satrap of Syria (5:3–17), embodying a memorial from the leaders of the Jews, resulted in the confirmation of their contention that their proceedings were not only lawful but were actually carried on under royal authority. Darius gave orders that search should be made, with the result that in Ecbatana the edict of Cyrus was found containing all that the Jews had claimed (6:1–5). Darius therefore made a new proclamation insisting that no obstacle should be put in the way of the people of Jerusalem, that the Temple should be rebuilt, that interference with the work should be a capital offense, and that contributions should be made in money and goods from the king's local revenues toward the expenses of the restoration (6:6–12). Accordingly the satrap and his officers "with all diligence" carried out the orders of Darius (6:13–15), with the result that the Temple was finished and dedicated in the sixth year of Darius (515 B.C.). DARIUS THE MEDE (Dan. 5:31; 6:1, 6, 9, 25, 28; 9:1; 11:1). This person is to be identified with Gobryas (Gubaru), the governor of Babylon under Cyrus. Darius is most certainly another name for Gubaru. That he was styled "king" is to be regarded as not inaccurate in describing a man of Gubaru's authority since he was amēl pīhāte of the city or province of Babylon, neither does this title usurp the absolute sovereignty of Cyrus (which see). Moreover, it is not necessary to discover cuneiform tablets dated according to the years of Darius's reign in order to substantiate the biblical datings. These biblical datings of Darius's reign (9:1; 11:1) are exactly paralleled by the datings of Belshazzar's reign (7:1; 8:1). This conclusion is warranted since it is now known that the author of Daniel took into consideration Belshazzar's secondary position in the Babylonian Empire (cf. 5:7, 16, 29). Neither does the author of Daniel, while attributing far-reaching administrative powers to Darius, detract from his subordination to Cyrus. Darius is said to have "received the kingdom" (5:31) and to have been "made king over the kingdom of the Chaldeans" (9:1). Behind these statements is the implication that Darius was not the supreme ruler of the Persian Empire. Daniel 6:28 portrays Daniel as prospering not in the consecutive reigns of two independent sovereigns but during the reigns of two contemporary rulers, one being subordinate to the other. "So this Daniel enjoyed success in the reign of Darius and in the reign of Cyrus the Persian." Gubaru (Gobryas), it is now known, appointed governors in Babylon after the fall of the city, and Cyrus departed for Ecbatana before the end of the year. The only possible ruler of Babylon was Darius, since Cambyses did not reign as sub-king until the following year, being removed from that honorary position after a few months, while Gubaru continued as governor of Babylon and of a region called the "District Beyond the River" for some years. Since the territory ruled by Gubaru was coextensive with the Fertile Crescent and included many different peoples and races, the description in 6:25–28 of Darius's decree is explainable. Neither does the decree of Darius in 6:7, 12 exclude the possibility of his being a subordinate ruler. Darius's second decree (6:26), which was published to annul the first, was addressed to "all the dominion of my kingdom," not the entire Persian Empire. “To all the peoples, nations, and men of every language who were living in all the land” (6:25) does not claim universal sovereignty for Darius. Moreover, Gubaru was doubtless “the son of Ahasuerus” (9:1) and also a Mede. In the light of these various facts, it is maintained that Darius the Mede is to be identified with Gubaru the governor of Babylon and that the book of Daniel is accurate in this historical reference. Whitcomb, Jr., who wrote his master of divinity thesis on The Historicity of Darius the Mede in the Book of Daniel, now published as Darius the Mede.) M.F.U.

DARIUS THE PERSIAN (Neh. 12:22). This Darius was almost certainly Darius II (423–404 B.C.), who ruled after the Artaxerxes during whose reign Nehemiah was so active (for discussion, see Wycliffe Bible Commentary, p. 443). H.F.V.

DARKNESS (Heb. hōshek, “the dark”; Gk. skotos). In the physical sense, darkness is specially noticed, on three occasions, in the Scriptures:

1. At the period of creation, when darkness, it is said, “was over the surface of the deep,” the dispelling of which by the introduction of light was the commencement of that generative process by which order and life were brought out of primeval chaos (Gen. 1:2–4).

2. The plague of darkness in Egypt (Ex. 10:21), “darkness which may be felt.” See Plagues of Egypt.

3. The awful moment of our Lord’s crucifixion, when “from the sixth hour darkness fell upon all the land until the ninth hour” (Matt. 27:45). Some, chiefly ancient writers, have insisted upon rendering “upon all the earth,” and account for it by an eclipse of the sun. But an eclipse of the sun could not be visible to the whole world, and, moreover, there could not have been an eclipse, for it was the time of full moon, when the moon could not come between the sun and the earth. The darkness would, therefore, seem to have been confined to Palestine and may have been caused by an extraordinary and preternatural obstruction of the light of the sun by the sulphurous vapors accompanying the earthquake that then occurred.

The “thick darkness where God was” (Ex. 20:21, KJV and NIV) was doubtless the “thick darkness” in which “the Lord said that he would dwell” (1 Kings 8:12, KJV; NIV has “dark cloud”), and has reference to the cloud upon the Mercy Seat. “Clouds and thick darkness surround Him” (Ps. 97:2) refers to the inscrutability of the divine nature and working. The darkness connected with the coming of the Lord (Isa. 13:9–10; Joel 2:31; Matt. 24:29; etc.) has reference to the judgments attendant on His advent.

Figurative. Darkness is used as a symbol of ignorance and spiritual blindness (Isa. 9:2; John 1:5; 1 John 2:8; etc.). With respect to the gloom associated with darkness it becomes significant of sorrow and distress; hence, “a day of darkness” is the time of calamity and trouble (Joel 2:2). Isaiah 8:22; 9:2; 13:10; etc., refer to the unlighted streets of Eastern countries and indicate the despair and wretchedness of the lost. Darkness affording a covering for the performance of evil, “the unfruitful deeds of darkness” (Eph. 5:11) is employed to designate the more flagrant exhibitions of unrighteousness. Darkness is used to represent the state of the dead (Job 10:21; 18:18).

DAR’KON (dar’kon). One whose children, or descendants, were among the servants of Solomon who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:56; Neh. 7:58), about 458 B.C.

DARLING. In the KJV “darling” appears as the translation of the Heb. yāhîd in Pss. 22:20; 35:17. The Heb. term has the meaning of “united,” “only,” hence “beloved”; the NASB renders “my only life,” the NIV, “my precious life.”

In the NASB and NIV “darling” appears in the Song of Solomon as the translation of Heb. raçyâ, “attendant maidens.” The KJV and RV render “O my love.”

DART. The KJV rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words, referring to an arrow or light spear. The Hebrews are supposed to have discharged the arrow while on fire, to which allusion may be made in Deut. 32:23, 42; Ps. 7:13; 120:4; Zech. 9:14; Eph. 6:16. See Armor.

DA´THAN (dā´than; “of a spring,” or “well”). A Reubenite chieftain, son of Eliab, who joined the conspiracy of Korah the Levite, and, with his accomplices, was swallowed up by an earthquake (Num. 16:1–35; 26:9; Deut. 11:6; Ps. 106:17), about 1435 B.C.

DAUGHTER (Heb. bat, feminine of bēn, “son”; Gk. thugatēr). This word is used in Scripture, like son, with some latitude. In addition to its usual and proper sense of daughter, born or adopted, it is used to designate a step-sister, niece, or any female descendant (Gen. 20:12; 24:48; Deut. 23:17). More generally still it is used of the female branch of a family, or female portion of community, as “the daughters of Moab,” of “the Philistines,” “of Aaron” (Num. 25:1; 2 Sam. 1:20; Luke 1:5). Small towns were called daughters of neighboring large mother cities, as “Heshbon, and in all her daughters” (Num. 21:25, NASB marg.); so Tyre is called the daughter of Sidon (Isa. 23:12).

Cities were commonly personified as women and so, naturally, had the designation given to them of daughters of the country to which they belonged, as “daughter of Zion,” “daughter of Jerusalem” (Isa. 37:22; etc.). The condition of daughters, that is, of young women, in the East, their employments, duties, etc., may be gathered from various parts of the Scriptures. Rebekah drew and fetched water; Rachel kept sheep, as did the daughters of Jethro, though he was a priest, or a prince, of Midian. They superintended and performed domestic services for the family. Tamar, though a king’s daughter, baked bread.

DAUGHTER-IN-LAW (Heb. kallâ; Gk. numphē). The word literally means a “bride” and is applied to a son’s wife.

DA´VID.

David’s name in Heb. means “beloved” or possibly “chieftain,” as evidence from the Mari Letters indicates. Reference in these tablets to the plundering “Benjamites” is indicated by the word dawîdum (“leader”), but the connection between that term and Israel’s most famous king is conjectural. He was born in Bethlehem, the youngest son of a sheikh of that town named Jesse (1 Sam. 16:1). Apparently David had seven older brothers (1 Sam. 16:10). These are listed in table 5, “David’s Family Register,” along with other members of his immediate family.

Early History. His boyhood was spent as a shepherd. He was eminently gifted, being skilled in playing the lyre (1 Sam. 16:16–18). David was conspicuous for valor, slaying a lion and a bear in defense of his father’s flocks (17:34–36). As a humble shepherd boy he was anointed as Saul’s successor by Samuel (16:1–13).

His Relations with Saul. As a result of Saul's disobedience to the divine command, he was rejected from the kingship and afflicted with melancholy, jealousy, and hatred. David was summoned when an evil spirit, or demon, by God's permission came upon Saul. David played so well that Saul was refreshed and the evil spirit departed from him (1 Sam. 16:14–23). When Saul's condition presumably improved, David returned to his pastoral pursuits at Bethlehem. On a visit to his brethren, who were fighting in Saul's army against the Philistines, the young shepherd, whose valiant spirit was nurtured by communion with God, was outraged by the cowardice of Saul's army before the Philistine giant-champion, Goliath. David's notable victory over the giant with a simple shepherd's sling and pebbles from the brook gained him national reputation. It was then that Saul made adequate inquiry concerning David's family connections. The result was that David was adopted into the court (17:55–18:2). As a warrior-courtier the young man won the loyal friendship of Saul's son Jonathan (18:1–4). Further clashes with the Philistines greatly enhanced David's reputation. Saul's insane jealousy and hatred against David were aroused when the women of Israel greeted the returning heroes with the song: "Saul has slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands" (18:5–9). From that point on, David's life was in constant jeopardy. But he behaved himself so wisely that he attracted universal respect and love. Saul attempted to get rid of him by demanding that he slay one hundred Philistines and provide proof of the fact. David performed the feat and received Michal, Saul's daughter as wife. As a consequence he was saved from death only by the loyalty of Jonathan and Michal.

A Fugitive and an Outlaw. The next several years of David's life were spent fleeing from Saul's rage. Michal was given in marriage to another and was not restored to David until after Saul's death. David saw Jonathan only in secret. He fled to Samuel at Ramah, then fled to Nob where, on the pretext of a secret mission from Saul, he gained an answer from the oracle, food, and the sword of Goliath. He then fled to Achish, king of Gath, where, as the slayer of Goliath, he feigned madness in order to avoid death at the hands of the Philistines (21:10–15). As an outlaw, David at the head of a band of supporters made the Cave of Adullam his headquarters (22:1–2). In that wild and mountainous region he was hunted like an animal. On several occasions Saul was at David's mercy, but David spared his life.

Service Under Achish. Wearied with his wandering life, he at length crossed the Philistine frontier, not as before, in the capacity of a fugitive, but at the head of a sizable force of six hundred men (27:1–2). Achish, king of Gath, gave him, after the manner of Eastern kings, the city of Ziklag (which see) on the Philistine frontier (27:6). From the Philistines David learned much military knowledge. While he was away from Ziklag the Amalekites burned the city and carried off the women and children. David was able to overtake the raiders and recover a vast amount of spoil. Two days after that victory an Amalekite arrived with the news of Saul's death at Mt. Gilboa.

Early Activity as King. Saul's death resulted in a crisis in the political history of Israel, and a period of civil war followed. David took up his residence at Hebron in the hill country of Judah, some nineteen miles SW of Jerusalem. There he was anointed king over the house of Judah and reigned 7½ years over that tribe (2 Sam. 2:1–11). Meanwhile the long civil war between the house of Saul and the house of David eventuated in extermination of the house of Saul and David's being anointed king over all Israel (2:8–5:5). The most important event of his early reign was capturing Jebusite (which see) Jerusalem (which see) and making that the capital of his realm. Despite the apparent impregnable defense of the place, David took the stronghold, evidently by ascending the stout walls with a grappling hook. Although David's men probably scaled the walls of Jerusalem and did not gain entrance to the Jebusite fortress as previously believed, through the city's underground water system, archaeology has proved conclusively that the "stronghold of Zion" and subsequently "the city of David" (5:7), which the king constructed, were situated on the Eastern hill above the Gihon fountain and not on the so-called Western hill of Zion. Having conquered the city, David made it his capital, displaying great wisdom in that decision. The city stood on the border of Judah and Israel, and its neutral location tended to allay the jealousy between the northern and southern portions of his kingdom. Its liberation from the Canaanites opened the highway between Judah and the N, which greatly facilitated both commerce and foreign intercourse and was a potent factor in the unity of the kingdom.

Subjugation of Neighboring States. A united Israel under a virile personality like David aroused the fear and jealousy of the Philistines, who were decisively defeated by David (2 Sam. 5:17–25; 1 Chron. 18:1; 2 Sam. 21:15–22). So complete was David's subjugation of the inveterate enemy of Israel that their power was effectively nullified. David also conquered the Moabites, Aramaeans, Ammonites, Edomites, and Amalekites (8:10; 12:26–31). He was enabled to build up a substantial empire for his son Solomon, which reached from Ezion-geber on the Gulf of Aqabah in the S to the region of Hums bordering on the city-state of Hamath in the N (see W. F. Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel [1931], p. 131).

Organization of the Kingdom. David's administrative achievements, although overshadowed by his colorful, personal, skillful diplomacy and brilliant military strategy, were outstanding. That is clearly reflected in the extensive kingdom he left behind him and the preservation of accounts of efficient organization (cf. 1 Chron. 22:17–27:34). His kingdom was organized, in part at least, on Egyptian models (cf. Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel, p. 120). Among official Egyptian institutions, which he copied, probably through Phoenician or other channels, was the division of the functions between the "recorder" mazkir, the "secretary" sopher (18:15–16), and the "charge of thirty" (cf. 27:6). He also efficiently organized his army (2 Sam. 8:16), which included a special personal bodyguard of mercenaries, presumably of Philistine extraction, called Cherethites and Pelethites (8:18).

Establishment of Levitical Cities. Although these cities included the cities of refuge (Num. 35), which were provided for by Moses before entrance into the land and established by Joshua after the conquest (Josh. 21:2), it was unlikely that before the time of Saul or David many of these places, such as Gezer, Ibleam, Taanach, Rehob, Jokneam, and Nahalo (cf. chap. 21) were actually apportioned to the Levitical priests, since these places were not in Israelite hands before that time. Towns such as Eltekeh and Gibbethon were under Philistine domination previous to the Davidic era. And such small places as Allemeth and Anathoth in the tribe of Benjamin could scarcely have been established as Levitical towns previous to the removal of the Tabernacle to Nob in the time of Saul. It seems likely that they were apportioned to the Levites after David's conquest of Jebusite Jerusalem, making it his capital, since there is no doubt that he planned some kind of administrative reorganization of the Israelite confederation.

Allocation of Cities of Refuge. A wise administrator like David would hardly have overlooked need for asylum for one unjustly accused of crime. Scholars are quite certain that the six cities of refuge as well as the forty-eight Levitical cities figured prominently in David's political reorganization. Such a provision would rule out clan and tribal feuds, which flourished during the period of the judges and were commonly destructive (Judg. 8:1–4; Josh. 19:1–21:25). David’s wise statesmanship was fully aware that a well-grounded kingdom would not tolerate blood feuds, and he was quick to take advantage of the Mosaic provision of six refuge cities, three on each side of the Jordan, for the purpose of consolidating the kingdom and contributing to its peace.

Jerusalem Made a Religious Center. His most important single act in that direction was the removal of the Ark to Jerusalem from Kiriath-jearim, where Israel’s sacred chest had been, except for a brief period at Beth-shemesh after the Philistines, in whose territory it had been kept since the battle of Ebenezer (c. 1050 B.C.), had brought it back to Israel. The first attempt to bring up the Ark proved abortive (cf. 2 Sam. 6:11–15; 1 Chron. 15:13), because it was not carried according to prescribed Mosaic regulations (Num. 4:5, 15, 19), and David’s resort to the Philistine expedient of a new cart drawn by cows (cf. 1 Sam. 6:7–8) led to the death of Uzzah. Finally after four months and with great religious celebration the Ark was brought up to the city of David (2 Sam. 6:12–15) when David was “dancing before the Lord ... wearing a linen ephod” (6:14). The ephod, now illustrated from the Assyrian and Ugaritic texts, was formerly an ordinary garment worn apparently especially by women. Not until later centuries did the ephod become restricted to religious and, subsequently, to priestly use. In Israel, however, it early became a distinctive part of the dress of the Levitical priesthood. Its use by David on this occasion was evidently in his capacity as Yahweh’s anointed king and as His special representative. The Davidic tent was certainly copied after the specifications of the Mosaic prototype, like the one that had existed at Nob (1 Sam. 21:1, 9).

Organization of Sacred Music. Despite modern criticism’s denial that David organized Hebrew sacred music, archaeological findings tend to show there is nothing incongruous in the light of conditions existing in the ancient Near Eastern world around 1,000 B.C. with the biblical representation of David as a patron saint of Jewish hymnology and the organizer of Temple music. Palestinian musicians were well known in antiquity, as shown by the Egyptian and Mesopotamian monuments in the early nineteenth century B.C. Semitic craftsmen carried musical instruments with them when they went down into Egypt, as is shown by the famous relief from Beni-Hasan, 169 miles above Cairo. The epic religious literature discovered at Ras Shamra portrays the singers (sharim) as forming a special class of personnel at Ugarit as early as 1400 B.C. The OT narratives themselves give considerable prominence to David’s musical and poetical gifts. Musical guilds have been shown by archaeological and linguistic evidence to have been prominent among the Canaanites.

Resolve to Build a Temple. After this event the king, contrasting his cedar palace with the curtains of the Tabernacle, was desirous of building a temple for the Ark. He communicated his desire to the prophet Nathan, who, without waiting to consult God, replied: “Go, do all that is in your mind, for the Lord is with you.” But the word of God came to Nathan that same night telling him that David was not to build a house for God to dwell in, that he had been a man of war, that God would first establish his house, and that his son should build the Temple (2 Sam. 7; 1 Chron. 17). Encouraged by the divine sanction and by the promises given him, David henceforth made it one of the great objects of his reign to gather means and material for this important undertaking.

Mephibosheth. When David had taken up his abode in Jerusalem, he inquired whether there yet survived any of Saul’s descendants to whom he might show kindness. Through Ziba, an old servant of Saul, he learned of Mephibosheth, a son of Jonathan. He sent for Mephibosheth, returned him Saul’s family possessions, and gave him a place at the king’s table (2 Sam. 9:13).

Three Years' Famine. About this time a three years' famine terrified Israel, which induced David to inquire of the Lord the cause of the judgment. The Lord replied, "It is for Saul and his bloody house, because he put the Gibeonites to death." Nothing further is known about the fact itself. The Gibeonites were sent for, and upon their requisition David gave up to them two sons of Rizpah, a concubine of Saul, and five sons of Merab, whom she had borne to Adriel. These were slain, and their bodies, left uncared for, were watched over by Rizpah. Word was brought to David, who had the bones of the crucified men, together with those of Saul and Jonathan, which were brought from Jabesh-gilead, honorably deposited in the family tomb at Zela, in the tribe of Benjamin. It is probable that this was the time when David spared Mephibosheth, in order to fulfill his covenant with Jonathan (21:1–14).

David's Adultery. The notion of the East, in ancient and modern times, has been that a well-filled harem is essential to the splendor of a princely court. That opened a dangerous precipice in David's way and led to a most grievous fall. Walking upon the roof of his house, he saw a woman washing herself. The beauty of the woman excited David's lust, and he inquired of his servants who she was. "Bathsheba, the daughter of Eliam, the wife of Uriah the Hittite," was the reply. Despite the fact that she was the wife of another, David sent for her, and she appears voluntarily to have acceded to his sinful purpose. In order to cover up his sin and secure Bathsheba for his wife, David sent Uriah into battle under circumstances that caused his death and thus added murder to his other crime. The clouds from this time gathered over David's fortunes, and the Lord told him, "The sword shall never depart from your house" (12:10). There followed the outrage of his daughter Tamar by his eldest son, Amnon, and the murder of the latter by the servants of Absalom (11:1–13:29).

Absalom's Rebellion. Absalom fled and went to Talmai, the son of Ammihud, king of Geshur, where he remained three years. After this he was recalled to Jerusalem but lived "two full years in Jerusalem, and did not see the king's face." He then sent for Joab and through his mediation was admitted into his father's presence (chap. 14). Absalom soon began to aspire to the throne, and, under pretense of wanting to fulfill a vow, he gained permission to go to Hebron, where he strengthened his conspiracy. Hearing of Absalom's conduct, David fled from Jerusalem (15:14) and passed over Jordan, about 974 B.C. Mahanaim was the capital of David's exile, as it had been of the exiled house of Saul (17:24; cf. 2:8, 12). His forces were arranged under the three great military officers who remained faithful to his fortunes—Joab, captain of the host; Abishai, captain of "the mighty men"; and Ittai, who seems to have taken the place of Benaiah as captain of the guard (18:2). On Absalom's side was David's nephew, Amasa (17:25). The final battle was fought in the "forest of Ephraim" and terminated in the accident leading to the death of Absalom (18:1–33). The return was marked at every stage by rejoicing and amnesty (19:16–40; 1 Kings 2:7), and Judah was first reconciled. The embers of the insurrection still smoldered (2 Sam. 19:41–43), and David's hereditary enemies of the tribe of Benjamin were trampled out by the mixture of boldness and sagacity in Joab, now, after the murder of Amasa, once more in his old position (chap. 20). David again reigned in peace at Jerusalem.

Three Days' Pestilence. This calamity visited Jerusalem at the warning of the prophet Gad. The occasion that led to this warning was the census of the people taken by Joab at the king's orders (2 Sam. 24:1–9; 1 Chron. 21:1–7; 27:23–24). Joab's repugnance to the measure was such that he refused to number Levi and Benjamin (21:6). The king also hesitated to number those who were under twenty years of age (27:23), and the final result was never recorded in the "chronicles of King David"

(27:24). Outside the walls of Jerusalem, Araunah, or Ornan, a wealthy Jebusite, perhaps even the ancient king of Jebus (2 Sam. 24:23), possessed a threshing floor (1 Chron. 21:20). At that spot an awful vision appeared, such as is described in the later days of Jerusalem, of the angel of the Lord stretching out a drawn sword between earth and sky over the city. The scene of such a phenomenon at such a moment was at once marked out for a sanctuary. David demanded and Araunah willingly granted the site; the altar was erected on the rock of the threshing floor; the place was called by the name “Mount Moriah” (2 Chron. 3:1); and for the first time a holy place, sanctified by the vision of the divine Presence, was recognized in Jerusalem. It was this spot that afterward became the altar of the Temple and therefore the center of the national worship.

Adonijah’s Conspiracy. Adonijah, one of David’s elder sons, feared that the influence of Bathsheba might gain the kingdom for her own son Solomon and declared himself to be the successor to his father (1 Kings 1).

Solomon Made King. The plot was stifled, and Solomon’s inauguration took place under his father’s auspices (1 Kings 1:1–53). By this time David’s infirmities had grown upon him. An attempt was made to restore the warmth of his exhausted frame by the introduction of the young Shunammite Abishag (1:1; 2:17). His last song is preserved—a striking union of the ideal of the just rule he had pursued and of the difficulties he had felt in realizing it (2 Sam. 23:1–7). His last recorded words to his successor are general exhortations to duty, combined with warnings against Joab and Shimei and charges to remember the children of Barzillai (1 Kings 2:1–9).

Death. He died at the age of seventy (2 Sam. 5:4) and “was buried in the city of David” (1 Kings 2:10–11), about 960 B.C. After the return from the captivity “the tombs of David” were still pointed out between “the artificial pool and the house of the mighty men” (Neh. 3:16). His tomb, which became the general sepulcher of the kings of Judah, was pointed out in the latest times of the Jewish people. The edifice, shown as such from the Crusades to the present day, is on the western hill of modern Jerusalem, commonly called Mt. Zion, under the so-called “Coenaculum,” but it cannot be identified with the tomb of David, which was within the walls of the “city of David” on the southeastern hill.

Perhaps the best way to understand the family of David will be to study table 6, “David’s Family,” in which are given his wives, children, and grandchildren, so far as known. The royal line was carried on through a union of the children of Solomon and Absalom.

Character. “If we proceed to put together, in its most general features, the whole picture of David which results from all these historical testimonies, we find the very foundations of his character to be laid in a peculiarly firm and unshaken trust in Jehovah, and the brightest and most spiritual views of the creation and government of the world, together with a constant, tender, and sensitive awe of the Holy One in Israel, a simple, pure striving never to be untrue to him, and the strongest efforts to return to him all the more loyally after errors and transgressions.... His mouth continually overflows with heartfelt praise of Jehovah, and his actions are ever redolent of the nobility inspired by a real and living fear of him (for the errors by which he is carried away stand out prominently just because of their rarity).... In the clear daylight of Israel’s ancient history David furnishes the most brilliant example of the noble elevation of character produced by the old religion” (Ewald, Hist. of Israel, 3:57–58).

Critics sometimes focus upon seeming contradictions in David's life, yet an examination of those so-called discrepancies reveals not contradiction but the uncompromising honesty of the scriptural text.

First Samuel 13:14. "How," ask some, "could a man after God's own heart have murdered Uriah, seduced Bathsheba, and tortured the Ammonites?" An extract from one who is not a too-indulgent critic of sacred characters expresses at once the common sense and the religious lesson of the whole matter. "David, the Hebrew king, had fallen into sins enough—blackest crimes—there was no want of sin. And, thereupon, the unbelievers sneer, and ask, 'Is this your man according to God's heart?' The sneer, I must say, seems to me but a shallow one. What are faults, what are the outward details of a life, if the inner secret of it, the remorse, the temptations, the often-baffled, never-ended struggle of it, be forgotten? All earnest souls will ever discern in [David's life] the faithful struggle of an earnest human soul toward what is good and best. Struggle often baffled—sore baffled—driven as into entire wreck, yet a struggle never ended, ever with tears, repentance, true unconquerable purpose, begun anew" (Carlyle, Heroes and Hero-worship, 1:277).

First Samuel 16:18; 17:42, 56. There seems a contradiction between these two passages, the one representing David as a "mighty man of valor, a warrior," the others as "but a youth." The first description of David "does not presuppose he had already fought bravely in war, but may be perfectly explained from what David himself afterward affirmed respecting his conflicts with lions and bears (17:34–35). The courage and strength which he then displayed furnished sufficient proofs of heroism for anyone to discern in him the future warrior" (Keil, Com.).

First Samuel 17:55–58. How can we reconcile Saul's and Abner's ignorance of David, who had been musician and armor bearer to Saul (16:14–23)? Keil and Delitzsch (Com.) explain as follows: "The question put by Saul does not presuppose an actual want of acquaintance with the person of David and the name of his father, but only ignorance of the social condition of David's family, with which both Abner and Saul may hitherto have failed to make themselves more fully acquainted." Some explain by saying that after David played before Saul he returned to his home (which appears to be the fact, 18:2), and that his appearance had so changed as to make recognition impossible (Thomson, Land and Book, 2:366, American ed.).

Second Samuel 5:3. The three anointings of David need give no trouble. The first (1 Sam. 16:13) was a private, prophetic anointing; by the second (2 Sam. 2:4) he was publicly recognized as king over Judah; by the third (5:3), as king over both Judah and Israel.

Second Samuel 5:6–9. Some see a discrepancy between the fact of the capture of "the stronghold of Zion" and the taking of Goliath's head to Jerusalem (1 Sam. 17:54). Ewald (Hist. of Israel, 3:72) answers that clearly David did not carry the head to Jerusalem till afterward, when he was king. Keil (Com. of 17:54) explains that the assertion made by some, that Jerusalem was not yet in possession of the Israelites, rests upon a confusion between the citadel of Jebus upon Zion, which was still in the hands of the Jebusites, and the city of Jerusalem, in which Israelites had dwelled a long time (Josh. 15:63; Judg. 1:8).

Second Samuel 6:20. The proud daughter of Saul was offended at the fact that the king had on this occasion let himself down to the level of the people. She taunted him with having stripped himself, because while dancing and playing he wore somewhat lighter garments (such as the ordinary priestly garb) instead of the heavy royal mantle (Ewald, Hist. of Israel, 3:127).

Second Samuel 24:1. In 2 Sam. 24:1, the Scripture observes that God moved David against Israel to say, “Go, number Israel and Judah,” yet in 1 Chron. 21:1 it is alleged that Satan stood up against Israel and provoked David to number the people. But the meaning is that God permitted Satan thus to move David in order that through his act an opportunity might arise for the punishment of Israel’s sin. The command of David was not sinful in itself but became so from the spirit of pride and vanity out of which it originated and which was shared with him by the people over whom he ruled (W. M. Taylor, David, p. 371). M.F.U.

DAVID, CITY OF.

1. Bethlehem of Judah was occasionally called “the city of David” (Luke 2:4, 11) because David grew up as a shepherd boy there.

2. The ancient portion of the city of Jerusalem, that eastern hill inhabited by the Jebusites before it was conquered by David, was also called “the city of David.” David’s account of the capture of “the stronghold of Zion, that is the city of David,” is recounted in 2 Sam. 5:6–8 and 1 Chron. 11:4–8. Situated on a plateau of commanding height, 2,500 feet above the Mediterranean and 3,800 feet above the Dead Sea, the Jebusite fortress was enclosed by natural rock for defense. Its stout walls, gates, and towers were considered impregnable. So secure did the native Jebusite defenders consider themselves that they taunted David and the Israelite besiegers with the words: “‘You shall not come in here, but the blind and lame shall turn you away’; thinking, ‘David cannot enter here’” (2 Sam. 5:6). Despite its supposed impregnability, David captured the fortress, most likely by ascending the stout walls with a grappling hook, and when the citadel was stormed he said, “Whoever would strike the Jebusites, let him reach the lame and the blind, who are hated by David’s soul” (5:8).

The ancient water system of Jerusalem is now well known. The fifty-foot-high watercourse (“Warren’s Shaft”) has been uncovered as the result of the excavations of the Palestine Exploration Fund, revealing that the inhabitants of the city (c. 2000 B.C.) had made a rock-cut passage, similar to that at Gezer and at Megiddo, to enable them to secure water from the Gihon spring without having to go outside the city walls. From the cave into which the Gihon spring entered, a horizontal tunnel had been driven back into the hill some thirty-six feet W and twenty-five feet N. This conduit conducted the water into an old cave that served as a reservoir. Running up from that was a vertical tunnel at the upper end of which the women could stand to lower their jugs to get water. The Jebusite bastion with its twenty-foot-thick wall has been verified by British archaeologists. Thus the city of David overlooks the Kidron and Hinnom valleys. David apparently did little to beautify the Jebusite city. Solomon, however, adorned it with magnificent buildings and made a worthy site of the Hebrew capital. M.F.U.

DAWN (Heb. bōqer).

Figurative. Dawn is illustrative of the glory of the church (song of Sol. 6:10); the love of God is compared to the breaking of the day; the dawn (Isa. 58:8); the wings of the dawn is figurative of rapid movement (Ps. 139:9). In the expression “as the dawn is spread over the mountains” (Joel 2:2), the prophet refers to the bright glimmer or splendor that is seen in the sky as a swarm of locusts approaches; from the reflection of the sun’s rays on their wings (K. & D.; Com., ad loc.). See also Morning; Time.

DAY. See Time.

DAY OF ATONEMENT. See Festivals.

DAY OF CHRIST. This is the period connected with reward and blessing of saints at the coming of Christ for His own. The expression occurs in 1 Cor. 1:8; 5:5; 2 Cor. 1:14; Phil. 1:6, 10; 2:16. In 2 Thess. 2:2 the KJV has the day of Christ incorrectly for the Day of the Lord. The day of Christ is not the Day of the Lord. The latter is connected with earth judgments (Rev. 4:1–19:16), which will come after the out-taking of the church, the Body of Christ, and its glorification and judgment for works at the judgment seat of Christ. The Day of the Lord (Isa. 2:12; Rev. 19:11–21) cannot occur until after the church is completed (2 Thess. 2:2–12). M.F.U.

DAY OF JUDGMENT. See Judgment.

DAY OF THE LORD. This is the protracted period commencing with the second advent of Christ in glory and ending with the cleansing of the heavens and the earth by fire preparatory to the new heavens and the new earth of the eternal state (Isa. 65:17–19; 66:22; 2 Thess. 2:2; 2 Pet. 3:13; Rev. 21:1). The Day of the Lord as a visible manifestation of Christ upon the earth is to be distinguished from the day of Christ. The latter is connected with the glorification of the saints and their reward in heaven prior to their return with Christ to inaugurate the Day of the Lord. The Day of the Lord thus comprehends specifically the closing phase of the Tribulation and extends through the millennial kingdom. Apocalyptic judgments (Rev. 4:1–19:6) precede and introduce the Day of the Lord. M.F.U.

DAY’S JOURNEY. See Metrology: Linear Measurements.

DAYS MAN (Heb. yākaḥ, to “set right”). An umpire or arbitrator (Job 9:33); an old English word derived from day, in the specific sense of a day fixed for a trial. The meaning seems to be that of someone to compose our differences, the laying on of whose hand expresses power to judge between the two persons. The NIV thus renders, “someone to arbitrate.” There might be one on a level with Job, the one party, but Job knew of none on a level with the Almighty, the other party (1 Sam. 2:25). Such a mediator we have in Jesus Christ (1 Tim. 2:5).

DAYSPRING (Heb. shaḥar, Job 38:12, KJV; Gk. anatolē, Luke 1:78, KJV). The NIV translates “dawn” and “rising sun” respectively. The first streak of daylight, the dawn; and so the early revelation of God in Christ to the soul.

DAYSTAR (Gk. phōsphoros, “light-bearing”; Lat. Lucifer). The KJV rendering of “morning star,” the planet Venus (2 Pet. 1:19). The meaning of the passage is that the prophets were like a lamp, but Christ Himself is the light of dawn, heralded by the “morning star” (Rev. 2:28; 22:16).

DEACON (Gk. diakonos, of uncertain origin). One who executes the commands of another, a servant.

In a General Sense. The term is applied to the “servant” of a king (Matt. 22:13); ministers (Rom. 13:4; lit., “deacons of God,” i.e., those through whom God carries out His administration on earth); Paul and other apostles (1 Cor. 3:5; 2 Cor. 6:4; 1 Thess. 3:2). As teachers of the Christian religion are called “servants of Christ” in 2 Cor. 11:23; Col. 1:7; 1 Tim. 4:6, Christ is called the “servant [lit., “deacon,” Rom. 15:8] to the circumcision,” as devoting Himself to the salvation of the Jews. In addition to this general use of the word it was given a more specific meaning:

Officer of the Church. In the NT, deacons, or helpers, appear first in the church at Jerusalem. The Hellenistic Christians complained that their widows were neglected in favor of the Hebrew Christians “in the daily serving of food” (Acts 6:1). This was a natural consequence of the rapid growth of the society and of the apostles’ having more than they could properly attend to. Upon the recommendation of the apostles “seven men of good reputation, full of the Spirit and of wisdom” were selected and set apart by prayer and laying on of hands. Deacons primarily were assigned the duty of ministering to the poor and the oversight of temporal affairs of the Christian societies, yet retaining, as in the case of Stephen and Philip, the right to teach and baptize. The qualifications for this office, as enumerated by Paul (1 Tim. 3:8–13), were of a nature to fit them for mingling with the church in most familiar relations, to ascertain and relieve the wants of the poorer members with delicacy, and freedom from temptation to avaricious greed. On offering themselves for their work, deacons were to be subject to a strict scrutiny (3:10).

In the Early Church. A difference of opinion respecting the function of deacons prevailed in the early church. Some contended that no spiritual function had been assigned them (Council of Constantinople, Can. 18), whereas Ignatius styles them “ministers of the mysteries of Christ.” Tertullian classes them with bishops and presbyters as guides and leaders to the laity. They evidently occupied the position of assistants to the higher clergy, exercising the spiritual functions or not, according to the sentiment of the age or wish of those whom they assisted. The deacons, also called “Levites,” received a different ordination from the presbyters, both as to form and the power it conferred; for in the ordination of a presbyter the presbyters who were present were required to join in the imposition of hands with the bishop, but the ordination of a deacon might be performed by the bishop alone.

The Duties of the Deacon. The duties of the deacon included: (1) To assist the bishop and presbyter in the service of the sanctuary, especially to care for utensils, etc., of the holy table. (2) In the administration of the Eucharist, to hand the elements to the people but not to consecrate the elements. (3) To administer baptism. (4) To receive the offerings of the people. (5) Sometimes, as the bishop’s special delegates, to give to the penitents the solemn imposition of hands, the sign of reconciliation. (6) To teach and catechize the catechumens. (7) In the absence of bishop and presbyter to suspend the inferior clergy. In addition there were many minor duties. Deacons often stood in close relations with the bishop and not infrequently looked upon ordination to the presbyterates as a degradation. The number of deacons varied with the wants of the individual church. The qualifications of a deacon were the same as those required for bishops and presbyters (3:1–13).

In the Modern Church. Today deacons are found as a distinct order of the clergy in the Roman Catholic, Church of England, Episcopal, Methodist Episcopal, and German Protestant churches. For the most part, their duties are the same and consist of helping the clergy in higher orders. In the Presbyterian and Congregational churches they are laymen who care for the poor, attend to the temporal affairs of the church, and act as spiritual helpers to the minister (see Schaff, Hist. Christ. Ch., 1:135; Hurst, Hist. Christ. Ch., p. 25; McClintock and Strong, Cyclopaedia).

DEACONESSES. Female helpers who had the care of the poor and the sick among the women of the church. This office was needed because of the rigid separation of the sexes in that day. Paul mentions Phoebe as a deaconess of the church of Cenchrea, and it seems probable that Tryphaena, Tryphosa, and Persis, whom he commends for labor in the Lord, were deaconesses (Rom. 16:1, 12).

In the Early Church. In the early church the apostolic constitution distinguished “deaconesses” from “widows” and “virgins” and prescribed their duties. The office of deaconess in the Eastern church continued down to the twelfth century. It was frequently occupied by the widows of clergymen or the wives of bishops, who were obliged to forgo the married state to enter upon their sacred office.

Qualifications. Piety, discretion, and experience were in any case the indispensable prerequisites in candidates. During the first two centuries the church more carefully heeded the advice of Paul that the deaconess should have been the wife of one husband and that the church should admit to the office only those who had been thoroughly tested by previous trusts, having provided hospitality to strangers, washed the saints’ feet, relieved the afflicted, diligently followed every good work, etc. (1 Tim. 5:10). But at a later period there was more laxity, and younger and more inexperienced women were admitted.

Ordination. The question of their ordination has been much debated. They were inducted into office by the imposition of hands; of that there is abundant proof. Such a practice, however, would not necessarily imply their right to fulfill the sacred functions of the ministry.

Duties. The need of such helpers arose from the customs and usages of the ancient world, which forbade the intimate association of the sexes in public assemblies. They were to instruct the female catechumens, to assist in the baptism of women, to anoint with holy oil, to minister to believers who were languishing in prison, to care for the women who were in sickness or distress, and sometimes to act as doorkeepers in the churches. It is plain that the deaconesses had other duties than those of keepers of the entrances of the church appointed for women, or even as assistants in baptism or instructors of candidates; they were employed in those works of charity and relief where heathen public opinion would not permit the presence of the deacons.

DEAD, BAPTISM FOR THE. See Baptism.

DEAD, THE.

Egyptian. The great care of the Egyptians was directed to their condition after death. They expected to be received into the company of that being who represented divine goodness, if pronounced worthy at the great judgment day, and to be called by his name was the fulfillment of all their wishes. The dead were all equal in rank—king and peasant, the humblest and the hero. Virtue was the basis of admission into the land of the blessed, and it brought reunion with the deity. The body was bound up so as to resemble the mysterious ruler of Amenti (Hades); it bore some of the emblems peculiar to him. And bread, in a form that belonged exclusively to the gods, was given to the deceased in token of his having assumed the character of that deity.

Burial services were performed by the priests (of the grade who wore the leopard skin) at the expense of the family. If the sons or relations were of the priestly order they could officiate, and the members of the family had permission to be present. The ceremonies consisted of a sacrifice (incense and libation being also presented) and a prayer. These continued at intervals as long as the family paid for them. The body after embalming (which see) was frequently kept in the house, sometimes for months, in order to gratify the desire to have those who were beloved in life as near as possible after death. The mummy was kept in a movable wooden closet, drawn on a sledge to and from the altar, before which frequent ceremonies were observed. It was during this interval that the feasts were held in honor of the dead. Sometimes the mummy was kept in the house because the family did not own a burial plot or was denied the rites of burial on account of accusations brought against or debt contracted by the dead or his sons. That was considered a great disgrace, only to be removed by the payment of the debt, liberal donations in the service of religion, or the influential prayers of the priests. The form of the ritual read by the priest in pronouncing the acquittal of the dead was preserved in the tombs, usually at the entrance passage. In this ritual the deceased was made to enumerate all the sins forbidden by the Egyptian law and to assert his innocence of each, persons of every rank being subjected to the ordeal. Every large city, as Thebes, Memphis, and some others, had its lake where the ceremonies were practiced. The Egyptians did not permit the extremes of degradation to be offered to the dead that the Jews sometimes allowed, and the body of a malefactor, though excluded from the precincts of the necropolis, was not refused to his friends for burial.

Hebrew. Immediately when life departed it was the duty of a friend or son to close the eyes of the dead (Gen. 46:4) and to kiss the face (50:1). The body was washed, wrapped in a linen cloth (Matt. 27:59; etc.), or the limbs separately wound with strips of linen (John 11:44), placed in a coffin (Luke 7:14), and, if not buried immediately, laid out in an upper room (2 Kings 4:21; Acts 9:37).

The Embalming. The embalming of the dead took place after the Egyptian fashion in the case of Jacob and Joseph (Gen. 50:2, 26) but only imitated the rich or distinguished by anointing the dead with costly oil (John 12:7) and wrapping them in linen with spices, especially myrrh and aloes (John 19:39–40).

The Burning of Bodies. The burning of bodies occurred to secure them from mutilation (1 Sam. 31:12), in which case the bones were afterward buried (v. 13); in times of war, where the multitude of deaths made burial impossible (Amos 6:10); or as a punishment inflicted on great criminals (Lev. 20:14; 21:9). The making of “a very great fire,” usual when kings were buried (2 Chron. 16:14; 21:19; Jer. 34:5), was a consuming of sweet-scented substances in honor of the dead. On high state occasions the vessels, bed, and furniture used by the deceased were burned also. Such was probably the “very great fire” made for Asa. If a king was unpopular or died disgraced (2 Chron. 21:19) the practice was not observed.

Funeral and Burial. To remain unburied was considered the greatest indignity that could befall the dead (1 Kings 13:22; 16:4; Jer. 7:33; etc.) because the corpse soon became the prey of wild beasts (2 Kings 9:35). The law ordered that criminals should be buried on the day of execution (Deut. 21:23; Josh. 8:29).

The speedy burial of the dead did not prevail in ancient times (Gen. 23:2) but arose when the law made dead bodies a cause of uncleanness (Num. 19:11–19; cf. Acts 5:6, 10).

To bury the dead was a special work of affection (Tobit 1:21; 2:8), an imperative duty of sons toward their parents (Gen. 25:9; 35:29; Matt. 8:21), and next devolved upon relatives and friends (Tobit 14:13). The body was carried to the grave in a coffin, often uncovered, on a bier borne by men, with a retinue of relatives and friends (2 Sam. 3:31; Luke 7:12–14; Acts 5:6, 10). Those prominent because of position, virtue, or good deeds were followed by a vast multitude (Gen. 50:7, 14; 1 Sam. 25:1; 2 Chron. 32:33).

The custom seems to have prevailed, as early as our Lord's life on earth, of having funeral orations at the grave. Even at the funeral of a pauper, women chanted the lament, "Alas, the lion; alas, the hero!" or similar words, whereas great rabbis were wont to bespeak for themselves a warm funeral oration. After the funeral a meal was served (2 Sam. 3:35; Hos. 9:4; Ezek. 24:17), which later became scenes of luxurious display (Josephus Wars 2.11). See Embalming; Mourning; Tomb.

The word rendered "departed spirit" or "dead" (Job 26:5; Ps. 88:10; Prov. 2:18; 9:18; 21:16; Isa. 14:9; 26:14, 19) is Heb. rāphā, the "relaxed," i.e., those who are bodiless in the state after death.

DEAD SEA, THE. In Scripture it is called the Salt Sea (Gen. 14:3; Num. 34:12; etc.), the Sea of the Arabah (Deut. 3:17; 4:49; etc.; KJV also renders it Sea of the Plain), Eastern Sea (Ezek. 47:18; Joel 2:20; Zech. 14:8, KJV, "former"). The name Dead Sea has been applied to it since the second century, and it was also called the Asphalt Sea by early writers.

The Dead Sea lies in the southern end of the Jordan Valley, occupying the fifty-three deepest miles, with an average breadth of nine to ten miles. The surface is 1,290 feet below the level of the Mediterranean, but the bottom is as deep again; soundings having been taken of 1,300 feet in the NE corner, under the hills of Moab. From there the bed shelves rapidly, till the whole southern end of the sea is only from eight to fourteen feet in depth. These figures vary from year to year. After a rainy season the sea will be as much as fifteen feet deeper and at the southern end more than a mile longer. It is fed by the Jordan and four or five smaller streams, which pour into it millions of tons of water a day. It has no outlet but is relieved by evaporation, often so great as to form a very heavy vapor. This evaporation causes the bitterness of the sea. The streams that feed it are unusually saline, flowing through nitrous soil and fed by sulfurous springs. Chemicals, too, have been found in the waters of the sea, probably introduced by hot springs in the sea bottom. Along the shores are deposits of sulfur and petroleum springs, whereas the surrounding strata are rich in bituminous matter. At the SE end a ridge of rock salt three hundred feet high runs for five miles, and the bed of the sea appears to be covered with salt crystals. "To all these solid ingredients, precipitated and concentrated by the constant evaporation, the Dead Sea owes its extreme bitterness and buoyancy. While the water of the ocean contains from 4 to 6 percent of solids in solution, the Dead Sea holds from 30 to 33 percent. The water is nauseating to the taste and oily to the touch, leaving upon the skin, when it dries, a thick crust of salt. But it is very brilliant. Its buoyancy is so great that it is difficult to sink the limbs deep enough for swimming.

"Its shore is a low beach of gravel, varied by marl or salt marsh. Twice on the west side the mountain cliffs come down to the water's edge, and on the east coast there is a curious peninsula, El-Lisan (or the Tongue), though the shape is more that of a spurred boot. Ancient beaches of the sea are visible all round it, steep banks from five to fifty feet of stained and greasy marl, very friable, with heaps of rubbish at their feet, and crowned with nothing but their own bare, crumbling brows. Behind these terraces of marl the mountains rise precipitous and barren on either coast. To the east the long range of Moab, at a height of two thousand five hundred to three thousand feet above the shore, is broken only by the great valley of the Arnon.... On the west coast the hills touch the water at two points, but elsewhere leave between themselves and the sea the shore already described, sometimes one hundred yards in breadth, sometimes one and a half miles. From behind the highest terrace of marl the hills rise precipitously from two thousand to two thousand five hundred feet.”

The prophet Ezekiel (Ezek. 47:1–12) gives a wonderful vision of a stream of water issuing from the Temple and with increasing volume sweeping down to the Dead Sea and healing its bitter waters, “teaching that there is nothing too sunken, too useless, too doomed, but by the grace of God it may be redeemed, lifted, and made rich with life” (Smith, Hist. Geog., pp. 499–512).

DEAD SEA SCROLLS, THE. Since 1947, when a Bedouin shepherd stumbled upon a cave (about seven miles S of Jericho and a mile from the Dead Sea) containing many scrolls of leather covered with Heb. and Aram. writing, biblical studies have been considerably altered by what have come to be known as the Dead Sea Scrolls.

The Discoveries. When all of the great manuscripts from this cave (known as Cave 1) were assembled in the possession of the state of Israel, they included a complete Isaiah, a partial Isaiah, a Habakkuk commentary (including two chapters of Habakkuk), The Manual of Discipline (rules for members of the religious community living nearby), Thanksgiving Hymns, a Genesis Apocryphon (apocryphal accounts of some of the patriarchs) and Wars of the Sons of Light Against the Sons of Darkness (an account of a real or spiritual war between some of the Hebrew tribes and tribes E of the Jordan).

This cache of documents stimulated exploration of some 270 caves in the vicinity of Cave 1, with the result that a total of 11 caves were found to contain manuscripts like those discovered in Cave 1. In Cave 2 there were about one hundred fragments of Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Jeremiah, Job, Psalms, and Ruth. Cave 3 contained the famous copper scrolls, with directions to sites where treasure was located. To date none of this treasure has been found. Cave 4 contained fragments of about one hundred biblical scrolls representing all the OT books except Esther. A fragment of Samuel, dating to the third century B.C. and believed to be the oldest known piece of biblical Heb., came from this cave. Caves 5–10 had a variety of scroll fragments too diverse to list here. Prize pieces from Cave 11 included very fine portions of Psalms and Leviticus. The former included forty-eight psalms, forty-one biblical and seven nonbiblical. It should be noted that biblical manuscripts accounted for only a fraction of the scroll fragments; e.g., some forty thousand fragments of an unknown number of manuscripts turned up in Cave 4.

As all this material came to light, interest centered on the ruin Khirbet Qumran, located on a plateau between Cave 4 and the Dead Sea. G. Lankester Harding, director of the Department of Antiquities for the state of Jordan, and Father R. de Vaux of the Ecole Biblique in Jerusalem dug there in 1951 and 1953 to 1956.

Evidently this was the center of the religious community (largely celibate) responsible for copying and assembling the library found in the eleven caves. Many scholars have classified them as Essenes, but not all are convinced of that identification.

The general date of the scrolls is bound up with the date of the community and is established on the basis of at least five lines of evidence: (1) carbon 14 tests on linen wrappings of the scrolls (range of c. 327 B.C.-A.D. 73); (2) coins found in the community, dating from 325 B.C. to A.D. 68; (3) pottery chronology for the jars in which the scrolls were found, as well as other pottery found in the community center and the scroll caves; (4) comparative paleography (science of handwriting); (5) linguistic analysis of Aram. documents found in the caves.

Discoveries in the Qumran area sparked interest in other cave investigation. From caves in the Wadi Murabba'at (twelve miles S of Qumran) in 1952 came fragments in Heb. of five leather scrolls: two of Exodus and one each of Genesis, Deuteronomy, and Isaiah. Bedouin later found in this area an incomplete scroll of the minor prophets and fragments of Genesis, Numbers, and Psalms. At Khirbet Mird in the Wadi en-Nar, six miles SW of Qumran, a Belgian expedition found biblical materials (dating to the fifth through eighth centuries) consisting of portions of Mark, John, and Acts in Gk. and Joshua, Luke, John, Acts, and Colossians in Syr. In 1960 an Israeli team found Heb. fragments of Pss. 15 and 16, Ex. 13, and Num. 20 in caves in the Nahal Hever gorge, about three miles S of En-gedi. They also found a considerable collection of Bar Kochba materials there. Then at Masada, Yigael Yadin found the following first-century A.D. materials: Pss. 81–85 and 150, fragments of Genesis, Lev. 8–12, Deuteronomy, and Ezekiel.

The Significance of the Dead Sea Scrolls. The big question yet to be answered is what all the magnificent discoveries near the Dead Sea have done for biblical studies. In the first place, they pushed the history of the Heb. text back a thousand years. Before the discovery of these texts, the oldest Heb. manuscript of any length dated to the ninth century A.D. The Isaiah manuscript and other materials from Qumran dated to the second century B.C. or earlier. Second, the Dead Sea Scrolls have thrown much light on the meanings of individual words often not clearly understood from their OT usage. Third, some higher critical views have been brought into question by the scroll discoveries. For example, the supposed second-century date for the composition of Daniel is difficult to support when a Dead Sea manuscript of Daniel dates to about 120 B.C. Likewise, a second- or first-century B.C. date for the composition of Ecclesiastes can hardly be maintained when part of Ecclesiastes, dating about 175 to 150 B.C., is produced from Cave 4. Moreover, the Dead Sea Scrolls do not support the existence of a deutero- or trito-Isaiah, at least during the second century B.C. The two Isaiah manuscripts from Cave 1 treat the book as a unit. Fourth, the Dead Sea Scrolls confirm the accuracy of the OT text. The new information shows that there were three or four families of texts, of which the Masoretic, or traditional Heb., text was one. But even though the Masoretic family of texts had to compete with the other textual traditions, it did not greatly diverge from them in most OT books, and the differences have a bearing only on minor points. Probably it is reasonably correct to say that there is at least 95 percent agreement between the various biblical texts found near the Dead Sea and the OT we have had all along. Most of the variations are minor, and none of the doctrines has been put in jeopardy. The Dead Sea Scrolls reveal a miracle of preservation of the text in transmission. In fact, when the Revised Standard Version translation committee was preparing that new version, they finally decided to adopt only thirteen improvements on the MT of Isaiah based on the complete Isaiah manuscript from Cave 1. Later Millar Burrows, a member of the committee, concluded that only eight of the changes were warranted. Last, the Dead Sea Scrolls demonstrate that the contents of John's gospel reflect the authentic Jewish background of John the Baptist and Jesus and the writer, rather than an alleged Hellenistic or later Gnostic orientation. DEAF (Heb. ḥērēsh; Gk. kōphos, “blunted”). Moses protected the deaf by a special statute. “You shall not curse a deaf man” (Lev. 19:14). This was because the deaf could not hear and were therefore unable to defend themselves.

Figurative. Deafness is symbolic of inattentiveness or inability (Isa. 29:18; 35:5; Matt. 11:5; etc.).

DEAL. See Metrology.

DEARTH (Heb. rācāb, “hunger”; Gk. limos, “scarcity”). KJV rendering of “famine” (Ruth 1:1; etc.). See Famine.

DEATH. A term that, in its application to the lower orders of living things, as animals and plants, denotes the extinction of vital functions, so that their renewal is impossible. With reference to human beings the term is variously defined according to the view held of human nature and life. The answer to the question, What is death? depends upon the answer given in the first place to the question, What is man? See Immortality.

Scripture Doctrine. The general teaching of the Scriptures is that man is not only a physical but also a spiritual being; accordingly, death is not the end of human existence, but a change of place or conditions in which conscious existence continues. (1) The doctrine of the future life is less emphatically taught in the OT than in the NT. The OT Scriptures, however, frequently refer to death in terms harmonious with that doctrine (Eccles. 12:7; 2 Sam. 12:23; Ps. 73:24; Job 14:14; Isa. 28:12). (2) In the NT this dark subject receives special illumination. In many cases essentially the same forms of representation are employed. Death is “a departure,” a “being absent from the body,” an “unclothing,” a “sleep,” but with all is the clear and strong announcement that Christ “brought life and immortality to light through the gospel” (2 Cor. 5:1–4; John 11:13; 2 Tim. 1:10; 4:6–7; etc.). (3) Death as a human experience, according to the Scriptures, is the result and punishment of sin. “The wages of sin is death.” And though the word is often used in a spiritual sense to denote the ruin wrought in man’s spiritual nature by sin, yet in the ordinary physical sense of the word, death is declared to have come upon the human race in consequence of sin. No such declaration is made as to the death of lower creatures (Gen. 2:17; 3:19; Rom. 5:12; 6:23; James 1:15). (4) A principal part of Christ’s redemptive work is the abolishment of death. This is seen in part in man’s present state, in the salvation that Christ effects from sin, which is “the sting of death,” and in the taking away of the fear of death from true believers. The complete work of Christ in this respect will appear in the resurrection (2 Tim. 1:10; 1 Cor. 15:22, 56–57; Heb. 2:14–15).

Man and Lower Creatures. The Scriptures make a deep distinction between the death of human beings and that of irrational creatures. For the latter it is the natural end of the existence; for the former it is an unnatural experience to which they are reduced because of sin, which is also unnatural. Man was not created to die.

The Scriptures nowhere affirm that death did not prevail over the lower creatures before the Fall of man. Thus upon this point there is no conflict between the Scriptures and geology.

It does not follow, because man was created immortal, that his permanent abiding place was to be this world. The OT Scriptures give two examples of men, Enoch and Elijah, who passed into the other world but “did not see death.” (See Martensen’s Christ. Dogm., Watson’s Institutes, Pope’s Compend. Christ. Theol., Laidlaw’s Bible Doctrine Concerning Man.) E.MCC.

DEBATE. In the KJV, in addition to the usual meaning of friendly discussion, debate means quarrel, strife; thus, “Ye fast for strife and debate” (Isa. 58:4, RV, “contention,” Heb. maṣṣâ). Among evils of the Gentiles given in the epistle to the Romans (1:29) Paul includes debate; the rendering of Gk. eris, “wrangling,” “strife” (KJV and NIV).

DE`BIR (de`bîr), or Kiriath-sepher.

1. A king of Eglon, one of the five Amorite kings whom Joshua defeated and hanged (Josh. 10:3, 5, 16, 26).

2. A highland city of Judah about a dozen miles SW of Hebron, or about the same distance SE of Lachish. It was conquered by Joshua (Josh. 10:38–40). Later reoccupied, it was retaken by Othniel (15:7, 15, 17). The Canaanites called it Kiriath-sepher (“book town”) or Kiriath-sanna (15:15, 49). W. F. Albright and Melvin Grove Kyle identified it as Tell Beit Mirsim and excavated there in 1926, 1928, 1930, and 1932. The site was found to have been occupied about 2200 B.C. and later to have become a Hyksos city with considerable prosperity. Destroyed about 1550, it was rebuilt as a Canaanite city. This in turn was leveled by fire late in the thirteenth century, a destruction believed to have been perpetrated by the Israelites. Several more rebuildings and destructions occurred before the final destruction by Nebuchadnezzar in 586, after which Debir was never rebuilt. Albright’s work at the site contributed considerably to the development of pottery chronology. Not all have been convinced that Tell Beit Mirsim was the site of Debir. Some scholars have located it at Khirbet Terrameh, five miles SW of Hebron, and others at Khirbet Rabud, nine miles SW of Hebron.

3. There was another Debir in Gad (Josh. 13:26) not far from Mahanaim, possibly the same as Lo-debar (2 Sam. 17:27). M.F.U.; H.F.V.

DEB’ORAH (deb’ō-ra; a “bee”).

1. The nurse of Rebekah (Gen. 35:8), whom she accompanied from the house of Bethuel (24:59). She is mentioned by name only on the occasion of her burial under the oak tree of Bethel, named in her honor Alon-bacuth (lit., “oak of weeping,” 35:8).

2. A prophetess, “the wife of Lappidoth,” who judged Israel (Judg. 4:4) in connection with Barak, about 1120 B.C. After the death of Ehud the children of Israel fell away from the Lord and were given into the hands of “Jabin, king of Canaan, who reigned in Hazor.” He oppressed them severely for twenty years.

At this time Deborah, “the prophetess,” dwelt under a palm tree (which bore her name) between Ramah and Bethel in the hill country of Ephraim, and there the people came to her for judgment. She sent an inspired message to Barak (which see), bidding him assemble ten thousand men of Naphtali and Zebulun at Mt. Tabor, for Jehovah would draw Sisera (Jabin’s general) and his host to meet him at the river Kishon and would deliver them into his hand. Barak agreed, but only on the condition that Deborah would accompany him. Deborah consented but assured him that the prize of victory, the defeat of the hostile general, should be taken out of his hand, for Jehovah would sell Sisera into the hand of a woman (Jael). “And the Lord routed Sisera and all his chariots and all his army, with the edge of the sword before Barak.” Sisera, taking refuge in the tent of Heber the Kenite, was slain by Heber’s wife, Jael. This success was followed up until Jabin was overthrown, and the land had rest for forty years.

This remarkable ode contained in Judg. 5 is a poetic version of the same material contained in prose in chap. 4. It is universally acclaimed an early masterpiece of Heb. poetry. Critics laud it as one of the first songs in Heb. literature. Deborah has been widely acclaimed as its author. It is remarkable for its vividness of imagery, preserved archaisms, and insight into the rude, barbaric life of the twelfth century B.C.

DEBT.

1. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words, with the general meaning of something due. In the Mosaic law the duty of aiding the poor was strongly emphasized (Deut. 15:7–15; cf. Ps. 37:26 and Matt. 5:42). All loans to fellow Israelites were to be forgiven every seven years (Deut. 15:2), and usury was looked upon with deepest contempt (Prov. 28:8; Ezek. 18:8, 13, 17; etc.). In any case of debt the creditor was expected to manifest the utmost consideration for the debtor, as a brother Israelite. Written notes of obligation were, at least after the period of exile, regularly in vogue (Josephus Ant. 16.10.8; Wars 2.17.6). The “bonds” mentioned in the parable (Luke 16:6) may have been written on wax-covered tablets, or parchment, from which the numbers might easily be effaced. Of these “bonds” there were two kinds. The most formal, shetar, was not signed by the debtor but only by the witnesses, who wrote their names (or marks) immediately below the lines of the document to prevent fraud. Generally it was further attested by the Sanhedrin of three, and contained the names of creditor and debtor, the amount owed, and the date, together with a clause attaching the property of the debtor. In fact, it was a kind of mortgage. When the debt was paid, the legal obligation was simply returned to the debtor; if paid in part, either a new bond was written or a receipt given. The bond mentioned in the parable was different, being merely an acknowledgment of debt for purchases made and signed only by the debtor, witnesses being dispensed with.

2. The Scripture spelled out regulations respecting debtors. The creditor might secure what was due him by means of a mortgage, pledge, or bondsman. (1) If a pledge was to be taken for a debt the creditor was not allowed to enter the debtor’s house and take what he pleased, but was to wait without (Deut. 24:10–11; cf. Job 22:6; 24:7–9). (2) A mill or millstone, or an upper garment, received as a pledge was not to be kept overnight. These appear to be only examples of those things that the debtor could not, without great inconvenience, dispense with (Ex. 22:26–27; Deut. 24:6, 12). (3) A debt could not be exacted during the sabbatic year (Deut. 15:1–15), but at other times the creditor might seize, first, the hereditary land, to be held until the year of jubilee; or, second, the debtor’s house, which could be sold in perpetuity unless redeemed within a year (Lev. 25:25–33). Third, the debtor might be sold, with wife and children, as hired servants (not slaves) until the jubilee (25:39–41). (4) A person becoming bondsman or surety was liable in the same way as the original debtor (Prov. 11:15; 17:18).

DEBTOR. See Debt.

DECALOGUE (Gk. deka, “ten”; logos, “word”). See Ten Commandments.

DECAP’OLIS (Gk. de-kap’o-lis; “ten cities”). A district containing ten cities in the NE part of Galilee, near the Sea of Galilee (Matt. 4:25; Mark 5:20; 7:31).

The cities were Scythopolis, Hippos, Gadara, Pella, Philadelphia, Gerasa, Dion, Canatha, Raphana, and Damascus. Damascus is the only one now entitled to the name of city. They were built originally by the followers of Alexander the Great and rebuilt by the Romans in 65 B.C., by whom they had certain privileges conferred upon them. These were typical Greco-Roman cities with their forums, pagan temples, baths, theaters, hippodromes, and other accoutrements. They were a thorn in the side of the Jews because they introduced nonsupernaturalistic ideas and elements of non-Jewish life-style and architecture into Palestine during the Roman period. The excavations at Jerash (Gergesa, which see) especially illustrate the nature of these cities. H.F.V.

DECISION, VALLEY OF. A figurative name (Joel 3:14) for the valley of Jehoshaphat (which see). The prophet gives in this passage a description of the nations streaming into the valley of judgment, following it with that of the appearance of Jehovah upon Zion in terrible glory as the judge of the nations and as a refuge of His people Israel.

DECK OF BOXWOOD (Heb. qeresh, a “plank,” usually rendered “board”). Deck of a ship (Ezek. 27:6) made of the tough, heavy wood of the box tree and said to be inlaid with ivory. The KJV renders “bench.” The same Heb. term is used (Ex. 26:15–29) for the boards of the Tabernacle (which see).

DECREE. The rendering of a number of Heb. and Gk. words, sometimes translated “law,” “edict.” The enactments of kings in the East were proclaimed publicly by criers (Jer. 34:8–9; Jonah 3:5–7) who are designated in Dan. 3:4; 5:29 by the term, kārôzâ, “herald.” Messengers, sent for that purpose, carried them to distant provinces, towns, and cities (1 Sam. 11:7; Ezra 1:1; Amos 4:5), and they were publicly announced at the gate of the city or other public place. In Jerusalem they were announced in the Temple, where large numbers of people assembled, for which reason the prophets often uttered their prophecies there.

DE DAN (dē’dan).

1. A son of Raamah, son of Cush (Gen. 10:7; 1 Chron. 1:9).

2. A son of Jokshan, son of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. 25:3; 1 Chron. 1:32). The usual opinion respecting these founders of tribes is that they first settled among the sons of Cush, wherever these latter may be placed; the second, on the Syrian borders, about the territory of Edom. But Gesenius and Winer have suggested that the name may apply to one tribe; and this may be adopted as probable on the supposition that the descendants of the Keturahite Dedan intermarried with those of the Cushite Dedan, whom the writer places, presumptively, on the borders of the Persian Gulf. The theory of this mixed descent gains weight from the fact that in each case the brother of Dedan is named Sheba. The passages in the Bible in which Dedan is mentioned (besides the genealogies above referred to) are contained in the prophecies of Isaiah (21:13), Jeremiah (25:23; 49:8), and Ezekiel (25:13; 27:15, 20; 38:13) and are in every case obscure. The probable inferences from these mentions of Dedan are (1) that Dedan, son of Raamah, settled on the shores of the Persian Gulf, and his descendants became caravan merchants between that coast and Palestine; (2) and that Jokshan, or a son of Jokshan, by intermarriage with the Cushite Dedan formed a tribe of the same name, which appears to have had its chief settlement in the borders of Edom, and perhaps to have led a pastoral life. A native indication of the name is presumed to exist in the island of Dadan, on the borders of the gulf (Smith).

DEDANIM. See Dedan.

DEDICATE (Heb. hānak, to “initiate”; Gk. qādash, to “pronounce clean”). A religious service whereby anything is dedicated or consecrated to the service of God; as the dedication of the Tabernacle by Moses (Ex. 40; Num. 7); the altar (Num. 7:84, 88); the Temple, by Solomon (1 Kings 8); the Temple, by the returned exiles (Ezra 6:16–17); the Temple built by Herod (Josephus Ant. 15.11.6; see Temple). Dedicatory solemnities were observed with respect to cities, walls, gates, and private houses (Deut. 20:5; Ps. 30, title; Neh. 12:27). The custom still lingers in the dedication of churches, “opening” of roads, bridges, etc.

DEDICATION, FEAST OF. See Festivals.

DEED. See Land.

DEEP. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words used to denote (1) the grave or abyss (Rom. 10:7; Luke 8:31, KJV); (2) the deepest part of the sea (Pss. 69:15; 107:24, 26); (3) the waters at creation (Gen. 1:2); (4) hell, the place of punishment (Luke 8:31; Rev. 9:1; 11:7, KJV). See also Depths.

DEER. See Animal Kingdom.

DEFECT. A “blemish” (Heb. mûm), and usually so rendered, either physical (Lev. 21:17–23; 22:20–21; 2 Sam. 14:25) or moral (Deut. 32:5; Job 11:15). The NIV renders the last two passages “to their shame” and “without shame,” respectively. See also Diseases: Blemish; Disfigured Face.

DEFILE. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words, generally meaning uncleanness in a figurative or ceremonial sense. Many blemishes of person and conduct were, under the Mosaic law, considered defilements. Under the gospel moral defilement is specially emphasized (Matt. 15:18; etc.). See Uncleanness.

DEGREE (Heb. ma'âlâ, a “step”). This term is used of a group of Levites “of the second degree” (1 Chron. 15:18, KJV; NASB and NIV, “rank”) in the sense of rank or order of enumeration. David, in the expression “Thou ... hast regarded me according to the standard of a man of high degree” (17:17), seems to mean, “Thou hast visited me in reference to my elevation.” In Ps. 62:9 “degree” is evidently used in the sense of condition or rank (cf. NIV, “highborn”), as also in Luke 1:52 and James 1:9 (Gk. tapeinos, “depressed, humiliated,” see KJV). In 1 Tim. 3:13 (Gk. bathmos) the meaning is “position” (or “standing,” NASB and NIV). In reference to degree as applied to measurement, see Dial.

DEGREES, SONG OF. See Ascents, Song of.

DEHA'VITES (dē-ha'vīts). Ezra 4:9 only, KJV; RV, “Dehaites;” NIV, “of” (as a relative pronoun construction in “Elamites of Susa”). One of the tribes transported by the king of Assyria to “the cities of Samaria” at the time of the captivity of Israel, 721 B.C. As they are named in connection with the Susanchites, or Susianans, and the Elamites, they may be the widely diffused Aryan Daï, or Dahi, mentioned by Herodotus (1.125) among the nomadic tribes of Persia (Smith, Bib. Dict., s.v.).

If Daï were transported by the Assyrians to Samaria it must have been a small detached section of the tribe analogous to the Hittites of S Palestine. The Daoi of Herodotus, the Dahae of Pliny and Virgil, were a warlike and “numerous nomad tribe who wandered over the steppes to the east of the Caspian. Strabo has grouped them with the Sacae and Massagetae as the great Scythian tribes of inner Asia to the north of Bactriana.” In the time of Alexander and later they were found around the rivers Oxus and Jaxartes. The name also appears in the vicinity of the Sea of Azof and of the river Danube. But all these places are far beyond the horizon of Assyria, and the Assyrians never mention such a race. On the whole, we are inclined to regard the identification as an interesting suggestion rather than an established fact. W.H.

DEKAR. See Ben-Dekar.

DELAI'AH (de-lī'a; “freed by Jehovah”).

1. One of the sons of Elioenai, a descendant of the royal line from Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:24). He probably belongs to the tenth generation before Christ (see Strong's Harmony of the Gospels, p. 17), about 300 B.C.

2. The head of the twenty-third division of the priestly order in the arrangement by David (1 Chron. 24:18), about 980 B.C.

3. The “sons of Delaiah” were among those that returned to Zerubbabel from certain parts of the Assyrian dominions but who had lost their genealogical records (Ezra 2:60; Neh. 7:62), 536 B.C.

4. The son of Mehetabel and father of the Shemaiah who advised Nehemiah to escape into the Temple from the threats of Sanballat (Neh. 6:10), 445 B.C.

5. A son of Shemaiah and one of the officials to whom Jeremiah’s first roll of prophecy was read (Jer. 36:12). He afterward vainly entreated the king (Jehoiakim) to spare the roll from the flames (v. 25), 606 B.C.

DELI’LAH (de-lī’la; “coquette”). A courtesan who dwelt in the valley of Sorek and was loved by Samson (Judg. 16:4–18), about 1060 B.C. Samson was tricked by her into revealing the secret of his strength and the means by which he might be overcome; she was bribed by the lords of the Philistines, who gave her the large sum of 1,100 pieces of silver for her services, into doing this. She was probably a Philistine and one who used her personal charms for political ends.

DE’MAS (dē’mas). A companion of the apostle Paul (called by him his fellow worker in Philem. 24; see also Col. 4:14) during his first imprisonment at Rome. At a later period (2 Tim. 4:10) we find him mentioned as having deserted the apostle because he “loved this present world,” A.D. 66.

DEME’TRIOUS (de-mē’tri-us).

1. A silversmith of Ephesus who made “silver shrines of Artemis” (Acts 19:24), i.e., probably, silver models of the temple or of its chapel, in which, perhaps, a little image of the goddess was placed. These, it seems, were purchased by foreigners who either could not perform their devotions at the temple itself or who, after having done so, carried them away as memorials or for purposes of worship. Demetrius, becoming alarmed at the progress of the gospel under the preaching of Paul, assembled his fellow-craftsmen and incited a tumult by haranguing them on the danger that threatened the worship of Artemis and, consequently, the profits of their craft. The tumult was quieted by the tact and boldness of the town-clerk, and Paul departed for Macedonia, A.D. (perhaps autumn) 55.

2. A Christian mentioned with commendation in 3 John 12, A.D. about 90. Further than this nothing is known of him.

DEMON (Gk. daimōn, and its derivative daimonion). Used once in the NT (Acts 17:18, NIV, “foreign gods”; NASB, “deities,” see marg.) for deity, but usually referring to the ministers of the devil (Luke 4:35; 9:1, 42; John 10:21; etc.); inferior spirit beings, Satan’s angels who “did not keep their own domain” (Jude 6; Matt. 25:41; Rev. 12:7, 9). Satan is called the “ruler of the demons” (Matt. 9:34; 12:24; Mark 3:22; Luke 11:15; Gk. archonti tōn daimoniōn). Demons are said to enter into the body of a person to vex him with diseases (Matt. 9:33; 17:18; Luke 4:35, 41; 8:30, 32–33; etc.), and a person was believed to be possessed by a demon when he suffered from some exceptionally severe disease (4:33; 8:27) or acted and spoke as though mad (Matt. 11:18; Luke 7:33; John 7:20; etc.). According to a Jewish opinion that passed over to the Christians, demons are the gods of the Gentiles and the authors of idolatry. Paul, teaching that the gods of the Gentiles are a fiction (1 Cor. 8:10–13), makes the beings answering to the heathen conceptions of the gods to be demons, to whom he says they really sacrifice (10:20); in 1 Tim. 4:1 deceitful lies are attributed to demons. They are represented as “kept in eternal bonds under darkness for the judgment of the great day” (Jude 6; cf. 2 Pet. 2:4).

DEMONIAC (Gk. daimonizomai, “to be under the power of a demon,” rendered “demon possessed” or “demoniac”). A term frequently used in the NT of one under the influence of a demon. The verb “to be demonized” occurs, in one form or another, seven times in Matthew, four times in Mark, once in Luke, and once in John.

Nature. By some, demoniacs are believed to have been “persons afflicted with especially severe diseases, either bodily or mental (such as paralysis, blindness, deafness, loss of speech, epilepsy, melancholy, insanity, etc.), whose bodies, in the opinion of the Jews, demons had entered.” But the evidence points to actual possession by spirits. “The demonized were incapable of separating their own consciousness and ideas from the influence of the demon, their own identity being merged, and to that extent lost, in that of their tormentors. In this respect the demonized state was also kindred to madness” (Edersheim, Life of Jesus, 1:608).

The evangelists constantly distinguish between demonic possession and all forms of mere disease, although sometimes they occurred together. Thus, Christ “cast out the spirits ... and healed all who were ill” (Matt. 8:16); they “brought to Him all who were ill ... demoniacs, epileptics, paralytics” (4:24); “they began bringing to Him all who were ill and those who were demon-possessed” (Mark 1:32; cf. v. 34). Matthew (9:32–33) keeps the possession distinct from the dumbness when he writes, “A dumb man, demon-possessed.” Jesus called His disciples “together, and gave them power and authority over all the demons, and to heal diseases” (Luke 9:1; cf. Matt. 10:1). In Mark 6:13 they “were casting out many demons and were anointing with oil many sick people and healing them” (cf. 3:15; Luke 6:17–18).

The evangelists constantly assert that the actions and utterances in demonic possessions were those of the evil spirits. The demons are the actual agents in the cases. There are many statements indicating this: “The unclean spirits ... would fall down before Him and cry out, saying,” etc. (Mark 3:11); “the demons began to entreat Him” (Matt. 8:31); “and throwing him into convulsions, the unclean spirit cried out with a loud voice, and came out of him” (Mark 1:26; Luke 4:35). Of a similar tenor are Mark 9:20–26; Luke 8:2; 9:42; Acts 5:16.

Some of the facts recorded are not compatible with any theory of mere disease, bodily or mental. One of these facts is found in the case recorded by three evangelists (Matt. 8; Mark 5; Luke 8), where the demons asked and received from Christ permission to pass from the demoniac into the herd of swine. Again, there is the habitual assertion of Christ’s divinity by these spirits and our Lord’s recognition of the fact, while as yet not only the people but also the disciples did not know who He was, e.g., “I know who You are—the Holy One of God!” (Mark 1:24; Luke 4:34); “What have we to do with You, Son of God?” (Matt. 8:29; cf. Mark 3:11; Luke 4:41). That this was a genuine recognition, and was so understood by our Savior, appears in several places in Scripture, for Mark said (1:34), “He was not permitting the demons to speak, because they knew who He was,” and again (3:12), “He earnestly warned them not to make Him known,” and in Luke (4:41) we read, “And rebuking them, He would not allow them to speak, because they knew Him to be the Christ.” Epilepsy, lunacy, and insanity do not meet these several facts. Alford calls attention to a sort of double consciousness indicated in some of these cases, the utterance seeming to come at times from the man and not from the evil spirit. In Acts 19:13–17 we find a distinction between “the evil spirit” and “the man, in whom was the evil spirit,” who leaped on the sons of Sceva and overcame them.

Jesus treated cases of demonic possession as realities. He is not only described as “rebuking,” “commanding,” and “casting out” the unclean spirits, but His direct addresses to them are recorded. Thus in Mark 5:8–12 and Matt. 8:28–32 Jesus addresses the demons who are called “Legion,” commanding them to leave and finally granting them permission to enter a nearby herd of swine. Again (Mark 1:25; Luke 4:35), He directly addressed the unclean spirit: “Be quiet, and come out of him!” Was this all a show and a pretense on His part? He went further yet, for He deliberately argued with the Jews on the assumption of the reality of demonic possession, affirming that His casting out demons by the Spirit of God proved that the kingdom of God had come to them (Matt. 12:23–28; Luke 11:14–26). Questioning their inability to cast out an evil spirit, Jesus told the disciples, “This kind cannot come out by anything but prayer” (Mark 9:29). When the seventy returned with joy and said to him, “Lord, even the demons are subject to us in Your name,” His answer was to the same effect: “I was watching Satan fall from heaven like lightning” (Luke 10:17–18). We are further informed (Mark 3:14–15) that in the solemn act of calling and appointing the apostles “He appointed twelve, that they might be with Him, and that He might send them out to preach, and to have authority to cast out the demons.” Clearly demonism was regarded by our Lord as a stern reality.

Cure. “The New Testament furnishes the fullest details as to the manner in which demoniacs were set free. This was always the same. It consisted neither in magical means nor formulas of exorcism, but always in the word of power which Jesus spake or intrusted to His disciples, and which the demons always obeyed. In one respect those who were demonized exhibited the same phenomenon: they all owned the power of Jesus” (Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus, 1:480).

DEN. The rendering of one Gk. and several Heb. words, meaning a lair of wild beasts (Job 37:8; Pss. 104:22; 10:9; where it is rendered “lair” or “cover” [NIV]); a hole of a venomous reptile (Isa. 11:8); a fissure in the rocks, caves used for hiding (Judg. 6:2; “holes in the ground,” Heb. 11:38, NASB; cf. Heb. 11:38; Rev. 6:15, NASB, KJV, NIV), or resort for thieves (Matt. 21:13; Mark 11:17; Luke 19:46). For “Den of Lions” see Daniel.

DENARIUS. See Metrology: Measures of Value, or Money.

DENIAL.

1. Heb. kāhash, to be “untrue, disown” (Josh. 24:27; Prov. 30:9).

2. Gk. aparneomai, to “affirm that one has no acquaintance or connection with another”; of Peter’s denying Christ (Matt. 26:34, 69–75); Mark 14:30, 66–72; Luke 22:34, 61); to deny one’s self, to lose sight of one’s self and one’s own interests (Matt. 16:24; Mark 8:34; Luke 9:23).

3. Gk. arneomai, to “deny” an assertion (Mark 14:70) or event (Acts 4:16). Used of followers of Jesus who, for fear of death or persecution, deny that Jesus is their master and desert His cause (Matt. 10:33; Luke 12:9; 2 Tim. 2:12); and, on the other hand, of Jesus denying that one as His follower (Matt. 10:33; 2 Tim. 2:12). “Denying” God and Christ is used of those who, by teaching false doctrines and introducing “destructive heresies” apostatized from God and Christ (2 Pet. 2:1; 1 John 2:22–23; Jude 4). Denying “ungodliness and worldly desires” (Titus 2:12) is to abjure, renounce.

4. Self-denial, in the scriptural sense, is the renouncing of all those pleasures, profits, views, connections, or practices that interfere with the true interests of the soul. One’s understanding must be denied in preference of divine instruction (Prov. 3:5–6); the will must be denied so far as it opposes the will of God (Eph. 5:17); the affections when they become inordinate (Col. 3:5); the physical nature when opposed to righteousness (Rom. 6:12–13); position (Heb. 11:24–26), monetary gain (Matt. 4:20–22), and friends and relatives (Gen. 12:1) must be renounced if they stand in the way of religion and usefulness. One’s own righteousness must be relinquished, so as not to depend upon it (Phil. 3:8–9); even life itself must be laid down if called for in the cause of Christ (Matt. 16:24–25).

DENIAL OF CHRIST. See Peter.

DEPRAVITY. In theology the term depravity denotes the sinfulness of man’s nature. See Sin, Original.

DEPTH. See Deep.

DEPTHS. The expression “the depths of the earth” (Ps. 63:9), also rendered “the lower parts of the earth” (Ezek. 26:20), properly means valleys; hence, by extension, sheol (which see), or the underworld as the place of the dead. The “lower parts of the earth” (“earth beneath,” NIV) in Isa. 44:23 is not hades but the interior of the earth with its caves, pits, and deep abysses. The “depths of the earth” (Ps. 139:15) is also used figuratively for any hidden place, such as the womb. See also Deep.

DEPUTY. The rendering of several words:

1. Niṣṣāb (“appointed”), a prefect; one set over others (1 Kings 4:5; etc.; “officer,” KJV).

2. Peḥâ, Esther 8:9; 9:3; NASB and NIV, “governor,” the Persian prefect W of the Euphrates; modern form, pasha.

3. Anthupatos, “in lieu of anyone,” a proconsul. The emperor Augustus divided the Roman provinces into senatorial and imperial. The former were presided over by the proconsuls appointed by the Senate; the latter were administered by legates of the emperor, sometimes called propraetor (Acts 13:7–8, 12; 18:12).

DER'BE (der'bi). A small town at the foot of Mt. Taurus, about sixteen miles E of Lystra. Paul and Barnabas gained many converts here, among them possibly Gaius (Acts 14:6, 20; 20:4). Paul passed through the place on his second missionary journey (16:1). Inscriptions found at Kerti Hüyük now fix that mound as the site of ancient Derbe. It is located some fifteen miles NW of Karaman (sixty-six miles by road SE of Konya). H.F.V.

DERISION (Heb. la-ag, to “stammer, imitate” in derision). “Derision” (Job 34:7, NASB; “scorning,” KJV and NIV) is blasphemy, and one who “drinks up derision like water” gives himself up to mockery in order to find satisfaction in it (cf. 15:16). It is used of the treatment accorded the godly by their enemies (Pss. 44:13; 79:4; Heb. qeles, a “laughingstock”).

DESERT. A term scarcely distinguished in ordinary language from wilderness, and in the English Bible the terms are used indiscriminately. In one place we find a Heb. term treated as a proper name and in another translated as a common name.

1. Midbār, “pasture”; Ex. 3:1; 5:1; etc. (KJV), usually rendered “wilderness” (Gen. 14:6; etc.), and applied to the country between Palestine and Egypt, including Sinai (Num. 9:5). When used with the article midbār denotes the wilderness of Arabia (1 Kings 9:18). Such pastureland in the East is often an extensive plain or steppe, which during the drought and heat of summer becomes utterly parched and bare, so that the transition from pastureland to desert was quite easy and natural. That the word comprehends both meanings is evident from Ps. 65:12 and Joel 2:22. But in the greater number of passages, the idea of sterility is the prominent one (Gen. 14:6; 16:7; Deut. 11:24; etc.). In the poetical books “desert” is found as the translation of midbār (Deut. 32:10; Job 24:5; Jer. 25:24).

2. Ārābā (“sterility”; rendered either “Arabah” or “desert” in Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel; elsewhere usually “plain”). Although this term primarily meant plain, it was not in the sense of pasture but rather that of hollow or level ground, and especially the level of the Jordan Valley, extending to the Red Sea (Deut. 1:1; 2:8; Josh. 12:1; hence also “sea of the Arabah” or “desert,” Deut. 4:49; namely, the Dead Sea). In the East, wide, extended plains are liable to drought and consequent barrenness; hence the Heb. language describes a plain, a desert, and an unfruitful waste by the same word.

3. Yāshûmôn (“desolation”; rendered “wilderness,” Deut. 32:10; Ps. 68:7; “desert,” Ps. 107:4) is used with the definite article apparently to denote the waste tract on both sides of the Dead Sea. In such cases it is treated as a proper name in some translations; thus “the top of Pisgah, which looketh toward Jeshimon” (Num. 21:20, KJV; NASB, see marg.; the NIV has “wasteland”). This term expresses a greater extent of uncultivated country than do the others (1 Sam. 23:19, 24; Isa. 43:19–20).

4. Horbā (“desolation”) is generally applied to what has been made desolate by man or neglect, rendered “ruin” in NASB and NIV (Ezra 9:9; Ps. 109:10). The only passage in which it expresses a natural waste or “desert” is Isa. 48:21, where it refers to Sinai. It is rendered “waste places” (Ps. 102:6; NIV, “ruins”), “deserts” (Isa. 48:21), and “ruins” (Ezek. 13:4). The Gk. word in the NT (erēmos) has the general meaning of “solitary,” “uninhabited,” and is sometimes rendered “wilderness.”

Figurative. “Desert” or wilderness is used in Scripture as the symbol of temptation, solitude, and persecution (Isa. 27:10; 33:9); of nations ignorant or neglectful of God (32:15; 35:1); of Israel when she had forsaken God (40:3). The desert was supposed to be inhabited by evil spirits or at least occasionally visited by them (“waterless places,” Matt. 12:43; Luke 11:24).

For figurative and nonfigurative use, see also Wilderness.

DESERT OWL. See Animal Kingdom: Owl; Peacocks.

DESIRE OF ALL NATIONS (lit., the “delight” or “costly” of all the nations). An expression (Hag. 2:7) understood by most of the earlier commentators as a title of the Messiah. Heb. hemdā (“desire”) is the valuable possessions of the heathen, their gold and silver (v. 8). The thought is that the shaking will be followed by this result, or produce this effect, that all that is valuable will come to fill the Temple with glory. The NASB renders “wealth of all nations,” and the NIV, “desired of all nations.”

DESOLATION, ABOMINATION OF. See Abomination.

DESTROYER (Heb. mashhîṭ, an “exterminator,” Ex. 12:23). The agent employed in the slaying of the firstborn (Heb. 11:28; Gk. hō holothrenōn), the angel or messenger of God (2 Sam. 24:15–16; 2 Kings 19:35; Ps. 78:49; Acts 12:23).

DESTRUCTION (Heb. ʾabaddôn, a “perishing”). A “place of destruction” (Ps. 88:11), or abyss, and nearly equivalent to Sheol (which see). In several places (Job 26:6; 31:12; Prov. 15:11) NASB renders simply “Abaddon.” See Abaddon.

DESTRUCTION, MOUNT OF. A hill near Jerusalem where Solomon established high places for the worship of Ashtoreth, Chemosh, and Milcom, afterward overthrown by Josiah (2 Kings 23:13–14). The NIV describes it as the “Hill of Corruption.” Tradition locates it at the rise immediately S of the Mount of Olives.

DETESTABLE. See Abomination.

DEU'EL (dū'el; “known of God”). Father of Eliasaph, head of the tribe of Gad at the time of the numbering of the people at Sinai (Num. 1:14; 7:42, 47; 10:20), about 1438 B.C. He is mentioned again (2:14), although the KJV reading of the verse gives Reuel in place of Deuel, reflecting the text of a number of ancient MSS and having to do with the similarity of the Heb. letters D and R.

DEUTERONOMY, BOOK OF. The last book of the Pentateuch, completing the five books of Moses. The Jews called it “five-fifths of the law.” It follows logically after Numbers; Numbers carries the history of the nation Israel to the events in the Plains of Moab to the E of Jericho, and Deuteronomy winds up the Mosaic age with three discourses from Moses just before his death and the entrance of the people into the land of Canaan.

Name. The name comes from the LXX through an inaccurate translation of Deut. 17:18, which is correctly rendered, “This is the copy (or repetition) of the law” (cf. NASB, KJV, NIV). It is apparent that the book is not a “second law” distinct from the law given at Sinai, as the name of the work might suggest. It is simply a partial restatement and exposition of former laws to the new generation that had been reared in the wilderness. The Jewish name of the book is ʾElleh haddevarim, “These are the words” or simply Devarim, “Words.” In Jewish tradition it is called Mishneh Torah, meaning “repetition” or “copy of the law” (17:18).

Author. In the most explicit terms the book itself asserts its authorship by Moses. “So Moses wrote this law and gave it to the priests, the sons of Levi who carried the ark of the covenant of the Lord, and to all the elders of Israel” (Deut. 31:9). “And it came about, when Moses finished writing the words of this law in a book until they were complete, that Moses commanded the Levites who carried the ark of the covenant of the Lord, saying, ‘Take this book of the law and place it beside the ark of the covenant of the Lord your God, that it may remain there as a witness against you’” (31:24–26). No other book of the Pentateuch bears so emphatic a testimony of its Mosaic authorship. It is of unusual interest that critics most dogmatically reject the Mosaic authorship of this book in the face of these clear assertions. Over against these critical claims conservative scholars see ample evidence to maintain the Mosaic authenticity of this book. The general character of the writing, its code of conquest, its exhortatory nature, its plan as a military law-book of a pilgrim people about to enter Canaan, together with the scope and spirit of the writing are peculiarly suited for the Mosaic era and completely unsuitable for a later age. Moses is mentioned more than forty times in the book, mostly as the authoritative author of the subject matter. The first person predominates. The language purports to come directly from Moses. If Moses is not the actual author, the book can hardly be excused from being a literary forgery, scarcely worthy of canonical Scripture.

Treaty Form. Second millennium B.C. Near Eastern treaties imposed upon a vassal by an overlord or a great king such as a Hittite ruler had a remarkably consistent form: (1) a preamble, identifying the author of the covenant; (2) historical prologue stating previous relations between the two parties (if any), and past benefactions by the overlord; (3) basic and detailed stipulations stating the obligations imposed by the sovereign ruler upon the vassal; (4) deposit of a copy of the covenant in the vassal's most sacred repository; (5) periodic public reading of the covenant by the vassal; (6) witnesses, generally the gods of the countries involved; (7) curses for breaking the covenant; (8) blessings for keeping it; (9) a formal oath of obedience; (10) a solemn ratification ceremony; (11) a formal procedure for acting against rebellious vassals. Covenants coming from first millennium B.C. sources are the same except that they do not have the historical prologue.

The covenant form was Hittite in origin. Not every element has survived in Scripture, but when Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy are put together, one can get an excellent idea of how the treaties worked. As far as Deuteronomy is concerned, it can be analyzed on the basis of the covenant form common in the second millennium B.C.: (1) preamble: Deut. 1:1–5; (2) historical prologue: Deut. 1:6–3:29; (3) stipulations: Deut. 4:5–11 (basic) and 12–26 (detailed); (4) provisions for depositing a copy in a sacred repository: Deut. 31:9, 24–26; (5) provision for periodic public reading: Deut. 31:10–13; (6) identification of the witness: Deut. 31:26 (the law book itself as witness); (7) curses: Deut. 28:15–68; (8) blessings: Deut. 28:1–14; (9) oath of obedience: not specific in Deut., but see Ex. 24:7; (10) provision for a ratification ceremony, specified in this case as a covenant-renewal ceremony: Deut. 27:5–7; (11) provision for dealing with rebellious vassals: foreshadowed in Deut. 30:17–19; this is the so-called “controversy” (Heb. rîb) procedure; see Hos. 4:1; 12:2, and elsewhere.

Critical View of Authorship. Deuteronomy has a central place in higher criticism of the Pentateuch. Rationalists maintain that it was written by an anonymous prophetic writer in the spirit of Moses between 715 and 640 B.C. It is claimed that it was first published in the eighteenth year of King Josiah, to bring about his great religious reformation (2 Kings 22–23). The principal reason assigned for the Josianic date is that the OT books do not give explicit witness to Deuteronomy, especially in the matter of the law of the central sanctuary (Deut. 12:1–7). It is, accordingly, assumed not to have had an existence previously to Josiah's time. But an unbiased view of the Pentateuch reveals that the laws of Deuteronomy were both known and observed, existing in the form of written codified statutes, and made a marked impression on the Israelites from the period of their actual entrance into the land of Canaan. Examples are abundant. The ban concerning Jericho (Josh. 6:17–18) follows Deut. 13:15–17. When Ai was captured, Israel took only “the cattle and the spoil” (Josh. 8:27) in keeping with Deut. 20:14. The body of the king of Ai was taken down from the gibbet before nightfall (Josh. 8:29, cf. Deut. 21:23). The altar on Mt. Ebal (Josh. 8:30–31) recalls Deut. 27:4–6. Many other evidences occur. The law of the central sanctuary, i.e., of worshiping only “at the place which the Lord your God shall choose,” was also known in early Israel, as is proved by the fact that the E Jordanic tribes disavowed their memorial when accused by their fellow tribesmen of building an altar of their own (Josh. 22:29, 31; cf. Deut. 12:5). Elkanah went up annually to Shiloh, Israel's early sanctuary (1 Sam. 1:3, 7). After the destruction of the central sanctuary, Samuel sacrificed at Mizpah, Ramah, and Bethlehem, evidently taking advantage of the law of Deut. 12:10–11 because of the time of war. Hezekiah's revival (2 Kings 18:4, 22) is inconceivable without a knowledge of Deuteronomy and its unique law of the central sanctuary. Eighth-century prophets knew the law also. By their unsound views of Deuteronomy the partitionists have been led to discard Mosaic authenticity of the entire Pentateuch and have landed in a quagmire of doubt and uncertainty.

DEVIL (Gk. diabolos, “accuser”).

1. One who slanders another for the purpose of injury, a maligner, e.g., a “malicious gossip” (1 Tim. 3:11; 2 Tim. 3:3; Titus 2:3).

2. “Goat demon” (or “goat idol,” NIV) is the rendering of the Heb. šā'âr, “hairy” (Lev. 17:7; Isa. 13:21; 34:14, marg.). These were demon spirits that inhabited the desert and whose evil influence was sought to be averted by sacrifice. The Israelites brought this superstition and the idolatry to which it gave rise from Egypt, where goats were worshiped as gods; these were the gods whom the Israelites worshiped in Egypt (Josh. 24:24; Ezek. 20:7; 23:3, 8–9; etc.).

3. In Deut. 32:17 and Ps. 106:37 the term rendered “demon” is “shade” (Heb. shēd, “demon”) and means an idol, since the Jews regarded idols as demons that caused themselves to be worshiped by men.

4. The greatest of all fallen spirits (Matt. 4:8–11; Rev. 12:9; etc.). This epithet refers to him as the “accuser of the brethren” (12:10). In this role he is granted a certain power of “sifting” carnal believers (Luke 22:31–32; cf. Job 1:6–11; 1 Cor. 5:5; 1 Tim. 1:20). Although this may even involve physical death, Satan's power over the believer is strictly permissive and limited, and believers are kept in faith through the advocacy of Christ (1 John 2:1). At the commencement of the Great Tribulation, Satan's privilege of access to God as accuser will be terminated (Rev. 12:7–11). At Christ's glorious second advent Satan will be chained for the Millennium (20:2). Finally, he will be loosed for a short time (20:3; 7–8) and will head a final attempt to overthrow God's kingdom. Defeated in this, he will be hurled to his eternal doom in the lake of fire. See Satan.

DEVOTED THING. See Anathema.

DEW (Heb. ṭal). "The dews of Syrian nights are excessive; on many mornings it looks as if there had been heavy rains, and this is the sole slackening of the drought which the land feels from May till October" (Smith, Hist. Geog., p. 65; Judg. 6:38; song of Sol. 5:2; Dan. 4:15). This partial refreshment of the ground is of great value and would alone explain all the oriental references to the effect of dew. Thus it is coupled as a blessing with rain, or mentioned as a source of fertility (Gen. 27:28; Deut. 33:13; Zech. 8:12), and its withdrawal is considered a curse (2 Sam. 1:21; 1 Kings 17:1; Hag. 1:10).

Figurative. Dew in the Scriptures is a symbol of the beneficent power of God, which quickens, revives, and invigorates the objects of nature when they have been parched by the burning heat of the sun (Prov. 19:12; Hos. 14:5). The silent, irresistible, and rapid descent of dew is used to symbolize the sudden onset of an enemy (2 Sam. 17:12). "Thy youth are to Thee as the dew" (Ps. 110:3) is believed to be a figure of abiding youthful vigor. Dew is a token of exposure in the night (song of Sol. 5:2; Dan. 4:15; etc.); the symbol of something transient (Hos. 6:4; 13:3); and, from its noiseless descent and refreshing influence, the emblem of brotherly love and harmony (Ps. 133:3).

DIADEM. The rendering of several Heb. words and, in the NASB, one Gk. word.

1. Ṣānîp, something wound about the head (Isa. 62:3, lit., "turban"); spoken of as the "turban" of men (Job 29:14), of women (Isa. 3:23), of the high priest (Zech. 3:5), as well as the tiara of a king (Isa. 62:3).

2. Ṣîpîrâ, circlet (Isa. 28:5), a royal tiara or, "wreath" (NIV).

3. Miṣnepet (Ezek. 21:26, KJV), the royal diadem, like ṣānîf, but the turban (so NASB and NIV) of the high priest, as it is used in every instance in the Pentateuch, from which Ezekiel has taken the word.

4. Diadēma. This Gk. word is rendered "crowns" in three passages of the KJV and NIV (Rev. 12:3; 13:1; 19:12), but the NASB correctly gives "diadem." A diadem (diadēma) and crown (stephanos) are distinct from one another. The latter is a crown in the sense of a chaplet, wreath, or garland; the "badge of victory in the games, of civic worth, of military valor, of nuptial joy, of festal gladness." Diadem is a crown as the badge of royalty.

What the "diadem" of the Jews was we do not know. That of other nations of antiquity was a band of silk, two inches broad, bound around the head and tied behind, the invention of which is attributed to Liber. Its color was generally white; sometimes, however, it was blue, like that of Darius, and it was sown with pearls or other gems. See also Priest, High; Turban.

DIAL (Heb. ma'ālâ, "step"). Used for the measurement of time, erected by Ahaz (2 Kings 20:9–11; Isa. 38:8) and called the "steps of Ahaz" (KJV; NASB and NIV, "stairway"). As ma'ālâ may signify either one of a flight of steps or degree, we might suppose the reference to be a dial plate with a gnomon indicator; but, in the first place, the expression points to an actual succession of steps, that is to say, to an obelisk upon a square or circular elevation ascended by steps, which threw the shadow of its highest point at noon upon the highest steps, and in the morning and evening upon the lowest, either on the one side or the other, so that the obelisk itself served as a gnomon. The step dial of Ahaz may have consisted of twenty steps or more, which measured the time of day by half hours, or even quarters. If the sign was given an hour before sunset, the shadow, by going back ten steps of half an hour each, would return to the point at which it stood at twelve o'clock. When it is stated that "the sun returned" (KJV), this does not mean the sun in the heaven but the sun upon the sundial, upon which the illumined surface moved upward as the shadow retreated, for when the shadow moved back the sun moved back as well. The event is intended to be represented as a miracle, and a miracle it really was (Delitzsch, Com., on Isa. 38:7–8).

DIAMOND, or ADAMANT. See Mineral Kingdom.

DIANA. See Gods, False: Artemis.

DIB'LAH (dib'la). A place mentioned only in Ezek. 6:14, as if situated at one of the extremities of the land of Israel. It is natural to infer that Diblah was in the N. The only name in the N at all like it is Riblah, and the letters D and R are so much alike in Heb. and so frequently interchanged, owing to the carelessness of copyists, that there is a strong possibility that Riblah is the correct reading.

DIB'LAIM (dib'la-im; "cakes" [of dried figs?]). The name of the father of Gomer, the wife of Hosea (Hos. 1:3), about 750 B.C.

DIB'LATH. See Diblah.

DI'BON (di'bon; "pining").

1. A town on the E side of Jordan, in the rich pastoral country that was taken possession of and rebuilt by the children of Gad (Num. 32:3, 34). From this circumstance it possibly received the name of Dibon-gad. Its first mention is in the ancient fragment of poetry (21:30), and from this it appears to have belonged originally to the Moabites. We find Dibon counted to Reuben in the lists of Joshua (13:9, 17). In the time of Isaiah and Jeremiah, however, it was again in possession of Moab (Isa. 15:2; Jer. 48:18, 22; cf. v. 24). In the same denunciations of Isaiah it appears, probably, under the name of Dimon.

Dibon, capital of the Moabite kingdom, is located about forty miles S of Amman and thirteen miles E of the Dead Sea. Here the famous Moabite Stone was found in 1868. The American Schools of Oriental Research excavated there from 1950 to 1953 and in 1955 and 1956 under the leadership of F. V. Winnett, W. L. Reed, A. D. Tushingham, and W. M. Morton. Excavation has shown that the site was occupied as early as about 3000 B.C. and intermittently until Byzantine and Arab times. During the first three seasons of excavation, attention concentrated on the defenses of the eastern and southeastern edges of the mound. The beautifully built wall stood there from the middle of the ninth century to Nebuchadnezzar's destruction in 582. During the last season of excavation interest centered on the northern gate area, dating to the tenth-eighth centuries. On the summit of the mound stood an official building that may have been a temple or a palace with a royal chapel.

2. One of the towns reinhabited by the men of Judah after the return from captivity (Neh. 11:25). From its mention with Jekabzeel, Moladah, and other towns of the S there can be no doubt that it is identical with Dimonah (which see). H.F.V.

DI'BON-GAD (di'bon-gad). One of the halting places of the Israelites (Num. 33:45–46). It was, no doubt, the same place that is generally called Dibon, no. 1.

DIB'RI (dib'ri; perhaps “eloquent”). A Danite, father of Shelomith, a woman whose son was stoned to death at Moses' command for blaspheming the name of the Lord (Lev. 24:11), 1420 B.C.

DIDRACHM. See Metrology: Measures of Value, or Money; and also the article Tribute Money.

DID'YMUS (did'i-mus; “twin”). A surname (John 11:16) of the apostle Thomas.

DIET (Heb. šrūhâ). The daily “allowance” (so NASB and NIV) of food apportioned by Evil-merodach, king of Babylon, to his royal captive Jehoiachin, king of Judah (Jer. 52:34). See also Food.

DIGIT. The digit or finger was a linear measure. See Metrology.

DIGNITIES (Gk. plural of doxa, “glory”). A KJV term for persons higher in honor (2 Pet. 2:10; Jude 8), probably angels as spiritual beings of preeminent dignity. The NASB translates the Gk. term with the expression “angelic majesties” and gives marginal readings of “glories” and “angelic glories.” The NIV renders “celestial beings” in both passages.

DIK'LAH (dik'la). The name of a son of Joktan (Gen. 10:27; 1 Chron. 1:21). His descendants probably settled in Yemen and occupied a portion of it a little to the E of the Hejaz.

DIL'EAN (dil'i-an). A town in the low country of Judah (Josh. 15:38). Probably Tell en Negileh.

DILL. See Vegetable Kingdom.

DIM'NAH (dim'na; “dunghill”). A Levitical city in Zebulun (Josh. 21:35). In 1 Chron. 6:77 Rimmono is substituted for it.

DI'MON, THE WATERS OF (di'mon). A stream on the E of the Dead Sea, in the land of Moab, against which Isaiah utters denunciations (Isa. 15:9). Gesenius conjectures that the two names Dimon and Dibon are the same.

DIMO'NAH (di-mō'na). A city in the S of Judah (Josh. 15:22), perhaps the same as Dibon in Neh. 11:25.

DI'NAH (dī'na; “justice”). The daughter of Jacob by Leah (Gen. 30:21) and full sister of Simeon and Levi. While Jacob dwelt in Shechem, Dinah was seduced by Shechem, the son of Hamor, the prince of the country (chap. 34). She was probably thirteen to fifteen years of age, the ordinary period of marriage in the East. Shechem proposed to make the usual reparation by paying a sum to the father and marrying her (Deut. 22:28–29), but Jacob declined to negotiate until he had made known the facts to his sons and conferred with them. Hamor proposed a fusion of the two peoples by the establishment of intermarriage and commerce. The sons, bent upon revenge, demanded, as a condition of the proposed union, the circumcision of the Shechemites. They assented, and on the third day, when the men were disabled, Simeon and Levi slew them all and took away their sister. Dinah probably continued unmarried and went with her father into Egypt (Gen. 46:15), about 1950 B.C.

DI'NAITE (dī'na-īt). A name given to a part of the colonists placed in Samaria after it was taken by the Assyrians (Ezra 4:9, KJV; the NIV has "judges"). "They remained under the dominion of Persia, and took part with their fellow-colonists in opposition to the Jews under Artaxerxes, but nothing more is known of them" (Smith, Bib. Dict., s.v.). They may have been the Armenian peoples known as Dayani to the Assyrians.

DINE, DINNER. See Eating; Food.

DIN'HABAH (din'haba). A city of Bela, king of Edom (Gen. 36:32; 1 Chron. 1:43). Location uncertain.

DIONY'SIUS THE AREOPAGITE (di-o-nish'i-us the a-rē-o'pa-gīt, Acts 17:19–34). An eminent Athenian converted to Christianity by the preaching of Paul on Mars' Hill. Nothing further is related of him in the NT, but Suidas recounts that he was an Athenian by birth and eminent for his literary attainments, that he studied first at Athens and afterward at Heliopolis, in Egypt. The name of Dionysius has become important in church history from certain writings formerly believed to be his but now known to be spurious and designated as the Pseudo-Dionysian writings.

DIOT'REPHES (dī-ot're-fez; "brought up or nourished by Jove"). A person condemned by the apostle John in his third epistle. Desiring preeminence, he refused to see the letter sent by John, thereby declining to submit to his direction or acknowledge his authority. He circulated malicious slanders against the apostle and exercised an arbitrary and pernicious influence in the church (3 John 9–10).

DISCERNING OF SPIRITS (NASB and NIV, "distinguishing the spirits"). A spiritual gift enjoyed by certain Christians in the apostolic age and enabling them to judge from what spirits the utterances they heard proceeded, whether from the Holy Spirit, human, or demonic spirits, thus preserving the church from misleading influences (1 Cor. 12:10; cf. 1 Cor. 14:29; 1 John 4:1).

DISCHARGE. See Diseases: Issue.

DISCIPLE. This term occurs in the OT as the rendering of Heb. limmūd, one "instructed," Isa. 8:16; 50:4; rendered "taught" in 54:13.

In the NT it is the rendering of the Gk. mathētēs, "learner," and occurs frequently. The meaning applies to one who professes to have learned certain principles from another and maintains them on that other's authority. It is applied principally to the followers of Jesus (Matt. 5:1; 8:21; etc.); sometimes to those of John the Baptist (9:14) and of the Pharisees (22:16). It is used in a special manner to indicate the twelve (10:1; 11:1; 20:17).

DISCIPLINE. From the Gk. paideuō, "to instruct, train, correct." The action of the heavenly Father toward His disobedient child that he should "not be condemned along with the world" (1 Cor. 11:31–32). This correction of the Father of His own offspring (Heb. 12:6) must in no way be connected with condemnation: "There is therefore now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus" (Rom. 8:1); "He who believes in Him is not judged" (John 3:18). A regenerated child of God has the position of a son, stands in the imputed merits of Christ, and cannot come into condemnation. Discipline, therefore, is confined to members of the family, and it may be (1) preventive, as in the case of the apostle Paul, who was given a thorn in the flesh to keep him humble (2 Cor. 12:7–9); (2) corrective, which is the disciplinary moving of the Father against His wayward child for the good of the child; (3) enlarging, the object being to “share His holiness,” to bring forth the “fruit of righteousness” (Heb. 12:11; John 15:2); (4) vindicatory, as in the case of Job who vindicated God against the challenge and accusations of Satan that the patriarch did not really love God apart from his family, his possessions, and himself. There is a difference between disciplining and scourging. The latter represents the divine conquering of the human will that the redeemed life may be completely yielded to God (Rom. 12:1–2; cf. Heb. 12:6). M.F.U.

DISDAIN (Heb. bāzâ, “to tread under foot, to despise”; KJV, “to scorn”). Rendered in Esther 3:6 “[Haman] disdained [NIV, “scorned”] to lay hands on Mordecai alone,” and elsewhere “joke” (Job 12:4), “contempt” (Esther 1:17), “careless” (Prov. 19:16), “despise” (Ps. 73:20; Isa. 53:3; Heb. qālas, “to despise, refuse”; KJV and NIV, “to scorn”), spoken of Jerusalem’s refusing payment for her adulteries, unlike what an ordinary prostitute would do (Ezek. 16:31).

DISEASES. In treating this subject we call attention to the several diseases mentioned in Scripture. Discussion of the treatment of disease is given in a separate article below. Under the latter we introduce medicine, physician, remedies, and so forth.

Ague. See Fever.

Blains. See Boils.

Blemish (Ex. 12:5; 29:1; etc.; Lev. 21:18–21, NASB and NIV, “defect.” The rendering of several Heb. words). Any deformity or spot. Such a disfigurement disqualified its possessor from becoming a priest.

Blindness (Heb. ʿāwwārôn, Deut. 28:28). Eye infections are among the most common of all the diseases of Bible lands. Ophthalmia and other destructive diseases prevail to a frightful extent in Egypt. Among the lower classes it has been the exception to see both eyes perfect. A large proportion of the population has lost one eye, and the number of totally blind is excessive. Although the ravages of eye disease are not so frightful in Palestine and Syria, they are sufficiently so to illustrate the frequent (more than sixty) references to blindness in the Bible. The causes are the heat, sunlight, dust, and, most of all, unclean habits, all of which favor the spread of diseases, which often in a single day destroy the eye.

Blood, Flow of. See Issue.

Boils (Heb. shāhîn, Ex. 9:9–10). These are of several kinds: (1) Simple boils, which may be single or come out in large numbers and successive crops (Job 2:7; NIV, “sores”), causing much suffering and some danger to the patient. They consist of a core, which is a gangrenous bit of skin and subcutaneous tissue, surrounded by an angry, inflamed and suppurating nodule, which finally bursts and lets out the core, after which the seat of the boil heals, leaving a permanent scar. (2) Carbuncles. These are large boils, with a number of openings, leading to a considerable mass of dead cellular tissue and giving exit to the discharge of the same. Such was probably Hezekiah’s boil (2 Kings 20:7; Isa. 38:21). (3) Malignant pustules. These are due to infections from animals having splenic fever. The virus is carried by insects or in wool or hides or otherwise, and produces a black spot where it enters, surrounded by a dark livid purplish or dusky red zone, with vesicles and a hard area of skin infiltrated with anthrax bacilli. If the focus of the disease is not destroyed the blood is rapidly poisoned, and the patient dies. (4) Probably all skin diseases in which there is suppuration in and beneath the skin would have been included in the generic designation of boils.

Broken Hand, Broken Foot (Lev. 21:19). A disqualification for the priesthood. Clubfoot and clubhand would also disqualify.

Bruises (Isa. 1:6; Jer. 30:12; Nah. 3:19, KJV; NASB often renders “crush”; several Heb. words). Familiar accidents, often far more serious than would be supposed from their external marks.

Canker. See Gangrene.

Cankered. A KJV term rendered “rusted” in the NASB.

Cripple, Crippled. See Lamé, Lameness; Maimed.

Crookbacked. See Hunchback.

Discharge (Lev. 15:2). Renders a person unclean. See Issue.

Disfigured Face (Heb. ḥāram, to be “blunt,” Lev. 21:18). A disqualification for the priesthood.

Dropsy (Gk. hudrōpikos, “watery,” Luke 14:2). This is a symptom of a number of diseases, mostly of the heart, liver, kidneys, and brain, causing collections of water in the cavities of the body, or on its surface, or in the limbs. It is curable only if the disease causing it is amenable to treatment.

Dwarf. Dwarfs were not allowed in the priesthood (Lev. 21:20).

Dysentery (Gk. dusentēria, Acts 28:8). This disease is common in the East and often fatal, not merely by its own violence but by the abscess of the liver that it frequently causes. It is supposed to be the disease of the bowels (2 Chron. 21:15, 19) that afflicted Jehoram.

Eczema. See Scab.

Emerods. See Hemorrhoids.

Fever (Heb. qaddaḥat, Lev. 26:16, KJV, “ague”). This doubtless covered all the fevers of the land. They were intermittent, remittent, typhoid, typhus, besides the febrile states accompanying the various inflammations and eruptive diseases such as measles. Malarial fevers were the most characteristic. They prevailed especially in late summer and early autumn. In the former swamps of the Hûleh and the irrigated gardens about the cities malignant types of these fevers attacked those who slept in the area of infection and those who worked in the poisonous atmosphere. Not infrequently patients died in the second or third paroxysm of such fevers. When they did not die from the violence of the poison they often dragged on through weary months of constantly recurring attacks and suffered from congestion or abscess of the liver or spleen and other internal disorders.

Flat Nose. See Disfigured Face.

Flow of Blood. See Issue.

Flux. See Dysentery.

Gangrene (2 Tim. 2:17, KJV, “canker”). Mortification of any part of the body. The reference is probably to the variety known as senile gangrene. This disease begins at the end of a toe or finger as a blackish spot that gradually spreads over the rest of the toe, then to the other toes, the foot, and leg, until at last the patient dies of blood poisoning. Even early and free amputation generally fails to save the life, as the disease is in the constitution and reappears in the stump. This course of the destructive process corresponds well with that of “worldly and empty chatter,” which “leads to further ungodliness.”

Halt, Halteth. See Lame, Lameness.

Hemorrhage. See Issue.

Hemorrhoids (Heb. ophēl, “tumor,” Deut. 28:27; etc.). A painful disease promoted especially by the sedentary habits of the East and thus quite common there. Although amenable to the skills of the West, the popular medicine of the East had no cure for it; it was, therefore, a terrible disease to be visited with (1 Sam. 5:6, 9, 12; 6:4–5, 11).

Hunchback (Heb. gībbēn, “arched,” Lev. 21:20). In the East it is quite common to see young girls carrying children on their shoulders or perched on their hips. Many of these fall and experience irreparable injuries to their spines. Scrofulous disease of the spine is also common and often results in angular curvature. The specimens of deformity of this class that are to be seen in Syria and Palestine are lamentable. Those afflicted with such deformities were not allowed in the Temple service.

Infirmity. A word used in the KJV in three senses: (1) impurity (Lev. 12:2, NASB, “menstruation”); (2) deformity (Luke 13:12); (3) a general term for disability (John 5:5; 1 Tim. 5:23). Besides these senses it is used figuratively for mental and spiritual weaknesses (Rom. 8:26; etc.).

Inflammation or Swelling. A general and well-understood term (Lev. 13:28; Deut. 28:22).

Itch (Heb. heres, Deut. 28:27). It is probable that the word translated “itch” in this passage refers to some other tormenting skin disease, such as eczema or prurigo, whereas that translated “scab,” RV, “scurvy” (Heb. gārāb; Arab. jarab), is the true itch. Jarab is the classical name of this disease and is used for it in common speech to this day (see Scurvy). Itch is a skin disease produced by the entrance of a parasitic insect into the substance of the skin. It causes intolerable itching, and the scratching produces deep furrows and excoriations. If left to itself it is interminable. Although curable by proper medical treatment, this was probably unknown to the Hebrews. See also Scab.

Lame, Lameness. The translation of one Gk. and several Heb. words referring to impairment or loss of power in walking, whether from rigidity, amputation, or deformity. Lameness was a barrier to the priestly office.

In the NASB and NIV “crippled” appears in place of KJV “lame” as the translation of Heb. nākeh, and in place of KJV “maimed” as the translation of Gk. kullos. Heb. pāsach is translated “maimed” in both the KJV and NASB, but “lame” in the NIV.

Gk. chōlos, “limping,” is translated “halt” or “lame” in the KJV and “lame” in the NASB and NIV (Luke 7:22; 14:21; John 5:3).

Leprosy (Heb. šāra:at). The term is of uncertain origin and meaning but is clearly a comprehensive designation of a disease marked by a variety of skin afflictions, only one form of which was malignant. There was also a šāra:at of materials, which may have corresponded to mildew (Lev. 13:47–59), and another of buildings (Lev. 14:34–53), possibly indicating dry rot of timbers or mineral efflorescence of stone walls.

The priests had to be consulted in all cases of suspected šāra:at, and Lev. 13 supplied them with detailed diagnostic directions that contained obscure medical terminology. The affliction could be marked by swellings under the skin, pink spots or reddish areas of skin, or could have arisen on the site of an earlier boil or burn. Although it may have come into being suddenly, most cases would be well developed when the priests examined them, because the fear of ṣāraʿat was so great in antiquity that its victims would go to the priests only as a last resort.

Benign Infections. If the sufferer exhibited a variety of eruptions (mishpaḥat), or patches of whitish skin on the body (vitiligo), or reddish patches covered with white scales occurring on the scalp, back, elbows, or knees (psoriasis), he or she was quarantined for two weeks. If during that time the condition did not deteriorate, the sufferer was released as “clean” even though his or her body might be covered with the eruption.

Malignant Infections. If the priest discovered white hairs on the lesion and evidence that it had penetrated the skin, the person was quarantined for two weeks as a suspected leper. After that time, if the lesion exhibited “raw flesh” (bāśār ḥay) such as skin ulcers or was marked by bright pink patches of skin and was obviously spreading, the sufferer was diagnosed as a leper and prohibited from living in the community as an “unclean” person. If he was healed subsequently, the priest employed cleansing rituals to restore the person to community life (Lev. 14:1–32). See the article Leprosy and the Mosaic Law.

Cause. The cause of leprosy is now known to be a bacillus similar to the one that produces tuberculosis, and modern medicine has classified the disease in terms of two main types, lepromatous and non-lepromatous, with some borderline cases. The lepromatous form is the most severe and is marked initially by lack of pigment and numbness in certain areas of the skin. Nodules (knoblike swellings) occur in various areas of the body and generally ulcerate. Other ulcers form on the feet and affect the bones, and as the disease progresses the hands and feet become distorted and the limbs swollen. Many peripheral nerves are affected, as are internal organs, and the condition of the patient is frequently complicated by gangrene. Tubercular lesions often arise on the face, and the skin of the forehead and cheeks puckers to produce a characteristic lionlike look. In severe cases most of the skin may thicken and become red.

Non-lepromatous Leprosy. Non-lepromatous leprosy is less severe in character. One variety is marked by patches of skin that have lost sensation and color but has few lesions and is usually noninfective. Another has rough-looking lesions that may either be pale or reddish; a third involves some nerves that become thick and sometimes ulcerate when nodules develop.

Ṣāraʿat and Clinical Leprosy. Although some modern doctors have attempted to deny the identification between ṣāraʿat and clinical leprosy (Hansen’s disease), the correspondence of the Levitical narrative with the signs and symptoms of lepromatous leprosy is so striking as to demand careful consideration. Those who repudiate the identification have been unable to suggest an alternative disease that would have so terrified the peoples of antiquity.

Leprosy in Biblical Persons. The leprosy that afflicted Moses (Ex. 4:6) was not of the malignant variety and may have been the same as Miriam’s (Num. 12:9–16), perhaps leucoderma. Naaman’s affliction was also of a nonmalignant kind (2 Kings 5), possibly also leucoderma, in which pale patches of skin develop on the body. Whatever the affliction, it was transmitted subsequently to Gehazi (2 Kings 5:19–27). What was probably a small colony of men with malignant leprosy was mentioned in 2

Kings 7:3–10, and it was probably this same condition that afflicted Uzziah (2 Chron. 26:19–21). There is little doubt that most NT persons described as lepers did in fact have Hansen’s disease (Luke 5:12–15; 17:11–19). By contrast, Simon the leper probably had a nonmalignant ṣāra:at such as vitiligo (Matt. 26:6; Mark 14:3).

Leprosy Today. Just as in biblical times, lepers can be encountered occasionally in public in the Near East today. Despite its abhorrent character, the disease is not contracted easily by persons in normal health.

Lunacy, Lunatick. See Madness.

Madness (Heb. shiggā-ôn, “raving,” Deut. 28:28). Madmen are mentioned twice (1 Sam. 21:15; Prov. 26:18). Insanity is much more rare in the East than in the West, and little or no treatment is used. It is considered of merit to feed and clothe the insane if needy.

Maimed. A general term for severely injured. Although the term appears in the KJV, NIV, and NASB of Lev. 22:22, elsewhere the NASB and NIV render “crippled” in place of “maimed” (Matt. 15:30–31; Luke 14:13, 21). The only instance in the KJV of the term cripple is in Acts 14:8 (“lame,” NASB), although the word appears numerous times in the NASB and NIV.

Murrain (Heb. deber, “pestilence”). A KJV term appearing once in the Bible (Ex. 9:3) in connection with the plagues of Egypt. The Heb. term is rendered “pestilence” in the NASB and “plague” in the NIV. We have no means of knowing what the epidemic was that constituted the fifth plague (Ex. 9:1–6). It may have been splenetic fever, which sometimes prevails extensively.

Palsy. See Paralysis.

Paralysis (Gk. paralutikos, “loosened,” Matt. 4:24; 9:2; etc.). Paralysis comes from several causes: (1) Inflammation of the brain or spinal cord. In the East this is specially common in infancy, and in many cases leads to partial paralysis, as of the shoulder, arm, one or both legs, and sometimes the nerve of speech or hearing, or both. (2) Injuries of the spinal column. These are more apt to occur in adult life. (3) Pressure from curvature of the spine, or from tumors or other cause. (4) Apoplexy. The paralysis from the latter cause is sometimes cured. That from the others is incurable. The cases brought to our Savior were undoubtedly of the incurable sort and probably involved at least the lower limbs.

Pestilence (Heb. deber; Gk. loimos, “plague”). A general term for diseases that attack large numbers of persons at the same time. They are not known to be due to germs. We have no means of knowing what particular pestilences from time to time scourged the Israelites.

Running Sore. See Wen.

Scab (Heb. sappahat, Lev. 13:2, 6–7; 14:56). A similar root appears in the form of a verb (Isa. 3:17), śāpah, to “afflict with a scab.” Both refer to the crust that forms on skin eruptions. The NIV usually renders “rash” or “sore.” Such are common in many skin diseases and do not indicate any particular kind. Many diseases of the scalp produce them and cause the hair to fall out; this is regarded as a special calamity for women (3:17). The term yallepet (Lev. 21:20; 22:22) refers to some crustaceous disease of the skin of animals (NIV, “running sores”). The disease of horses, in which there is a scabby, eczematous state of the pastern, known in English as “scratches,” is called jarab (itch) in Arab.

The Heb. term garab is translated “scab” in the KJV and NASB of Deut. 28:27 (“festering sore” in the NIV) but as “scurvy” (KJV), “eczema” (NASB), or “festering sore” (NIV) in Lev. 21:20; 22:22.

Scale (Lev. 13:30, 35; 14:54). A somewhat general term for eruptions.

Scall. See Scale.

Scurvy (RV, Deut. 28:27, for NASB “scab” and NIV “itch”). We have given our reasons under Itch for preferring the rendering “itch” for the Heb. garab here, instead of for heres, as in KJV, RV, and NIV. We do not see any reason to render it RV “scurvy.” Neither do we believe the rendering of the same word (Lev. 21:20; 22:22), KJV, RV, “scurvy,” any better; “itch” is its proper rendering (cf. the NASB reading of the same text, which renders “eczema” for Heb. garab). This would remove scurvy from the list of diseases mentioned in Scripture.

Sores (Lev. 22:22; Luke 16:20; Rev. 16:11). A general term for ulcers. See also Wen.

Tumors. See Hemorrhoids.

Wen (Heb. yabbelet). A KJV term appearing once in the Bible (Lev. 22:22) and rendered “running sore” in the NASB and “warts” in the NIV. A “wen” was a cyst containing sebaceous and other substances, spoken of only in connection with animals intended for sacrifice (22:22) but also common in men.

Withered (Heb. yābēsh). The Nazirite’s skin is spoken of as withered (Lam. 4:8), i.e., wrinkled and dry (“shriveled” in the NIV). A “withered hand” (Matt. 12:10; cf. 1 Kings 13:4–6) is one in which the muscles, and often the bones themselves, are shrunken owing to loss of nerve power or stiffening of joints. Not infrequently the limb is much shorter, as well as more slender, than natural. When resulting from anything but recent disuse it is incurable.

Worms. The worms that ate Herod (Acts 12:23) may have been maggots bred in some gangrenous sore.

Wounds. Wounds are frequently alluded to. The binding up and pouring in oil and wine (Luke 10:34) was as good an antiseptic treatment as was then known.

DISEASES, TREATMENT OF. The Hebrews were greatly inferior in scientific culture to their powerful neighbors Egypt, Assyria, and Greece. We have no allusion in the OT to scientific schools, and it is improbable that such existed. There were schools for the education of religious teachers, but we have no reason to believe that anything was taught in them except the Heb. language itself and the various branches of canon law and interpretation. While their neighbors were cultivating mathematics, astronomy, history, logic, metaphysics, law, and medicine, and their learned men were committing all that they knew to inscribed bricks, stone, papyrus rolls, and books full of treatises, the ancient Hebrews left us very little in the way of literature or science except the canonical Scriptures and the Apocrypha. Only by the most laborious search can we find in these Scriptures hints as to the scientific belief and practice that the Hebrews may have derived from their residence in Egypt and interaction with their more enlightened and progressive rivals. The Talmud, the function of which was to gather up all that tradition had transmitted and expound it by all that the ingenuity of its astute authors could furnish, does nothing to change our judgment that the Hebrews had little or no notion of the movement of the human mind that was taking place in other lands.

We have no reason to suppose that medicine affords any exception to the general state of the sciences among the Hebrews. It is exceedingly difficult to establish from the Bible the existence of such a science or of a proper order of medical practitioners in the earlier stages of Hebrew history. The allusions to the offices of the midwives (Gen. 35:17; 38:28; Ex. 1:15) give us no reason to suppose that they were an educated class, or had any knowledge of their art greater than is possessed by their successors in Syria at the present day. The simple operation of circumcision was probably performed by heads of families or their dependents (17:10–14; 34:24), or at times women (Ex. 4:25). The law provided that one who injured another should “pay for his loss of time and shall take care of him until he is completely healed” (Ex. 21:19). But this healing does not state or necessarily imply a physician. Physicians embalmed Jacob (Gen. 50:2), but they were Egyptians, not Hebrews. Job mentions physicians (13:4). Even as late as the time of Joram (850 B.C.), although he returned to Jezreel to be healed of wounds and sickness (2 Kings 8:29), no mention is made of doctors. It is uncertain whether Asa’s physicians (2 Chron. 16:12, 915 B.C.) were natives or foreigners. The poetical allusion (Jer. 8:22, 626 B.C.) is in the form of a question, “Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no physician there?” Although it is implied that physicians were then recognized as a guild, that does not make certain that they were more than users of balsams and ointments for wounds. A few passages in Proverbs and one in Ecclesiastes have been quoted to prove that Solomon was versed in medicine (Prov. 3:8; 12:18; 17:22; 20:30; 29:1; Eccles. 3:3); but such an interpretation is quite fanciful. The allusions to diseases and remedies also tend to show that the conceptions of medicine were crude and popular. Of the diseases and deformities mentioned in the Pentateuch and Joshua, we know about boils, blindness, bruises, dwarfs, hemorrhoids, dysentery, infirmity, inflammation, itch, lameness, madness, paralysis, and wounds. Yet the most cursory glance at these terms shows that they are popular, not scientific. Of the treatment of these, except ceremonial and sacerdotal, we have not the faintest hint. The few remedies mentioned are evidently popular ones, such as mandrakes, balm; or ingredients in unguents used for sacred purposes, not for healing, such as calamus, cassia, cinnamon, myrrh, galbanum, onycha, stacte, frankincense; or condiments, such as coriander.

Thus for the period of Hebrew history to the end of the OT the Scripture reveals hardly a trace of medical science or art. This seems remarkable considering the long residence of Israel in Egypt where medicine was well established and cultivated to a high degree of excellence for those days. The Egyptians, owing to the practice of embalming, were well acquainted with human anatomy, as well as with that of the domestic animals. They also had a system of pathology and a considerable materia medica. They cultivated medicine to the point of dividing it into specialties as in modern times. But the Israelites in Egypt were apparently separated, and there is no reason to believe that any of them except Moses carried away any of the learning of Egypt. Although a considerable number of hygienic precepts exist in the Mosaic law, such as circumcision, burying of excrements, etc. (Deut. 23:13), it is a strained interpretation to refer them to the medical knowledge or skill of the lawgiver. There was a tendency in all serious sickness to fall back on religious ritual and ultimately on divine providence (Ex. 15:26; Pss. 103:3; 147:3; Isa. 30:26; Jer. 17:14; 30:17). When Asa “did not seek the Lord, but the physicians” (2 Chron. 16:12), the record speaks reproachfully. It is impossible to tell whether his diseased and swollen feet were dropsical or elephantiasical. The term feet was sometimes used euphemistically of the sexual organs (cf. Ruth 3:4–8), and if this is intended here the reference could be to some form of venereal disease.

In the time of Christ the Jews had become enlightened by contact with Egypt, Babylon, Greece, and Rome. They certainly cultivated philosophy, law, and medicine. In the NT are mentioned dropsy, gangrene, dysentery, paralysis, and epilepsy. Physicians were a regular profession (Matt. 9:12; Mark 2:17; Luke 4:23; 5:31). Luke was the “beloved physician” (Col. 4:14). Physicians were numerous (Mark 5:26; Luke 8:43). They doubtless practiced according to the system then in vogue in the Greek and Roman world. But the vast number of the unrelieved stands out on every page of the gospels and gives to the ministry of Christ its peculiar hold on the people.

The following animal and vegetable substances used in medicine are alluded to under their several headings in the articles Animal Kingdom and Vegetable Kingdom: anise, balm, calamus, cassia, cinnamon, cummin, dill, galbanum, gall, hyssop, leech, mandrake, mint, myrrh, stacte, wine. G.E.P.

DISFIGURED FACE. See Diseases.

DISGUISE. In 2 Cor. 11:13, Paul, characterizing false prophets, says of them that they are “deceitful workers, disguising themselves as apostles of Christ. And no wonder, for even Satan disguises himself as an angel of light” (vv. 14–15). The Gk. is metaschēmatisō and means “to assume the appearance of another.” It is translated “transformed” in the KJV and “masquerades” in the NIV. The persons of whom Paul speaks were servants of Satan, but in working against the apostle in doctrine and act they hypocritically assumed the mask of an apostle, though they were opposite of a true apostle.

DISH. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. terms:

1. Sēpel, “low.” Probably a shallow pan (a “dish” [NASB and NIV, “bowl”] of “curds,” curdled milk, Judg. 5:25; “bowl” of water, 6:38).

2. Ṣēlāhâ, something to “pour” into, probably a platter (2 Kings 21:13, NASB, KJV, NIV, “dish.”)

3. Qāārâ, something “deep,” the gold “dishes” of the Tabernacle (Ex. 25:29; 37:16; Num. 4:7; 7:13).

4. Trublion (Matt. 26:23; Mark 14:20, NASB and NIV, “bowl”), probably the same as no. 3.

In ancient Egypt and Judea each person broke off a small piece of bread, dipped it into the dish, and brought it to the mouth with a small portion of the contents of the dish. To partake of the same dish or bowl was to show special friendliness and intimacy.

DI'SHAN (dī'shan; another form of Dishon, “antelope”). The name of the youngest son of Seir the Horite, father of Uz and Aran, and head of one of the original tribes of Edom (Gen. 36:21, 28, 30; 1 Chron. 1:38, 42).

DI'SHON (dī'shon; “antelope”). The name of two descendants of Seir the Horite.

1. Seir's fifth son, and head of one of the original Edom tribes (Gen. 36:21, 30; 1 Chron. 1:38).

2. Seir's grandson, the only son of Anah, and brother of Oholibamah, Esau's second wife (Gen. 36:25; 1 Chron. 1:41).

DISPENSATIONS (Gk. oikonomia, “management of a household,” hence English “economy”).

A dispensation is an era of time during which man is tested in respect to obedience to some definite revelation of God’s will. Seven such dispensations are recognized by many premillennialists. Other premillennialists speak of only three or four. Still others prefer not to be classed as dispensationalists at all. Those who hold to seven list them as follows:

Innocence. Man was created innocent, set in an ideal environment, placed under a simple test and warned of the result of disobedience. The woman fell through pride; the man, deliberately (1 Tim. 2:14). Although God restored the sinning creatures, the dispensation came to an end at the judgment of the expulsion (Gen. 3:24).

Conscience. By an act of disobedience man came to an experiential knowledge of good and evil. Driven out of Eden and placed under the Adamic covenant, man was accountable to do all known good and to abstain from all known evil and to come before God by sacrifice. The result of this testing was complete degeneration ending in the judgment of the Flood (Gen. 6–9).

Human Government. The declaration of the Noahic covenant after the Flood (Gen. 8:20–9:27) put man under a new test, featured by the inauguration of human government, the highest function of which was the judicial taking of life. Man is responsible to govern the world for God. That responsibility rests upon the whole race, Jew and Gentile. With the failure of Israel under the Palestinian covenant (Deut. 28:64) and the consequent judgment of the captivities, “the times of the Gentiles” began (Luke 21:24). The world is still Gentile-governed, and hence this dispensation overlaps other dispensations and will not strictly come to an end until the second coming of Christ.

Promise. This era went from the call of Abraham (Gen. 12:1) to the giving of the Mosaic law (Ex. 19:8). The dispensation was under the Abrahamic covenant and was exclusively Israelite.

Law. This era reaches from Sinai to Calvary. The period was a time of teaching used to bring Israel to Christ and was governed by the Mosaic covenant (Ex. 20:1–31:18).

Grace. This period began with the death and resurrection of Christ (Rom. 3:24–26; 4:24–25). The point of testing is no longer legal obedience to the law as a condition of salvation but acceptance or rejection of Christ with good works as the fruit of salvation (John 1:12–13; 3:36; 1 John 5:10–12). The predicted end of the testing of man under grace is the apostasy of the professing church (2 Tim. 3:1–8) and the subsequent apocalyptic judgments.

The Kingdom. This is the last of the ordered ages regulating human life on the earth, previous to the eternal state. It involves the establishment of the kingdom covenanted to David (2 Sam. 7:8–17; Zech. 12:8; Luke 1:31–33). This will include Israel’s restoration and conversion (Rom. 11:25–27) and her rehabilitation as a high-priestly nation in fellowship with God and as head over the millennial nations (Zech. 3:1–10; 6:9–15).

DISPERSION OF ISRAEL (Gk. diaspora; John 7:35; rendered “dispersed,” James 1:1; “scattered,” 1 Pet. 1:1). Jewish communities settled in almost all the countries of the civilized world, remaining on the one hand in constant communication with the mother country and, on the other, in active interaction with the non-Jewish world.

Causes. These were of different kinds: the deportation by the Assyrian and Babylonian conquerors of large masses of the nation into their eastern provinces; the carrying of hundreds of Jewish captives to Rome by Pompey. Of greater importance, however, were the voluntary emigrations of Jewish settlers during the Greco-Roman period to the countries bordering on Palestine, and to all the chief towns of the civilized world, for the sake chiefly of trade. The Diadochoi (successors of Alexander the Great), in order to build up their many kingdoms, offered citizenship and many other privileges to immigrants. Attracted by these circumstances and perhaps influenced by adverse events at home, large numbers of Jews were induced to settle in Syria, Egypt, and Asia Minor, as well as in all the more important ports and commercial cities of the Mediterranean Sea.

Extent. We have strong and varied evidence that the dispersion became quite widespread. The Roman Senate dispatched a circular (139–138 B.C.) in favor of the Jews to the kings of Egypt, Syria, Pergamos, Cappadocia, and Parthia, and to a great number of provinces, towns, and islands of the Mediterranean Sea (1 Macc. 15:16–24). It may therefore be safely inferred that there was already a number of Jews in all these lands. See also the list of countries from which Jews had come to Jerusalem (Acts 2:9–11).

In Mesopotamia, Media, and Babylonia lived the descendants of the members of the ten tribes and of the kingdom of Judah carried there by the Assyrians and Chaldeans. The “ten tribes” never returned at all from captivity, neither must the return of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin be conceived of as complete. These eastern Jewish settlements may also have been increased by voluntary additions, and the Jews in the provinces were “an immense multitude” (Josephus Ant. 11.5.2).

Josephus names Syria as the country in which was the largest percentage of Jewish inhabitants, and its capital, Antioch, was specially distinguished in this respect. In Damascus, according to Josephus, ten thousand (or according to another passage, eighteen thousand) Jews were said to have been assassinated during the war. Agrippa is the authority for the statement that Jews had settled in Bithynia and in the uttermost corners of Pontus, which is confirmed by Jewish inscriptions in the Gk. language found in the Crimea. The entire history of the apostle Paul shows how widely the Jews had settled all over Asia Minor.

Most important with regard to the history of civilization was the Jewish colony in Egypt, especially in Alexandria. Long before the time of Alexander the Great, Jewish immigrants were found there. In the time of Jeremiah many Jews went to Egypt out of fear of the Chaldeans (Jer. 41:17–18), in opposition to the warning of the prophet (chaps. 42–43), and settled in various parts of the country (44:1). Nebuchadnezzar appears, during his invasion of Egypt, to have carried to Babylon a considerable number of Jews from Alexandria.

The Jewish dispersion penetrated westward from Egypt and was numerous represented in Cyrenaica. That it reached Greece is evident from the fact that Paul found synagogues in Thessalonica, Berea, Athens, and Corinth (Acts 17:1, 10, 17; 18:4, 7). Jews were also found in almost all the islands of the Grecian Archipelago and the Mediterranean Sea, in some of these in large numbers.

In Rome there was a Jewish community numbering thousands, first appearing in that city during the time of the Maccabees. Judas Maccabeus sent an embassy to obtain assurances of its friendship and assistance (1 Macc. 8:17–32); another was sent by Jonathan (12:1–4), and a third by Simon (140–139 B.C.), which effected an actual offensive and defensive alliance with the Romans (14:24; 15:15–24).

But the settlement of Jews at Rome dates only from the time of Pompey, who after his conquest of Jerusalem (63 B.C.) took numerous Jewish prisoners of war with him to Rome. Sold as slaves, many of them were afterward given their liberty and, granted Roman citizenship, formed a colony beyond the Tiber. They were expelled from Rome under Tiberius and again by Claudius. But the Jews soon returned and, although looked down upon by the Romans, increased in wealth and numbers.

Jewish Communities in the Dispersion. Of course there was only one way in which the scattered Israelites could maintain their native religion and usages—by organizing themselves into independent communities. That as a rule they were in the habit of doing, the nature of the organization varying according to time and place. Information respecting this feature of the Dispersion in the East, Asia Minor, and Syria is meager. In Alexandria and Cyrene they formed an independent municipal community within or coordinate with the rest of the city. An important light is thrown upon the constitution of communities of the Dispersion by a Jewish inscription found in Berenice, in Cyrenaica (probably 13 B.C.), from which we find that the Jews of Berenice formed a distinct community, with nine archons at its head. With regard to the constitution of the Jewish communities of Rome and of Italy, generally we are most thoroughly informed through the large number of Jewish epitaphs found in the cemeteries of Rome and Venosa. From these inscriptions we gather that the Jews living in Rome were divided into a large number of separate and independently organized communities, each having its own synagogue, gerousia (assembly of elders), and public officials. Two important privileges were allowed them: the right of administering their own funds and jurisdiction over their own members. Rome also granted them exemption from military service. In the older cities of Asia Minor, Syria, and Phoenicia there were instances in which individual Jews had the rights of citizenship conferred upon them, e.g., Paul (Acts 21:39). But as a rule the Jewish communities are to be considered as private associations of settlers. These had the right to claim the protection of the laws and enjoy the comforts and amenities of life.

Religious Life. Constant contact could not fail to have its effect upon the Jews in their development. The cultured Jews were not only Jews, but Greeks also, in respect to language, education, and habits; yet they were Jews and felt themselves in all essentials to be in unison with their brethren in Palestine. One of the principal means employed for preserving and upholding the faith of their fathers was the synagogue (which see).

There was also a temple at Leontopolis, with a regular Jewish temple service (160 B.C.-A.D. 73). See Temple. Collections were regularly received in every town and at particular seasons were forwarded to Jerusalem. The language employed in the religious services appears to have been usually Gk.

DISPERSION OF MANKIND. This dispersion was the result of the confusion of tongues at Babel (Gen. 11:6–9). In 10:5, 20, 31, we are told that the posterity of Noah were divided in their lands, all of them according to their own language, family, and nation, so that their distribution was undoubtedly conducted under the ordinary laws of colonization. The tenth chapter of Genesis presents an account of the principal descendants of Noah, followed by the description of that event that led to the division of the race into many nations with different languages. Table 7, “Tribes Descended from Noah's Sons" (p. 313), shows the principal tribes that have been identified. For archaeological illumination of the Table of Nations (chap. 10) see Merrill F. Unger, Archaeology and the Old Testament (1954), pp. 73–104.

EAGLE. See Animal Kingdom.

Figurative. Of great and powerful kings (Ezek. 17:3; Hos. 8:1); of the renovating and quickening influences of the Spirit in the godly, referring to the eagle's increase of vigor after moulting (Ps. 103:5; Isa. 40:31); of God's strong and loving care of His people (Ex. 19:4; Deut. 32:11); the melting away of riches is symbolized by the swiftness of the eagle's flight (Prov. 23:5), also the rapidity of the movement of armies (Deut. 28:49; Jer. 4:13; 48:40) and the swiftness of man's days (Job 9:26); the height and security of its dwelling symbolizes the fancied but fatal security of the wicked (Jer. 49:16; Obad. 4). "Extend your baldness like the eagle" (Mic. 1:16) is "a reference to the bearded vulture, or more probably the carrion vulture, which has the front of the head completely bald and only a few hairs at the back of the head. The words cannot possibly be understood as referring to the yearly moulting of the eagle itself" (K. & D., Com., ad loc.).

EAGLE OWL. See Animal Kingdom: Owl.

EAR. The organ of hearing. We learn from Scripture that blood was put upon the right ear of the priests at their consecration (Ex. 29:20; Lev. 8:23) and of the healed leper in his cleansing (14:14). They were often adorned with rings (see Earring), and servants who refused to leave their masters had to stand against a door as an awl was bored through the ear as a mark of perpetual servitude (Ex. 21:6; Deut. 15:17).

Figurative. "Uncover my ear" (1 Sam. 20:2, marg.) is to reveal; to have the "ears dull" (Isa. 6:10) or "closed" (Jer. 6:10, marg., "uncircumcised") is to be inattentive and disobedient; the regard of Jehovah to the prayer of His people is expressed thus: "His ears are open to their cry" (Ps. 34:15).

EARRING.

Egyptian. The earrings usually worn by Egyptian women were large, round, single hoops of gold, from 1½ to 2 1/3 inches in diameter, and frequently of a still greater size or made of six rings soldered together. Sometimes a snake, whose body was of gold set with precious stones, was worn by persons of rank as a fashionable caprice, but it is probable that this emblem of majesty was usually confined to members of the royal family. Earrings of other forms have been found at Thebes, but their date is uncertain, and it is difficult to say if they are of an ancient Egyptian age or of Greek introduction. Of these the most remarkable were a dragon and another elegant, fancy shape. A few were of silver, and plain hoops, like those made of gold already noted, but less massive, being of the thickness of an ordinary ring. At one end was a small opening, into which the curved extremity of the other caught after it had been passed through the ear. Others were in the form of simple studs. The ancient Assyrians, both men and women, wore earrings of exquisite shape and finish; those on the later monuments are generally in the form of a cross.

Hebrew. Rings and amulets were worn.

K. & Johann Karl Friedrich Keil and Franz Julius Delitzsch, Old Testament Commentaries (1875)

Com. Commentary

marg. margin, marginal reading

Ring (Heb. nezem). Used both as a nosering and an earring, and differing little if any in form. It certainly means an earring in Gen. 35:4 but a nose jewel in 24:47; Prov. 11:22; Isa. 3:21; its meaning is doubtful in Judg. 8:24–25 (though the NIV has “earring”); Job 41:22.

Amulet (Heb. lahash, “whispering”). This word, rendered in the KJV “earrings” (Isa. 3:20), is “amulets” in the NASB and “charms” in the NIV. These latter more correctly represent the Heb. word (meaning “incantations”). Amulets were gems or metal charms with an inscription upon them, worn for protection as well as ornament. On this account they were surrendered along with the idols by Jacob’s household (Gen. 35:4). Chardin describes earrings, with talismanic figures and characters on them, as still existing in the East. Jewels were sometimes attached to the rings. The size of the earrings still worn in Eastern countries far exceeds what is usual in the West; hence they formed a handsome present (Job 42:11) or offering to the service of God (Num. 31:50). Earrings were worn by both sexes (Ex. 32:2).
See also Dress.

EARTH. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words. (See Mineral Kingdom.)

Soil (Heb. ādāmā), or ground, as in Gen. 9:20, where the word used for farming is literally “man of the ground.” The earth supplied the elementary substance of which man’s body was formed (2:7). According to the law, earth or rough stones were the material out of which altars were to be raised (Ex. 20:24); thought by some to symbolize the elevation of man to God. Others think it teaches that the earth, which has been involved in the curse of sin, is to be renewed and glorified by the gracious hand of God. Naaman’s request for “two mules’ load of earth” (2 Kings 5:17) was based on the belief that Jehovah, like heathen deities, was a local god and could be worshiped acceptably only on His own soil.

Land (Heb. ēreṣ). K. & D. (Com., on Gen. 2:5) thus distinguish between “field” (Heb. sādeh) and “earth.” “Sādeh is not the widespread plain of the earth, the broad expanse of land, but a field of arable land, which forms only a part of the earth or ground.” The term is applied in a more or less extended sense: (1) to the whole world (Gen. 1:1); (2) to land as opposed to sea (1:10); (3) to a country (21:32); (4) to a plot of ground (23:15); (5) to the ground on which a man stands (33:3); (6) to the inhabitants of the earth (6:11; 11:1); (7) to heathen countries, as distinguished from Israel, especially during the theocracy (2 Kings 18:25; 2 Chron. 13:9; etc.); (8) in a spiritual sense it is employed in contrast with heaven, to denote things carnal (John 3:31; Col. 3:2, 5).

EARTHEN VESSEL or Earthenware. See Pot, Potter.

EARTHQUAKE (Heb. ra'ash, “vibration”; Gk. seismos). A tremulous motion or shaking of the earth caused by the violent action of subterranean heat and vapors. There can be no doubt that Palestine has been subject both to volcanic agency and to occasional earthquakes. The recorded instances, however, are few; the most remarkable occurred in the reign of Uzziah (Amos 1:1), which Josephus connected with the sacrilege and consequent punishment of that monarch (cf. 2 Chron. 26:16–23). Of the extent of that earthquake, of the precise localities affected by it, or of the desolations it may have produced—of anything, in short, but the general alarm and consternation occasioned by it—we know absolutely nothing. Earthquakes are mentioned in connection with the crucifixion (Matt. 27:51–54), the resurrection (28:2), and the imprisonment of Paul and Silas (Acts 16:26). These, like those recorded in connection with the death of Korah (Num. 16:32) and Elijah's visit to Mt. Horeb (1 Kings 19:11), would seem to have been miraculous rather than natural phenomena. Josephus (Ant. 14.52) gives an account of an earthquake that devastated Judea (31 B.C.). The second advent of Christ will be preceded and attended by gigantic earthquakes (Rev. 16:18–19; Zech. 14:4–5).

Figurative. Earthquakes are symbolic of the judgments of God (Isa. 24:20; 29:6; Jer. 4:24; Rev. 8:5) and of the overthrow of nations (Hag. 2:6, 22; Rev. 6:12–13; 16:18–19).

EAST. The direction toward the rising of the sun, denoted by the Heb. word mizrāḥ, “rising” (Josh. 11:3; Ps. 103:12; Zech. 8:7), used when the E is distinguished from the W or from some other quarter of the compass (Dan. 8:9; 11:44). Since the Hebrews faced the rising of the sun in telling direction, the E was “the front” (Heb. qedem, “what is the front”; Gen. 13:14; 28:14; Ezek. 47:18). This Heb. word is also used in a geographical sense to describe a spot or country immediately before another in an easterly direction (Gen. 2:8; 3:24; 13:11). In Matt. 2:2, 9 the Gk. expression for E means “rising,” anatolē, “for we saw His star in the east,” that is, in its rising.

EAST, SONS OF THE. Hebrew idiom for “Easterners” applied to peoples living E of Palestine (Judg. 6:3, 33; 7:12; 8:10; 1 Kings 4:30; etc.).

EAST GATE. See Potsherd Gate.

EAST WIND (Heb. qādīm, “east”). See Winds.

EASTER (Gk. pascha, from Heb. pesaḥ). The Passover (which see), and so translated in every passage except in the KJV: “intending after Easter to bring him forth to the people” (Acts 12:4). In the earlier English versions Easter had been frequently used as the translation of pascha. At the last revision Passover was substituted in all passages but this. See Passover.

The word Easter is of Saxon origin, Eastra, the goddess of spring, in whose honor sacrifices were offered about Passover time each year. By the eighth century Anglo-Saxons had adopted the name to designate the celebration of Christ's resurrection.

EASTERN SEA. The Dead Sea was called the East (KJV) or Eastern Sea (Joel 2:20; Ezek. 47:18), whereas the Mediterranean Sea was called the West (KJV) or Great Sea (Num. 34:6). See Dead Sea.

EATING. See Food; Hospitality.

Figurative. “To eat” is spoken metaphorically of meditating upon and assimilating the Word of God (Jer. 15:16; Ezek. 3:1–3; Rev. 10:9–10) and familiar intercourse (Luke 13:26; cf. Titus 1:16). To eat the “spoil of your enemies” (Deut. 20:14, marg.) is to make use of it for one's own maintenance. Eating and drinking signifies enjoying one's self (Eccles. 5:18) or to live in the ordinary way as distinguished from asceticism (Matt. 11:18; cf. Acts 10:41).

E'BAL (ē'bal; to be “bare,” a “stone”).

1. A variant reading (1 Chron. 1:22) for Obal (which see).
2. One of the sons of Shobal, son of Seir the Horite, of Edom (Gen. 36:23; 1 Chron. 1:40).
3. A mountain opposite Gerizim (Deut. 11:29; Josh. 8:30, 33). In Deut. 27:4 the Samaritan Pentateuch has Gerizim instead of Ebal. The modern name is Jebel Eslamiyeh (2,950 feet) N of Shechem (see L. H. Grollenberg, Atlas of the Bible [1956], p. 148). From Ebal the law of Moses was recorded and read by Joshua with the blessings and the cursings

(Josh. 8:30–35), the blessing set upon Mt. Gerizim and the curse upon Mt. Ebal (Deut. 11:29), which is known as the Mount of Cursing. M.F.U.

EʿBED (eʿbed; “servant”).

1. The father of Gaal (which see), who headed the insurrection at Shechem against Abimelech (Judg. 9:26–35), about 1100 B.C.

2. Son of Jonathan and head of the descendants of Adin, who returned (to the number of fifty males) from the captivity (Ezra 8:6), about 457 B.C.

EʿBED-MEʿLECH (eʿbed-meʿlek; “servant of a king”). Probably an official title equal to king’s slave, i.e., minister; an Ethiopian at the court of Zedekiah, king of Judah, who was instrumental in saving the prophet Jeremiah from the dungeon and famine (Jer. 38:7–13). For the kindness he was promised deliverance when the city should fall into the enemy’s hands (39:15–18), 589 B.C. He is designated a eunuch, and he probably had charge of the king’s harem, an office that would give him free private access to the king.

EBʿEN-EʿZER (ebʿen-ēʿzer; “stone of the help”). A stone set up by Samuel after a defeat of the Philistines as a memorial of the “help” received on the occasion from Jehovah (1 Sam. 7:12). Its position is carefully defined as between Mizpah and Shen. The site is currently identified with Izbet Sartah, about two miles E of Aphék (which see). Moshe Kochavi of Tel Aviv University directed a dig there for four seasons in the years 1976 to 1978. He found three occupational layers covering the period c. 1200–1000 B.C. From the lowest level came an ostrakon bearing the earliest proto-Canaanite alphabet that has yet come to light. Level II evidently was abandoned c. 1050, about the time of the battle that resulted in the Israelite loss of the Ark of the Covenant. About 1000 B.C. the site was reoccupied briefly and then abandoned to the present. H.F.V.

EʿBER (ēʿber).

1. The son of Shelah and father of Peleg, being the third postdiluvian patriarch after Shem (Gen. 10:24; 11:14; 1 Chron. 1:18, 25). He is claimed as founder of the Hebrew race (Gen. 10:21; Num. 24:24). In Luke 3:35 his name is anglicized Heber.

2. The last named of the seven chiefs of the Gadites in Bashan (1 Chron. 5:13; “Heber,” KJV).

3. The oldest of the three sons of Elpaal the Benjamite; and one of those who rebuilt Ono and Lod and their towns (1 Chron. 8:12), 535 B.C.

4. A Benjamite and son of Shashak (1 Chron. 8:22; “Heber,” KJV), before 598 B.C.

5. The head of the priestly family of Amok in the time of the return from the Exile under Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:20), 535 B.C.

EʿBEZ (ēʿbez). A city allotted to the tribe of Issachar following the conquest of Canaan under Joshua. E.H.M.

EBIʿASAPH (e-biʿa-saf; “gatherer”). The son of Elkanah and father of Assir, in the genealogy of the Kohathite Levites (1 Chron. 6:23). In v. 37 he is called a son of Korah. From a comparison of that circumstance with Ex. 6:24 most interpreters have identified him with Abiasaph (which see) of the latter passage; but (unless we understand not three sons of Korah to be meant but only three in regular descent) the pedigrees of the two cannot be made to tally. From 1 Chron. 9:19 it appears he had a son named Kore. In 26:1 his name is abbreviated to Asaph.

EBLA (eb'la; Tell Mardikh). This city, unmentioned in Scripture but known from ancient cuneiform texts, was located about thirty miles S of Aleppo in Syria. Italian archaeologists under Paolo Matthiae of the Italian Archaeological Mission to Syria began excavating the 140-acre mound in 1964, but the site was only identified by its ancient name in 1968, when a broken inscribed statue was discovered. In 1974 a collection of forty-two large clay tablets dating to about 2300 B.C. was uncovered, and in the following year a large hoard of fifteen thousand tablets came to light. They were written in Eblaite, an early NW Semitic dialect close to the Heb. and Canaanite, but including many Sumerian loanwords. The language is sophisticated and obscure, making decipherment extremely difficult and uncertain.

Excavations showed that the ancient city could be entered through four gates set in the reinforced walls. The upper or acropolis area included the royal residences and administrative buildings, whereas the lower part of the mound was subdivided into four sections that included the homes of the workers. From the tablets, insofar as they have been deciphered correctly, Ebla appears to have been a prominent commercial center in the ancient Near East, reaching its greatest degree of influence between 2400 and 2000 B.C. (level IIB). The Eblaites traded with surrounding nations in timber, textiles, grain, metals, and marble. When Eblaite influence was at its height the city-state may well have threatened commercial interests as far away as Mesopotamia and Egypt.

The city evidently began as a prehistoric settlement about 3500 B.C. (levels I-IIA), and at its most prosperous point boasted a population of about 260,000. After its destruction about 2000 B.C. by Naram-Sin, the city was rebuilt but on a smaller scale. The rise of the Amarna Age (fifteenth and fourteenth centuries B.C.), when Egypt dominated the Near East, brought a decline in Ebla's commercial importance, and the site ultimately became a burial ground in Roman times.

Names similar to those of some OT personages have allegedly been recognized in the Ebla tablets, including Abraham, Saul, Israel, and David. One of the cosmological texts recorded some elements of creation in the same order as that found in Genesis, while another referred to a devastating flood sent by the gods. One of the chief Eblaite deities was Dagan, who was represented in the tablets as having male hands but a fish's body. Chemosh and Ishtar are mentioned in the tablets, and reference to them is also made in OT narratives.

Early reports from Tell Mardikh suggested that the Ebla materials would have great importance for the early history of the Hebrews. But the difficulties encountered in translating the language have led to considerable uncertainty about the names of persons and places; and until these matters are resolved, it is difficult to obtain a satisfactory correlation. What is evident, however, is that a flourishing culture was able to communicate in a highly sophisticated written form some 2,500 years before Christ was born. There is thus no reason for questioning the authenticity of written communications in a comparable period of OT history. But much more investigation and study will need to be undertaken before assured comparisons between Ebla and OT personages can be made. R.K.H.

ECCLESIASTES, BOOK OF (e-klē'zi-as'tēz). The superscription in 1:1 designates the book as "the words of the Preacher, the son of David, king in Jerusalem." "The Preacher," Heb. qōheleth, apparently describes one who holds or addresses an assembly, Heb. qāhal. This is the meaning evident in the Gk. ekklēsiastēs, the Vulg. concionator, and the English "preacher." Ecclesiastes was a roll that was read at the feast of Booths. The theme of the book is the vanity of mere earthly things contrasted to the knowledge and service of God.

Contents.

- I. The subject discussed: vanity of everything (1:1–3)
- II. The subject proved (1:4–3:22)
 - A. By the transitoriness of things (1:4–11)
 - B. By the existence of evil (1:12–18)
 - C. By the emptiness of pleasure, riches, and work (2:1–26)
 - D. By the certainty of death (3:1–22)
- III. The subject developed (4:1–12:8)
 - A. In consideration of injustices (4:1–16)
 - B. In consideration of riches (5:1–20)
 - C. In consideration of man's end (6:1–12)
 - D. In consideration of man's sinfulness (7:1–29)
 - E. In consideration of inscrutable divine providence (8:1–9:18)
 - F. In consideration of disorders (10:1–20)
 - G. In consideration of the vanity of youth and age (11:1–12:8)
- IV. The conclusion: revere God and observe His commandments (12:9–14)

Authorship. Luther denied the Solomonic authorship, and it is at present common to attribute the book to a much later writer or writers. Few today, even among conservative scholars, defend the Solomonic authorship. However, certain evidences point to the fact that Solomon wrote the book (cf. 1:1). Definite texts in the book refer to Solomon's wisdom (1:16), his pleasures (2:3), his building exploits (2:4–6), his servants (2:7), and his wealth (2:8). If Solomon is not the writer, one must be prepared to defend the position that the author impersonates Solomon, as in the apocryphal Book of Wisdom (cf. Wisd. of Sol. 6–9). Solomonic authorship, it may be said, need not be abandoned as incapable of scholarly defense despite critical unanimity. Roman Catholic scholars Gietmann, Vigouroux, and Cornely-Hagen, as well as some Protestant scholars, have defended the Solomonic authorship.

Unity. Numerous critics such as Winckler, Haupt, Kautzch, and Barton deny unity of authorship and regard the book as composed of many later annotations to the original skeptical treatise in order to give the book an orthodox tone, but the language, style, and theme of the entire book are against this view. Ernst Sellin and Otto Eissfeldt correctly defend the unity of the book, as do many church Fathers such as Jerome and Gregory the Great, and medieval scholastics such as Thomas Aquinas.

ECLIPSE OF THE SUN. No historical notice of an eclipse occurs in the Bible, but there are passages in the prophets that contain manifest allusions to this phenomenon (Joel 2:10, 31;

3:15; Amos 8:9; Mic. 3:6; Zech. 14:6). Some of these notices probably refer to eclipses that occurred about the time of the respective compositions; thus the date of Amos coincides with a total eclipse, which occurred February 9, 784 B.C., and was visible at Jerusalem shortly after noon; that of Micah with the eclipse of June 5, 716 B.C. A passing notice in Jer. 15:9 coincides in date with the eclipse of September 30, 610 B.C., so well known from Herodotus's account (1.74.103). The darkness that overspread the world at the crucifixion cannot with reason be attributed to an eclipse, as the moon was full at the time of the Passover.

ED (Heb. ēd, a “witness”). A word inserted in the KJV of Josh. 22:34, apparently on the authority of a few manuscripts and also of the Syr. and Arab. versions, but not existing in the generally received Heb. text. In the NASB and NIV the word used is “witness.”

EDAR. See Eder.

E'DEN (ē'den; “delight,” “pleasantness”).

1. Garden of. Biblical notices locate the spot where the temptation and the Fall occurred somewhere in the Tigris-Euphrates valley, evidently in the easternmost third of the Fertile Crescent. “Now a river flowed out of Eden to water the garden; and from there it divided and became four rivers. The name of the first is Pishon.... And the name of the second river is Gihon.... And the name of the third river is Tigris.... And the fourth river is the Euphrates” (Gen. 2:10–14). Pishon and Gihon are presumably canals, called rivers in Babylonia, which connected the Tigris and Euphrates as ancient riverbeds. The KJV Hiddekel (Babylonian Idigla, Diglat) is the ancient name of the Tigris. Friedrich Delitzsch located the site of Eden just N of Babylon where the Euphrates and Tigris closely approach each other. A. H. Sayce and others located it near Eridu, anciently on the Persian Gulf, but such identifications are now impossible. Both the Tigris and the Euphrates have shifted their riverbeds in the course of millennia and enormous deposits of silt have drastically changed the entire configuration of lower Babylonia. The important thing is that the book of Genesis locates the beginning of human life in the very region that scientific archaeology has demonstrated to be the cradle of civilization.

2. One of the markets that supplied Tyre with richly embroidered goods (Isa. 37:12; Ezek. 27:23). This city is the “Bit Adini” of the Assyrian monuments, a small kingdom situated on both sides of the Euphrates N of the Balikh River.

3. Son of Joah, and one of the Gershonite Levites who assisted in the reformation of public worship under Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:12), after c. 719 B.C. He is possibly the same Levite appointed by Hezekiah as one of those who were to superintend the distribution of the freewill offerings (31:15).

E'DER (ē'der; “a flock,” “helper”).

1. A city of southern Judah, on the Edomite border (Josh. 15:21), perhaps also the place where Jacob first halted after the burial of Rachel.

2. A chief Benjamite, son of Beriah, resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:15).

3. The second of the three “sons” (descendants) of Mushi appointed to Levitical offices in the time of David (1 Chron. 23:23; 24:30), after 1000 B.C.

EDIFICATION (Gk. oikodomē, “building”). Means building up. A building is therefore called an edifice. Accordingly, the work of confirming believers in the faith of the gospel and adding to their knowledge and grace is appropriately expressed by this term. Christians are said in the NT to be edified by understanding spiritual truth (1 Cor. 14:3–5), by the work of apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers (Eph. 4:11–12, “building up”), and by good speech (4:29).

The means to be used for one’s upbuilding are the study and hearing of God’s Word, prayer, use of the sacraments, meditation, self-examination, and Christian work of every kind. It is our duty to edify or “build up one another” (1 Thess. 5:11) by the exhibition of every grace of life and conversation.

The term is also applied to believers as “living stones” builded up into a habitation for the Lord, constituting the great spiritual temple of God (Eph. 2:20–22; 1 Pet. 2:5).

E'DOM (ē'dom; “red”).

1. The name given to Esau (which see) after he bartered his birthright for a mess of red stew (Gen. 25:30).

2. The name of the country settled by the descendants of Edom. See Edomites.

E'DOMITES (ē'do-mīts). The descendants of Esau, who settled in the S of Palestine and at a later period came into conflict with the Israelites (Deut. 23:7); frequently called merely Edom (Num. 20:14–21; 24:18; Josh. 15:1; 2 Sam. 8:14; etc.).

Country. Edom (“Idumaea,” KJV) was situated at the SE border of Palestine (Judg. 11:17; Num. 34:3) and was properly called the land or mountain of Seir (Gen. 36:8; 32:3; Josh. 24:4; Ezek. 35:3, 7, 15). The country lay along the route pursued by the Israelites from Sinai to Kadesh-barnea and thence back again to Elath (Deut. 1:2; 2:1–8), i.e., along the E side of the great valley of Arabah. On the N of Edom lay the territory of Moab, the boundary appearing to have been the “brook Zered” (2:13–14, 18).

The physical geography of Edom is somewhat peculiar. Along the western base of the mountain range are low calcareous hills. These are succeeded by lofty masses of igneous rock, chiefly porphyry, over which lies red and variegated sandstone in irregular ridges and abrupt cliffs with deep ravines between. The latter strata give the mountains their most striking features and remarkable colors. The average elevation of the summit is about two thousand feet above the sea. Along the eastern side runs an almost unbroken limestone ridge, a thousand feet or more higher than the other. This ridge sinks down with an easy slope into the plateau of the Arabian Desert. Although Edom is thus wild, rugged, and almost inaccessible, the deep glens and flat terraces along the mountainsides are covered with rich soil, from which trees, shrubs, and flowers now spring up luxuriantly.

People. The Edomites were descendants of Esau, or Edom, who expelled the original inhabitants, the Horites (Deut. 2:12). A statement made in Gen. 36:31 serves to fix the period of the dynasty of the eight kings. They “reigned in the land of Edom before any king reigned over the sons of Israel”; i.e., before the time of Moses, who may be regarded as the first virtual king of Israel (cf. Deut. 33:4–5; Ex. 18:16–19). It would also appear that these kings were elected. The chiefs (“dukes,” KJV) of the Edomites are named in Gen. 36:40–43 and were probably petty chiefs or sheikhs of their several clans.

History. Esau’s bitter hatred toward his brother, Jacob, for fraudulently obtaining his blessing appears to have been inherited by his posterity. The Edomites peremptorily refused to permit the Israelites to pass through their land (Num. 20:18–21). For a period of 400 years we hear no more of the Edomites. They were then attacked and defeated by Saul (1 Sam. 14:47). Some forty years later David overthrew their army in the “Valley of Salt,” and his general, Joab, following up the victory, destroyed nearly the whole male population (1 Kings 11:15–16) and placed Jewish garrisons in all the strongholds of Edom (2 Sam. 8:13–14).

Hadad, a member of the royal family of Edom, made his escape with a few followers to Egypt, where he was kindly received by Pharaoh. After the death of David he returned and tried to excite his countrymen to rebellion against Israel, but failing in the attempt he went on to Syria, where he became one of Solomon's greatest enemies (1 Kings 11:14–22). In the reign of Jehoshaphat (875 B.C.) the Edomites attempted to invade Israel in conjunction with Ammon and Moab but were miraculously destroyed in the valley of Beracah (2 Chron. 20:22, 26). A few years later they revolted against Jehoram, elected a king, and for half a century retained their independence (21:8). They were then attacked by Amaziah, and Sela, their great stronghold, was captured (2 Kings 4:7; 2 Chron. 25:11–12). Yet the Israelites were never again able to completely subdue them (28:17). When Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem the Edomites joined him and took an active part in the plunder of the city and slaughter of the Jews. Their cruelty at that time seems to be specially referred to in Ps. 137. It was on account of these acts of cruelty committed against the Jews in the day of their calamity that the Edomites were so fearfully denounced by the later prophets (Isa. 34:5–8; 63:1–4; Jer. 49:17; Lam. 4:21; Ezek. 25:13–14; Amos 1:11–12; Obad. 8–10, 15). On the conquest of Judah, the Edomites, probably in reward for their services during the war, were permitted to settle in southern Palestine and the whole plateau between it and Egypt; but at about the same time they were driven out of Edom proper by the Nabataeans. For more than four centuries they continued to prosper. But during the warlike rule of the Maccabees they were again completely subdued and even forced to conform to Jewish laws and rites and submit to the government of Jewish prefects. The Edomites were then incorporated into the Jewish nation, and the whole province was often termed by Greek and Roman writers "Idumaea." Immediately before the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, twenty thousand Idumaeans were admitted to the Holy City, which they filled with robbery and bloodshed. From this time the Edomites, as a separate people, disappear from the pages of history. Scriptural indications that they were idolaters (2 Chron. 25:14–15, 20) are amply confirmed and illuminated by discoveries at Petra. For a discussion of the degrading practices of Edomite religion, see George L. Robinson, The Sarcophagus of an Ancient Civilization.

ED'REI (ed're-i; "mighty").

1. A fortified town of northern Palestine, situated near Kedesh and Hazor (Josh. 19:37), site not known.

2. One of the metropolitan towns of Bashan beyond the Jordan (Josh. 12:4; 13:12; Deut. 3:10), and the place where King Og was defeated by the Israelites (Num. 21:33–35; Deut. 1:4; 3:1–3). It afterward fell to eastern Manasseh (Josh. 13:31; Num. 32:33).

"Its present name, Ed-Dera'-ah [Deraa]; first discovered by Consul Wetzstein in 1860, explored and mapped since by Schumacher in 1886. Accounts of this wonderful city have been given by others. It is a subterranean city. There is a small court, twenty-six feet long, eight feet three inches wide, with steps leading down into it, which has been built as an approach to the actual entrance of the caves. Then come large basaltic slabs, then a passage twenty feet long, four feet wide, which slopes down to a large room, which is shut off by a stone door so this underground city could be guarded.

"Columns ten feet high support the roof of the chambers into which you now enter. These columns are of a later period, but there are other supports built out of the basaltic rock. Then come dark and winding passages—a broad street, which had dwellings on both sides of it, whose height and width left nothing to be desired. The temperature was mild, no difficulty in breathing; several cross streets, with holes in the ceiling for air; a marketplace, a broad street with numerous shops in the walls; then into a side street, and a great hall, with a ceiling of a single slab of jasper, perfectly smooth and of immense size. Airholes are frequent, going up to the surface of the ground about sixty feet. Cisterns are frequent in the floors. Tunnels partly blocked, too small for anyone now to creep through, are found. The two travelers from whom I have quoted believe that a far greater city exists than the portion they explored.

“This remarkable subterranean city was presumably hollowed out to receive the population of the upper town in times of danger, and the people were thus prepared to stand a siege on the part of the enemy for as long as their magazines were filled with food, their stables with cattle, and the cisterns with water.

“If, however, the enemy had found out how to cut off their supply of air by covering up the airholes the besieged would have had to surrender or perish. The average depth of the city from the surface of the ground is about seventy feet” (Harper, Bib. and Mod. Dis., pp. 127–29).

This important Amorite town was located about ten miles N of Ramoth-gilead on one of the eastern tributaries of the Yarmuk River. Today Deraa has a population of some ten thousand.

EDUCATION. Although nothing is more carefully inculcated in the law than the duty of parents to teach their children its precepts and principles (Ex. 12:26; 31:8, 14; Deut. 4:5, 9–10; 6:2, 7, 20; etc.), there is little trace among the Hebrews in earlier times of education in any other subject. Exception to this statement may perhaps be found in the instances of Moses himself, who was brought up in all Egyptian learning (Acts 7:22); of the writer of the book of Job, who was evidently well versed in natural history and in the astronomy of the day (Job 38:31; 39–41); of Daniel and his companions in captivity (Dan. 1:4, 17); and, above all, in the intellectual gifts and acquirements of Solomon, which were even more renowned than his political greatness (1 Kings 4:29, 34; 10:1–9; 2 Chron. 9:1–8). In later times the prophecies and comments on them, as well as on the earlier Scriptures, together with other subjects, were studied. Parents were required to teach their children some trade. See Children; Father; Schools.

EFFECTIVE CALLING. See Call.

EFFECTIVE PRAYER. In James 5:16 we read, “The effective [Gk. energoumenē] prayer of a righteous man can accomplish much.” The participle here has not the force of an adjective but gives the reason that the prayer of a righteous man has outward success. The

RV renders appropriately, “The supplication of a righteous man availeth much in its working.”

EGG. Deuteronomy 22:6 prohibits the taking of a sitting bird from its eggs or young. Eggs are mentioned as abandoned (Isa. 10:14); also of the adder (59:5). The egg is contrasted with a scorpion (which see, Animal Kingdom), as an article of food (Luke 11:12). Eggs were extensively used as food (which see). See also Animal Kingdom: Bird.

Figurative. “The white of an egg” is used (Job 6:6, “the juice of purslain,” RV marg.) as a symbol of something insipid.

EG’LAH (eg’la; “heifer”). One of David’s wives during his reign in Hebron and the mother of his son Ithream (2 Sam. 3:5; 1 Chron. 3:3), about 1000 B.C. The clause appended to Eglah’s name, namely, “David’s wife,” is not added to show that Eglah was David’s principal wife, which would necessitate the conclusion drawn by the rabbis that Michal was the wife intended (Keil, Com.).

EG’LAIM (eg’la-im; Isa. 15:8). See Eneglaim.

EG’LATH SHELIŠI’YAH (eg’lath shel-i-shi’yah). A Moabite city whose location is uncertain but probably in the S of that country (Isa. 15:5; Jer. 48:34). E.H.M.

EG’LON (eg’lon; “calflike”).

1. A Moabite king. When Israel once again forsook the Lord, the Lord strengthened Eglon against them. The king allied himself with the Ammonites and the Amalekites, invaded the land, and took “the city of the palm trees” (Judg. 3:13), i.e., Jericho (c. 1300 B.C.). Sixty years had passed since Jericho had been destroyed by Joshua. During that time the Israelites had rebuilt the ruined city, but they had not fortified it on account of the curse pronounced by Joshua upon anyone who should restore it as a fortress. Thus the Moabites could easily conquer it and, using it as a base, reduce the Israelites to servitude. Here Eglon built a palace (Josephus Ant. 5.4.1.), which he occupied at least in the summer months (3:20).

After the Israelites had served him eighteen years the Lord raised up a deliverer in the person of Ehud (which see), a Benjamite. He was sent to carry a tribute to the king, and after he had done so retired with his attendants. Returning to the king, whom he found in his summer parlor, he informed him that he had a secret message from God. Eglon dismissed his attendants and rose to receive the divine message with reverence. Then Ehud plunged a dagger into the body of the king, whose obesity was such that the weapon was buried to the handle and Ehud could not draw it out again. Ehud locked the door of the room, went out through the porch, and escaped to Seirah, in Mt. Ephraim. Through delicacy the servants waited for a long time before they opened the door, when they found Eglon dead on the floor (3:12–26).

2. An Amorite city in the western lowlands that was conquered by Joshua (Josh. 10:3, 23; 12:12; 15:39).

E’GYPT (ē’jipt). The ancient Egyptians knew their native country by the term Kemet (the “black land”), from its dark-colored Nile mud in contrast with the golden sands of the desert. The most common designation was Touï, the two countries, meaning Upper and Lower Egypt. The Canaanites called the land «Mišri.” The Heb. name employed in the OT, «Mišrayim,” is probably a dual, suggesting also the twofold ancient division of the country. Modern Arabs call it «Mišr.” The Greeks called it “Aigyptos” as early as the Homeric period.

Territory and Divisions. In ancient times Egypt consisted mainly of (1) the narrow strip of land watered by the Nile, extending from Memphis or Cairo as far as the First Cataract and (2) the so-called Delta (from its resemblance to that letter of the Gk. alphabet), the pie-shaped area between the Mediterranean Sea and Cairo (measuring c. 125 miles N and S and 115 E and W). This geographic configuration of the country gave rise to the term Upper Egypt, denoting the long, narrow fertile valley, and Lower Egypt, constituting the Delta. Egypt was accordingly about 725 miles long from the Mediterranean to the First Cataract and its breadth never more than 30 miles, while its cultivated area did not exceed 10 miles. It was thus a long and narrow country, its extremely fertile land comprising less than 13,000 square miles. Egypt in a definite sense is the “gift of the Nile,” as the ancient Greeks said. It depended upon the exceedingly rich alluvial mud deposited by the annual inundation of the river from June to October. Irrigation was indispensable, and agriculture was the foundation of its economy.

Bounded on either side by untraversable deserts and mountains, the sea on the N, an exceedingly narrow valley, and the river obstructed by cataracts on the S, Egypt was an isolated land. This geographic isolation was a prominent factor in its long and splendid history and brilliant civilization.

Inhabitants. The ancient Egyptians were Hamitic peoples (Gen. 10:6). Later on an invasion from Babylonia, predominantly Semitic, came into the country and left its imprint upon the language and culture. Other elements such as the Nubian entered into the Egyptian mixture. At a late date the country was divided into forty-two nomes, or provinces, twenty in Lower and twenty-two in Upper Egypt.

Egyptian is Hamitic, but may properly be called Hamito-Semitic. The following linguistic areas may be noted: (1) Old Egyptian, Dynasties I-VIII, included the language of the Pyramid Texts. (2) Middle Egyptian, the literary tongue of Dynasties IX-XVIII, and the vernacular language of the early part of the period, which became the classical norm imitated in later eras. (3) Late Egyptian, Dynasties XIX-XXIV, which exists on business documents and to some extent in literary works. (4) Demotic, denoting the language in a popular script from Dynasties XXV to late Roman times, 700 B.C. until after A.D. 450. (5) Coptic, third century A.D. onward, the language of the Copts, the Christian descendants of the ancient Egyptians.

The earliest writing was hieroglyphic, or picture language, including representations of common objects and geometric symbols. As early as the Old Kingdom scribes began to do away with cumbersome pictures in order to facilitate rapid writing. By the eighth century B.C. a demotic or popular writing came into vogue and was cursive in form. In 1799 Napoleon's expedition discovered the Rosetta Stone, a piece of black basalt bearing an inscription in hieroglyphics, demotic and Gk. This discovery, now in the British Museum, furnished the key to the decipherment of the Egyptian language. This feat was accomplished by the Frenchman François Champollion in 1822.

History. Manetho, a priest of Sybennytyos, c. 290 B.C., wrote a history of Egypt in Gk. He divided the history of united Egypt into thirty royal dynasties. The new minimal chronology begins the first of his dynasties around 2900 B.C. Our knowledge of the early and pre-dynastic periods comes from more recent archaeological discovery.

Early and Pre-Dynastic Periods (c. 5000–2900 B.C.). Neolithic cultures appear from discoveries at Deir Tasa in Middle Egypt, in the Fayum and at Merimdeh Beni-Salameh. Chalcolithic remains appear at Badari. Copper and fine pottery were used as well as green malachite for eye paint. Akin to the Badarians were the succeeding Amratians. The civilization of these people is to be dated around the middle of the fifth millennium B.C. and marks the beginning of the pre-dynastic period. Cemeteries and village sites of Amratian culture exist from Badari to lower Nubia. They used copper and plied the Nile in boats made of bundles of papyrus. Their graves are distinctive, consisting of shallow oval pits accompanied by food, ornaments, and weapons. The Amratian period was succeeded by the Gerzean. Pear-shaped maces, wavy-handled jars of clay, stone vessels of animal shapes, and amulets representing the falcon, the cow, the bull, the toad, and the fly were uncovered. In this period emerged the independent districts, each denoted by an ensign representing a plant or animal. Later the Greeks called them “nomes.”

Eventually two powerful states came into existence, one in Upper Egypt and the other in the Delta. Ombos, near the modern town of Naqada, became the capital of Upper Egypt. The symbol of this kingdom was the so-called lotus. Behdet, near Alexandria, became the capital of Lower Egypt. The symbol of this kingdom was the papyrus that grows so luxuriously in the marshes of the Delta. Even after Egypt became a united country the two-kingdom tradition persisted. The rulers of all Egypt bore the title “king of Upper and Lower Egypt,” and the symbol became a device in which the lotus and papyrus were combined. The OT Heb. name for Egypt remained literally “the two Egypts.”

The Proto-Dynastic Period (Dynasties I and II, c. 2900–2700 B.C.). According to Manetho, Menes was the first king and reigned at This, not far from the great bend of the Nile below Thebes, near present-day Girga. The First and Second Dynasties are often called Thinite. The cemetery of the Thinite kings was in the desert near This, close to present-day Abydos. Sir W. M. Flinders Petrie excavated most of the tombs of this dynasty. Like so many of the burial places of ancient Egyptians, the royal tombs at Abydos had already been plundered. Enough of the contents remained, however, to yield a profusion of jewelry, stone vases, copper vessels, and other objects. Names of a number of the kings were found, including Narmer, Aha, and Zer. The slate palette of Narmer found at Hierakonpolis has on the reverse the conspicuous figure of the king raising a mace to crush the skull of his enemy, whom he holds by the hair. On the king’s head is a helmetlike crown of Upper Egypt. Behind the king is his servant bearing the king’s sandals and a water vessel. Heads of Hathor the cow-goddess are around the king’s belt and at the top of the palette. The falcon, as a royal symbol, holds a rope attached to a human head. Six papyrus stalks, symbolizing the marshes of Lower Egypt, are depicted beneath the falcon. Below is a single barbed harpoon head and a rectangle representing a lake. The entire representation means that the falcon king has taken captive the people of the region of the Harpoon Lake in Lower Egypt.

The Old Kingdom, Dynasties III-IV (c. 2700–2200 B.C.). With his capital at Memphis, King Zoser of the Third Dynasty built the famous Step Pyramid at Saqqara, the earliest large stone structure known in history, 190 feet high. Khufu, founder of the Fourth Dynasty, built the greatest of the pyramids at Gizeh. It was originally 481 feet high, 755 feet square at the base, covering almost thirteen acres; 2,300,000 blocks of limestone, each weighing about 2½ tons, were required in its construction. Khafre, the successor of Khufu, constructed the second pyramid at Gizeh. Its present height is 447½ feet and it is not considerably smaller than the Great Pyramid. The head of the great Sphinx, which stands to the E of the second pyramid, probably represents Khafre. Kings of the Fifth and Sixth Dynasties had inscriptions carved on the walls and inner passages of the pyramids. These are now known as the Pyramid Texts and deal with the glorious future life of the deceased kings in the presence of the sun-god. The Pyramid Texts frequently have the form of couplets with parallel thought arrangement, an early form of poetry that was to be used by the Hebrews two millennia later.

First Intermediate Period (Dynasties VII-XI, c. 2200–1900 B.C.). The pharaohs of this period were comparatively weak and ruled at Memphis and at Herakleopolis, some seventy-seven miles S of Cairo. In the Eleventh Dynasty the Intefs and the Mentuhoteps ruled at Thebes, which was later destined to become Egypt’s greatest capital.

Egypt’s Strong Middle Kingdom (Dynasty XII, c. 1900–1775 B.C.). These kings were native Thebans, but they ruled at Memphis and in the Fayum. This period was contemporary with the patriarchal period in Palestine. Joseph became prime minister of and Jacob stood before one of the powerful pharaohs of this dynasty (Amenemes I-IV or Senwosret I-III).

This period marked the classical efflorescence of Egyptian literature. Amenemes I composed a series of proverbs for his son. The Tale of Sinuhe portrays conditions in Syria and Palestine under the power of Egypt at this time. Senwosret III pushed the Egyptian Empire to the Second Cataract and extended his power into Syria. There was great commercial activity. A canal was constructed connecting the Red Sea to the nearest branch of the Nile in the eastern Delta. The mining industry in Sinai was developed into a permanent industry. Jewelry and art work from this period show remarkable design and accuracy of construction. The famous tomb of Khnumhotep II, a powerful noble under Senwosret II who lived at Beni Hasan 169 miles above Cairo, depicts the visit of thirty-seven Asiatics to Egypt about 1900 B.C. These Semites bringing gifts remind us of Abraham's going down into Egypt. The picture gives an inscription reading: "The arrival, bringing eye paint, which 37 Asiatics bring to him." Their leader has the good Heb. name "Sheikh of the highlands Ibshe."

Second Intermediate Period (Dynasties XII-XVII, c. 1775–1570 B.C.). The strong Middle Kingdom was succeeded by Dynasties XIII and XIV, characterized by weakness and futile struggles. This period of turmoil was followed by the invasion of the Hyksos, literally, "rulers of the foreign lands," commonly called the "Shepherd Kings." These foreign princes reigned almost a century and a half, comprising Dynasties XV-XVI. The Hyksos seem to have been mainly Semitic with probable intermixture of Hittites and Hurrians. Avaris in the Delta was their capital. As the Hyksos period ran its course, Dynasty XVII came into power at Thebes. The last king of this dynasty, named Ahmose, completely expelled the Hyksos. The Hyksos introduced the horse and the chariot into the Nile Valley and contributed to their empire-building activities.

The New Empire, (Dynasties XVIII-XX, c. 1570–1150 B.C.). This was the heyday of Egyptian splendor and building activity, as evidenced by the vast temple at Karnak. Great pharaohs of this era include Amenhotep I, c. 1546–1525, Thutmose I, c. 1525–1508, Thutmose II, c. 1508–1504, Queen Hatshepsut, c. 1520–1482. She was succeeded by Thutmose III, the great conqueror and builder, c. 1482–1450. This warrior conducted seventeen campaigns and extended the empire to its widest limits in Palestine, Syria, and the regions of the upper Euphrates and on the Nile up to the Fourth Cataract. At the battle of Megiddo, c. 1482 B.C., he defeated the Hittites. According to the chronology preserved in the MT, he was probably the pharaoh of the oppression. Amenhotep II, c. 1450–1425, was apparently the pharaoh under whom the children of Israel left the country. The great empire began to decline after Thutmose III. Amenhotep III reigned from c. 1412 to 1375 (the Amarna period) and was followed by his son Amenhotep IV, c. 1375–1366. This religious zealot is better known by the name of Akhnaton and is famous for his solar monotheism. This cult was a reaction against the well-entrenched religion of Amon, the sun-god of Thebes. Akhnaton established a new capital at Akhetaton (modern el-Amarna, where the famous Amarna Letters were discovered in 1887), nearly three hundred miles below Thebes. Frantic calls for help against encroaching Habiru fill the Amarna correspondence. Under Tutankhamen (c. 1358–1352) the capital was reestablished at Thebes. The lavish, intact tomb of this pharaoh was discovered in 1922 by Howard Carter. Dynasty XIX was initiated by a general named Harmhab, c. 1353–1319, who restored traditional religion and organization. Rameses I reigned for only a year, c. 1319, and was succeeded by Sethi I, c. 1318–1299. He showed imperial tendencies and began the reconquest of Palestine-Syria, which his great son Rameses II, c. 1299–1232, carried forward. This great pharaoh, comparable to Thutmose III, clashed with the Hittites around 1293 at Kadesh on the Orontes. About a decade later he made a treaty with the Hittites. Merenptah (Merneptah), c. 1232–1222, succeeded the great conqueror. In his famous stela, Israel is mentioned for the first time, and Merneptah claims to have destroyed them. Dynasty XX (c. 1200–1085) had about ten rulers by the name of Rameses. Rameses III (c. 1198–1167) was the greatest. He repulsed the invading Sea Peoples, including the Philistines. After him decline set in rapidly.

The Decline (Dynasties XXI-XXX, c. 1085–332 B.C.). During Dynasty XXI (c. 1085–945 B.C.), the high priests of Amon at Thebes, Herihor and his successors, and nobles of Tanis, Smendes and his successors, strove for supremacy. Meanwhile there was a Libyan penetration of the country and Sheshonk I (biblical Shishak), a Libyan, seized the throne, inaugurating Dynasty XXII (c. 945–745). Bubastis in the E Delta was now the capital. Dynasties XXIII-XXIV (c. 745–712) were likewise Libyan. Dynasty XXV (c. 712–663) was Nubian. By the middle of the eighth century B.C. a strong Nubian kingdom came into existence with a capital at Napata, just below the Fourth Cataract. By around 721 B.C. Piankhi, a Nubian king, advanced up the Nile and eventually captured Memphis. Shabaka, a brother of Piankhi, established the Nubian and Ethiopian Dynasty XXV (c. 712–663). Taharka, a son of Piankhi, was the last ruler. Around 680 B.C. Egypt became imperiled by the Assyrians. Esarhaddon conquered the Delta, and Taharka surrendered Lower Egypt. When the Assyrian army was withdrawn, Taharka once more became ruler of the whole country. Under Ashurbanipal the Assyrians made a new invasion (c. 667 B.C.). Ashurbanipal's second campaign eventuated in the sacking of Thebes (c. 663, Nah. 3:8–10). Dynasty XXVI (c. 663–525) was founded by Psamtik (Psammetichus). It is sometimes called the Saite Dynasty, since the capital was at Sais in the Delta. He was a practical vassal of the Assyrians until about 650, when the Assyrians had to withdraw their occupational forces because of a Babylonian revolt. Egyptian glory momentarily returned. Psamtik was succeeded by his son Necho II (c. 609–593). It was he who slew Josiah at Megiddo (c. 608) when the latter opposed his march toward Assyria. He was utterly routed by Nebuchadnezzar II and lost all of Egypt's Asiatic possessions (2 Kings 24:7). Henceforth Necho confined his energies chiefly to Egypt, as did his son Psamtik II. The latter's son Apries (Hophra) unsuccessfully challenged Nebuchadnezzar's invasion of Palestine when Jerusalem fell (587 B.C.). Hophra lost his life in a civil war with Amasis II (c. 569–525), who succeeded him. In the days of Amasis, Nebuchadnezzar attempted to invade Egypt. At the end of his reign Amasis witnessed the rise of Cyrus the Great and the Persian Empire. His son Psamtik III reigned only a few months when he fell at Pelusium (525 B.C.) before the invading forces of Cyrus's son and successor, Cambyses II. During Dynasties XXVII-XXX Egypt was under Persian rule. In 332 B.C. the country was conquered by Alexander the Great. After his death in 323 B.C., the land came under the rule of the Ptolemies until the death of Cleopatra, 30 B.C., when it became a province of Rome.

Religion. The Egyptian religion was an utterly bewildering polytheistic conglomeration in which many deities of the earliest periods, when each town had its own deity, were retained. Re, the sun-god, was worshiped at Heliopolis (On). Osiris, god of the Nile, became the god of fertility. With the ascendancy of Thebes, the local god Amon was elevated and finally identified with Re under the compound Amon-Re. The moon also was worshiped as a god. Ptah, a god of Memphis, was known as the "great chief of artificers." It would be practically impossible to list all the gods sacred to Egyptians. Every object beheld, every phenomenon of nature, was thought to possess a spirit that could choose its own form, occupying the body of a crocodile, a fish, a cow, a cat, etc. Hence the Egyptians had numerous holy animals, principally the bull, the cow, the cat, the baboon, the jackal, and the crocodile. Some of the deities were composite, with human bodies and animal heads. Thoth, the scribe of the gods, had the head of an ibis; Horus, the sun-god, that of a hawk. The idea of a universal god found expression under Akhnaton, and for a brief period Aton was distinguished from the material sun. Despite crude nature worship among the Egyptians, there was a remarkable understanding of ethical conduct and, notably, mortality. Great pains were taken to insure the welfare of the deceased in the hereafter.

Relations with Israel. According to biblical chronology preserved in the MT of the Heb. Bible, Jacob and his family went down into Egypt somewhere in the neighborhood of 1871 B.C., under the Twelfth Egyptian Dynasty of the Middle Kingdom. Abraham, early in the history of this powerful government, had gone down into Egypt in time of famine (Gen. 12:10–20) as the aged Jacob and his sons did in this later period under like circumstances (46:6). Archaeology has yielded a number of evidences of Israel's sojourn in Egypt, among which are Egyptian personal names of Levites such as Moses, Assir, Pashhur, Hophni, Phinehas, Merari, and Putiel. These are all incontestably Egyptian. Another indication is the Canaanite place names in the Delta before the New Empire, such as Succoth (Ex. 12:37), Baal-zephon (14:2), Migdol (14:2), Zilu, and very likely Goshen itself (8:22; 9:26; W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity [1940], p. 184). The Egyptian plagues abound in authentic local coloring. About 1441 B.C. (Masoretic chronology), the Hebrews left Egypt after a 430-year sojourn (12:40–41). This date is supported by the data in 1 Kings 6:1, which places the Exodus as 480 years before the fourth year of Solomon's reign (c. 961 B.C.). Adding 480 to 961 gives 1441 B.C. Scholars such as Albright argue for a c. 1290 B.C. date. H. H. Rowley places it around 1225 B.C. Besides telescoping the period of the Judges, these later dates virtually rule out the possibility of fitting the biblical chronology into the frame of contemporary history. John Garstang's excavations at Jericho favor the date c. 1441, and general conditions in Palestine, reflected in the Amarna Letters, do not make the equation impossible. Moreover, contemporary Egyptian history under the Eighteenth Dynasty permits the 1441 B.C. date. (For the early date and its arguments, see Merrill F. Unger's Archeology and the Old Testament [1954], pp. 140–48 and objections to the early date, pp. 149–52.)

The son and successor of Rameses II, Merenptah, set up a victory stela. This important monument found in the pharaoh's mortuary temple at Thebes, in twenty-eight closely packed lines of inscription, celebrates his triumph over his enemies. The first extrabiblical mention of Israel occurs on this inscription. The concluding portion of the stela reads as follows:

Askelon is carried captive; Gezer is conquered.

Yanoam is made as though it did not exist.

The people of Israel is desolate; it has no offspring;

Palestine has become a widow for Egypt.

All lands are united; they are pacified.

Everyone that is turbulent is bound by King Merenptah, giving life like Re every day.

Other notable contacts with Egypt occurred in the days of Solomon, who married an Egyptian princess, and in the days of Rehoboam, when Judah and also Israel, as archaeology has shown, were overrun and plundered by Shishak. In the days of Jeremiah, on the eve of the fall of Jerusalem, the prophet denounced the people for leaning upon Egypt. After the fall of the city and the murder of Gedaliah, Jeremiah and a number of those left in the land migrated to Egypt. In later periods, after Alexander's conquests and death, numerous Jews settled in Egypt, notably in Alexandria, under the favorable treatment of the Ptolemies. M.F.U.

EGYPT, BROOK OF. Present-day Wadi el-Arish is a wide, shallow stream bed forming the southern boundary of Judah. It drains surplus water of the wet season from the wilderness of Paran into the Mediterranean. It forms a line of demarcation between Sinai and Palestine (Num. 34:5). It is some ninety-six miles NE of Kantara, the point of crossing the Suez Canal into Egypt proper.

E'HI (ē'hī; “brotherly”). One of the “sons” of Benjamin (Gen. 46:21). He is probably the grandson called Ahiram (which see) in Num. 26:38. In the parallel passage (1 Chron. 8:6) he seems to be called Ehud (which see).

E'HUD (ē'hud).

1. A descendant of Benjamin, progenitor of one of the clans of Geba that moved to Manahath (1 Chron. 8:6). He seems to be the same as Ahiram (Num. 26:38), and if so, Ahiram is probably the right name, as the family is called Ahiramites. In 1 Chron. 8:1 the same person seems to be called Aharah, and perhaps also Ahoah in v. 4; Ahijah, v. 7; and Aher, 7:12.

2. The third named of the seven sons of Bilhan, the son of Jediael and grandson of the patriarch Jacob (1 Chron. 7:10).

3. A judge of Israel, the son (descendant) of Gera, a Benjamite (Judg. 3:15). The name Gera was hereditary among the Benjamites (see Gen. 46:21; 2 Sam. 16:5; 1 Chron. 8:3, 5).

This Ehud was the second judge of Israel, or rather of that part of Israel that he delivered from the Moabites. Israel having lapsed into idolatry, the Lord strengthened Eglon, the king of Moab, against them. With the assistance of the Ammonites and the Amalekites he invaded the land, took Jericho (Judg. 3:12–13), and held Israel under tribute eighteen years (c. 1314–1295 B.C.).

Sent by the children of Israel, Ehud brought a tribute to Eglon. He departed with those who bore the gift, but, turning “back from the idols which were at Gilgal,” he presented himself before the king in his “cool roof chamber.” He secured the dismissal of the attendants by declaring that he had a “secret message” for Eglon; when they were alone, Ehud said, “I have a message from God for you,” and the king rose to receive it with reverence. Immediately Ehud, who was left-handed, drew a dagger from his right thigh and plunged it so deeply into Eglon’s abdomen that the fat closed upon the hilt and Ehud could not withdraw it. Leaving the room, he locked the door and fled past the idols into Seirah.

Ehud now summoned the Israelites to Seirah, in the mountains of Ephraim. First taking the fords of Jordan, he fell upon the Moabites, defeating them with a loss of 10,000 of their best men. And so the land had rest for eighty years (Judg. 3:15–30).

“The conduct of Ehud must be judged according to the spirit of those times, when it was thought allowable to adopt any means of destroying the enemy of one’s nation. The treacherous assassination of the hostile king is not to be regarded as an act of the Spirit of God, and therefore is not set before us as an example.” Beyond his commission as deliverer of Israel we do not suppose that God gave Ehud any special commands but left him to the choice of such measures and plans of conquest as his own judgment and skill might devise.

E'KER (e'ker). The youngest of the three sons of Ram, the grandson of Hezron (1 Chron. 2:27).

EK'RON (ek'ron; “extermination”). A city of the Philistines, about eleven miles from Gath. It belonged successively to Judah (Josh. 13:3) and Dan (19:43) and to the Philistines (1 Sam. 5:10). Here the Ark was carried (5:10; 6:1–8). Baal-zebub was worshiped here (2 Kings 1:2). Ekron is now located at Tel Miqne, near Revadim, about twenty-five miles W of Jerusalem. Excavations at the site are being led by Trude Dothan of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem and Seymour Gitin of the Albright Institute in Jerusalem. Finds demonstrate that Miqne was occupied during the Early, Middle, and Late Bronze ages (c. 3000–1200 B.C.); and around 1200 B.C. the Philistines founded the first urban settlement there. The last fortified city was probably destroyed by Sennacherib of Assyria during his 701 B.C. campaign in Judah. H.F.V.

EK'RONITE (ek'ron-īt; Josh. 13:3; 1 Sam. 5:10). An inhabitant of the Philistine city of Ekron (which see).

EL (el). This is a name by which God is called in the OT—El, the God Elohim of Israel (Gen. 33:20). In prose it occurs more frequently with the modifier—El Elyon (“God, Most High,” 14:18), El Shaddai (“God Almighty,” 17:1), El Hai (“the living God,” Josh. 3:10), commonly the plural of majesty Elohim. In poetry el is common. The word often stands alone without any adjunct (Pss. 18:31; 68:21; Job 8:3). El is a generic name for God in NW Semitic (Heb. and Ugaritic), and as such it is also employed in the OT for heathen deities (Ex. 34:14; Isa. 44:10). The original generic term was ilum, which, dropping the mimation and the nominative case ending u, became el in Heb. The word is derived from the root ʾwl, “to be strong, powerful,” meaning “the strong one.” In Canaanite paganism as reflected in the Phoenician historian Philo of Byblos, A.D. 100, and particularly in the epic religious literature unearthed at Ras Shamra, ancient Ugarit in N Syria, 1929–37, El was the head of the Canaanite pantheon. According to Philo, El had three wives, who were also his sisters. This fluidity of relationship is in accordance with the general irrationality and moral grossness of Canaanite cults. According to Philo, El was a bloody tyrant who dethroned his own father, Uranus, murdered his favorite son, and decapitated his daughter. The Ugaritic poems present him also as a lustful, morbid character. Despite these crimes, El was considered the exalted “father of years” (abu shanima), the “father of man” (abu adami), and “father bull,” that is, the progenitor of the gods. Like Homer’s Zeus, El was the father of men and gods. The utter moral abandon of El, as well as that of his son, Baal, and his three sister-wives, who were patronesses of sex and war, point to the degrading effects of Canaanite religion and offer adequate moral explanation for the inflexibly stern attitude of the OT toward the religion of the Canaanites and to the Canaanites themselves. The Ras Shamra literature speaks of Canaan as the “land of El,” where this deity was absolute in authority over lesser gods. El rapidly declined, however, and was largely supplanted by the worship of Baal, who was equally demoralizing. The Heb. name of God, El, has, of course, no connection with paganism, but is a simple generic term. M.F.U.

E'LA (ē'la). The father of Shimei, one of Solomon's deputies (1 Kings 4:18; "Elah," KJV), after 960 B.C.

EL'ADAH. See Eleadah.

E'LAH (ē'la; "oak," any large "evergreen").

1. One of the Edomite chiefs in Mt. Seir (Gen. 36:41; 1 Chron. 1:52).
2. In the KJV, the father of Shimei. See Ela.
3. The son and successor of Baasha, king of Israel (1 Kings 16:8–10). He reigned for only part of two years (c. 886–885 B.C.) and was then killed while drunk by Zimri, in the house of his steward Arza (in Tirzah), who was probably a confederate in the plot. He was the last king of Baasha's line, and by this catastrophe the predictions of the prophet Jehu (16:1–4) were accomplished.
4. The father of Hoshea, last king of Israel (2 Kings 15:30; 17:1), c. 732–724 B.C.
5. One of the three sons of Caleb, the son of Jephunneh (1 Chron. 4:15), c. 1380 B.C. In KJV (NASB marg.) this passage ends with the words "even (or and) Kenaz," showing that a name had been dropped out before it (Keil, Com.). The NIV, however, reads, "The son of Elah: Kenaz."
6. The son of Uzzi, and one of the Benjamite heads of families who were taken into captivity (1 Chron. 9:8), or rather, perhaps, returned from it and dwelt in Jerusalem, 536 B.C.
7. The Valley of Elah located eleven miles SW from Jerusalem, the scene of Goliath's death at the hands of David (1 Sam. 17:2; 21:9). It is the modern Wadi es-Sunt, or valley of the acacia tree. Its entrance from the Philistine plain is commanded by the famous Tell-es-Sâfiyeh.

E'LAM (ē'lam; "hidden"). The name of an ancient land (see article below) and of several persons in the Bible.

1. The first named of the sons of Shem (Gen. 10:22; 1 Chron. 1:17). His descendants probably settled in that part of Persia that was afterward frequently called by this name.
2. A head man of the tribe of Benjamin, one of the sons of Shashak, resident at Jerusalem at the captivity or on the return (1 Chron. 8:24), 536 B.C.
3. A Korahite Levite, fifth son of Meshelemiah, who was one of the gatekeepers of the Tabernacle in the time of David (1 Chron. 26:3), 1000 B.C.
4. The progenitor of a family who returned with Zerubbabel (536 B.C.) to the number of 1,254 (Ezra 2:7; Neh. 7:12). A further detachment of 71 men came with Ezra (8:7). It was, probably, one of this family, Shecaniah son of Jehiel, who encouraged Ezra in his efforts against the indiscriminate marriages of the people (10:2), and six of the "sons of Elam" accordingly put away their foreign wives (10:26).
5. In the same set of lists is a second Elam, whose sons, to the same number as in the former case, returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:31; Neh. 7:34), and which, for the sake of distinction, is called "the other Elam." "The coincidence of numbers is curious, and also suspicious, as arguing an accidental repetition of the foregoing name" (Smith, Dict., s.v.).
6. One of the leaders of the people who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:14), 445 B.C.
7. One of the priests who accompanied Nehemiah and took part in the dedication of the new wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:42), 445 B.C.

E'LAM (ē'lam; Heb. ēlām; Akkad. elamtu, "highland"). The land beyond the Tigris and E of Babylonia, bounded on the N by Assyria and Media and on the S by the Persian Gulf. Its capital was the ancient city of Susa, OT Shushan (KJV). Elam was the center of an ancient political power. Eannatum of Lagash was the first known person to mention Elam. He claims to have conquered it, but not much later, under one of his successors, the Elamites plundered Lagash. The great Sargon of Agade called himself “conqueror of Elam.” His successor, Naram-Sin, mastered the entire land of Elam. As the result of the victories of this great Semitic dynasty of Agade (c. 2400–2200 B.C.), the Elamites were kept in subjection for more than three hundred years. After the destruction of the Third Dynasty of Ur, c. 1960 B.C., Kudur Mabuk became master of Larsa and was succeeded by his sons, Warad-Sin and Rim-Sin. The great Hammurabi defeated Rim-Sin. Later on an Elamite conqueror carried the Code of Hammurabi to Susa, where it was recovered in A.D. 1901–2. In the Abrahamic era, Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, was powerful in Lower Babylonia and conquered even the country on the Jordan (Gen. 14:1–11). In the eighth and seventh centuries B.C. the mighty Assyrian Empire intermittently had to struggle with the troublesome Elamites. About 645 B.C. Susa was taken. The Chaldeans conquered the Elamites (cf. Ezek. 32:24), and Susa became a capital of the Persian Empire. Some Elamites were forcibly settled in Samaria and joined in harassing the Jews in their attempts to rebuild the Temple (Ezra 4:9). Elamites were prominently present on the Day of Pentecost, when the Holy Spirit came (Acts 2:9). M.F.U. BIBLIOGRAPHY: E. Herzfeld, Iran in the Ancient Near East (1941); J. EL-AMARNA. See Amarna, el-.

E'LAMITES (ē'la-mīts; Ezra 4:9; Acts 2:9). The original inhabitants of the country called Elam; they were descendants of Shem and perhaps received their name from an actual man, Elam (Gen. 10:22).

EL'ASAH (el'a-sa; “God has made”).

1. One of the sons of Pashhur, a priest, who renounced his Gentile wife, whom he had married during the captivity or after (Ezra 10:22), 457 B.C.

2. The son of Shaphan, one of the two men sent on a mission by King Zedekiah to Nebuchadnezzar at Babylon. At the same time they took charge of the letter of Jeremiah the prophet to the captives in Babylon (Jer. 29:3), about 593 B.C.

E'LATH (e'lath, e'loth; “great trees”). A site located on the NE end of the Gulf of Aqaba. On their northward trek from Sinai the Israelites passed Elath (Deut. 2:8), which was then a tiny village E of the later Elath and that was beside Ezion-geber. Ezion-geber, modern Tell el Keleifeh, excavated by Nelson Glueck, lay E of Elath, but from the tenth to the fifth century B.C. the place was known as Ezion-geber, later as Elath. Because of its strategic location Ezion-geber passed back and forth between Edomites and Jews in the two centuries between David and Uzziah (2 Kings 14:22; 16:6). It was also a strategic stopping place for caravans coming from Arabia.

EL-BE'RITH (el-be'rīth). The god (Judg. 9:46). See Gods, False: Baal-berith.

EL-BETH'EL (the “God of Bethel”). The name given by Jacob to the altar that he erected at Bethel on his return from Laban (Gen. 35:7). It was built in memory of God's appearance to him in the vision of the “ladder” (cf. 28:12–22).

EL'DAAH (el'da; “God of knowledge”). The last named of the five sons of Midian, Abraham's son by Keturah (Gen. 25:4; 1 Chron. 1:33), after 2,000 B.C.

EL'DAD (el'dad; “God has loved”). One of the seventy elders appointed to assist Moses in the administration of justice, c. 1440 B.C. These elders were assembled before the door of the Tabernacle and received the spirit of prophecy from God (Num. 11:24–25). Eldad is mentioned along with Medad, another elder, as having received the same gift, although for some reason they were not with the other elders but remained in the camp. A young man brought word to Moses that these two persons were prophesying in the camp, and Joshua entreated Moses to forbid them. But Moses replied: “Are you jealous for my sake? Would that all the Lord's people were prophets, that the Lord would put His Spirit upon them!”

(11:26–29). The mode of prophesying, in the case of Eldad and Medad, was probably the spontaneous production of hymns chanted forth to the people. Compare the case of Saul (1 Sam. 10:11).

ELDER (Heb. zāqēn, “old”; Gk. presbuteros, “older”; English “presbyter”). In early times books were scarce, and the aged of the tribes were the depositories of the traditions of bygone generations. The old men, moreover, had the most experience and were the heads of large families, over whom they exercised supreme authority. Great reverence was paid to the aged among the Hebrews and other nations (Deut. 32:7; Job 12:12; Prov. 16:31). Because old age was identified with matured wisdom, knowledge, and experience, and a reward for a virtuous and godly life, the aged were from time immemorial chosen to fill the official positions in the community. The name elder came to be used as the designation for the office itself.

In the Old Testament. The term elder is applied to various offices: to Abraham’s “oldest” servant (RV, “elder,” i.e., major-domo; NIV, “chief servant,” Gen. 24:2); the officers of Pharaoh’s household (50:7); and David’s head servants (2 Sam. 12:17). “The elders of Gebal” (Ezek. 27:9) are understood to be the master workmen. The elders of Egypt (Gen. 50:7) were probably the state officers, and the term denoting a political office applied not only to the Hebrews and Egyptians but also to the Moabites and Midianites (Num. 22:7). “According to patriarchal custom the fathers, standing by the right of birth (primogeniture) at the head of the several tribes and divisions of tribes, regulated the relations of the tribes and clans, punished offenses and crimes, and administered law and equity. Thus from the heads of tribes, clans and families proceeded the elders, who, even before the time of Moses, formed the superiors of the people. For Moses and Aaron, on their arrival in Egypt, gathered the elders of Israel to announce to the people their divine commission to lead them out of the bondage of Egypt (Ex. 3:16, 18; 4:29).” They accompanied Moses in his first interview with Pharaoh (3:18); through them Moses gave his communications and commands to the people (19:7; Deut. 31:9). They were his immediate attendants in all the great transactions in the wilderness (Ex. 17:5), and seventy of them accompanied Moses to Sinai (24:1). Seventy of them were also appointed to bear the burden of government with Moses (Num. 11:16–17). As in the legislation of Moses certain things were committed to the charge of the elders of each particular city (Deut. 19:12; 21:3; etc.), it was clearly implied that the people, on their settlement in Canaan, were expected to appoint persons (“elders”) who would see that divine regulations were executed in the several districts (see Josh. 20:4; Judg. 8:16; Ruth 4:2; etc.). In the Psalms and the Prophets, elders are spoken of as a distinct class with an official character and occupying a somewhat separate position (Ps. 107:32; Lam. 2:10; Ezek. 14:1; etc.). After the return from the Exile, the office rose into higher significance and fuller organization. With every synagogue (which see) there was connected a government of elders, varying in number according to the population attached to it. The rulers of the synagogue and the elders of the people were substantially one, and a certain number of those elders belonged to the Sanhedrin (which see).

In the New Testament. They were associated sometimes with the chief priests (Matt. 21:23), sometimes with the chief priests and scribes (16:21), or the council (26:59), always taking an active part in the management of public affairs. Luke speaks of the whole order by the collective term of eldership (Gk. presbuterion; Luke 22:66; Acts 22:5). There is no specific account of the origin of the eldership in the apostolic church. We find officers called interchangeably elders or presbyters and bishops (Gk. episkopos, “superintendent”). This office pertained to local congregations, was extended as the churches multiplied, and was distinguished from that of deacon. Elders first came into prominence on the scattering abroad of the disciples and the withdrawing of the apostles from Jerusalem, following the death of Stephen. They were associated with James to give direction to the affairs of the church, appear to have been a well-known and established class of officials (11:30), and came into greater prominence in association with the apostles (15:2). With the “brethren” they constituted the council at Jerusalem to which was referred the question of circumcision, and they united with the apostles and the church in sending to Antioch and other churches delegates who should convey the decision of the council (15:22–23). When Paul visited Jerusalem for the last time he went in to James, the president, where he found all the elders assembled (21:18–25). The “elders” of the NT church were the “pastors” (Eph. 4:11), “overseers” (Acts 20:28; etc.), the leaders who “have charge” (Heb. 13:7; 1 Thess. 5:12; etc.) of the flock. They were also the regular teachers of the congregation, whose duty it was to expound the Scriptures and administer the sacraments (1 Tim. 3:2; Titus 1:9). The Jewish Christians, following the pattern of the synagogue as well as of political administration of cities, which was vested in a senate or college, readily adopted the presbytery. Consequently we meet it everywhere in the plural, as a corporation at Jerusalem (Acts 11:30; 15:4, 6, 23; 21:18), at Ephesus (20:17, 28), at Philippi (Phil. 1:1), at the ordination of Timothy (1 Tim. 4:14; etc.).

“The essential identity of presbyters and bishops in the apostolic age is a matter of well nigh absolute historic demonstration. The same officers of the church of Ephesus are alternately called presbyters and bishops. Paul sends greetings to the bishops and deacons of Philippi, but omits the presbyters because they were included in the first term, as also the plural indicates. In the pastoral epistles, when Paul intends to give the qualifications for all church officers he again mentions two, bishops and deacons, but the term presbyters afterward for bishops. Peter urges the presbyters to ‘tend the flock of God, and to fulfill the office of bishops,’ with disinterested devotion and without lording it over the charge allotted them. The interchange of terms continued in use to the close of the 1st century, as is evident from the epistle of Clement of Rome (about 95 A.D.), and still lingered toward the close of the second” (Schaff, Hist. Christ. Church). The reason for the use of two terms for persons having the same essential functions has given rise to much discussion.

Two general suggestions have been made: (1) The term presbyter has been claimed to be of Jewish derivation and to have been used at first only by Jewish-Christian congregations. In communities where a Christian church had sprung from the bosom of a local synagogue, and was therefore chiefly under the control of Jewish tradition and thought, the term presbyter, which was the name of the governing body of the synagogue, would be naturally transferred to officers of similar function in the Christian societies. It is likewise true that the term bishop is used to designate one of like official duty in the churches of almost exclusively Gentile origin. (2) A second theory is that the bishop of the Christian church was analogous in office and function to that of the president of the pagan fraternities or clubs. To administer the funds of these organizations became a matter of primary importance, and the officer charged with this duty was termed an episcopos.

The peculiar environment of the first Christian believers compelled like provision for the exercise of systematic charities. Most of the early disciples were of the poorer class, and many more, upon profession of the Christian faith, became outcasts from their families and homes.

In the Modern Church. (1) In the Roman Catholic church, the Church of England, and the Protestant Episcopal church, “priest” is generally used instead of “presbyter” or “elder,” to designate the second order in the ministry (the three orders being bishops, priests, and deacons). (2) In the Methodist church only two orders of ministers are recognized, elders and deacons, the bishops being chosen (primus inter pares) as superintendents. (3) Among Congregationalist and all churches having the presbyterian form of government the two orders of elders and deacons are recognized. Among Presbyterians there are two classes of elders: teaching elders (pastors) and ruling elders (laymen).

EL'EAD (el'e-ad; "God has testified"). A descendant of Ephraim (1 Chron. 7:20–21), but whether through Shuthelah (which see) or a son of the patriarch (the second Shuthelah being taken as a repetition of the first, and Ezer and Elead as his brothers) is not determined.

EL'EADAH (el'e-a-da; "God has decked"). One of the sons (rather than later descendants, as the text seems to state) of Ephraim (1 Chron. 7:20); perhaps the same as Elead (which see) of v. 21, since several of the names (see Tahath) in the list appear to be repeated.

ELEA'LEH (e-le-a'le; "God has ascended"). A town of the Amorites, in the country E of the Jordan, in the tribe of Reuben (Num. 32:3–37). Prophetic threats were uttered against it (Isa. 15:4; Jer. 48:34). The present El-Al, about a mile N from Heshbon, marks the site.

ELE'ASAH (el-e'a-sa). More properly Elasah (which see).

1. The son of Helez, one of the descendants of Judah, of the family of Hezron (1 Chron. 2:39).

2. Son of Rapha, or Rephaiah, a descendant of Saul through Jonathan and Merib-baal, or Mephibosheth (1 Chron. 8:37; 9:43), after 1030 B.C.

ELEA'ZAR (el-e-a'zar; "God is helper"). A common name among the Hebrews.

1. The high priest. The third son of Aaron by Elisheba, daughter of Amminadab (Ex. 6:23; 28:1). He married a daughter of Putiel, who bore him Phinehas (6:25), c. 1440 B.C.

After the death of Nadab and Abihu, who had no children (Lev. 10:12; Num. 3:4), Eleazar was appointed chief over the principal Levites, to have the oversight of those who had charge of the sanctuary (3:32). After the destruction of Korah and his company, Eleazar gathered up their censers out of the fire to make plates for a covering of the altar of burnt offering (16:37–39). With his brother Ithamar he ministered as a priest during their father's lifetime.

Immediately before the death of Aaron, Moses went with them both to Mt. Hor, where he invested Eleazar with the sacred garments, as the successor of Aaron in the office of high priest (Num. 20:25–29), about 1402 B.C. One of his first duties was, in conjunction with Moses, to superintend the census of the people (26:1–4). He also assisted at the inauguration of Joshua (27:18–23) and at the division of the spoil taken from the Midianites (31:21). After the conquest of Canaan he took part in the division of the land (Josh. 14:1). The time of his death is not mentioned in Scripture. Josephus says that it took place about the same time as Joshua's, twenty-five years after the death of Moses. The high priesthood is said to have remained in the family of Eleazar until the time of Eli, into whose family, for some reason unknown, it passed until it was restored to the family of Eleazar in the person of Zadok (2 Sam. 8:17; 1 Chron. 6:8; 24:3; 1 Kings 2:27) (Smith, s.v.).

2. An inhabitant of Kiriath-jearim, who was set apart by his fellow townsmen to attend upon the Ark while it remained in the house of his father, Abinadab, after it had been returned to the Hebrews by the Philistines (1 Sam. 7:1–2), before 1030 B.C. It is not stated that Eleazar was a Levite, but that is very probable, because otherwise they would hardly have consecrated him to be the keeper of the Ark, but would have chosen a Levite for the purpose.

3. The son of Dodo the Ahohite, that is, possibly a descendant of Ahoah, of the tribe of Benjamin (2 Sam. 23:9; 1 Chron. 8:4), one of the three most eminent of David's thirty-seven heroes, who fought "until his hand was weary" in maintaining with David and the other two a daring stand after "the men of Israel had withdrawn." He was also one of the same three when they broke through the Philistine host to gratify David's longing for a drink of water from the well of his native Bethlehem (2 Sam. 23:9–17; 1 Chron. 11:12), about 998 B.C.

4. A Levite, son of Mahli and grandson of Merari (after 1400 B.C.). He is mentioned as having had only daughters, who were married by their "brothers," i.e., cousins (1 Chron. 23:21–22; 24:28).

5. The son of Phinehas, and associated with the priests and Levites in taking charge of the sacred treasure and vessels restored to Jerusalem after the Exile (Ezra 8:33), about 457 B.C. It is not definitely stated, however, whether he was a priest or even a Levite.

6. One of the descendants of Parosh, an Israelite (i.e., layman) who, on returning from Babylon, renounced the Gentile wife whom he had married (Ezra 10:25), 456 B.C.

7. One of those who encompassed the walls of Jerusalem when they were completed (Neh. 12:42), 445 B.C. He is probably the same as no. 5.

8. The son of Eliud, in the genealogy of Jesus Christ (Matt. 1:15).

ELECT (Heb. bāhîr, "chosen"; so rendered in 2 Sam. 21:6). Used to denote those selected by God for special office, work, honor, etc. (Isa. 42:1; 45:4; 65:9, 22, all KJV; NASB, NIV, "chosen"). The term was sometimes applied in the early church (1) to the whole body of baptized Christians; (2) to the highest class of catechumens elected to baptism; and (3) to the newly baptized, as especially admitted to the full privileges of the profession.

ELECTION (Gk. eklogē, "choice," a "picking out").

Bible Meaning. This word in the Scriptures has three distinct applications. (1) To the divine choice of nations or communities for the possession of special privileges with reference to the performance of special services. Thus the Jews were "a chosen nation," "the elect." Thus also in the NT, bodies of Christian people, or churches, are called "the elect." (2) To the divine choice of individuals to a particular office or work. Thus Cyrus was elected of God to bring about the rebuilding of the Temple, and thus the twelve were chosen to be apostles and Paul to be the apostle to the Gentiles. (3) To the divine choice of individuals to be the children of God, and therefore heirs of heaven.

It is with regard to election in this third sense that theological controversies have been frequent and at times most fierce. Calvinists hold that the election of individuals to salvation is absolute, unconditional, by virtue of an eternal divine decree. Arminians regard election as conditional upon repentance and faith; the decree of God is that all who truly repent of their sins and believe on the Lord Jesus Christ shall be saved. But every responsible person determines for himself whether or not he will repent and believe. Sufficient grace is bestowed upon everyone to enable him to make the right decision.

The Calvinistic View. The Westminster Confession, the standard of the Church of Scotland and of the various Presbyterian churches of Europe and America, contains the following statement: "God from all eternity did by the most wise and holy counsel of His own free will freely and unchangeably ordain whatsoever comes to pass; yet so as thereby neither is God the author of sin, nor is violence offered to the will of the creatures, nor is the liberty or contingency of second causes taken away, but rather established. Although God knows whatsoever may or can come to pass upon all supposed conditions, yet hath He not decreed anything because He foresaw its future, or as that which would come to pass upon such conditions. By the decree of God, for the manifestation of His glory some men and angels are predestinated unto everlasting life and others foreordained to everlasting death. These angels and men, thus predestinated and foreordained are particularly and unchangeably designed, and their number is so certain and definite that it cannot be either increased or diminished. Those of mankind that are predestinated unto life, God, before the foundation of the world was laid, according to His eternal and immutable purpose, and the secret counsel and good pleasure of His will, hath chosen in Christ unto everlasting glory, out of His mere free grace and love, without any foresight of faith, or good works, or perseverance in either of them, or any other thing in the creature, as conditions or causes moving Him thereto; and all to the praise of His glorious grace. As God hath appointed the elect unto glory, so hath He, by the eternal and most free purpose of His will, foreordained all the means thereunto. Therefore, they who are elected, being fallen in Adam, are redeemed by Christ, are effectually called unto faith in Christ, by His Spirit working in due season; are justified, adopted, sanctified, and kept by His power through faith unto salvation. Neither are any other redeemed by Christ, effectually called, justified, adopted, sanctified, and saved, but the elect only. The rest of mankind God was pleased, according to the unsearchable counsel of His own will, whereby He extendeth or withholdeth mercy, as He pleaseth, for the glory of His sovereign power over His creatures, to pass by, and to ordain them to dishonor and wrath for their sin, to the praise of His glorious justice.”

In support of this doctrine several arguments are made by Calvinistic theologians: (1) According to the Scriptures election is not of works but of grace; and that it is not of works means that it is not what man does that determines whether he is to be one of the elect or not. For the descendants of Adam this life is not a probation. They stood their probation in Adam and do not stand each one for himself. (2) The sovereignty of God in electing men to salvation is shown by the fact that repentance and faith are gifts from God. These fruits of His Spirit are the consequences and signs of election and not its conditions. (3) The salvation that is of grace must be of grace throughout. The element of works or human merit must not be introduced at any point in the plan. And that would be the case if repentance and faith were the conditions of election. (4) The system of doctrine called Calvinistic, Augustinian, Pauline, should not be thus designated. That though taught clearly by Paul, particularly in Rom. 8:9, it was taught also by others of the writers of sacred Scripture, and by Christ Himself. Reference is made to Matt. 11:25–26; Luke 4:25–27; 8:10; John 6:37, 39; etc. (5) That the sovereignty of God is evidenced in dispensing saving grace is illustrated also in His establishing the temporal conditions of mankind. Some are born and reared in the surroundings of civilization, others of barbarism. And precisely so some are blessed with the light of the gospel, while others, dwelling in pagan lands, are deprived of that light and consequently are not saved.

This system of strict Calvinism above outlined has received various modifications by theologians of the Calvinistic school. The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, May 1903, adopted the following: “We believe that all who die in infancy, and all others given by the Father to the Son who are beyond the reach of the outward means of grace, are regenerated and saved by Christ through the Spirit, who works when and where and how He pleases.”

The Arminian View. The Arminian view of election has been in recent years more generally accepted than formerly, even among denominations whose teaching has been Calvinistic or indefinite upon this point. This view grounds itself, in opposition to Calvinism, upon the universality of the atonement and the graciously restored freedom of the human will. Election, accordingly, is not absolute but conditional, contingent upon the proper acceptance of such gifts of grace as God by His Spirit and providence puts within the reach of men. Inasmuch as this subject involves the character and method of the divine government and the destiny of the entire race, the following should be said: (1) According to the Arminian doctrine the purpose of God to redeem mankind was bound up with His purpose to create. The Lamb of God was “slain from the foundation of the world” (Rev. 13:8, KJV, NIV). God would not have permitted a race of sinners to come into existence without provision to save them. Such provision must not be for only a part but for the whole of the fallen race. To suppose the contrary is opposed to the divine perfections. To doom to eternal death any number of mankind who were born in sin and without sufficient remedy would be injustice. (2) The benefits of the atonement are universal and in part unconditional. They are unconditional with respect to those who, through no fault of their own, are in such a mental or moral condition as to make it impossible for them either to accept or reject Christ. A leading denomination emphasizes the doctrine that “all children, by virtue of the unconditional benefits of the atonement, are members of the kingdom of God.” This principle extends to others besides children, both in heathen and Christian lands. God alone is competent to judge the extent to which, in varying degrees, human beings are responsible, and therefore the extent to which the unconditional benefits of the atonement may be applied. (3) The purpose or decree of God is to save all who do not, actually or implicitly, willfully reject the saving offices of the Lord Jesus Christ. Among those who have not heard the gospel may exist “the spirit of faith and the purpose of righteousness.” Thus even those who have no knowledge of the historic Christ virtually determine whether or not they will be saved through Christ. They to whom the gospel is preached have higher advantages and more definite responsibilities. To them, repentance toward God and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ are the conditions of salvation. (4) Upon all men God bestows some measure of His grace, restoring to the depraved will sufficient freedom to enable them to accept Christ and be saved. Thus, in opposition to Calvinists, Arminians assert that not only Adam, but also his depraved descendants are in a stage of probation.

In behalf of this doctrine the following is argued: (1) That the whole trend of the Scriptures is to declare the responsibility of men and their actual power to choose between life and death. (2) That the Scriptures explicitly teach that it is the will of God that all men should be saved. Only those perish who wickedly resist His will (1 Tim. 2:4; 4:10; John 5:40; Acts 7:51; etc.). (3) That the Scriptures declare the universality of Christ’s atonement, and in some degree the universality of its benefits (Heb. 2:9; John 1:29; 3:16–17; 1 Cor. 15:22; Rom. 5:18–19; and many other passages). (4) That the doctrine of unconditional election necessarily implies that of unconditional reprobation; and that is to charge God with cruelty. (5) That unconditional election also necessarily implies the determinate number of the elect, a point that Calvinists hold, though they admit that they have for it no explicit teaching of Scripture. To the contrary, the Scriptures not only generally but particularly teach that the number of the elect can be increased or diminished. This is the purport of all those passages in which sinners are exhorted to repent, or believers warned against becoming apostate, or to “make certain about His calling and choosing you” (Matt. 24:4, 13; 2 Pet. 1:10; etc.). (6) That the Scriptures never speak of impenitent and unbelieving men as elect, as in some cases it would be proper to do if election were antecedent to repentance and faith and not conditioned thereby. (7) That the whole theory of unconditional election is of the same tendency with fatalism. (8) That the logic of unconditional election is opposed to true evangelism. (9) That the essential features of the Arminian doctrine of election belong to the primitive and truly historic doctrine of the church. Augustine was the first prominent teacher of unconditional election, and he, regardless of the logical inconsistency, granted that reprobation is not unconditional. This doctrine of Augustine was first formally accepted by the church in A.D. 529, in the Canons of the Council of Orange, approved by Pope Boniface II. The prominence of unconditional election in the theory of Protestantism is due largely to the influence and work of John Calvin, who, at the age of twenty-five, wrote his Institutes, in which he not only set forth the Augustinian doctrine of unconditional election, but also taught unconditional reprobation. John Wesley and his followers were responsible in a large degree for reviving and developing the doctrine of Arminius.

The limits of this article do not permit an examination of the contested passages of Scripture. For that, the reader should refer to works of systematic theology and to the commentaries. E.MCC.

EL-ʿELO-HE-IS-RAEL (el'e-lo'hē-iz'ra-el; the “mighty God of Israel”). Jacob called by this name an altar pitched before Shechem (Gen. 33:20) in accordance with his vow (28:20–22) to give glory to the “God of Israel.”

ELEMENTS (Gk. stoicheion, “orderly”). The component parts of the physical universe. “The elements will melt with intense heat” (2 Pet. 3:10, 12), i.e., be reduced to as confused a chaos as that from which it was first created.

Figurative. The term is used figuratively of the elementary parts of religion (Heb. 5:12), the elements of religious training, or the ceremonial precepts common alike to the worship of the Jews and Gentiles (Gal. 4:3, 9); the ceremonial requirements, especially of Jewish tradition (Col. 2:8, 20). These types, “weak” and “beggarly” (KJV; the NIV renders, “basic principles of this world”), were suited to a condition of comparative childhood, in which appeals must be made to the senses.

ELHAʿNAN (el-haʿnan; “God is gracious”).

1. A distinguished warrior in the time of King David, who performed a memorable exploit against the Philistines, though in what that exploit exactly consisted and who the hero himself was it is not easy to determine (about 989 B.C.). Second Sam. 21:19 says that he was the “son of Jaare-oregim the Bethlehemite” and that he “killed Goliath the Gittite, the shaft of whose spear was like a weaver’s beam.” In the KJV the words “the brother of” are inserted to bring the passage into agreement with 1 Chron. 20:5, which states that “Elhanan the son of Jair killed Lahmi the brother of Goliath the Gittite, the shaft of whose spear,” etc. Of these two statements the latter is correct, the former containing a textual corruption. See E. Young, Introduction to the O. T. (1949), p. 182.

2. The name Elhanan also occurs as that of “the son of Dodo” (2 Sam. 23:24; 1 Chron. 11:26). He is given as one of “the thirty” of David’s guard. Perhaps his father had both names. “This Elhanan is not the same as the one mentioned above” (Keil, Com.).

EʿLI (ēʿlī; “high,” i.e., “God is high”). The name of a high priest mentioned in 1 Sam. (see below) and that of the father-in-law of Joseph, the maternal grandfather of Jesus (Luke 3:23; “Heli,” KJV).

EʿLI (ēʿlī; “high,” i.e., “God is high”). This Eli (for the other, see article above), a high priest, was descended from Aaron through Ithamar (Lev. 10:1–2, 12), as appears from the fact that Abiathar, who was certainly a lineal descendant of Eli (1 Kings 2:27), had a son, Ahimelech, who is expressly stated to have been “of the sons of Ithamar” (1 Chron. 24:3; cf. 2 Sam. 8:17).

High Priest. Eli is generally supposed to have been the first of the line of Ithamar who held the office of high priest (Josephus Ant. 5.11.5). How the office ever came into the younger branch of the house of Aaron we are not informed, but it is very evident that it was no unauthorized usurpation on the part of Eli (1 Sam. 2:27–30).

Judge. Eli also acted as judge of Israel, being the immediate predecessor of Samuel (7:6, 15–17), the last of the judges. He was also the first judge who was of priestly descent and is said to have judged Israel forty years (4:18).

Sons. His sons, Hophni and Phinehas, conducted themselves so outrageously that they excited deep disgust among the people and rendered the services of the Temple odious in their eyes (2:12–17, 22). Of this misconduct Eli was aware but contented himself with mild and ineffectual remonstrances (2:23–25) where his station required severe and vigorous action (3:13).

Prophetic Warnings. A prophet was sent to announce the destruction of the house of Eli, as a sign of which both his sons should be slain in one day, a faithful priest should be raised up in his place, and those who remained of Eli's house should come crouching to him with the prayer to be put into one of the priests' offices to earn a morsel of bread (2:27–36). Another warning was sent to Eli by the mouth of the youthful Samuel (3:11–18).

Death. At last the Israelites rose against the Philistines but were defeated near Ebenezer. They then took the Ark of the Covenant into the camp, hoping thereby to secure the help of God; but in a succeeding engagement they suffered a still greater defeat, in which Eli's sons were slain. When tidings were brought to Eli that Israel was defeated—that his sons were slain and the Ark of God was taken—he “fell off the seat backward beside the gate, and his neck was broken and he died, for he was old and heavy” (1 Sam. 4:18), about 1050 B.C. The final judgment upon Eli's house was accomplished when Solomon removed Abiathar from his office and restored the line of Eleazar in the person of Zadok (1 Kings 2:27).

Character. The recorded history of Eli presents to us the character of Eli in three different aspects: (1) The devoted high priest. He takes particular interest in Hannah when he understands her sorrows and bestows upon her his priestly benediction (1:17; 2:20). He recognizes the divine message and bows in humble submission to the prophecy of his downfall (3:8, 18) and shows his profound devotion to God by his anxiety for the Ark and his sudden fall and death at the tidings of its capture. We can find in him no indication of hypocrisy or lack of faith in God. (2) As judge. The fact that he judged Israel seems to prove that his administration was, on the whole, careful and just. But his partiality appears when his own sons are the offenders. (3) As father. Eli let his paternal love run away with his judgment; his fondness for his sons restrained him from the exercise of proper parental authority.

ELI'AB (e-lī'ab; “God is father”).

1. A son of Helon and the leader of the tribe of Zebulun, who assisted Moses in numbering the people (Num. 1:9; 2:7; 10:16), about 1440 B.C. He is mentioned (7:24–29) as presenting the offering of his tribe at the dedication of the Tabernacle.

2. A Reubenite, son of Pallu (or Phallu), whose family was principal in the tribe, and father or progenitor of Dathan and Abiram, the leaders in the revolt against Moses (Num. 16:1, 12; 26:8–9; Deut. 11:6), c. 1425 B.C. Eliab had another son, Nemuel (Num. 26:9).

3. The eldest brother of David (1 Chron. 2:13) and first of the sons of Jesse, who was presented to Samuel when he came to Bethlehem to anoint a king (1 Sam. 16:6), about 1013 B.C. Eliab, with his next two younger brothers, was in the army of Saul when threatened by Goliath; it was he who made the contemptuous inquiry, with which he sought to screen his own cowardice, when David proposed to fight the Philistine, “With whom have you left those few sheep in the wilderness?” (17:28). His daughter Abihail married her second cousin, Rehoboam, and bore him three children (2 Chron. 11:18–19). Eliab is supposed to be the same as Elihu, “one of David’s brothers” (1 Chron. 27:18).

4. An ancestor of Samuel the prophet, being a Kohathite Levite, son of Nahath and father of Jeroham (1 Chron 6:27). In the other statements of the genealogy this name appears to be given as Elihu (1 Sam. 1:1) and Eliel (1 Chron. 6:34).

5. A valiant man, one of the Gadites who joined David in the stronghold in the wilderness (1 Chron. 12:9).

6. A Levite, who was one of the second rank of those appointed to conduct the music of the sanctuary in the time of David and whose part was to play “with harps tuned to alamoth.” He also served as gatekeeper (1 Chron. 15:18, 20; 16:5), about 986 B.C.

ELI’ADA (e-lī’a-da; “God is knowing”).

1. One of the youngest sons of David, born at Jerusalem, the child (as it would seem) of one of his wives and not of a concubine (2 Sam. 5:16; 1 Chron. 3:8–9), after 1000 B.C. In 14:7 the name appears in the form Beeliada (whom the “master has known”). As to the difficulty of David’s using a name that contained Baal for one of its elements, it is doubtful whether that word, which literally means “master,” or “husband,” had in David’s time acquired the bad sense that Baal worship in Israel afterward imparted to it (Kitto, s.v.).

2. The father of Rezon, who fled from the service of Hadadezer, king of Zobah, and became a captain of Syrian marauders who annoyed Solomon during his reign (1 Kings 11:23–24), after 960 B.C.

3. A Benjamite and mighty man of war, who led 200,000 archers of his tribe to the army of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 17:17), 875 B.C.

ELI’AHBA (e-lī’a-ba; “God will hide”). A Shaalbonite, one of David’s thirty chief warriors (2 Sam. 23:32; 1 Chron. 11:33), about 1000 B.C.

ELI’AKIM (e-lī’a-kim; “God will establish”).

1. Son of Hilkiah and “over the household” of King Hezekiah (2 Kings 18:18; 19:2). He succeeded Shebna in this office after the latter had been removed from it as a punishment for his pride (Isa. 22:15–20), after 719 B.C. He was one of the three persons sent by Hezekiah to receive the message of the invading Assyrians (2 Kings 18:18; Isa. 36:3, 11, 22) and afterward to report it to Isaiah. Eliakim was a good man, as appears by the title emphatically applied to him by God, “My servant Eliakim” (22:20), and as was shown by his conduct on the occasion of Sennacherib’s invasion (2 Kings 18:18, 26, 37; 19:1–5) and also in the discharge of the duties of his high station (Isa. 22:20–21).

The office that Eliakim held has long been a subject of perplexity to commentators. The ancients, including the LXX and Jerome, understood it of the priestly office. But it is certain, from the description of the office in Isa. 22, and especially from the expression in v. 22, “I will set the key of the house of David on his shoulder,” that it was the king’s house, and not the house of God, of which Eliakim was made prefect (Smith, Dict., s.v.; Delitzsch, Com.). Most commentators agree that Isa. 22:25 does not apply to him, but to Shebna. Delitzsch, however, says: “Eliakim himself is also brought down at last by the greatness of his power on account of the nepotism to which he has given way.”

2. The original name of Jehoiakim (which see), king of Judah (2 Kings 23:34; 2 Chron. 36:4).

3. A priest in the days of Nehemiah who assisted at the dedication of the new wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:41), 445 B.C.

4. Son of Abiud and father of Azor, of the posterity of Zerubbabel (Matt. 1:13). He is probably identical with Shecaniah (1 Chron. 3:21).

5. The son of Melea and father of Jonam, in the genealogy of Christ (Luke 3:30), probably the grandson of Nathan, of the private line of David's descent, considerably after 1000 B.C.

E'LIAM (e'li-am; "God of the people").

1. The father of Bathsheba, the wife of Uriah and afterward of David (2 Sam. 11:3). In the list of 1 Chron. 3:5 the names of both father and daughter are altered, the former to Ammiel and the latter to Bath-shua.

2. Son of Ahithophel, the Gilonite, one of David's "thirty" warriors (2 Sam. 23:34), about 1000 B.C. The name is omitted in the list of 1 Chron. 11, but is now probably discernible as "Ahijah the Pelonite." The ancient Jewish tradition, preserved by Jerome, is that the two Eliams are one and the same person (Smith, Dict.).

ELI'AS (e-li'as), the Grecized form in which the name of Elijah is given in the KJV of the Apocrypha and NT.

ELI'ASAPH (e-li'a-saf; "God has added").

1. The son of Deuel (or Reuel), head of the tribe of Gad at the time of the census in the wilderness of Sinai (Num. 1:14; 2:14; 7:42, 47; 10:20), about 1438 B.C.

2. The son of Lael and leader of the family of Gershonite Levites (Num. 3:24).

ELI'ASHIB (e-li'a-shib; "God will restore"). A common name among the Israelites, especially in the latter period of OT history.

1. A son of Elioenai, one of the last descendants of the royal family of Judah (1 Chron. 3:24).

2. A priest in the time of King David, head of the eleventh "lot" in the order of the "officers" of the sanctuary (1 Chron. 24:12), about 989 B.C.

3. A Levitical singer who divorced his Gentile wife after the Exile (Ezra 10:24), 556 B.C.

4. An Israelite of the lineage of Zattu, who did the same (Ezra 10:27), 456 B.C.

5. An Israelite of the lineage of Bani, who did the same (Ezra 10:36), 456 B.C.

6. The high priest of the Jews in the time of Nehemiah (445 B.C.). With the assistance of his fellow priests he rebuilt the eastern city wall adjoining the Temple (Neh. 3:1). His own mansion was, doubtless, situated in the same vicinity (3:20–21). Eliashib was related in some way to Tobiah the Ammonite, for whom he prepared an anteroom in the Temple, a desecration that excited the pious indignation of Nehemiah (13:4, 7). One of the grandsons of Eliashib had also married the daughter of Sanballat the Horonite (13:28). There seems to be no reason to doubt that the same Eliashib is referred to, in Ezra 10:6, as the father of Jehohanan with whom Ezra consulted concerning the transgression of the people in taking Gentile wives. He is evidently the same as the son of Joiakim mentioned in the succession of high priests (Neh. 12:10, 22).

ELI'ATHAH (e-li'a-tha; "God has come"). The eighth named of the fourteen sons of the Levite Heman, and a musician in the time of David (1 Chron. 25:4). With twelve of his sons and brothers he had the twentieth division of the Temple service (25:27), about 970 B.C.

ELI'DAD (e-li'dad; "God of his love"). Son of Chislon (NIV, Kislon), and a leader of the tribe of Benjamin who represented his tribe among the commissioners appointed to divide the Promised Land (Num. 34:21), c. 1390 B.C.

ELIEHOE'NAI (el-i-hō'-e'nī; "toward Jehovah" are "my eyes").

1. The seventh son of Meshelemia, one of the Korhite gatekeepers of the Temple (1 Chron. 26:3; "Elioenai," KJV), about 960 B.C.

2. A son of Zerariah, of the “sons of Pahath-moab,” who returned with 200 males from the Exile (Ezra 8:4), 457 B.C.

E'LIEL (e'li-el; “God is God”).

1. One of the leaders of the tribe of Manasseh, on the E of the Jordan, a mighty man (1 Chron. 5:24).

2. The son of Toah and father of Jeroham, ancestors of Heman the singer and Levite (1 Chron. 6:34); probably identical with the Eliab of v. 27 and of the Elihu of 1 Sam. 1:1.

3. One of the descendants of Shimei, and leader of a Benjamite family in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:20).

4. One of the descendants of Shashak, and also leader of a Benjamite family in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:22).

5. “The Mahavite,” one of David’s distinguished warriors (1 Chron. 11:46), 991 B.C.

6. Another of the same guard, but without any express designation (1 Chron. 11:47).

7. One of the Gadite heroes who came across the Jordan and joined David in his stronghold in the wilderness (1 Chron. 12:11); possibly the same as no. 5 or 6, about 1000 B.C.

8. One of the eighty Hebronite Levites who assisted David in the removal of the Ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 15:9, 11), about 982 B.C.

9. One of the Levites appointed by Hezekiah to have charge of the offerings and tithes dedicated in the Temple (2 Chron. 31:13), about 719 B.C.

ELIE'NAI (el-i-ē'ni; “toward God are my eyes”). A descendant of Shimei, and a leader of one of the Benjamite families resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:20).

ELIE'ZER (el-i-ē'zer; “God of help”).

1. “Eliezer of Damascus,” mentioned in Gen. 15:2–3, apparently a house-born domestic and steward of Abraham and hence likely, in the absence of direct issue, to become the patriarch’s heir, about 2070 B.C. The common notion is that Eliezer was Abraham’s house-born slave, adopted as his heir, and meanwhile his chief servant, the same who afterward was sent into Mesopotamia to seek a wife for Isaac. “This last point we may dismiss with the remark that there is not the least evidence that ‘the elder servant of his house’ (Gen. 24:2 KJV) was the same with Eliezer” (Kitto).

Much difficulty has arisen from the seeming contradiction in the two expressions “Eliezer of Damascus” and “one born in my house” (Gen. 15:2–3). The question arises as to how Eliezer could have been a house-born slave, seeing that Abraham’s household was never in Damascus. The answer is that the expression “the heir of my house” literally translated is “the son of possession of my house” and is exactly the same as the phrase in v. 3, “the son of my house [“one born in my house,” NASB; NIV, however, “a servant in my house”] is my heir.” This removes every objection to Eliezer’s being of Damascus and leaves it more probable that he was not a servant at all but a near relative, perhaps nearer than Lot. Some, indeed, identify Eliezer with Lot, which would afford an excellent explanation if Scripture afforded sufficient grounds for it (Keil, Com.; Kitto).

2. The second of the two sons of Moses and Zipporah, born during the exile in Midian, to whom his father gave this name, “for he said, ‘the God of my father was my help, and delivered me from the sword of Pharaoh’” (Ex. 18:4; 1 Chron. 23:15), before 1440 B.C. He remained with his mother and brother, Gershom, in the care of Jethro, his grandfather, when Moses returned to Egypt (Ex. 18:2–4). Jethro brought Zipporah and her two sons back to Moses in the wilderness after the Exodus from Egypt (18:5). Eliezer had one son, Rehabiah, from whom sprang a numerous posterity (1 Chron. 23:17; 26:25–26). Shelomoth, in the reigns of Saul and David (v. 28), had the care of all the treasures of things dedicated to God and was descended from Eliezer in the sixth generation, if the genealogy in 26:25 is complete.

3. A son of Becher and grandson of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:8).
4. One of the priests who blew the trumpets before the Ark when it was brought to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 15:24), about 982 B.C.
5. Son of Zichri, and “chief officer” of the Reubenites in the reign of David (1 Chron. 27:16).
6. A prophet (son of Dodavahu, of Mareshah) who foretold to Jehoshaphat (which see) that the fleet he had fitted out in partnership with Ahaziah would be wrecked (2 Chron. 20:37), after 875 B.C.
7. A leader of the Jews during the Exile, sent by Ezra with others from Ahava to Casiphia to induce some Levites and Temple servants to join the party returning to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:16), 457 B.C.
- 8, 9, 10. A priest (descendant of Jeshua), a Levite, and an Israelite (of the lineage of Harim), who divorced their Gentile wives after the Exile (Ezra 10:18, 23, 31), 456 B.C.
11. Son of Jorim and father of Joshua, of the private lineage of David prior to Shealtiel (Luke 3:29), before 588 B.C.

ELIHOE'NAI. See Eliehoenai.

ELIHO'REPH (el-i-hō'ref; “God of autumn”). Son of Shisha, and appointed, with his brother Ahijah, secretary by Solomon (1 Kings 4:3), 959 B.C.

ELI'HU (e-lī'hū; “my God is he”).

1. The son of Tohu and grandfather of Elkanah, Samuel's father (1 Sam. 1:1). In the statements of the genealogy of Samuel in 1 Chronicles, the name Eliel (which see) occurs in the same position—son of Toah and father of Jeroham (6:34); and also Eliab (which see; 6:27), father of Jeroham and grandson of Zophai. The general opinion is that Elihu is the original name, and the two latter forms are copyists' variations of it.

2. One of the captains of Manasseh (1 Chron. 12:20) who followed David to Ziklag on the eve of the battle of Gilboa and who assisted him against the Amalekites (1 Sam. 30), about 1001 B.C.

3. One of the very able-bodied members of the family of Obed-edom (a grandson by Shemaiah) who were appointed gatekeepers of the Temple under David (1 Chron. 26:7), after 1000 B.C. Terms applied to all these gatekeepers appear to indicate that they were not only “strong men,” as in the KJV, but also fighting men (see vv. 6–8, 12, in which the Heb. words for army and warriors, or heroes, occur).

4. A “chief officer” of the tribe of Judah, said to be “one of David's brothers” (1 Chron. 27:18) and hence supposed by some to have been his eldest brother, Eliab (1 Sam. 16:6), 1000 B.C.

5. One of Job's friends. He is described as “the son of Barachel the Buzite, of the family of Ram” (Job 32:2). This is usually understood to imply that he was descended from Buz, the son of Abraham's brother Nahor. For his part in the remarkable discussion, see Job.

ELIJAH (e-lī'ja; “my God is Jehovah”). The name of the great prophet (which see) and three other biblical characters.

1. One of the “sons of Jeroham,” and head of a Benjamite family resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:27).

2. A priest of the “sons of Harim,” who divorced his Gentile wife on returning from the Exile (Ezra 10:21), 456 B.C.

3. One of the “sons of Elam,” who divorced his Gentile wife on returning from the Exile (Ezra 10:26), 456 B.C.

ELI'JAH (e-li'ja; "my God is Jehovah"). The prophet Elijah came from Tishbeh in Gilead, a district that shared deeply in the miseries of the kingdom of the ten tribes. Nothing is known concerning his family or birth.

The better to understand his history, let us briefly consider the condition of affairs when Elijah made his appearance. Ahab had taken Jezebel, a Canaanite woman and daughter of Ethbaal, for his wife. Of a weak and yielding character, he allowed Jezebel to establish the Phoenician worship on a grand scale—priests and prophets of Baal were appointed in crowds—the prophets of Jehovah were persecuted and slain or only escaped by being hid in caves. It seemed the last remnants of true religion were about to perish. Jezebel had also induced Ahab to issue orders for the violent death of all the prophets of Jehovah who, since the expulsion of the Levites, had been the only firm support of the ancient religion (see 1 Kings 18:4, 13, 22; 19:10, 14; 2 Kings 9:7).

Appears Before Ahab. Elijah suddenly appeared before Ahab and proclaimed the vengeance of Jehovah for the apostasy of the king. "As the Lord, the God of Israel lives, before whom I stand, surely there shall be neither dew nor rain these years, except by my word" (1 Kings 17:1). This was probably the conclusion of a warning given the king of the consequences of his iniquitous course (about 870 B.C.). Warned by God, Elijah went and hid by Cherith, perhaps the present Wadi Kelt. There he remained, supported by ravens, until the brook dried up. Then another refuge was provided for him at Zarephath (which see). "Then the word of the Lord came to him, saying, 'Arise, go to Zarephath ... and stay there.'" At the gate of the city he met the woman who was to sustain him, herself on the verge of starvation. Obedient to his request to prepare him food, she was rewarded by the miracle of the prolonging of the meal and oil and the restoration of her son to life after his sudden death (17:8–10, 16, 21–22).

Second Appearance Before Ahab. For three years and six months there had been no rain (James 5:17). At last the full horrors of famine, caused by the failure of the crops, descended on Samaria. Elijah, returning to Israel, found Ahab still alive and unreformed, Jezebel still worshiping her idols, and the prophets of Baal still deceiving the people. Elijah first presented himself (1 Kings 18) to Obadiah, the principal servant of Ahab and a true servant of God. He requested him to announce his return to Ahab, and Obadiah, his fears having been removed by the prophet, consented. The conversation between Ahab and Elijah, when they met soon after, began with the question of the king, "Is this you, you troubler of Israel?" Elijah answered unhesitatingly, "I have not troubled Israel, but you and your father's house have, because you have forsaken the commandments of the Lord, and you have followed the Baals" (vv. 17–18). He then challenged Ahab to exercise his authority in summoning an assembly to Mt. Carmel that the controversy between them might be decided.

On Carmel. Whatever his secret purposes were, Ahab accepted this proposal, and the people also consented. Fire was the element over which Baal was supposed to preside so Elijah proposed (wishing to give them every advantage) that two oxen be slain and each laid upon a separate altar, the one for Baal, the other for Jehovah; whichever should be consumed by fire would proclaim whose the children of Israel were and whom it was their duty to serve (vv. 23–24). There are few more sublime stories in history than this. On the one hand the servant of Jehovah, attended by his one servant, with his wild, shaggy hair, his scanty garb, and sheepskin cloak, but with calm dignity of demeanor and the minutest regularity of procedure. On the other hand the prophets of Baal and Ashtaroath—doubtless in all the splendor of their vestments (2 Kings 10:22), with the wild din of their vain repetitions and the maddened fury of their disappointed hopes—and the silent people surrounding all; these form a picture that brightens into fresh distinctness every time we consider it. The Baalites were allowed to make trial first. All day long these false prophets cried to Baal; they leaped upon the altar, and mingled their blood with that of the sacrifice—but all was in vain, for at the time of the evening sacrifice the altar was still cold and the ox unconsumed—“there was no voice, no one answered, and no one paid attention” (1 Kings 18:29). Then Elijah repaired the broken altar of Jehovah, and, having laid his ox on it and drenched both altar and sacrifice with water until the trench about them was filled, he prayed, “O Lord, the God of Abraham, Isaac and Israel, today let it be known that Thou art God in Israel, and that I am Thy servant, and that I have done all these things at Thy word.” The answer was all that could be desired, for the “fire of the Lord fell, and consumed the burnt offering and the wood and the stones and the dust, and licked up the water that was in the trench.” The people acknowledged the presence of God, exclaiming with one voice, “The Lord, He is God; the Lord, He is God.” By Elijah’s direction the priests were slain and Ahab informed that he might take refreshment, for God would send the desired rain (vv. 31–44).

Prays for Rain. Elijah prayed, God heard and answered; a little cloud arose, and, diffusing itself gradually over the entire face of the heavens, emptied its refreshing waters upon the whole land of Israel. Ahab rode to Jezreel, a distance of at least sixteen miles; the prophet also “girded up his loins and outran Ahab to Jezreel” (v. 46).

Flees from Jezebel. The prophets of Baal were destroyed and Ahab was cowed, but Jezebel remained undaunted. She made a vow against the life of the prophet, who, attended by his servant—according to Jewish tradition, the boy of Zarephath—took refuge in flight. The first stage in his journey was “Beersheba, which belongs to Judah.” Leaving his servant in the town he set out alone into the wilderness (19:1–4).

Under the Juniper Tree. The labors, anxieties, and excitement of the last few days had proved too much even for that iron frame and stern resolution. His spirit was broken, and, sitting beneath a juniper tree, Elijah wished for death. “It is enough; now, O Lord, take my life, for I am not better than my fathers.” But sleep and food, miraculously furnished, refreshed the weary prophet, and he went forward in the strength of that food to Mt. Horeb, a journey of forty days (vv. 4–8).

At Horeb. After he rested in a cave one night the voice of the Lord came to him in the morning, asking, “What are you doing here, Elijah?” And then he again unburdened his soul and told his grief: “I have been very zealous for the Lord, the God of hosts, for the sons of Israel have forsaken Thy covenant ... I alone am left; and they seek my life, to take it away” (vv. 9–10). He was directed to stand outside the cave, and “the Lord was passing by” (v. 11) in all the terror of His most appalling manifestations. The fierce wind tore the solid mountains and shivered the granite cliffs of Sinai; the earthquake crash reverberated through the defiles of those naked valleys; the fire burned in the incessant blaze of Eastern lightning. Elijah’s own mode of procedure had been like these in their degree, but the conviction was now forced upon him that in none of these was Jehovah to be known. Then came the whisper of the “still small voice” (v. 12, KJV; NIV, “a gentle whisper”). Elijah knew the call and, stepping forward, hid his face in his mantle and waited for the divine communication. Three commands were laid upon him—to anoint Hazael king over Syria; Jehu the son of Nimshi, king over Israel; and Elisha the son of Shaphat to be his own successor. Of these three commands the first two were reserved for Elisha to accomplish; the last one was executed by Elijah himself (vv. 15–18).

Finds Elisha. The prophet soon found Elisha at his native place, Abel-meholah. Elisha was plowing at the time, and Elijah, without uttering a word, cast his mantle, the well-known sheepskin cloak, upon him, as if by that familiar action (which was also a symbol of official investiture) claiming him for his son. The call was accepted, and then began the long relationship that continued until Elijah’s removal (vv. 19–21).

Reproves Ahab and Jezebel. For about six years we find no notice of Elijah, until God sent him once again to pronounce judgment upon Ahab and Jezebel for the murder of the unoffending Naboth (which see). Just as Ahab was about to take possession of the vineyard he was met by Elijah, who uttered the terrible curse (21:19–24), 860 B.C. Ahab, assuming penitence and afterward proving his sincerity, was rewarded by a temporary arrest of judgment; but it took effect upon his wicked consort and children to the very letter.

Elijah and King Ahaziah. Ahaziah had succeeded Ahab, his father, upon his death and in the second year of his reign met with a serious accident. Fearing a fatal result, he sent to Ekron to learn at the shrine of Baal of the issue to his illness, but the angel of the Lord told Elijah to go forth and meet the messengers of the king. Questioned by Ahaziah as to the reason for their early return the messengers told him of their meeting the prophet and his prediction. From their description of him Ahaziah recognized Elijah, the man of God. Enraged he sent a captain with fifty men to take Elijah. The officer addressed the prophet by the title most frequently applied to him, “O man of God, the king says, “Come down.” ’ And Elijah answered and said to the captain of fifty, ‘If I am a man of God, let fire come down from heaven and consume you and your fifty.’ Then fire came down from heaven and consumed him and his fifty” (2 Kings 1:9–10). A second company shared the same fate. The altered tone of the leader of the third party, and the assurance of God that His servant need not fear, brought Elijah down. But the king gained nothing. The message delivered before was repeated to his face, and the king died shortly after (vv. 11–17). This was Elijah’s last interview with the house of Ahab, and his last recorded appearance in person against the Baal worshipers, c. 852 B.C.

Warns Jehoram. Jehoram, king of Judah, had married the daughter of Ahab and walked “in the way of the kings of Israel,” as did the house of Ahab. Elijah sent him a letter denouncing his evil doings and predicting his death (2 Chron. 21:12–15). That is Elijah’s only communication with the Southern Kingdom of which any record remains.

Closing Scenes. The faithful prophet’s warfare was now accomplished, and God would translate him in a special manner to heaven. Conscious of that, he determined to spend his last moments in imparting divine instruction to, and pronouncing his last benediction upon “the sons of the prophets” who were at Bethel and Jericho. It was at Gilgal—probably not the ancient place of Joshua and Samuel but another of the same name still surviving on the western edge of the hills of Ephraim—that the prophet received the divine intimation that his departure was at hand. Here he requested Elisha, his constant companion, to remain while he went on an errand of Jehovah. Perhaps the request was made because of the return of his old love for solitude, perhaps he desired to spare his friend the pain of too sudden a parting, or, it may be, he desired to test the affection of the latter. But Elisha would not give up his master, and they went together to Bethel (2 Kings 2:1–4). The sons of the prophets, apparently acquainted with what was about to happen, inquired of Elisha if he knew of his impending loss. His answer shows how fully he was aware of it. “Yes, I know; be still” (vv. 3, 5). Again Elijah attempted to escape to Jericho, and again Elisha protested that he would not be separated from him. Under the plea of going to Jordan, Elijah again requested Elisha to tarry, still with no success, and the two set off together toward the river. Fifty men of the sons of the prophets ascended the heights behind the town to watch what would happen. Reaching the river, Elijah rolled up his mantle as a staff, struck the waters, which divided, and the two went over on dry ground. What followed is best told in the simple words of the narrative: “Now it came about when they had crossed over, that Elijah said to Elisha, ‘Ask what I shall do for you before I am taken from you.’ And Elisha said, ‘Please, let a double portion of your spirit be upon me.’ And he said, ‘You have asked a hard thing. Nevertheless, if you see me when I am taken from you, it shall be so for you; but if not, it shall not be so.’ Then it came about as they were going along and talking, that behold, there appeared a chariot of fire and horses of fire which separated the two of them. And Elijah went up by a whirlwind to heaven.” Elisha, at the wonderful sight, cried out, like a bereaved child, “My father, my father, the chariots of Israel and its horsemen!” The mantle of his master had, however, fallen upon Elisha as a pledge that the office and spirit of the former were now his own (vv. 6–13).

Character. Elijah’s character is one of moral sublimity. His faith in God seemed to know no limit or questioning. His zeal for Jehovah was an all-absorbing motive of his life, so that he justly said, “I have been very zealous for the Lord, the God of hosts.” No danger or duty was too severe to shake his confidence—no labor too great for his Lord. His courage was undaunted, even in the presence of royalty or famine. His obedience was as simple and unquestioning as a child’s. Tender of soul, he could sympathize with the widow when she lost her child or weep over the sad condition of his deluded countrymen. Stern in principle, he was; in his opposition to sin, as fierce as the fire that more than once answered his command. He was by nature a recluse, only appearing before men to deliver his message from God and to enforce it by a miracle, and then disappearing from sight again.

The Ravens. Much ingenuity has been devoted to explaining away the obvious meaning of Elijah’s ravens (1 Kings 17:4, 6). Some suppose that the brook Cherith was a place where ravens congregated and that Elijah took from their nests morning and evening the food they brought to their young. Others have explained ṣōrbîm to mean “Arabians”; others, the inhabitants of Orbo, or Oreb; and some have thought that the word might mean “merchants,” from ṣārab, “to traffic.” The text, however, plainly records a miracle (Whedon, Com., ad loc.).

Elijah’s Mocking. Some have objected that Elijah’s mockery of Baal’s prophets was not in accordance with the spirit of Scripture—“not returning evil for evil, or insult for insult, but giving a blessing instead” (1 Pet. 3:9). “In the case of Elijah ridicule was a fit weapon for exposing the folly and absurdity of idol worship. The prophet employed it with terrible effect” (Haley, Dis.).

Letter to Jehoram. This letter has been considered a great difficulty, on the ground that Elijah’s removal must have taken place before the death of Jehoshaphat and, therefore, before the accession of Jehoram to the throne of Judah. That Jehoram began to reign during the lifetime of his father, Jehoshaphat, is stated in 2 Kings 8:16. He probably ascended the throne as viceroy or associate some years before the death of his father.

ELI’KA (e-lī’ka; perhaps “God has spewed out,” “rejected”). A Harodite, and one of David’s thirty-seven distinguished warriors (2 Sam. 23:25), about 1000 B.C.

E’LIM (ē’lim; “trees”). Second station of Israel in the desert (Ex. 15:27; Num. 33:9), where they encamped for a month (Ex. 16:1). Here were “twelve springs of water and seventy date palms.” The present Wadi Gharandel.

ELIM’ELECH (e-lim’e-lek; “God is king”). A man of the tribe of Judah who dwelt in Bethlehem in Judah in the days of the judges, probably before 1070 B.C. In consequence of a great famine in the land, he went with his wife, Naomi, and his two sons, Mahlon and Chilion, to dwell in Moab, where he and his two sons died (Ruth 1:2–3; 2:1, 3; 4:3, 9).

ELIOE’NAI (e-li-o-ē’ni; a contracted form of the name Elihoenai).

1. The eldest son of Neariah, son of Shemaiah, of the descendants of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:23–24).

2. A leader of the Simeonites (1 Chron. 4:36).

3. The fourth son of Becher, son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:8).

4. Seventh son of Meshelemiah (1 Chron. 26:3, KJV). See Eliehoenai, no. 1.

5. A priest of the sons of Pashhur, who, at the instigation of Ezra, put away his Gentile wife and offered a ram for a trespass offering (Ezra 10:22), 456 B.C. He is, perhaps, the same mentioned in Neh. 12:41 as one of the priests who accompanied Nehemiah with trumpets at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem, 445 B.C.

6. An Israelite (singer) of the sons of Zattu, who likewise divorced his Gentile wife after the Exile (Ezra 10:27), 456 B.C.

ELI'PHAL (e-lī'fal; “God his judge”). Son of Ur, and one of David’s mighty men (1 Chron. 11:35), about 1000 B.C. See Eliphelet, no. 3.

ELIPH'ALET. See Eliphelet, no. 2.

ELI'PHAZ (el'ī'faz; “God of gold,” or “God is fine gold”).

1. A son of Esau by Adah, his first wife, and father of several Edomite tribes (Gen. 36:4, 10–11, 16; 1 Chron. 1:35–36).

2. One of the three friends who came to console Job in his affliction. They had agreed to meet together for this purpose, but, overcome with feeling at the condition of their friend, they sat down in silence for seven days (Job 2:11). Eliphaz is called “the Temanite” and was probably of Teman in Edom. As Eliphaz the son of Esau had a son named Teman, from whom the place took its name, there is reason to conclude that this Eliphaz was a descendant of the former Eliphaz (Kitto). He is the first speaker among the friends and probably the eldest among them. He begins his orations with delicacy and conducts his part of the controversy with considerable address (chaps. 4–5, 15, 22). On him falls the main burden of the argument that God’s retribution in this world is perfect and certain and that, consequently, suffering must be a proof of previous sin. The great truth brought out by him is the unapproachable majesty and purity of God (4:12–21; 15:12–16). But still, with the other two friends, he is condemned because they “have not spoken of Me what is right” (42:7). “In order that they may only maintain the justice of God they have condemned Job against their better knowledge and conscience” (Delitzsch). Through sacrifice and intercession of Job all three are pardoned.

ELIPH'ELE'HU (e-lif'e-lē'hu; “whom God makes distinguished”). A Merarite Levite, one of the gatekeepers appointed by David to “lead with lyres tuned to the sheminith” on the occasion of bringing up the Ark to the city of David (1 Chron. 15:18, 21), about 982 B.C.

ELIPH'ELET (e-lif'e-let; “God of deliverance”).

1. The third of the nine sons of David, born at Jerusalem, by Bathsheba (1 Chron. 3:6; 14:5). In the latter passage the name is given in a contracted form, Elpelet (Elpalet, KJV), about 989 B.C.

2. The ninth of the same (1 Chron. 3:8; 14:7; 2 Sam. 5:16). It is believed that there were not two sons of this name but that one is merely a transcriber’s repetition. The two are certainly omitted in Samuel, but, on the other hand, they are inserted in two separate lists in Chronicles, and in both cases the number of the sons is summed up at the close of the list.

3. One of David's distinguished warriors, called "the son of Ahasbai, the son of the Maacathite" (2 Sam. 23:34) but, by some error and abbreviation, Eliphaz (which see) son of Ur, in 1 Chron. 11:35.

4. The third of the three sons of Eshek, of the posterity of Benjamin, and a descendant of King Saul through Jonathan (1 Chron. 8:39).

5. One of the three sons of Adonikam, who returned from Babylon with his brothers and sixty males (Ezra 8:13), 457 B.C.

6. A descendant of Hashum, who divorced his Gentile wife after the Exile (Ezra 10:33), 456 B.C.

ELISABETH. See Elizabeth.

ELISEUS. See Elisha.

ELISHA (e-li'sha; Heb. ēlišaʿ, "God his salvation"). The son of Shaphat, of Abel-meholah (in or near the Jordan Valley).

Call. Elisha, a husbandman, was plowing with a number of companions, himself with the twelfth plow. Elijah, on his way from Horeb to Damascus, found Elisha and threw upon his shoulders his mantle—a token of investiture with the prophet's office and of adoption as a son. Elisha accepted the call. Delaying only long enough to kiss his father and mother and give a farewell feast to his people, he "arose and followed Elijah and ministered to him" (1 Kings 19:19–21), about 856 B.C.

Elijah's Ascension. We hear no more of Elisha until he accompanied his master to the other side of the Jordan, witnessed his ascension there, with his fallen mantle parted the waters, and was welcomed by the sons of the prophets as the successor of Elijah (2 Kings 2:1–15), 846 B.C.

At Jericho. After that he dwelt at Jericho (2:18). The town had lately been rebuilt by Hiel (1 Kings 16:34) and was the residence of a body of the "sons of the prophets" (2 Kings 2:5). While he was there the citizens of the place complained to him of the foulness of its waters. He remedied the evil by casting salt into the water at its source in the name of Jehovah (2:19–22).

Mocked. Leaving Jericho he went to Bethel and upon nearing the town was met by a number of children who mockingly cried, "Go up, you baldhead." This dishonor to God through His prophet was sternly rebuked by Elisha, and "two female bears came out of the woods and tore up forty-two lads of their number. And he went from there to Mount Carmel, and from there he returned to Samaria" (2:23–25). Objection has been made to the severity of the punishment visited upon the mocking children. "It is not said that they were actually slain (the expression is bāqaʿ, 'to rend,' which is peculiarly applicable to the claws of the bear). It is by no means certain that all of them were killed" (McClintock and Strong, s.v.). Kitto thinks that these children had been instigated by their idolatrous parents to mock Elisha, and that by this judgment the people of Bethel were to know that to dishonor God's prophets was to dishonor Him.

Assists Jehoram. Jehoram, king of Israel, and the kings of Judah and Edom were united in a campaign against Moab, endeavoring to suppress a revolt that occurred shortly after the death of Ahab. A difficulty arose from the lack of water. Elisha, being appealed to, requested a minstrel to be brought, and at the sound of the music the hand of Jehovah came upon him. He ordered pits to be dug to hold the abundant supply of water that he prophesied would be given them. The water that preserved their lives became the source of destruction to their enemies, for the next morning "the sun shone on the water, and the Moabites saw the water opposite them as red as blood. Then they said, 'This is blood; the kings have surely fought together, and they have slain one another. Now therefore, Moab, to the spoil!' But when they came to the camp of Israel, the Israelites arose and struck the Moabites, so that they fled before them; and they went forward into the land, slaughtering the Moabites” (3:4–24).

Widow’s Oil. A widow of one of the sons of the prophets was in debt and her two sons about to be taken from her and sold by her creditors, as by law they had power to do (Lev. 25:39). In her extremity she implored the prophet’s assistance. Inquiring into her circumstances he learned that she had nothing in the house but a jar of oil. This Elisha caused (in his absence, 4:5) to multiply until the widow had filled with it all the vessels she could borrow, and thus she procured the means of payment (4:7). No place or date of the miracle is mentioned.

The Shunammite. On his way between Carmel and the Jordan Valley Elisha called at Shunem. Here he was hospitably entertained by a rich and godly woman. Desiring to have him as a guest on his frequent visits, she prepared a chamber for his use. This room, called ‘āliyyā (the upper chamber), is the most desirable of the house, being secluded and well fitted. Elisha, grateful for the kindness shown him, asked the woman if she would have him seek a favor for her of the king or captain of the army. She declined the prophet’s offer, saying, “I live among my own people.” Gehazi, Elisha’s servant, reminded him of the Shunammite’s childless condition, and a son was promised her, which in due time was born (4:8–17). When the child was large enough he went out to his father in the field. While there he was (probably) sunstruck, and soon died. The mother laid the dead child upon the prophet’s bed, and hastening to the prophet in Carmel she made him acquainted with her loss. Gehazi was sent before to lay Elisha’s staff upon the face of the child. The child’s life did not return, and Elisha shut himself up with the dead boy. Praying to God, he “stretched himself on him; and the flesh of the child became warm” (4:18–37).

At Gilgal. It was a time of famine, and the food of the prophets was limited to any herbs that could be found. A large pot was put on at the command of Elisha, and one of the company brought in his blanket full of such wild vegetables as he had collected and emptied it into the stew. But no sooner had they begun their meal than the taste betrayed the presence of some obnoxious herb, and they cried out, “O man of God, there is death in the pot.” In this case the cure was effected by meal that Elisha cast into the caldron (4:38–41). The next miracle probably occurred at the same time and place. A man from Baal-shalishah brought a present to Elisha of the firstfruits, which, under the law (Num. 18:8, 12; Deut. 18:3–4), were the perquisites of the ministers of the sanctuary—twenty loaves of new barley and full ears of corn in the husk (perhaps new garden grain). This, by the word of Jehovah, was rendered more than sufficient for a hundred men (4:42–44).

Naaman Cured. Naaman, captain of the army of Syria, was afflicted with leprosy, and that in its most striking form, the white variety (5:1, 27). Hearing of Elisha, he informed the king, who sent him with a letter to the king of Israel. “And now,” so ran Benhadad’s letter, “as this letter comes to you, behold, I have sent Naaman my servant to you, that you may cure him of his leprosy.” Accompanying the letter were rich presents of gold, silver, and “ten changes of clothes.” The king of Israel saw only one thing in the transaction—a desire on the part of Benhadad to pick a quarrel with him. The prophet, hearing of the matter, sent word to the king, “Now let him come to me, and he shall know that there is a prophet in Israel.” So Naaman stood with his retinue before Elisha’s house. Elisha sent a messenger to the general with the simple instruction to bathe seven times in the Jordan. Naaman was enraged at the independent behavior of the prophet and the simplicity of the prescription but, persuaded by his servants, obeyed Elisha and was healed. Returning to the prophet, he acknowledged the power of God and entreated Elisha to accept the present he had brought from Damascus. This Elisha firmly refused and dismissed him in peace (5:1–27).

Ax Raised. When the home of the prophets became too small, it was resolved to build nearer the Jordan. While one of them was felling a tree the axe head flew off and fell into the water. Appeal was made to Elisha, who “cut off a stick, and threw it in there, and made the iron float” (6:1–7).

Syrians Thwarted. The Syrians warred against Israel, but their plans, however secret, were known to Elisha, who disclosed them to the king of Israel, and by his warnings saved the king “more than once or twice.” The king of Syria, learning that Elisha the prophet told of his plans, sent a detachment of men to take him. They came by night and surrounded Dothan, where Elisha resided. His servant was the first to discover the danger and made it known to his master. At Elisha’s request the eyes of the young man were opened to behold the spiritual guards who protected them. In answer to Elisha’s prayer, the Syrians were blinded, and Elisha offered to lead them to the place and person they sought. He conducted them to Samaria, where their blindness was removed and they found themselves in the presence of the king and his troops. The king, eager to destroy them, asked, “My father, shall I kill them? Shall I kill them?” Elisha’s object was gained when he showed the Syrians the futility of their attempts against him. He, therefore, refused the king permission to slay them and, having fed them, sent them away to their master (6:8–23). “Was the deception (6:19) practiced toward the Syrians justifiable? Various answers have been given. Keil and Rawlinson apparently regard Elisha’s statement simply in the light of a ‘stratagem of war.’ Thenius says: ‘There is no untruth in the words of Elisha; for his home was not in Dothan, where he was only residing temporarily, but in Samaria; and the words “to the man” may well mean to his house.’ Some regard the prophet’s language as mere irony” (Haley, Alleged Dis.).

Famine in Syria. Ben-hadad, the king of Syria, now laid siege on Samaria, and its inhabitants were driven to great straits by reason of famine. Roused by an encounter with a ghastly incident, Jehoram, the king (Josephus Ant. 9.4.4), vented for some reason his wrath upon Elisha, and with an oath he said, “May God do so to me and more also, if the head of Elisha the son of Shaphat remains on him today” (6:31). An emissary started to execute the sentence, but Elisha, warned of the danger, told those present not to admit him, assuring them that the king himself was coming in haste to stay the result of his rash exclamation (so interprets Josephus, Ant. 9.4.4). To the king Elisha promised that within twenty-four hours food should be plentiful. The next day the Syrian camp was found deserted; the night before, God had caused the Syrians to hear the noise of horses and chariots and, believing that Jehoram had hired against them the kings of the Hittites and the king of Egypt, had fled in panic and confusion. Thus God, according to the words of Elisha, delivered Samaria. Another prediction was also accomplished, for the distrustful lord who doubted the word of Elisha was trampled to death by the famished people rushing through the city gates to the forsaken tents of the Syrians (6:24–7:20).

Shunammite’s Property Restored. Elisha, aware of the famine God was about to bring upon the land, had advised his friend the Shunammite of it that she might provide for her safety. She left Shunem for the land of the Philistines and remained there during the dearth. At the end of the seven years she returned and found her house and land appropriated by some other person. When she came to the king to ask redress he was listening to a recital by Gehazi of the great things that Elisha had done, the crowning feat being that which he was then actually relating—the restoration to life of the boy of Shunem. The woman was instantly recognized by Gehazi. “My lord, O king, this is the woman and this is her son, whom Elisha restored to life.” The king immediately ordered her land to be restored, with the value of its produce during her absence (8:1–6).

Elisha at Damascus. We next find Elisha at Damascus, where he went to anoint Hazael to be king over Syria. Ben-hadad was prostrate with his last illness and sent Hazael with a princely present to inquire of Elisha, “Will I recover from this sickness?” The answer of Elisha, though ambiguous, contained the unmistakable conclusion, “The Lord has shown me that he will certainly die.” The prophet fixed his earnest gaze upon Hazael and burst into tears. Inquired of as to the cause of his grief, Elisha told him that he would be king and bring great evil upon the children of Israel. Hazael returned and told the king that the prophet had predicted his recovery. That was the last day of Ben-hadad's life, for on the morrow he was smothered, and Hazael reigned in his stead (8:7–15).

Jehu Anointed. While Hazael was warring against the combined force of the kings of Israel and Judah (8:28) Elisha sent one of the sons of the prophets to anoint Jehu the son of Jehoshaphat king over Israel and to prophesy concerning the fearful overthrow of the house of Ahab (9:1–10).

Death. We next find Elisha upon his deathbed. Here he was visited by Joash, the grandson of Jehu, who came to weep over the departure of the great and good prophet. The king was given a test and told that he would strike Syria but three times, whereas if he had shown more energy in striking the ground with the arrows he should have completely destroyed his foe (13:14–19).

In His Tomb. The power of the prophet did not end with his death, for even in his tomb he restored the dead to life. A funeral was going on in the cemetery that contained the sepulcher of Elisha. Seeing a band of Moabites near by, the friends of the dead man hastily put him into the tomb of the prophet. The mere touch of his remains had power, for the man “revived and stood up on his feet” (13:20–21).

Character. Elisha presents a striking contrast to his master, Elijah, who was a true Bedouin child of the desert. Elisha, on the other hand, was a civilized man, preferring companionship, dwelling in cities, and often in close connection with kings. Elijah was a man whose mission was to accuse of sin or bring judgment upon men because of it; Elisha, while defending the ancient religion, came as a healer, and his miracles were those of restoring to life, increasing the widow's oil, making pure the bitter waters. There were tender sympathy for friends, tears for his country's prospective woes. And yet there was firmness in maintaining that which was right, sternness of judgment, and seeming forgetfulness of self. “In spite of all the seductions to which he was abundantly exposed through the great consideration in which he was held he retained at every period of his life the true prophetic simplicity and purity and contempt for worldly wealth and advantages” (Ewald, History of Israel, 4:83).

ELI'SHAH (e-lī'sha). The oldest of the four sons of Javan (Gen. 10:4; 1 Chron. 1:7). He seems to have given his name to “the coastlands of Elishah,” which are described as exporting fabrics of purple and scarlet to the markets of Tyre (Ezek. 27:7). Elishah is Kittim or Cyprus (G. E. Wright and F. Filson, Westminster Historical Atlas to the Bible [1945], p. 109). It is the Alashia of the Amarna Letters. Cyprus with the Peloponnesus and the islands and coasts of the Aegean were rich in purple shells.

ELISH'AMA (e-lish'a-ma; “God of hearing”).

1. The son of Ammihud, and head of the tribe of Ephraim at the Exodus (Num. 1:10; 2:18; 7:48, 53; 10:22), c. 1440 B.C. From the genealogy in 1 Chron. 7:26 we find that he was the grandfather of Joshua.

2. The second of the nine sons of David, born at Jerusalem, by Bathsheba (1 Chron. 3:6), called in the parallel passages (2 Sam. 5:15; 1 Chron. 14:5) by apparently the more proper name Elishua (which see).

3. The seventh of the same series of sons (1 Chron. 3:8; 14:7). According to Samuel (2 Sam. 5:14–16) there were only eleven sons born to David after his establishment in Jerusalem, and Elishama is eleventh of the series, after 1000 B.C.

4. An Israelite of the family of David, father of Nethaniah, and grandfather of Ishmael, who slew Gedaliah, the ruler appointed by Nebuchadnezzar over the people that were left in Judea (2 Kings 25:25; Jer. 41:1), before 588 B.C.

5. An Israelite of the tribe of Judah and son of Jekamiah. In the Jewish tradition preserved by Jerome (Quaestiones hebraicae on 1 Chron. 2:41) he appears to be identified with no. 4.

6. One of the two priests sent with the Levites by Jehoshaphat to teach the law through the cities of Judah (2 Chron. 17:8), after 875 B.C.

7. A royal scribe, in whose chamber the roll of Jeremiah was read to him and other magnates. Afterward it was deposited for a time (Jer. 36:12, 20, 21), about 604 B.C.

ELISH'APHAT (e-lish'a-fat; "God of judgment"). Son of Zichri. One of the captains of hundreds by whose aid Jehoiada the priest placed Joash on the throne of Judah and overthrew Athaliah, the usurper (2 Chron. 23:1ff.), about 836 B.C.

ELISH'EBA (e-lish'e-ba; "God of the oath," i.e., worshiper of God). Daughter of Amminadab and sister of Nahshon, the captain of the Hebrew host (Num. 2:3). She became the wife of Aaron and hence the mother of the priestly family (Ex. 6:23), about 1440 B.C.

ELISH'UA (e-lish'ū-a; "God of supplication"). One of the sons of David born at Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:15; 1 Chron. 14:5), called Elishama (which see) in the parallel passage (1 Chron. 3:6), after 1000 B.C.

ELI'UD (e-liūd; "God of majesty"). Son of Achim and father of Eleazar; the fifth in ascent in Christ's paternal genealogy (Matt. 1:14–15), about 200 B.C. (McClintock and Strong, Cyclopedia).

ELIZ'ABETH (e-liz'a-beth; Gk. Elisabeth, from Heb. Elīshēbāc, "God her oath"). The wife of Zacharias and mother of John the Baptist. She was a descendant of Aaron, and of her and her husband this exalted character is given by the evangelist: "They were both righteous in the sight of God, walking blamelessly in all the commandments and requirements of the Lord" (Luke 1:5–6). They remained childless until well advanced in years, when an angel foretold to Zacharias the birth of John while he was "performing his priestly service before God" in the Temple. Upon asking for a sign that this miracle would indeed occur, Zacharias lost his speech. After Zacharias returned home, Elizabeth conceived (1:7–24). For five months she concealed the favor God had granted her, but the angel Gabriel revealed to the virgin Mary this miraculous conception as an assurance of the birth of the Messiah by herself (1:24–38). Mary visited her cousin Elizabeth, and they exchanged congratulations and praised God together; Mary abode with her for three months (1:39–56). When the child was circumcised Elizabeth named him John. Her friends objected that none of her kindred had that name, and an appeal was made to Zacharias; he wrote upon a tablet, "His name is John," and immediately speech was restored to him (1:58–64), 6 B.C.

ELIZ'APHAN (e-liz'a-fan; "God has concealed").

1. The second son of Uzziel, and chief of the Kohathite Levites at the Exodus (Num. 3:30; Ex. 6:22), 1441 B.C. He, with his elder brother, Mishael, was directed by Moses to carry away the corpses of their sacrilegious cousins, Nadab and Abihu (Lev. 10:4). In Exodus and Leviticus the name is contracted into Elzaphan. His family took part in the ceremony of bringing the Ark to Jerusalem in the time of David (1 Chron. 15:8) and were represented in the revival under Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:13).

2. Son of Parnach and leader of the tribe of Zebulun, appointed to assist Moses in the division of the land of Canaan (Num 34:25).

ELI'ZUR (e-lī'zur; "God his rock"). Son of Shedeur and head of the tribe of Reuben at the Exodus (Num. 1:5; 2:10; 7:30, 35; 10:18), 1440 B.C.

ELKA'NAH (ěl-kā'nà; “whom God has acquired”). The name of several men, all apparently Levites. There is much difficulty and uncertainty in discriminating among the various individuals who bear this name.

1. The second son of Korah, according to Ex. 6:24, where his brothers are represented as being Assir and Abiasaph. But in 1 Chron. 6:22–23, Assir, Elkanah, and Ebiasaph are mentioned in the same order, not as the three sons of Korah, but as son, grandson, and great-grandson, respectively, and that seems to be correct.

2. Son of Shaul, or Joel, and father of Amasai, and ninth in descent from Kohath the son of Levi (1 Chron. 6:25, 36).

3. Son of Ahimoth, or Mahath, being father of Zuph, or Zophai, and great-grandson of the one immediately preceding (1 Chron. 6:26, 35).

4. Another Kohathite Levite, in the line of Heman the singer. He was the son of Jeroham and father of Samuel (1 Chron. 6:27–28, 33–34), about 1106 B.C. He is described (1 Sam. 1:1–2) as living at Ramathaim-zophim, in Mt. Ephraim, otherwise called Ramah, and as having two wives, Hannah and Peninnah, with no children by the former till the birth of Samuel in answer to the prayer of Hannah. We learn also that he lived in the time of Eli the high priest, and that he was a pious man, going up yearly to Shiloh to worship and offer sacrifice (1:3). After the birth of Samuel, Elkanah and Hannah continued to live at Ramah and had three sons and two daughters (2:21). Elkanah the Levite is called an Ephraimite because, so far as his civil standing was concerned, he belonged to the tribe of Ephraim, the Levites being reckoned as belonging to those tribes in the midst of which they lived.

5. The father of Asa, and head of a Levitical family resident in the “villages of the Netophathites” (1 Chron. 9:16), long before 536 B.C.

6. A man of the family of Korahites, who joined David while he was at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:6), about 1002 B.C. He probably resided in the tribe of Benjamin, which included four Levitical cities. Perhaps he was the same person who was one of the two gatekeepers for the Ark when it was brought to Jerusalem (15:23), about 982 B.C.

7. The chief officer in the household of Ahaz, king of Judah, slain by Zichri the Ephraimite when Pekah invaded Judah (2 Chron. 28:7), about 735 B.C.

EL'KOSH (el'kosh; uncertain derivation). The birthplace of the prophet Nahum, from which he is called “the Elkoshite” (Nah. 1:1). Two Jewish traditions assign widely different localities to Elkosh. In the time of Jerome it was believed to be a small village of Galilee, called to the present day Helcesaei (or Helcesei, Elcesi), which belief is more credible than the one that identifies Elkosh with a village on the eastern side of the Tigris, NW of Khorsabad. This place, Alkush, is a Christian village, where the tomb of the prophet is shown in the form of a simple plaster box of modern style. Others place Elkosh in Judah. It is impossible to be definite about its location at the present time.

EL'KOSHITE (el'ko-shīt). See Elkosh.

ELLAS'AR (el-la'sar). A city of Babylonia, mentioned twice in Genesis (14:1, 9). Ellasar was located in southern Babylonia, between Ur and Erech, on the left bank of the great canal Shatt-en-Nil. The site of the city is now marked by the little mound called by the natives Senkereh. In an early period, Ellasar played an important role in Babylonia. In southern Babylonia, it was the center of the sun worship (called in Babylonian Shamash), as Sippar in northern Babylonia was the chief place of the same worship. The Babylonian form of the city's name was Larsa, and in later times it was known to the Greeks as Larissa. Its origin is entirely unknown to us, but its holy character and its religious leadership point to high antiquity. About 2400 B.C. Ellasar was filling an influential place in Babylonia. It had then the leadership in southern Babylonia, and the kings of Larsa were at the same time kings of Sumer and Akkad. Of the dynasty that then ruled in Ellasar we know the names of only two kings, Nur-Ramman and Sin-iddina, the latter of whom built an important canal that connected the Shatt-en-Nil with the Tigris River. Shortly after this time Ellasar was conquered by an invasion from Elam, and the Elamite king Kudur-Mabug, at that time a great conqueror even in the West, possessed the city. He did not, however, reside in the conquered city but was represented there by his son, Eri-Aku, who is also known in the Babylonian inscriptions by the name of Rim-Sin. He was later conquered by Hammurabi, king of Babylon, who annexed the whole territory to the newly founded Babylonian empire.

W. K. Loftus excavated there in 1854 and extracted numerous tablets and worked around the ziggurat and temple of the city, but he established no clear chronology of the site. André Parrot of the Louvre excavated at Larsa in 1932 and 1933 and worked out the history of this important city-state from the Ur III period (about 2000 B.C.) to the Neo-Babylonian period (c. 600 B.C.) and uncovered the temple of the sun-god Shamash and the royal palace. The French reopened the dig in 1967 and have since recovered materials useful for the study of ancient Mesopotamian civilization.

ELM. See Vegetable Kingdom: Oak.

ELMA'DAM (el-ma'dam). Son of Er and father of Cosam, one of the ancestors of Christ in the private line of David (Luke 3:28). He is not mentioned in the OT.

ELNA'AM (el-na'am; "God his delight"). Father of Jeribai and Joshaviah, two of David's distinguished warriors (1 Chron. 11:46), about 1000 B.C. "In the Septuagint the second warrior is said to be the son of the first, and Elnaam is given himself as a member of the guard."

ELNA'THAN (el-na'than; "God the giver").

1. An inhabitant of Jerusalem, whose daughter Nehushta was the mother of Jehoiachin, king of Judah (2 Kings 24:8), before 597 B.C. He was, perhaps, the same as the son of Achbor sent by Jehoiakim to bring the prophet Uriah from Egypt (Jer. 26:22) and in whose presence the roll of Jeremiah was read, for the preservation of which he interceded with the king (36:12, 25).

2, 3, 4. Three of the Israelites of position and understanding sent by Ezra to invite the priests and Levites to accompany him to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:16), 457 B.C.

ELO'HIM (e-lō'hîm; Heb. plural ʾēlōhîm; singular ʾēlōah, "mighty"). A term sometimes used in the ordinary sense of gods, whether true or false (Ex. 12:12, 32:4; etc.), including Jehovah (Ps. 76:7; Ex. 18:11; etc.). W. Henry Green (Hom. Mag. [Sept. 1898]: 257ff.) thus summarizes the principles regulating the use of Elohim and Jehovah in the OT: "1. Jehovah represents God in His special relation to the chosen people, as revealing Himself to them, their guardian and object of their worship; Elohim represents God in His relation to the world at large, as Creator, providential ruler in the affairs of men, and controlling the operations of nature. 2. Elohim is used when Gentiles speak or are spoken to or spoken about, unless there is a specific reference to Jehovah, the God of the chosen people. 3. Elohim is used when God is contrasted with men or things, or when the sense requires a common rather than a proper noun."

ELOI (e-lō'i; Aram. "My God"). An exclamation from Ps. 22:1 quoted by our Savior (Mark 15:34) while on the cross.

ELON (e-lon; "oak").

1. A Hittite, father of Basemath (Gen. 26:34), or Adah (36:2), wife of Esau.
2. The second of the three sons of Zebulun (Gen. 46:14) and head of the family of Elonites (Num. 26:26).
3. An Israelite of the tribe of Zebulun and judge for ten years (Judg. 12:11–12).
4. One of the towns in the border of the tribe of Dan (Josh. 19:43), doubtless the same as Elonbeth-hanan (1 Kings 4:9). Its site has not been identified.

ELONBETH-HA'NAN (e'lon-beth-ha'nan). The same as Elon, no. 4.

ELONITE (ē'lon-īt). The patronymic applied to the descendants of Elon (which see), the son of Zebulun (Num. 26:26).

ELOTH (ē'loth). Another form (1 Kings 9:26; etc.) of the city of Elath (which see).

ELPA'AL (el-pa'al; "God's doings"). The second of the two sons of Shaharaim by his wife Hushim, and progenitor of a numerous progeny. He was a Benjamite (1 Chron. 8:11–12, 18).

ELPA'LET. A contracted form in the KJV (1 Chron. 14:5) of the name Eliphalet; the NASB gives Eliphelet (which see, no. 1); the NIV reads "Elpelet."

EL-PA'RAN (el-pā'ran; "oak of Paran"). "The one oasis which is in mid-desert, on the great highway across the wilderness of Paran, known in later times as 'Qala' at Nukhl, ... more commonly 'Castle Nakhl,' 'Castle of the Palm'" (Trumbull, Kadesh-barnea, p. 37). It was at "El-paran, which is by the wilderness," that Chedorlaomer halted before starting northward into Canaan (Gen. 14:5–6). Ishmael dwelt in the wilderness of Paran, after he and his mother were expelled through the influence of Sarah (21:21).

ELPE'LET (el-pe'let). A contracted form in the NASB and NIV (1 Chron. 14:5) of the name Eliphelet (which see, no. 1).

EL'TEKEH (el'te-keh), Elteke (el-te-ke). A Danite town assigned to the Levites (Josh. 19:44; 21:23). The site was destroyed by Sennacherib, c. 701 B.C., and in its vicinity a decisive battle was fought by the Assyrians and the Egyptians. Its site is uncertain. M.F.U.

EL'TEKON (el'te-kon; "God is straight"). One of the towns of the tribe of Judah, in the mountain district (Josh. 15:59); not identified.

ELTO'LAD (el-to'lad; perhaps "God is generator"). One of the cities in the S of Judah (Josh. 15:30) allotted to Simeon (19:4) and in possession of that tribe until the time of David (1 Chron. 4:29), when it is called simply Tolad; not identified.

E'LUL (e'lūl; Heb. ēlūl from Akkad. ulūlu). The sixth month of the ecclesiastical, and twelfth of the civil, year of the Jews. See articles Calendar; Time.

ELU'ZAI (e-lu'za-i; "God is my strength"). One of the Benjamite warriors who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:5), a little before 1000 B.C.

NASB New American Standard Bible

NIV New International Version

M.F.U. Merrill F. Unger

EL'YMAS (el'i-mas; probably from the Arab. aliman, “a wise man”). A Jew named Barjesus, who had attached himself to the proconsul of Cyprus, Sergius Paulus, when Paul visited the island (Acts 13:6–12). Upon his endeavoring to dissuade the proconsul from embracing the Christian faith he was miraculously struck blind by the apostle (A.D. 44).

EL'ZABAD (el'za-bad; “God has given”).

1. The ninth of the eleven Gadite heroes who joined David in the wilderness of Judah (1 Chron. 12:12), before 1000 B.C.

2. One of the sons of Shemaiah, the son of Obed-edom, the Levite. He served as a gatekeeper to the house of the Lord under David (1 Chron. 26:7), after 1000 B.C.

EL'ZAPHAN (el'za-fan); a contracted form (Ex. 6:22; Lev. 10:4) of the name Elizaphan (which see).

EMBALM (Heb. ḥānaṭ, “to spice”). The process of preserving a corpse by means of spices (Gen. 50:2–3, 26). See Handicrafts: Embalming.

EMBROIDERER. See Handicrafts.

E'MEK-KE'ZIZ (e'mek-ke'ziz). A city of Benjamin (Josh. 18:21), the name of which is still preserved in the Wadi el Kaziz, on the road from Jerusalem to Jericho, SE of the Apostles' well. The KJV renders it “valley of Keziz.”

EMERALD. See Mineral Kingdom.

EMERODS. See Diseases: Hemorrhoids.

E'MIM (ē'mim). The giant aborigines dispossessed by Moab. In Gen. 14:5–7 (cf. Deut. 2:10–12, 20–23) we find all the region E of the Jordan once occupied by a series of races mostly described as giants—the Rephaim in Bashan, the Zamzummin dispossessed by the Ammonites (2:20–21); possibly the same as the Zuzim of Gen. 14:5, the Emim by the Moabites, and the Horim by the Edomites. The “Emims” of the KJV is an incorrect double plural. See also Giant.

E'MITES. See Emim.

EMMAN'UEL. See Immanuel.

EMMA'US (e-mā'us; “hot baths”). A town seven and a half miles from Jerusalem (sixty furlongs), the scene of Christ's revelation of Himself after His resurrection (Luke 24:13). Its real site is disputed, however. A number of places are held, by tradition and otherwise, to be the original site of Emmaus. Among them are Amwas (about twenty miles from Jerusalem and, apparently, too far away); Kolonieh (only about thirty-four stades or furlongs from Jerusalem, a little over three miles, and thus too close); and El-Qubeibeh, on the road to Joppa, about the right distance from Jerusalem (about seven and one-half miles). Materials recovered there date to the NT period. H.F.V.

EM'MOR. See Hamor.

EN- (Heb. עַן, “fountain”). A prefix given to many names of places in Heb. because there was a living spring in the vicinity.

ENA'IM. See Enam.

E'NAM (ē'nam). One of the cities of Judah in the lowland (Josh. 15:34). From its mention with towns that are known to have been near Timnath this is probably the place in the gateway (KJV, “an open place”) in which Tamar sat before her interview with her father-in-law (Gen. 38:14). The NIV reads “Enaim” in the latter passage.

E'NAN (ē'nan; “fountain”). The father of Ahira, who was leader of the tribe of Naphtali at the time of the numbering of Israel in the desert of Sinai (Num. 1:15; 2:29; 7:78, 83; 10:27), c. 1440 B.C.

ENCAMPMENT. See Camp.

ENCHANTER, ENCHANTMENT. The practice of magic or the speaking of certain words whereby evil forces are invoked in order to achieve supernatural effects over human beings, animals, or natural phenomena was known in Bible times. This category includes magic (Ex. 7:11), conjuration, exorcism (Acts 19:13–17), sorcery (8:9, 11; 13:8, 10). This traffic in quackery or bona fide spiritism was forbidden by the law of Moses (Deut. 18:10). Sometimes magic is not easily distinguished from divination in the English versions (cf. Num. 23:23; 24:1; 2 Kings 17:17; Jer. 27:9).

END OF THE WORLD. See Eschatology.

EN'-DOR (en'dor; “fountain of Dor”). A town about four miles from the S foot of Mt. Tabor. It is probably located at Khirbet Safsafa, about a mile NE of the village of Indur. The numerous caves in the hillsides suggest a fit dwelling place for such persons as the spiritistic medium to whom Saul (which see) resorted (1 Sam. 28:7). See also Josh. 17:11 and Ps. 83:10.

ENE'AS (ē-nē'as). See Aeneas.

ENEG'LAIM (en-eg'la-im; “fountain of two calves”), En Eglaim (NIV). A place mentioned by Ezekiel (47:10; “En-eglaim,” KJV) in the vision of holy waters. Identified with Ain Hajlah, N of the Dead Sea, W of the Jordan.

EN-GAN'NIM (en-gan'im; “fountain of gardens”).

1. A city of Issachar (Josh. 19:21; “Anem,” 1 Chron. 6:73) allotted to the Levites (Josh. 21:29). It is located fifteen miles S of Mt. Tabor and is the scene of Ahaziah's escape from Jehu (2 Kings 9:27, “garden house”). It is identified with modern Jenin, a prosperous town at the southern edge of the plain of Esdraelon.

2. A town in Judah (Josh. 15:34) whose location is unknown.

ENGE'DI (en-ge'di; “fountain of the wild goat”). A town, also called the city of palm trees (i.e., Hazazon-tamar, Gen. 14:7; 2 Chron. 20:2), and wilderness situated about thirty miles SE of Jerusalem, on the W shore of the Dead Sea. It is full of rocks and caves (1 Sam. 23:29; Ezek. 47:10). The source of the spring from which it derives its name is on the side of the mountain about six hundred feet above the sea.

It is a fertile place and most suitable for refuge. The strongholds of David (23:29; 24:22) must have been situated by the water, and the cave is described as being below them.

It was immediately after an assault upon the “Amorites, who lived in Hazazon-tamar,” that the five Mesopotamian kings were attacked by the rulers of the plain of Sodom (Gen. 14:7; cf. 2 Chron. 20:2). Saul was told that David was in the “wilderness of Engedi,” and he took “three thousand chosen men from all Israel, and went to seek David and his men in front of the Rocks of the Wild Goats” (1 Sam. 24:1–4). At a later period Engedi was the gathering place of the Moabites and Ammonites who went up against Jerusalem and fell in the valley of Beracah (2 Chron. 20:2, 26). The vineyards of Engedi were celebrated by Solomon (Song of Sol. 1:14), its balsam by Josephus, and its palms by Pliny.

At Tell el-Jurn, just S of the springs of Engedi, Benjamin Mazar led a Hebrew University and Israel Exploration Society dig from 1961 to 1965. He found no evidence of occupation in the time of David, but that is not surprising because the area probably was quite wild when David and his band hid there. Five periods of occupation were uncovered on the tell, dating from the last days of the Judean kingdom to the Roman-Byzantine period. A large fort stood in the middle of the city during the Hasmonean (Maccabean) period (Stratum III) and again in Herodian-Roman days (Stratum II). This latter city and fort were burned about the time of the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. The place was again occupied during the Roman-Byzantine period. Mazar also excavated a Chalcolithic worship center (c. 3500 B.C.) just N of the spring of Engedi. H.F.V.

ENGINE. A term applied in Scripture exclusively to military affairs. See Armor.

ENGRAVER. See Handicrafts: Carver.

EN-HAD´DAH (en-had´a). A city on the border of Issachar (Josh. 19:21); according to Knobel either the place by Gilboa called Judeideh, or else el-Hadethah, six miles E of Mt. Tabor.

EN-HAK´KORE (en-hak´o-re; “fountain of the crier”). A spring that burst forth at the cry of Samson (Judg. 15:19). It has been identified with Ayun Kara, near Zoreah.

EN-HA´ZOR (en-ha´zor; “fountain of the village”). One of the fortified cities in the inheritance of Naphtali, distinct from Hazor (Josh. 19:37). Probably Khirbet Hasireh near Hazzur.

ENLIGHTENED (from Gk. photizō, to “give light”). A term meaning imbued with a saving knowledge of the gospel, and so applied to Christians (Heb. 6:4; 10:32). In the early Christian church it was used to denote the baptized.

EN-MISH´PAT (en-mish´pat; “fountain of judgment”). The earlier name (Gen. 14:7) for Kadesh (which see).

ENMITY (Heb. ēbā; Gk. echthra). Deep-rooted hatred or irreconcilable hostility. God established perpetual enmity, not only between the serpent and the woman, but also between the human and the serpent race (Gen. 3:15). Friendship with the world (i.e., the corrupt part of it) is declared to be “enmity with God” (James 4:4, KJV; NASB, “hostility toward God”; NIV, “hatred toward God”), or being at variance with His plans for the promotion of righteousness (cf. 1 John 2:15–16). So also the carnal mind is “hostile toward God” (Rom. 8:7–8), or opposed to His nature and will. The ceremonial law is called “enmity” (Eph. 2:15–16), referring to the hostility between Jew and Gentile, and due to Judaical limitations and antagonisms and especially the alienation of both Jew and Gentile from God.

E´NOCH (ē´nok; “dedicated,” “initiated”). The name of two men, two others having their name given as Hanoch (which see), and the name of a city.

1. The eldest son of Cain, who gave his own name to the city he built (Gen. 4:17–18).
2. The son of Jared (Gen. 5:18) and father of Methuselah (5:21; Luke 3:37). After the birth of Methuselah, in his sixty-fifth year, he lived 300 years. Following his son’s birth it is said (Gen. 5:22–24) that Enoch “walked with God three hundred years ... and he was not, for God took him.” As a reward of his sanctity he was transported into heaven without dying, and thus the doctrine of immortality was plainly taught under the old dispensation. In the epistle to the Hebrews (11:5) the issue of Enoch’s life is clearly marked. Jude (vv. 14–15) quotes from a prophecy of Enoch, but whether he derived his quotation from tradition or from writing is uncertain. The voice of early ecclesiastical tradition is almost unanimous in regarding Enoch and Elijah as the “two witnesses” (Rev. 11:3).

3. The first city mentioned in Scripture (Gen. 4:17), which was built by Cain; it lies E of Eden and in the land of Nod.

E'NOS. The Gk. (and less correct) way of rendering OT Enosh (which see).

E'NOSH (ē'nosh; “a man”). The son of Seth and grandson of Adam (Gen. 5:6–11; Luke 3:38) who lived 905 years. He was remarkable on account of a singular expression used respecting him in Gen. 4:26, “Then men began to call upon the name of the Lord.” Two explanations are given of this passage: (1) “Then began men to call themselves by the name of the Lord,” in order, it would seem, to distinguish themselves from those who were already idolaters and were termed children of men; and, (2) “Then men profanely called on the name of the Lord,” intimating that at that period idolatry began to be practiced among men. “ENQUIRE OF THE LORD.” See “Inquire of the Lord.”

EN-RIM'MON (en'rim'on; “fountain of a pomegranate”). A place occupied by the descendants of Judah after the Exile (Neh. 11:29), apparently the same as “Ain and Rimmon” (Josh. 15:32). It seems probable that they were so close together that in the course of time they grew into one. It is identified with Umm er-Rummāmin, nine miles N of Beersheba.

EN-RO'GEL (en-rō'gel; “fountain of the treaders”). The “foot fountain,” also called the “fullers’ fountain.” Here the fullers cleansed their garments by treading them in the water of the spring (Josh. 15:7; 18:16; 2 Sam. 17:17; 1 Kings 1:9). This is the well of Job, “Bir Eyub,” or the well of Jeremiah, located just below the junction of the valley of Hinnom and that of the Kidron, SE of the hill Op'hel. Gihon Spring, with which En-Rogel is sometimes confused, is farther N. Here Adonijah declared himself king (1 Kings 1:5–10).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J. SIMONS, Jerusalem in the Old Testament (1952), pp. 48–50.

EN-SHE'MESH (en-she'mesh; “fountain of the sun”). A landmark between Judah and Benjamin (Josh. 15:7; 18:17), E of the Mount of Olives and said to be the only spring on the way to Jericho, now called Ain-Haud, or “well of the apostles.”

ENSIGN. See Banner; Standard.

EN-TAP'PUAH (en-tap'u-a; “fountain of Tappuah”). A spring near the city of Tappuah (which see), used for that place in Josh. 17:7 (cf. v. 8).

ENVY (Heb. qin-â; Gk. phthonos). (1) That discontented feeling that arises in the selfish heart in view of the superiority of another, nearly tantamount to jealousy (Ps. 37:1; 73:3; Prov. 24:1, 19; Phil. 1:15; etc.). (2) That malignant passion that sees in another qualities that it covets, often resulting in hate for their possessor (Matt. 27:18; Rom. 1:29; etc.).

Envy is ill will, malice, spite (James 3:14, NASB, “jealousy”). It is accompanied by every “evil thing” (v. 16). It always desires and often strives to degrade others, not so much because it aspires after elevation as because it delights in obscuring those who are more deserving. It is one of the most odious and detestable of vices.

EPAE'NETUS (e-pe'nē-tus; “praised”). A Christian at Rome, greeted by the apostle Paul in Rom. 16:5 and designated as his beloved and the “first convert to Christ from Asia.”

EP'APHRAS (ep'a-frag; probably a contraction of Epaphroditus). An eminent teacher in the church of Colossae, called by Paul his “beloved fellow bond-servant” and “a bondservant of Jesus Christ” (Col. 1:7; 4:12), A.D. 62. It has been inferred from 1:7 (“as you learned it from Epaphras”) that he was the founder of the Colossian church. Lardner thinks that the expression respecting Epaphras in 4:12, ho ex humōn (“one of your number”), is quite inconsistent with the supposition of his being the founder of the church, since the same phrase is applied to Onesimus, a recent convert. The words are probably intended to identify these individuals as fellow townsmen of the Colossians. He was at this time with Paul in Rome and is afterward mentioned in the epistle to Philemon (v. 23), where Paul calls him “my fellow prisoner.” The martyrologies make Epaphras to have been the first bishop of Colossae and to have suffered martyrdom there.

EPAPHRODITUS (e-paf-ro-dī’tus; belonging “to Aphrodite,” or Venus). A messenger of the church of Philippi to the apostle Paul during his imprisonment at Rome and entrusted with their contributions for his support (Phil. 2:25; 4:18). Paul seems to have held him in high appreciation, calling him his “brother,” “fellow worker,” and “fellow soldier.” While in Rome he contracted a dangerous illness brought on by his ministering to the apostle (2:27–30). On his return to Philippi he was the bearer of the epistle to the church there. Grotius and some other critics conjecture that Epaphroditus was the same as Epaphras mentioned in the epistle to the Colossians. But though the latter name may be a contraction of the former, the fact that Epaphras was most probably in prison at the time sufficiently marks the distinction of the two persons.

EPE’NETUS. See Epaenetus.

E’PHAH (ē’fā; “gloom”).

1. The first named of the five sons of Midian (Gen. 25:4; 1 Chron. 1:33). His descendants formed one of the tribes of the desert connected with the Midianites, Shebaïtes, and Ishmaelites (Isa. 60:6–7) and had its seat on the E coast of the Elanitic Gulf.

2. A concubine of Caleb, the son of Hezron, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:46).

3. One of the sons of Jahdai, probably a descendant of one of the sons of the foregoing (1 Chron. 2:47).

EPHAH (ē’fā). A measure for grain. See Metrology: Dry Measures of Capacity.

E’PHAI (e’fi; “birdlike”). A Netophathite whose sons were among the “commanders of the forces” left in Judah after the deportation to Babylon and who submitted themselves to Gedaliah, the Babylonian governor (Jer. 40:7–8). They warned Gedaliah of the plots against him, but he did not believe them (vv. 13–16), and they were probably massacred with him by Ishmael (41:2–3), 588 B.C.

E’PHER (e’fer; “gazelle”).

1. The second named of the sons of Midian (Gen. 25:4; 1 Chron. 1:33) and Abraham’s son by Keturah.

2. An Israelite of the tribe of Judah, apparently of the family of Caleb, who was the son of Jephunneh (1 Chron. 4:17).

3. The head of one of the families of Manasseh, who were carried away by Tilgath-pileser (1 Chron. 5:21–26), before 727 B.C.

E'PHES-DAM'MIM (e'fes-dam'im; "boundary of blood," 1 Sam. 17:1). Called Pasdammim (1 Chron. 11:13). The bloody contests between Israel and the Philistines gave it its name. It is modern Beit Fased ("house of bleeding").

EPHESIANS. See Ephesus.

EPHESIANS, EPISTLE TO. Perhaps the most sublime of all the Pauline epistles. No part of NT revelation sets forth more clearly or more profoundly the believer's position "in Christ" and the results that should be obtained in his practical experience. In contrast to Colossians and Galatians it is remarkably free of controversial elements. As Salmon notes, there have been students "who with an incredible lack of insight have construed it as an insipid production or a tedious and unskillful compilation" (Exp. Gk. Testament, 3:208).

Authorship and Authenticity. Ephesians has a strong claim to Pauline authenticity, both externally and internally. Clement of Rome, Ignatius, Polycarp, Hermas, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Irenaeus, and Hippolytus give evidence of early and continued use of the epistle. Internal evidence is likewise decisive. The writer twice mentions his name (1:1 and 3:1). The organization of material is Pauline, beginning with doctrine (chaps. 1–3) and ending with experience based upon the doctrine (chaps. 4–6). The language is definitely Pauline. According to Lewis, "out of 155 verses in Ephesians, seventy-eight are found in Colossians in varying degrees of identity" ("The Epistle to the Ephesians," Int. Stand. Bible Ency., p. 956). First Peter, Hebrews, and the Apocalypse apparently show acquaintance with Ephesians, indicating that Ephesians is earlier than any of the three. Ephesians was written from Rome in A.D. 64 (Acts 20–27). Tychicus was the bearer, together with the epistles of Colossians and Philemon. Since Ephesians is the most impersonal of Paul's letters and the words "to the Ephesians" are not in the best manuscripts, it seems that the letter was intended to be circularized, being sent to several churches, and may be referred to in Col. 4:16 as the "letter that is coming from Laodicea." The letter would then be addressed "to the saints who are faithful in Christ Jesus anywhere." The theme of the epistle confirms this view.

Although the genuineness of the epistle has been denied by Schleiermacher, de Wette, and others, there are strong arguments in its favor. Coleridge called it "the divinest composition of man."

Position. The apostle's real object in writing this epistle is to set forth the believer's union with Christ (1:3–14; 2:1–10), relating this to the union of Jew and Gentile in Christ (2:11–22). With the distinctive revelation of this truth to Paul (3:10–13), these sections give the believer's standing in Christ and are doctrinal. Chapters 4–6 are practical and give our state. In the doctrinal section Paul offers two remarkable prayers that the power of the believer's position "in Christ" be understood and by faith be made an experience (1:15–23; 3:14–21). The practical exhortation based on the believer's position in Christ (4:1–6:9) pertains to his walk, which should be consonant with his position. Presented in 6:10–20 is the spiritual warfare of the Spirit-filled believer who through knowledge and faith translates his position into an everyday experience.

EPH´ESUS (ef’e-sus). The capital of proconsular Asia; an opulent city on the W coast of Asia Minor, located on the banks of the Cayster and about forty miles SE of Smyrna. Its harbor was ample.

History. Ephesus was an ancient city when Paul arrived. By the middle of the second millennium B.C., settlers of Asiatic origin inhabited the site. During the eleventh century B.C., Athenians arrived and gradually assimilated the older population. After varying periods of independence and absorption into neighboring empires, Ephesus came into the Roman Empire in 133 B.C. as part of the province of Asia. Though suffering terribly during the civil wars of the first century B.C., Ephesus enjoyed great prosperity under Rome during the first and second centuries A.D., when the city must have had a population of about a half million. Here the Roman governor resided, and here Paul conducted the longest of his city ministries (two years and nine months, Acts 19:8, 10). The city’s importance lay in its political prominence, its economic clout derived from its position on major trade routes, and its religious leadership as a center for the worship of Diana, or Artemis. By the middle of the third century signs of decay appeared in the city, and in 263 Goths raided Ephesus and dealt it a blow from which it never recovered. By the tenth century the prosperous city of Roman times was completely deserted and invaded by marshes.

Religion. The Ephesians worshiped the Asiatic goddess Artemis, or Diana (see Gods, False), whose temple, one of the seven wonders of the world, made the city famous. After the temple was destroyed by fire (356 B.C.), it was immediately rebuilt. It is said that some of the magnificent columns are incorporated into the Church of St. Sophia.

There were many Jews in the city who were more or less influenced by Christianity (Acts 2:9; 6:9). Timothy was the bishop of the church founded by Paul. To this church Paul addressed one of his epistles. According to Eusebius John spent his last years in Ephesus. John opposed the doctrines of Nestorius, and Paul opposed the idolatry of those who made or worshiped shrines or practiced magic (19:13). His opposition resulted in a serious riot.

Several important councils were held in Ephesus, among which was the third ecumenical council (June 22–August 31, A.D. 431). A small Turkish town today represents the once noted city, which is called Ayasuluk.

Archaeology. The archaeological history of Ephesus began on May 2, 1863, when the British architect John T. Wood started his search for the temple of Artemis, or Diana. He did not actually discover the ruins of the temple itself (outside the city) until December 31, 1869; after that he worked for five years at the temple site. In 1904–5 D. G. Hogarth did further work on the temple. The temple platform was 239 feet wide and 418 feet long. A flight of ten steps led up to the pavement of the platform. The temple itself was 180 feet wide and 377 feet long, and the roof was supported by 117 60-foot columns. These were 6 feet in diameter and 36 of them were sculptured at the base with life-sized figures.

The Austrian Archaeological Institute began to excavate the city of Ephesus in 1897 and continued there for sixteen years under the leadership of Otto Bendorf and Rudolf Heberdey. In part subsidized by Rockefeller money, the Austrians worked there again from 1926 to 1935, and they have been working annually at the site since 1954. To date they have uncovered about 25 percent of the city. Today one can walk down the ancient streets past the odeion (covered concert hall), the Roman agora, the town hall, the temple of Hadrian, the magnificent library of Celsus (now restored), the Hellenistic agora, the great theater (where the mob scene of Acts 19 occurred), and much more. The Austrians have also done some work at the site of the temple of Artemis, or Diana, and on the Church of St. John, on the hill overlooking the temple. The traditional burial place of the apostle John was located there and was enclosed by a church in the fourth century and covered by a great domed church in the days of Justinian (527–565). H.F.V.

EPH'LAL (eph'lal). The son of Zabad (1 Chron. 2:37), a descendant of Judah through Hezron, Jerahmeel, and Sheshan (which see). E.H.M.

E'PHOD (ē-fod; "a covering").

The Ephod and the Jewish Priesthood. A sacred garment of gold, blue, purple, scarlet, and fine twined linen worn by the Jewish high priest (Ex. 28:4–9). The ephod fit closely around the shoulders and was held on by two straps. A hole in the top admitted the head. On top of each of the shoulder straps an onyx stone was encased in a filigree setting of gold and engraved with the names of six tribes of Israel (28:9; 39:6–7). The robe of the ephod was a garment different from the ephod. It was blue, sleeveless, and fringed at the bottom with bells of gold and pomegranates of blue, gold, purple, and scarlet (28:31–35; 39:22–26). Ordinary priests wore a simpler linen ephod (1 Sam. 22:18); Samuel also wore such an ephod as a child (2:18), as did David when officiating before the Ark as king (2 Sam. 6:14). See also Priest, High.

The Ephod and Archaeology. Old Assyrian cuneiform tablets of the nineteenth century B.C. and the Ugaritic texts of the fifteenth show that an ephod (epadu), such as is mentioned in the OT as an important part of the holy attire of the Levitical priesthood, was formerly an ordinary garment, worn especially, it would seem, by women. Only after many centuries did the epadu come to be restricted to religious and subsequently to priestly use. In Israel, however, it came early to be a distinctive part of the sacred dress of the Levitical priesthood. It was as Israel's anointed king and accordingly as a special representative of Jehovah that David wore a linen ephod on the occasion of the transfer of the Ark of God to his capital city, Jerusalem. E'PHRAIM (ē'fra-im; "fruitful"). The second son of Joseph by Asenath, the daughter of Potiphera (Gen. 46:20), born during the seven years of plenty, about 1880 B.C.

Personal History. The first incident in Ephraim's history is the blessing of his grandfather, Jacob. Contrary to the intention of Joseph, Ephraim was preferred to Manasseh by Jacob, and upon him was conferred the birthright blessing (Gen. 48:17–19). Before Joseph's death Ephraim's family had reached the third generation (50:23), and it may have been about this time that the conflict mentioned in 1 Chron. 7:21 occurred, when some of his sons were killed and when Ephraim named one of his sons Beriah to perpetuate the memory of the disaster that had fallen on his house.

The Tribe of Ephraim. At the census in the wilderness of Sinai (Num. 1:32–33; 2:19) its numbers were 40,500, ranking tenth, and at the second census, had decreased to 32,500, ranking eleventh.

Position. During the march through the wilderness the position of the sons of Joseph and Benjamin was on the W of the Tabernacle (2:18–24), and the head of Ephraim was Elishama, the son of Ammihud (1:10). According to rabbinical authority the standard of Ephraim was a golden flag on which the head of a calf was depicted. The representative of Ephraim among the spies was the great hero "Hoshea, the son of Nun," whose name was changed by Moses to the more distinguished form (Joshua), in which it is familiar to us.

Territory. The boundaries of Ephraim are given in Josh. 16 (cf. 1 Chron. 7:28–29). We are not able to trace this boundary line exactly, but Ephraim occupied the center of Palestine, embracing an area about forty miles in length from E to W and from six to twenty-five in breadth from N to S. It extended from the Mediterranean to the Jordan, having on the N the half tribe of Manasseh and on the S Benjamin and Dan (Josh. 16:5–8; 18:7; 1 Chron. 7:28–29). The tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh at first were not contented with the size of their allotted portions and were told by Joshua to go boldly and expel the inhabitants of the adjacent mountain and woodland country and occupy it (Josh. 17:14–18).

Subsequent History. The "tent of meeting" was set up in Ephraim at Shiloh (Josh. 18:1). By this circumstance the influence of the tribe was increased, and we find it bearing itself haughtily. We have an example of this in the Ephraimites' remonstrance to Gideon after his first victory, which that leader deemed prudent to pacify by a flattering answer (Judg. 7:24–25; 8:1–3). With Jephthah they were still more incensed because, as they said, he had not solicited their aid. Jephthah boldly attacked and defeated them (12:1–6). At first the Ephraimites did not submit to the authority of David (2 Sam. 2:8–9). Although after the death of Ish-bosheth a large body of them went to Hebron to join David and that monarch could speak of Ephraim as the strength ("helmet") of his head, the jealousy against Judah sometimes broke out (2 Sam. 19:40–43; 1 Chron. 12:30; Ps. 60:7). David had his ruler in Ephraim (1 Chron. 27:20), and Solomon one of his twelve deputies (1 Kings 4:8). Still the spirit and weight of the tribe were so great that Rehoboam found it necessary to go to Shechem, a city within its borders, for his inauguration (1 Kings 12:1). And then, on his foolish refusal of their demands, the ten tribes revolted and established a different mode of worship (chap. 12). After this Ephraim was the main support of the Northern Kingdom, which came to be designated by its name, and its reunion with Judah became the hope of the prophets as the fulfillment of Israel's glory (Isa. 7:2; 11:13; Ezek. 37:15–22). After the captivity "sons of Ephraim" dwelt in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 9:3).

E'PHRAIM, CITY OF. This town was mentioned as being in the wilderness (John 11:54). It lay NE of Jerusalem. Christ found refuge there when threatened with violence by the priests in consequence of raising Lazarus from the dead. Identified as et Taiyibeh, about five miles NE of Bethel and fifteen miles N of Jerusalem.

E'PHRAIM, FOREST OF. When David's army had advanced into the field against Israel (those who followed Absalom) a battle was fought "in the forest of Ephraim" (2 Sam. 18:6). All the circumstances connected with the battle indicate that it took place E of the Jordan. Absalom had encamped in Gilead, and it is not stated that he had recrossed the Jordan; v. 3 ("be ready to help us from the city") presupposes that the battle took place near Mahanaim, and that after the victory David and his army returned there.

E'PHRAIM, GATE OF. This was one of the gates of Jerusalem on the N side of the city (2 Kings 14:13; 2 Chron. 25:23).

E'PHRAIM, MOUNT OF. Also called by other names, such as the "hill country of Israel" (Josh. 11:21) and the "hills" or "mountains of Samaria" (Jer. 31:5–6; Amos 3:9). In the NASB it is called the "hill country of Ephraim"; NIV, "hills of Ephraim." Joshua's burial place was among these mountains, at Timnath-heres, on the N side of Mt. Gaash (Judg. 2:9). The earliest name given to the central range of mountains in Samaria was Mt. Ephraim, just as the whole tableland of Judah was called Mt. Judah.

E'PHRAIM, WOOD OF. See Ephraim, Forest of.

E'PHRAIMITE (ē'frā-mīt). A descendant of the patriarch Ephraim (Judg. 12:5; 1 Sam. 1:1; 1 Kings 11:26); also rendered Ephrathite (which see). The narrative in Judges seems to indicate that the Ephraimites had a peculiar accent, or patois, similar to that which in later times caused the speech of the Galileans to betray them at Jerusalem (Matt. 26:73).

E'PHRAIN. See Ephron, no. 3.

EPH'RATAH. Another spelling of Ephrathah, no. 2 (which see).

EPH'RATHAH (ef'ra-tha), or Eph'rath (ef'rath; "fruitfulness, fruitful").

1. The second wife of Caleb the son of Hezron. She was the mother of Hur (1 Chron. 2:19) and grandmother of Caleb the spy (v. 50; 4:4), probably 1440 B.C.

2. The ancient name of Bethlehem in Judah (Gen. 35:16, 19; 48:7), both of which passages distinctly prove that it was called Ephrath or Ephrathah in Jacob's time. The meaning of the passage "Behold, we heard of it in Ephrathah" (Ps. 132:6) is much disputed. The most obvious reference is to Bethlehem (which see), which is known in other places by that name.

EPH'RATHITE (ef'ra-thīt).

1. An inhabitant of Bethlehem (Ruth 1:2).
2. An Ephraimite (1 Sam. 1:1; 1 Kings 11:26).

E'PHRON (e'fron; perhaps "fawnlike").

1. The son of Zohar, a Hittite; the owner of a field that lay facing Mamre, or Hebron, and contained a cave that Abraham bought from him for 400 shekels of silver (Gen. 23:8–18; 25:9; 49:29–30; 50:13), perhaps about 1950 B.C.

2. A mountain of the "cities" that formed one of the landmarks on the N boundary of the tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:9). It was probably the steep mountain ridge on the W side of the Terebinth valley (Wadi Beit Hanina).

3. A city of Israel that, with its dependent hamlets, Abijah and the army of Judah captured from Jeroboam (2 Chron. 13:19). C. V. Raumer and others identify Ephron (KJV, “Ephrain”) both with Ophrah of Benjamin that, it is conjectured, was situated near or in Taiyibeh to the E of Bethel, and with the city of Ephraim (Keil, Com., ad loc.).

EPICURE´ANS, THE (ep-i-ku-rē´anz). The name derives from Epicurus (342–271 B.C.), a philosopher of Attic descent whose “Garden” at Athens rivaled the “Porch” and the “Academy” in popularity. The doctrines of Epicurus found wide acceptance in Asia Minor and Alexandria, and they gained a brilliant advocate at Rome in Lucretius (95–50 B.C.). The object of Epicurus was to find in philosophy a practical guide to happiness. True pleasure and not absolute truth was the end at which he aimed; experience and not reason the test on which he relied. It is obvious that a system thus framed would degenerate by a natural descent into mere materialism, and in this form Epicurism was the popular philosophy at the beginning of the Christian era (cf. Diog. 50.10.5.9). When Paul addressed “the Epicurean and Stoic philosophers” (Acts 17:18) at Athens the philosophy of life was practically reduced to the teaching of those two antagonistic schools (Smith).

EPISTLE (Gk. epistolē, a “written message”). The term employed to designate twenty-one out of twenty-seven of the writings of the NT, whereas Luke and the Acts are both prefaced by an epistle to Theophilus, a friend of the evangelist. They are known as Paul’s Epistles and the Catholic or General Epistles.

Paul’s Epistles. Paul’s epistles number fourteen (if we include Hebrews) and are arranged in the NT not in the order of time as to their composition but rather according to the rank of the places to which they were sent. It is not known by whom they were thus arranged. Paul’s letters were, as a rule, written by an amanuensis under his dictation, after which he added a few words in his own hand at the close. The epistles to Timothy and Titus are called pastoral epistles, because they contain pastoral instructions from a pastor to a pastor.

Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon are known as prison epistles because they were written during Paul’s Roman imprisonment.

The Catholic or General Epistles. The Catholic epistles are so called because they were not addressed to any particular church or individual but to Christians in general. Of these, three were written by John, two by Peter, and one each by James and Jude. This division is strictly accurate, for 1 Peter and 2 and 3 John, although addressed to particular persons, have little in them that is properly local and personal.

EPISTLES, SPURIOUS. Many of these are lost, but several are extant, of which the following are the principal:

1. The Epistle of Paul to the Laodiceans. Marcion received as genuine an “Epistle of Paul to the Laodiceans,” early in the second century, but it is doubtful whether it is the Lat. one now extant. The original epistle was probably a forgery founded on Col. 4:16, “And when this letter is read among you, have it also read in the church of the Laodiceans, and you, for your part read my letter that is coming from Laodicea.” Some have endeavored to identify it with a genuine epistle; Grotius thought it to be the epistle to the Ephesians; Theophylact believed it to be 1 Timothy, whereas others hold it to be 1 John, Philemon, etc.

2. Third Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians. John Calvin, Louis Cappell, and others think that Paul wrote many other epistles besides those now known, basing their opinion on 1 Cor. 5:9. There is still extant, in the Armenian language, an epistle from the Corinthians to Paul, together with the apostle’s reply. This epistle is quoted as Paul’s by St. Gregory the Illuminator in the third century.

3. The Epistle of Peter to James is an ancient forgery. Origen says that it was not to be reckoned among the ecclesiastical books, and that it was not written by Peter or any other inspired person. It is thought to be a forgery of some Ebionite in the beginning of the second century.

4. The Epistles of Paul and Seneca consist of eight long letters from the philosopher Seneca to the apostle Paul, with six from Paul to Seneca. Their antiquity is doubted. They are mentioned by Jerome and Augustine and are generally rejected as spurious.

5. The Epistle of Lentulus to the Roman Senate, giving a description of the Person of Christ, and some pretended epistles of the virgin Mary, are generally rejected. See Bible.

EPOCH. A point of time distinguished by some remarkable event, and from which succeeding years are numbered. See Era; Dispensation.

ER (ūr; “watchful”).

1. The eldest son of the patriarch Judah by Shuah, a Canaanitess (Gen. 38:2–3). “Er ... was evil in the sight of the Lord, so the Lord took his life” (v. 7; Num. 26:19). What the nature of his sin was is not apparent, but, from his Canaanitish birth on his mother’s side, it was probably connected with the abominable idolatries of Canaan (Smith).

2. The son of Shelah and grandson of Judah (1 Chron. 4:21).

3. The son of Joshua and father of Elmadam, in the ancestry of Joseph, the husband of Mary (Luke 3:28).

ERA. A period during which years are numbered and dates are reckoned from some historical event.

Jewish. The ancient Jews used several eras in their computations: (1) from Gen. 7:11 and 8:13 it appears that they reckoned from the lives of the patriarchs or other illustrious persons; (2) from the Exodus from Egypt (Ex. 19:1; Num. 1:1; 33:38); (3) from the building of the Temple (1 Kings 9:10; 2 Chron. 8:1) and the reigns of the kings of Judah and Israel; (4) from the Babylonian captivity (Ezek. 1:1; 33:21; 40:1) and the dedication of the second Temple; (5) from the era of the Seleucidae, dating from the occupation of Babylon by Seleucus Nicator (312 B.C.); (6) from the time when their princes began to reign (1 Kings 15:1; Isa. 36:1; Jer. 1:2–3; also Matt. 2:1; Luke 1:5; 3:1); (7) since the compilation of the Talmud the Jews have reckoned their years from the creation of (year of) the world, which they fix at 3761 B.C.

Ancient Heathen. (1) The first olympiad was placed in the year of the world 3228, and 776 B.C.; (2) the taking of Troy by the Greeks, year of the world 2820 and 1184 B.C.; (3) the voyage undertaken for the possession of the golden fleece, year of the world 2760; (4) the foundation of Rome, 753 B.C.; (5) the Era of Nabonassar, 747 B.C.; (6) the Era of Alexander the Great, or his last victory over Darius, 330 B.C.; (7) the Julian Era, dating from the reform of the calendar by Julius Caesar, 45 B.C., Jan. 1; (8) the Era of Diocletian, being the beginning of the first Egyptian year after the accession of that emperor, A.D. 284, August 29; (9) among the Muslims, the Hegira, A.D. 622; and (10) among the modern Persians, the Era of Yezdegird III, A.D. 632, June 16.

Christian. For a long time the Christians had no era of their own but followed those in common use in the different countries. In the western part of the Roman Empire the Consular Era was used until the sixth century after Christ. The Era of Diocletian, called by the Christians the “Era of Martyrs” (Aera Martyrum) because of persecutions in his reign, is still used by the Ethiopians and Copts. The Era of the Armenians was adopted when the Armenians, at the Council of Tiben, separated from the main body of the Eastern church by rejecting the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 552. The idea of counting from Christ's birth was introduced in the sixth century by Dionysius Exiguus, who supposed that Christ was born December 25, 1 B.C. (a date now universally considered to be at least three years too late), and was in the eleventh century adopted by the popes. It has since been in universal use in the Western church.

The present reckoning of the New Year, January 1, was established only over a long period. The date observed by Dionysius, December 25, was used for some time, as was March 25, the date of the annunciation. When the Gregorian calendar was published in 1582 by Pope Gregory XIII, it established January 1 as the beginning of the New Year, and countries that were predominantly Roman Catholic quickly adopted the new method. The Eastern church and the Protestants did not recognize the new calendar until much later. Britain, for example, observed December 25 as the New Year until the fourteenth century, when it began to observe March 25 as the date; it did not shift from the Julian to the Gregorian calendar until 1752. Greece did not adopt the Gregorian calendar until 1923, and Turkey not until 1928. See also Chronology.

E'РАН (e'ran; "watchful"). Son of Shuthelah (eldest son of Ephraim) and head of the family of the Eranites (Num. 26:36).

E'РАНITES (e'ran-its). Descendants of Eran (Num. 26:36).

ERAS'TUS (e-ras'tus; "beloved"). A Corinthian and one of Paul's disciples whose salutations he sends from Corinth to the church at Rome as those of "the city treasurer" (Rom. 16:23). The word so rendered is oikonomos (Vulg., arcarius) and denotes an officer or steward of great dignity in ancient times (Josephus Ant. 7.8.2); the conversion of such a man to the faith of the gospel was proof of the wonderful success of the apostle's labors in that city. We find Erastus with Paul at Ephesus as one of his attendants or deacons, and he was sent along with Timothy into Macedonia while the apostle himself remained in Asia (Acts 19:22). They were both with the apostle at Corinth when he wrote, as above, from that city to the Romans; at a subsequent period Erastus was still at Corinth (2 Tim. 4:20), which would seem to have been his usual place of abode.

E'RECH (ē'rek; Akkad. Uruk). This city of Nimrod (Gen. 10:10), lying on the left bank of the Euphrates, is represented by modern Warka, situated about a hundred miles SE of Babylon in a marshy region of the Euphrates. Excavations at Erech have been an effort of the German Oriental Society. Julius Jordan worked there in 1912 and 1913; Jordan and later A. Nöldeke excavated at the site from 1928 to 1939. Heinrich Lenzen launched a new series of excavations in 1954. The earliest ziggurat or stage tower, the earliest cylinder seals, and the earliest known writing in the world (c. 3400–3300 B.C.) appeared at the site. Several mounds encase the ruins of ancient Uruk; four of these cover the remains of temples, the largest of which was dedicated to Inanna, Lady of the Heavens. Another mound contains the palace of a Babylonian king. Occupation of the site goes back to the fifth or fourth millennium B.C. The whole area of the city, surrounded by a wall, is 5½ square miles in extent. H.F.V.

E'RI (e'ri; "watching"). The fifth son of the patriarch Gad (Gen. 46:16) and ancestor of the Erites (Num. 26:16).

E'RITES (e'rīts). Descendants of the Gadite Eri (Num. 26:16).

ESARHAD'DON (e-sar-had'on; "Ashur" has given a brother). An eminent and powerful Assyrian emperor, successor of Sennacherib. He reigned 680–669 B.C.

Accession. Sennacherib was assassinated in 681 B.C. by his two sons Adrammelech and Sharezer as a result of their jealousy of Esarhaddon, the emperor's favorite (cf. 2 Kings 19:37; Isa. 37:38). Esarhaddon was away conducting a campaign, and he immediately returned to Nineveh. The murderers escaped to Armenia.

Accomplishments. The most important achievement of Esarhaddon was the restoration of the city of Babylon, destroyed by his father, Sennacherib. "... At the beginning of my rule, in the first year of my reign, when I took my seat upon the royal throne in might, there appeared favorable signs in the heavens and upon earth ... through the soothsayers' rites encouraging oracles were disclosed, for the rebuilding of Babylon and the restoration of Esagila (temple of the gods). They caused the command (oracle) to be written down" (D. D. Luckenbill, Ancient Records of Assyria and Babylonia II, sec. 646). Esarhaddon continues his description of the rebuilding of Babylon. "I summoned all my artisans and the people of Babylon in their totality ... Babylon I built anew, I enlarged, I raised aloft, I made magnificent" (ibid., sec. 647). Esarhaddon also defeated Taharka, the pharaoh of Egypt. The triumph over Taharka was commemorated by the victory stela set up at Senjirli in N Syria, recovered in 1888 by the Germans. The king is depicted with a mace in his left hand, and with his right he pours out a libation to the gods, symbolized at the top of the stela. Ropes extending to the lips of two figures at his feet are shown in his left hand. Taharka is evidently one of the figures. The other seems to be Ba'alu of Tyre. Esarhaddon thus boasts of himself, "I am powerful, I am all powerful. I am a hero, I am gigantic, I am colossal," and for the first time an Assyrian monarch assumed the new title, "king of the kings of Egypt," boasting concerning Taharka, king of Egypt and Ethiopia: "daily without cessation I slew multitudes of his men and him I smote five times with the point of my javelin with wounds from which there was no recovery. Memphis, his royal city, in half a day, with mines, tunnels, assaults, I besieged, I captured, I destroyed, I defeated, I burned with fire" (ibid., secs. 577–83). M.F.U.

E'SAU (ē'saw; "hairy," Gen. 25:25). His surname, Edom, was given him from the red stew he ate (Gen. 25:30). He is the eldest son of Isaac by Rebekah, and twin brother of Jacob.

We have no account of the early life of Esau beyond an incident or two connected with his birth (Gen. 25:22–26), about 2001 B.C. As he grew up Esau became "a skillful hunter, a man of the field." He was, in fact, a thorough "son of the desert," who delighted to roam free as the wind of heaven, and who was impatient at the restraints of civilized or settled life. Still his father loved him, and none the less for the savory venison the son brought to him (25:28).

Sells His Birthright. Coming in one day from the chase hungry and longing for food he saw Jacob enjoying a dish of stew and asked him to share his meal with him. Jacob set a price upon the food: the birthright of his brother. This was, indeed, a large demand, for the birthright secured to its possessor immunities and privileges of high value—the headship of the tribe, both spiritual and temporal, and the possession of the great bulk of the family property, and carried with it the covenant blessing (Gen. 27:28–29, 36; Heb. 12:16–17). Urged by hunger, however, Esau acceded to Jacob's demands, secured the food, and "despised his birthright" (Gen. 25:29–34).

Marries. At the age of forty Esau married two wives in close succession. They were both Canaanites and, on account of their origin, were not acceptable to Isaac and Rebekah. The latter was especially grieved. "I am tired of living," she said (Gen. 27:46), "because of the daughters of Heth.” (1) His first wife was Adah, the daughter of Elon the Hittite (36:2), called Basemath in 26:34. (2) His second wife was Oholibamah, the daughter of Anah (36:2), as all the accounts agree, except that in 26:34, where by some error or variation of names she is called Judith, the daughter of Beerli the Hittite. (3) Esau’s third wife, taken from his own kindred, was Basemath (otherwise called Mahalath, 28:9), sister of Nebaioth and daughter of Ishmael (36:3).

Loses His Father’s Blessing. When Isaac had grown old and feeble he wished in the consciousness of approaching death to give his blessing to his elder son. Without regard to the words that were spoken by God with reference to the children before their birth, and without taking any notice of Esau’s frivolous barter of his birthright and his ungodly connection with the Canaanites, Isaac maintained his preference for Esau. He commanded him to hunt game and prepare him a savory dish that he might eat and bless him. Rebekah sought to frustrate this plan, desiring to secure the inheritance for Jacob. Jacob successfully simulated Esau and secured the desired blessing but had scarcely done so when Esau returned. When told that his brother had secured the prize he cried out, “Bless me, even me also, O my father!” Entreated again and again, even with tears, Isaac at length said to him: “Behold, away from the fertility of the earth shall be your dwelling, and away from the dew of heaven from above. And by your sword you shall live, and your brother you shall serve; but it shall come about when you become restless, that you shall break his yoke from your neck” (Gen. 27:1–40). Thus deprived forever of his birthright by virtue of the irrevocable blessing, Esau hated his brother and vowed vengeance. But he said to himself, “The days of mourning for my father are near; then I will kill my brother Jacob.” When Esau heard that his father had commanded Jacob to take a wife of the daughters of his kinsman Laban, he also resolved to see if by a new alliance he could win his parents’ acceptance. He accordingly married his cousin Mahalath, the daughter of Ishmael (28:6–9).

Removes to Mt. Seir. Esau probably moved soon after this to Mt. Seir, still retaining, however, some interest in his father’s property in southern Palestine. It is probable that his own habits and the idolatrous practices of his wives and growing family continued to excite and even increase the anger of his parents, and that he, consequently, considered it more prudent to remove his household to a distance (Gen. 32:3).

Reconciled to Jacob. Esau was residing at Mt. Seir when Jacob returned from Paddan-aram, and Jacob, fearing lest Esau should desire to take revenge for former injuries, sent messengers in order, if possible, to appease his wrath. In reply to his conciliatory message Esau came to meet him with 400 armed men. Jacob was greatly afraid and distressed; what must have been his surprise, when they neared each other, to see Esau running with extended arms to greet and embrace him! Esau “fell on his neck and kissed him, and they wept.” Jacob had prepared a present for Esau, which he at first refused to take, but afterward accepted. Esau’s offer to march with Jacob as a guard was declined, and Esau returned to Mt. Seir (Gen. 32:3–33:16).

Later History. It does not appear that the two brothers met again until the death of their father. Mutual interest and fear constrained them to act honestly, and even generously, toward each other at this solemn interview. They united in laying the body of Isaac in the cave of Machpelah (Gen. 35:29). Then “Esau took ... all his cattle and all his goods which he had acquired in the land of Canaan”—such, doubtless, as his father, with Jacob’s consent, had assigned to him—“and went to another land away from his brother Jacob” (36:6). Esau is once more presented to us (36:43) in a genealogical table, in which a long line of illustrious descendants is referred to “Esau, the father of the Edomites.”

Spiritual Message. Esau serves as a good illustration of the natural man of the earth (Heb. 12:16–17). In many respects a more honest man than Jacob, he was nevertheless destitute of faith. This was manifest in his despising the birthright because it was a spiritual thing, of value only as faith could see that value. The birthright involved the exercise of the priestly rights vested in the family head until the establishment of the Aaronic priesthood. The Edenic promise of one who would “bruise” Satan was fixed in the family of Abraham (Gen. 3:15); the order of promise was Abel, Seth, Shem, Abraham, Isaac, Esau. As the firstborn Esau was in the distinct line of the promise to Abraham: “and in you all the families of the earth shall be blessed” (12:3). For all that was revealed, these great messianic promises might have been realized in Esau. For a fleeting, fleshly gratification Esau sold this birthright. Although Jacob’s understanding of the birthright at the time was undoubtedly carnal and faulty, his desire for it, nevertheless, evidenced true faith. “For he who comes to God must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of those who seek Him” (Heb. 11:6).

ESCHATOLOGY (from Gk. eschatos, “last,” and logosM, “study”). A theological term employed to designate the doctrine of last things, particularly those dealing with the second coming of Christ and the events preceding and following this great event.

Common Concept. It is quite customary in treatises on systematic theology to find an abbreviated eschatology and to discover a prevailing agnostic attitude that much cannot be known. This curtailment of such an important phase of biblical theology is a severe hindrance to the edification of the present-day church. Creedal systems and traditionalism have held the field in this realm of theological thinking as in no other. When one considers that approximately 25 percent of divine revelation was prophetic when written, it is a tragedy to reduce this realm of theology to the events immediately clustering around the second advent of Christ.

Correct Concept. Properly understood, eschatology includes more than just Christ’s second coming. As Lewis Sperry Chafer says, “This, the last major division of systematic theology, is concerned with things to come and should not be limited to things which are future at some particular time in human history but should contemplate all that was future in character at the time its revelation was given.... A worthy eschatology must employ all prediction whether fulfilled or unfulfilled at a given time. In other words, a true eschatology attempts to account for all the prophecy set forth in the Bible” (Lewis Sperry Chafer, Systematic Theology, 4:255).

General Scope. Eschatology is of broad significance.

1. Properly understood, it embraces the far-reaching prophecy concerning the Lord Jesus Christ as Prophet, Priest, and King, as the promised seed, and with regard to the two advents.
2. It embraces prophecy concerning Israel’s covenants, the four major covenants being that made with Abraham, that given through Moses, that made with David, and the New Covenant yet to be made in the messianic kingdom.
3. It embraces prophecy concerning the Gentiles—their “times” (Luke 21:24) and their judgment.
4. It embraces prophecies concerning Satan, evil, the “man of sin,” etc.
5. It embraces prophecy concerning the end of apostate Christendom.
6. It embraces prophecy concerning the church, involving the translation of the living saints, the judgment seat of Christ, the marriage of the Lamb, and the return of the glorified church to reign with Christ. A full-scale study of these great prophetic themes will include the judgments, the resurrections, the mediatorial messianic kingdom, and the eternal state. M.F.U.

ESDRAE'LON, PLAIN OF (es-dra-ē'lōn). This name is the Gk. modification of Jezreel ("God sows"). It is a large plain about twenty miles long and fourteen miles wide, famous for its fertility due to soil washed down from the neighboring mountains of Galilee and the highlands of Samaria. Esdraelon drains into the Mediterranean by the Wadi Kishon where Deborah's ancient battle was fought (Judg. 4:7; 5:21) and Elijah conducted his contest with the priests of Baal (1 Kings 18:40). Important towns in ancient times, such as Taanach, Megiddo, and Bethshan, were built around the edge of the plain by Canaanite chariot kings. The valley has been a famous battleground through the centuries. Here the great Egyptian Thutmose III fought the confederate princes of Syria and Palestine. Here King Saul was slain by the Philistines (1 Sam. 31:1–3), and here the conquering Israelites faced the Canaanite kings (Josh. 17:16). In the prophetic Scriptures the last great battle of the age will be fought at Armageddon, the ancient hill of the valley of Megiddo W of Jordan in the plain of Jezreel (Rev. 16:14–16). This great conflict will be that in which Christ and His coming glory will deliver the Jewish remnant besieged by the Gentile world powers under the Beast and the False Prophet (16:13–16; Zech. 12:1–9). Apparently the besieging hosts, alarmed by the signs preceding the Lord's advent (Matt. 24:29–30), fall back to Megiddo after the events of Zech. 14:2, where their destruction begins, with the decimation completed in Moab and the plains of Edom (Isa. 63:1–6). E'SEK (ē'sek; "contention"). One of the three wells dug by Isaac's herdsmen in the valley of Gerar and so named because the herdsmen of Gerar disputed concerning its possession (Gen. 26:20).

ESH'AN (esh'an; "support"). The third named of a group of nine towns in the country around Hebron in Judah (Josh. 15:52). As the LXX reading is "Somah," Knobel conjectures that Eshan is a corrupt reading for "Shema" (1 Chron. 2:43) and connects it with the ruins of Simia, S of Daumeh (K. & D., Com.).

ESH'BAAL (esh'ba-al; "man of Baal"). The fourth son of King Saul (1 Chron. 8:33; 9:39). He is doubtless the same person as Ish-bosheth (1 Sam. 31:2, cf. 2 Sam. 2:8), since it was the practice to change the obnoxious name of Baal into Bosheth or Besheth, as in the case of Jerubbesheth for Jerubbaal and (in this genealogy) of Mephibosheth for Merib-baal. The Heb. term bōshēth, meaning "shame," expressed the horror pious Jehovistic worshipers felt toward the degenerate cults of Canaan.

ESH'BAN (esh'ban). The second named of the four sons of Dishon, the Horite (Gen. 36:26; 1 Chron. 1:41).

ESH'COL (esh'kol; "a bunch, cluster").

1. A young Amorite chief who, with his brothers Aner and Mamre, being in alliance with Abraham, joined him in recovering Lot from the hands of Chedorlaomer and his confederates (Gen. 14:13, 24), about 1955 B.C.

LXX Septuagint

2. A valley in the neighborhood of Hebron, the one in which the spies found large grapes (Num. 13:23–24). The valley probably took its name from the distinguished Amorite mentioned above.

ESH'EAN. See Eshan.

E'SHEK (e'shek; "oppression"). A brother of Azel, a Benjamite, one of the late descendants of King Saul; the father of Ulam, the founder of a large and noted family of archers (1 Chron. 8:39).

ESH'KALONITE. See Ashkelonite.

ESH'TAOL (esh'ta-ol). A town in the northern part of the hilly region, at first assigned to Judah (Josh. 15:33), but afterward to Dan (19:41). Samson was born at or near Eshtaol (Judg. 13:24–25; 16:31). From Eshtaol and the neighboring Zorah the Danites started on their expedition to secure more territory at Laish (18:2). Its location has been fixed at Eshwa' near Zorah, and thirteen miles NW of Jerusalem.

ESH'TAO'LITE (esh'ta-o'lit). An inhabitant of Eshtaol (1 Chron. 2:53).

ESHTA'RAH (esh-ta'ra). Otherwise known as Be Eshtarah (or Be-eshterah, NASB), this was a city allocated to the Gershonites as one of the Levitical cities E of the Jordan and in the territory of East Manasseh (Josh. 21:27). E.H.M.

ESHTEMO'A (esh'te-mō'a), or Esh'temoh (esh'-te-mō; "obedience," Josh. 15:50). A mountain town of Judah, and afterward ceded to the priests (Josh. 21:14; 1 Chron. 4:17, 19). David, when at Ziklag, sent some of his spoil to the elders of Eshtemoa (1 Sam. 30:28), and Ishbah is mentioned (1 Chron. 4:17) as its "father," i.e., lord. It is the present Semua, a village S of Hebron, with considerable ruins dating from ancient times.

ESH'TON (esh'ton; "restful"). A man of Mehir and grandson of Chelub, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:11–12).

ES'LI. See Hesli.

ESPOUSAL. The mutual agreement between parties to marry. See Marriage.

Figurative. This social institution is alluded to figuratively in the relationship of the church as the bride of Christ (John 3:29; 2 Cor. 11:2; Eph. 5:25–32; Rev. 19:6–8). It is important to distinguish between Israel and the church. Israel is the wife of Jehovah (Hos. 2:2, 16–23) now disowned but some day to be restored. This relationship is not to be confused with that of the church of Christ. The church is a virgin espoused to one husband, which could never be said of an adulterous wife to be restored in grace. Israel is, accordingly, to be the forgiven and restored wife of Jehovah. Such relationships in dealing with deity, being figurative and expressing spiritual relationship, are not inconsonant or contradictory. First Cor. 10:32 clearly names three classes in this present age—Jews, Gentiles, and the church of God. All the unsaved are either Jews or Gentiles in this age. All saved people, whether Jews or Gentiles, are members of the church, the Body of Christ, a distinct entity formed at Pentecost by the advent of the Spirit performing His baptizing work (Acts 1:5; 11:16) and to be completed at the coming of the Lord (1 Cor. 15:53; 1 Thess. 4:13–17; 2 Thess. 2:1). ESSENCE, THE DIVINE. Essence (from the Lat. verb esse, "to be") signifies that which a person or thing is in himself or itself, apart from all that is accidental. Substance is a term of equivalent meaning. These terms are held by some to be more appropriate in philosophy than in theology. The Scriptures, it is true, contain no such abstract terms as essence and substance. At the same time it must be admitted that some of the names under which God has revealed Himself, such as Elohim and Jehovah, refer directly to the eternal, divine essence. Therefore, theology has often made large use of these terms in its attempts to arrive at the proper and scriptural conception of God. The principal points in dispute have been, first, as to what extent, if any, the divine essence can be known to us; and, second, as to the relation existing between the attributes of God and His essence. The view best substantiated is that the attributes of God are not merely subjective conceptions, based upon certain only relatively true Scripture revelations, but that the attributes made known to us through the Scriptures are manifestations of what God is in Himself. They are the living realization of His essence. Accordingly, although the divine essence is incomprehensible, we have nevertheless some measure of true knowledge of God, knowledge that relates to His very essence. (See God, Attributes of.) For full and discriminating discussion see Dorner, System of Christian Doctrine, 1:187–206; Pope, Compendium of Christian Doctrine, 1:246–52; Van Oosterzee, Christian Dogmatics, 1:234–38; Hodge, Systematic Theology, 1:366–70. ESSENES' (es-sēnz'). A Jewish religious community, though differing in many respects from traditional Judaism.

Identity. An ascetic community of men in Palestine and Syria forming the first cells of organized monasticism in the Mediterranean world. Their main colonies were near the northern end of the Dead Sea and around En-gedi. The phenomenal discovery of nonbiblical literature among the famous Dead Sea Scrolls, including "The Manual of Discipline" and "The Commentary on Habakkuk," has shed a great deal of light on pre-Christian sects. The sect that owned and produced the Dead Sea Scrolls had striking affinities with the Covenanters of Damascus, the Essenes, the Therapeutae of Egypt, and the John the Baptist movement. Millar Burrows has shown that the Judean Covenanters (his term for the Essenes) are the same Jewish sect as the Covenanters of Damascus. This material corroborates Philo and Josephus, heretofore the primary sources for an understanding of the Essenes. For a comparison of this archaeological material with the older sources see W. H. Brownlee, "A Comparison of the Covenanters of the Dead Sea Scrolls with Pre-Christian Jewish Sects," The Biblical Archaeologist 13 (Sept. 1950): 50–72, dealing specifically with the Essenes.

Origin. The origin of the Essenes is as obscure as their name. Josephus first mentions them (Ant. 13.5.9) in the time of Jonathan the Maccabee (about 150 B.C.) and speaks expressly of Judas, an Essene (105–104 B.C.). This would place the origin of the order in the second century before Christ. It is questionable whether they proceeded simply from Judaism or whether foreign and especially Hellenistic elements did not also have an influence in their origin.

Organization. Their whole community was strictly organized as a single body, at the head of which were presidents (Gk. epimelētai) to whom the members were bound in unconditional obedience. One wishing to enter the order received three badges—a pickaxe, an apron, and a white garment. After a year's probation he was admitted to the purification ceremonies. Another probation of two years followed, after which he was allowed to participate in the common meals and to become a full member. At that time the new member took a fearful oath in which he bound himself to absolute openness to his brethren and secrecy concerning the doctrines of the order to nonmembers. Only adults were admitted as members, but children were received for instruction in the principles of Essenism. Josephus says that the Essenes were divided into four classes according to the time of their entrance, the children being the first class, those in the two stages of the novitiate the second and third class, and the members proper the fourth class.

Discipline. Transgressions of members were tried by a court, and sentence was never pronounced by a vote of less than one hundred. What was once decided by that number was unalterable.

Excommunication was equivalent to a slow death since an Essene could not take food prepared by strangers for fear of pollution. The strongest tie by which the members were united was the absolute community of goods. It was a law among the Essenes that those who came to them must let what they had be common to the whole order. They also had stewards appointed to take care of their common affairs. They chose fitting persons as receivers of revenues and of the produce of the earth, and priests for the preparation of the bread and food. There was one purse for all, and common expenses, common clothes, and common food at common meals. The needy of the order, such as the sick and the aged, were cared for at common expense, and special officers were appointed in every town to care for the wants of the traveling brethren. The daily labor of the members was strictly regulated. After prayer they were dismissed to their work by the presidents. They reassembled for purifying ceremonies and the common meal, after which they went to work again, to reassemble for the evening meal. Although their chief employment was agriculture, they carried on crafts of every kind, but trading (thought to lead to covetousness) and the making of weapons or any utensils that might injure men was forbidden.

Ethics, Manners, and Customs. Philo competes with Josephus in sounding the praises of the Essenes. According to these authorities their life was moderate, simple, and unpretentious. They condemned sensual desires as sinful and abstained from wedlock but chose other people's children while they were pliable and fit for learning. They took food and drink only till they had had enough, contenting themselves with the same dish day by day and rejecting great expense as harmful to mind and body. They did not cast away clothes and shoes until they were utterly useless and sought to acquire only what was needed for the wants of life.

In addition to the general features of simplicity and moderation mentioned above we call attention to the following special points: (1) There was no slave among them, but all were free, mutually working for each other. (2) Swearing was forbidden as worse than perjury: "For that which does not deserve belief without an appeal to God is already condemned." (3) They forbade anointing with oil, regarding a rough exterior as praiseworthy. (4) Bathing in cold water was compulsory before each meal, after performing the functions of nature, or coming in contact with a member of a lower class of the order. (5) They considered white raiment as seemly for all occasions. (6) Great modesty was inculcated. In performing natural functions they dug with the pickaxe—which each member received—a hole one foot deep, covered themselves with a mantle (not to offend the brightness of God), relieved themselves, and filled the hole again. In bathing they bound an apron about their loins; they avoided spitting forward or to the right hand. (7) They sent gifts of incense to the Temple but offered no animal sacrifices because they esteemed their own sacrifices more valuable. (8) The chief peculiarity of the Essenes was their common meals, which bore the character of sacrificial feasts. The food was prepared by priests, with the observance, probably, of certain rites of purification; an Essene was not permitted to partake of any other food than this. The opinion that the Essenes abstained from flesh and wine is not supported by the older authorities.

Theology. The Essenes held fundamentally the Jewish view of the world, entertaining an absolute belief in providence, which they held in common with the Pharisees. Next to God the name of Moses the lawgiver was an object of the greatest reverence with them, and whoever blasphemed it was punished with death. In their worship the Holy Scriptures were read and explained. The Sabbath was so strictly observed that on that day they did not remove a vessel or even perform the functions of nature, and they seem to have kept to the priesthood of the house of Aaron.

They must have held their angelology in high esteem as their novices had to swear carefully to preserve the names of the angels. Concerning their doctrine of the soul and of its immortality Josephus writes: "They taught that bodies are perishable, but souls immortal, and that the latter dwelt originally in the subtlest ether, but being debased by sensual pleasures united themselves with bodies as with prisons; but when they are freed from the fetters of sense they will joyfully soar on high as if delivered from long bondage. To the good (souls) is appointed a life beyond the ocean, where they are troubled by neither rain nor snow nor heat, but where the gentle zephyr is ever blowing.... But to the bad (souls) is appointed a dark, cold region full of unceasing torment."

A strange phenomenon presented on Jewish soil is the peculiar conduct of the Essenes with respect to the sun. To this they turned while praying, in opposition to the Jewish custom of looking toward the Temple. From this and other customs it would appear that they were in earnest in their religious estimation of the sun.

In conclusion we may observe that "Essenism is merely Pharisaism in the superlative degree." It was, however, influenced by foreign systems of theology and philosophy, of which four have been proposed, namely, Buddhism, Parseeism, Syrian heathenism, and Pythagoreanism.

The Essenes disappeared from history after the destruction of Jerusalem. Though not directly mentioned in Scripture they may be referred to in Matt. 19:11–12; Col. 2:8, 18, 23. BIBLIOGRAPHY: W. H. ES'THER (es'ter). The Jewish maiden chosen by Ahasuerus to be queen. Esther was the new, and probably Persian, name given on her introduction to the royal harem. Her proper Heb. name was Hadassah, "Myrtle" (which see). As to the signification of Esther, it is "Ishtar," the name of the great Babylonian goddess. Gesenius quotes from the second Targum on Esther: "She was called Esther from the name of the star Venus, which in Greek is Aster (i.e., astēr, English, 'star')." Esther was the daughter of Abihail, a Benjamite and uncle of Mordecai (Esther 2:15). Her ancestor Kish had been among the captives led away from Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. Left an orphan, Esther was brought up by her cousin Mordecai, who held an office in the palace at Susa (Esther 2:5–7).

Chosen Queen. Ahasuerus, Xerxes I (486–465 B.C.), having divorced his wife because she refused to comply with his drunken commands, ordered that a search be made for the most beautiful maiden to be her successor. Those selected were placed in the custody of "Hegai, who was in charge of the women." The final choice among them remained with the king himself. That choice fell upon Esther, for "the king loved Esther more than all the women, and she found favor and kindness with him more than all the virgins, so that he set the royal crown on her head and made her queen instead of Vashti" (2:8–17), about 478 B.C.

Saves Her People. Esther, in obedience to Mordecai, had not made known her parentage and race (Esther 2:10). But Haman, the Agagite, angry with Mordecai because he "neither bowed down nor paid homage to him," represented to the king that the Jews scattered through his empire were a pernicious nation. The king gave Haman full power to kill them all and seize their property (chap. 3). Upon being informed of this by Mordecai, Esther, who seemed herself to be included in the doom of extermination, resolved to plead for her people. She decided to present herself unbidden to the king, which was not according to law (4:16). She did so and, obtaining favor in his sight, made known her request: that the king and Haman would attend a banquet that she had prepared that day. At the banquet the king renewed his willingness to grant Esther any request she might make. She extended another invitation to both of them for the next day and promised to reveal her wishes then (chap. 5). The next day Esther pleaded for her people and denounced Haman. The laws of the empire would not allow the king to recall a decree once uttered, but the Jews were authorized to stand upon their defense and this, with the change in the intentions of the court known, averted the worst consequences of the decree. The Jews established a yearly feast in memory of their deliverance called Purim, which is observed to this day (9:20–32).

Character. “The character of Esther, as she appears in the Bible, is that of a woman of deep piety, faith, courage, patriotism, and caution, combined with resolution; a dutiful daughter to her adopted father, docile and obedient to his counsels, and anxious to share the king’s favor with him for the good of the Jewish people. That she was a virtuous woman, and, as far as her situation made it possible, a good wife to the king, her continued influence over him for so long a time warrants us to infer. There must have been a singular charm in her aspect and manners since she obtained favor in the sight of all that looked upon her (Esther 2:15)” (McClintock and Strong, Cyclopedia).

ESTHER, BOOK OF. The book is named from its principal character whose Heb. name Hadassah (myrtle) was changed to the Persian name Esther (which see). The Jews call it Megilloth Esther, that is, the Esther Roll, and it is in the third section of the Heb. Scriptures with the four other rolls, including the Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, and Ecclesiastes. These rolls were short and read on special feast days. The Esther Roll was read at the feast of Purim.

Design. The purpose of the book is to demonstrate God’s providential care of His people in their trials and persecutions and to furnish an explanation of the origin of the important feast of Purim, first mentioned in 2 Macc. 15:36.

Authenticity. It is common in critical circles to deny the historicity of the story except as history may be fictionalized. A. Bentzen, accordingly, describes the book as an “historical novel” but is forced to confess “that the story teller knows something of the administration of the Persian kingdom and especially the construction of the palace at Shushan” (Introduction to the O.T. [1948] 2:192). The author’s undeniable knowledge of Persian life and customs and his manifestly historical intent (cf. 10:2) militate against the critics’ contention of a fictional narrative. For example, it is alleged that Mordecai would have to be well over a hundred years old to have gone in the first deportation in 597 B.C. The relative pronoun of this verse evidently refers to Kish, Mordecai’s great-grandfather; hence, this difficulty is obviated. It is also contended that Vashti, Esther, and Mordecai are unknown to secular history in the reign of Xerxes I (c. 485–465 B.C.). But Esther evidently did not become queen until the seventh year of Xerxes’s reign, c. 478 B.C., after his return from his defeat in Greece, c. 480 B.C., when Herodotus specifically says he paid attention to his harem. It is true that the queen is said to have been Amestris, but certainly Xerxes, from what we know of him personally and of his splendor and power, may well have had many other wives, if Solomon, king over tiny Syria-Palestine, had “seven hundred wives, princesses, and three hundred concubines” (1 Kings 11:3). The contention that Esther (Ishtar), Mordecai (Marduk), and Vashti (the name of a Persian deity) were merely fictional names is pure supposition carrying no weight with the devout student.

The arguments against the genuineness of the story of Esther are these: (1) The narrative implies that Vashti and Esther were the legitimate wives of “the great king” (Esther 1:19; 2:4). The only wife of Xerxes known to history, however, was Amestris, married to him before the third year of his reign and who continued to be queen after his death. To this it is replied that the disgrace of Vashti may have been only temporary, and she may afterward have been restored to her queenship; or that Vashti and Esther were secondary wives, the latter certainly being selected from the king's harem. The title "queen" may have been used as a special honor in indicating the favor Esther had obtained with the king. (2) The king could not legally, and therefore it is supposed would not, marry a wife not belonging to one of the seven great Persian families. "The marriage of Ahasuerus with a Jewess, even if we regard it as a marriage in the fullest sense, would not be more illegal or more abhorrent to Persian notions than Cambyses's marriage with his full sister. It is, therefore, just as likely to have taken place. If, on the other hand, it was a marriage of the secondary kind, the law with respect to the king's wives being taken from the seven great families would not apply to it" (Rawlinson, Historical Illustrations of the Old Testament).

Authenticity and Date. The book is anonymous. It is to be placed sometime during or near the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus (c. 464–425 B.C.). This also accounts for its literary phenomena, since its diction is reminiscent of such late books as Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles. Critics who doubt the historicity of the book put it later in the Gk. (third century B.C.) or Maccabean period (second century B.C.).

ETAM (ē'tam; "hawk ground").

1. The "rock of Etam" was the place to which Samson retired after his slaughter of the Philistines (Judg. 15:8, 11). It is probably to be located near Zorah at 'Arak Isma'in.

2. A city of Judah fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:6), probably, from its position in the list, near Bethlehem and Tekoa. The Talmudists locate the sources of the water from which Solomon's gardens and pleasure grounds were fed there, from which it has been inferred that the site was identical with that of Solomon's Pools at el-Eurak, near Bethlehem. Probably it is the same Etam mentioned in 1 Chron. 4:3.

ETERNAL LIFE. This is a priceless treasure, the gift of God. It is not to be confused with mere endless existence, which all possess, saved as well as unsaved. Christ said, "I came that they might have life, and might have it abundantly" (John 10:10). This life is nothing less than "Christ in you, the hope of glory" (Col. 1:27). It is likened to a birth from above (John 3:3; 1:13) and is dependent upon receiving Christ as Savior. "He who has the Son has the life; he who does not have the Son of God does not have the life" (1 John 5:12). Eternal life must not be confused with natural life. This form of life is subject to death and is derived by human generation. Spiritual life has a beginning but no end. The difference is that one possessing mere natural life will be separated eternally from God in the lake of fire, whereas the one possessing eternal life will be united and in fellowship with God for all eternity. Thus, separation from God is eternal death; union with God is eternal life. M.F.U.

ETERNITY. This is an essential attribute of God. It is the infinitude of God in relation to duration, as His omnipresence is His infinitude in relation to space. His existence is without beginning and will never end. The thought of this divine attribute is necessarily included in that of God's absolutely independent existence. The eternity of God is declared in many places in the Scriptures. See Pss. 90:2; 102:26–28; Isa. 44:6; 47:15; 1 Tim. 6:16; 2 Pet. 3:8; Rev. 1:4.

E'THAM (ē'tham). A place to the E of the present Suez Canal, on the border of the desert, where Israel made its second station after leaving Egypt (Ex. 13:20; Num. 33:6). At this point the Israelites were ordered to change their route (Ex. 14:2).

E'THAN (ē'than; “perennial, permanent”).

1. One of the four persons (“Ethan the Ezrahite, Heman, Calcol and Darda”) who were so renowned for their perception that it is mentioned to the honor of Solomon that his wisdom excelled theirs (1 Kings 4:30–31). Ethan is distinguished as “the Ezrahite” from the others who are called “sons of Mahol,” unless the word Mahol is taken for “sons of music, dancing,” etc., in which case it would apply to Ethan as well as to the others. In 1 Chron. 2:6 they are all given as “sons of Zerah.” In the title to Ps. 89 an “Ethan the Ezrahite” is named as the author.

2. Son of Zimmah and father of Adaiah, in the ancestry of the Levite Asaph (1 Chron. 6:42). In v. 21 he seems to be called Joah, the father of Iddo.

3. Son of Kishi, or Kushaiah, a Levite of the family of Merari. He was appointed one of the leaders of the Temple music by David (as singer, 1 Chron. 6:44, or player on cymbals, 15:17, 19), about 960 B.C. In the latter passages he is associated with Heman and Asaph, the heads of two other families of Levites; and, inasmuch as in other passages of these books (25:1, 6) the names are given as Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun, it has been conjectured that this last and Ethan were identical. There is at least great probability that Ethan the singer was the same person as Ethan the Ezrahite (see no. 1), whose name stands at the head of Ps. 89. It is an unlikely coincidence that there should be two persons named Heman and Ethan so closely connected in two different tribes and walks of life.

ETH'ANIM (eth'a-nim). Another name for the month Tisri. See Time.

ETH'BAAL (eth'bā-al; “with Baal”). A king of Sidon, father of Jezebel, the wife of Ahab (1 Kings 16:31), before 875 B.C. According to Josephus (Against Apion 1.18; cf. Ant. 8.13.1–2), Ethbaal is called Ithobalus by Menander, who also says that he was a priest of Astarte, and, having put the king, Pheles, to death, assumed the scepter of Tyre and Sidon, lived sixty-eight years, and reigned thirty-two. We see here the reason Jezebel, the daughter of a priest of Astarte, was so zealous a promoter of idolatry.

E'THER (e'ther; “abundance”). One of a group of nine cities in the plain of Judah (Josh. 15:42), but eventually assigned to Simeon (19:7). Now identified with Khirbet el-'Ater, one mile NW of Beit Jibrin.

ETHIO'PIA (ē-thi-ō'pi-a; Heb. kûsh). Lying S of Egypt, corresponding to what is now called the Sudan, i.e., the country of the blacks. It was known to the Hebrews (Isa. 18:1; 45:14; Zeph. 3:10). The name Cush (KJV, “Ethiopia”) is found in the Egyptian Keesh, evidently applied to the same territory. In the description of the Garden of Eden, an Asiatic Cush is mentioned (Gen. 2:13). In all other passages the words Ethiopia and the Ethiopians—with one possible exception, “the Arabs who bordered the Ethiopians” (2 Chron. 21:16), which may refer to Arabians opposite Ethiopia—may be safely considered to mean an African country and people or peoples (Kitto). The languages of Ethiopia are as various as the tribes. In Ps. 68:31, Isa. 45:14, and probably Zeph. 3:10, the calling of Ethiopia to the service of the true God is foretold. The case of the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts 8:27–39) indicates the spread of the old dispensation influence in that country and the introduction of the new. The NIV regularly uses the transliteration “Cush” except in Jer. 13:23 and Acts 8:27, where it is “Ethiopian.”

ETHIOPIAN (ē-thi-ō'pi-an; see 2 Chron. 14:9; Jer. 13:23; 38:7, 10, 12). An inhabitant of Ethiopia (which see) or Cush; used of Zerah and Ebed-melech.

ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH. Chief officer of Candace, the Ethiopian queen, who was converted to Christianity through the instrumentality of Philip, the evangelist (Acts 8:27). He is described as being “in charge of all her treasure.” In the East eunuchs were taken not only to be overseers of the harem but also generally to fill the most important posts of the court. Tradition calls the Ethiopian by the names Indich and Fudich and makes him without historical proof, but not improbably, the first preacher of the gospel among his countrymen. See Candace; Eunuch.

ETHIOPIAN WOMAN. See Cushite Woman.

ETH-KA'ZIN (eth-ka'zin; “time of a judge”). A city near the eastern boundary of Zebulun (Josh. 19:13), not identified.

ETH'NAN (eth'nān; “a gift”). A descendant of Judah, one of the sons of Helah, the wife of Ashhur (1 Chron. 4:7).

ETH'NI (eth'ni; “munificent”). The son of Zerah and father of Malchijah, a Levite of the family of Gershom (1 Chron. 6:41).

EUBULUS (ū-bu'lus, “good in counsel”). A Christian at Rome whose greeting Paul sent to Timothy during his last imprisonment (2 Tim. 4:21), A.D. 66.

EUCHARIST (ū'kar-ist; Gk. eucharistia, “giving of thanks”). One of the names of the Lord's Supper (which see). See also Agape.

EUNI'CE (ū'nis; “good victory”). The mother of Timothy and the wife of a Greek (Acts 16:1; 2 Tim. 1:5), A.D. before 66. In both passages reference is made to her faith.

EUNUCH (Gk. eunouchos; Heb. sārîs). The Gk. word means literally “bed keeper,” i.e., one who has charge of beds and bedchambers. The original Heb. word clearly implies the incapacity that mutilation involves. Castration, according to Josephus (Ant. 4.8.40), was not practiced by the Jews upon either man or animals; and the law (Deut. 23:1; cf. Lev. 22:24) dealt severely with this kind of treatment of any Israelite. It was a barbarous custom of the East to treat captives thus (Herodotus History 3. 49; 6. 32), not only those of tender age, but, it should seem, when past puberty. The “officer” Potiphar (Gen. 37:36; 39:1, KJV marg.,

NIV New International Version

KJV King James Version

marg. margin, marginal reading

“eunuch”) was an Egyptian, married, and the “captain of the bodyguard.” In the Assyrian monuments a eunuch often appears, sometimes armed and in a warlike capacity or as a scribe noting the number of heads and amounts of spoil, as receiving the prisoners, and even as officiating in religious ceremonies. The origination of the practice is ascribed to Semiramis and is no doubt as early, or nearly so, as Eastern despotism itself. The complete assimilation of the kingdom of Israel, and latterly of Judah, to the neighboring models of despotism, is traceable in the rank and prominence of eunuchs (2 Kings 8:6; 9:32; 23:11; 25:19; Isa. 56:3–4; Jer. 29:2; 34:19; 38:7; 41:16; 52:25). They mostly appear in one of two relations, either in the military as those set over “the men of war,” greater trustworthiness possibly counterbalancing inferior courage and military vigor, or associated, as we mostly recognize them, with women and children. We find the Assyrian Rab-saris, or chief eunuch (2 Kings 18:17) employed together with other high officials as ambassador. Some think that Daniel and his companions were in this manner treated (2 Kings 20:17–18; Isa. 39:7; cf. Dan. 1:3, 7). The court of Herod had its eunuchs (Josephus Ant. 15.7.4; 16.8.1), as did that of Queen Candace (Acts 8:27). We must remember that both the Heb. and Gk. terms were sometimes applied to those filling important posts, without regard to bodily mutilation.

Figurative. The term is employed figuratively by our Lord (Matt. 19:12) with reference to the power, whether possessed as a natural disposition or acquired as a property of grace, of maintaining an attitude of indifference toward fleshly desires and temptations.

EUO'DIA (ū-ō'di-a; “a good journey”). A female member of the church at Philippi who seems to have been at variance with another female member named Syntyche (A.D. 58–60). Paul describes them as women who had “shared my struggle in the cause of the gospel,” and implores them to “live in harmony” (Phil. 4:2–3).

EUPHRA'TES (ū-frā'tēz; Heb. pārāt, to “break” forth; Gk. Euphratēs). This river rises in the mountains of Armenia Major and flows through Assyria, Syria, Mesopotamia, and the city of Babylon, from 1,700 to 1,800 miles into the Persian Gulf. It is navigable for small vessels for 1,200 miles from its mouth. It floods like the Nile, becoming swollen in the months of March, April, and May by the melting of the snows. It was the natural boundary of the empire, so that to cross the Euphrates was to cross the Rubicon. It was the western boundary of Mesopotamia, dividing it from the “Land of Hatti,” which included all land between the Euphrates and the Mediterranean; Babylon lay upon this, as Nineveh did upon the Tigris River. It flowed by other ancient cities, such as Carchemish (2 Chron. 35:20) and Sippar, Agade, Borsippa, and Ur. It served, like the Nile, to irrigate the country by means of artificial canals, making the desert, according to Xenophon, to become a garden of fertility. It is referred to under various names in Scripture (Gen. 2:14; 15:18; Deut. 1:7; 11:24; Josh. 1:4; 2 Sam. 8:3; 2 Kings 23:29; 24:7; 1 Chron. 5:9; 18:3; 2 Chron. 35:20; Jer. 13:4; 51:63). It is sometimes called the “flood.”

EURA'QUILO (ū-ra'kwilō; KJV Euroclydon; Gk. Euroklydōn; “east” and “wave,” an “east waver”). The gale of wind in the Adriatic Gulf that off the S coast of Crete seized the ship in which Paul was finally wrecked on the coast of Malta (Acts 27:14). This gale in particular is described, and its circumstances are verified by abundant illustrations from experiences of modern seamen in the Levant. As to the direction of the wind we quote: “The wind came down from the island and drove the vessel off the island; whence it is evident that it could not have been southerly. If we consider further that the wind struck the vessel when she was not far from Cape Matala (Acts 27:14), that it drove her toward Claudia (v. 16; [“Clauda,” NASB]), which is an island twenty miles to the S.W. of that point, and that the sailors feared lest it should drive them into the Syrtis, on the African coast (v. 17), an inspection of the chart will suffice to show us that the point from which the storm came must have been N.E., or rather to the E. of N.E., and thus we may safely speak of it as coming [from] the E.N.E.” (Conybeare and Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, 2:326). The NIV, therefore, refers to it as the “northeaster.”

EU'TYCHUS (ū'ti-kus; “good fortune”). A young man of Troas who attended the preaching of Paul. The services were held in the third story of a house, the sermon long, lasting until midnight, and the air heated by the large company and the many lamps. Under those circumstances Eutychus was overcome with sleep and fell from the window in which he was sitting into the court below “and was picked up dead.” Paul went down and, extending himself upon the body, embraced it, like the prophets of old (1 Kings 17:21; 2 Kings 4:34). He then comforted his friends, “Do not be troubled, for his life is in him.” Before Paul departed in the morning they brought the young man to him alive and well (Acts 20:5–12). Bloomfield (New Testament) proves that the narrative forbids us for a moment to entertain the view of those critics who suppose that animation was merely suspended.

EVANGELIST (Gk. evangelistēs, one “announcing good news”). In a general sense this applies to anyone who proclaims the mercy and grace of God, especially as unfolded in the gospel; therefore preeminently to Christ, and the apostles whom He commissioned to preach the truth and establish His kingdom. It came, however, to be employed in the early church as the designation of a special class, as in the following enumeration: “And He [Christ] gave some as apostles, and some as prophets, and some as evangelists, and some as pastors and teachers” (Eph. 4:11). This passage, accordingly, would lead us to think of them as standing between the two other groups—sent forth as missionary preachers of the gospel by the first, and as such preparing the way for the labors of the second. The same inference would seem to follow the occurrence of the word as applied to Philip (Acts 21:8). It follows from what has been said that the calling of the evangelist is the proclamation of the glad tidings to those who have not known them, rather than the instruction and pastoral care of those who have believed and been baptized. It follows also that the name denotes a work rather than an order. The evangelist might or might not be a bishop-elder or a deacon. The apostles, so far as they evangelized (8:25; 14:7; 1 Cor. 1:17), might claim the title, though there were many evangelists who were not apostles (Smith, Bib. Dict., s.v.). In later liturgical language the term applied to the reader of the gospel for the day.

EVE (ēv; Heb. ḥawwâ, “life giver”). The name given by Adam to the first woman, his wife (Gen. 3:20). It is supposed that she was created on the sixth day, after Adam had reviewed the animals. The naming of the animals led to this result, because “there was not found a helper suitable for him.” Then God caused a deep sleep to fall upon the man, and took one of his ribs and fashioned it into a woman, and brought her to Adam (2:18–22). Through the subtlety of the serpent, Eve was beguiled into a violation of the one commandment imposed upon her and Adam: she took of the fruit of the forbidden tree and gave some to her husband. Her punishment was an increase of sorrow and pain in childbirth (3:16). “That the woman should bear children was the original will of God; but it was a punishment that henceforth she was to bear them in sorrow, i.e., with pains which threatened her own life as well as that of the child” (Delitzsch). Three sons of Eve are named—Cain (4:1), Abel (v. 2), and Seth (5:3)—though the fact that there were other children is recorded (5:4).

E`VI (ē`vi; “desirous”). One of the five kings of the Midianites slain by the Israelites in the war arising out of the idolatry of Baal-peor, induced by the suggestion of Balaam (Num. 31:8), and whose lands were afterward allotted to Reuben (Josh. 13:21), 1441 B.C.

EVIDENCE. The rendering in the KJV (Jer. 32:10–16) of Heb. sēper, “book,” as it is usually rendered in the KJV, or “writing,” hence a document of title, i.e., a deed (so NASB and NIV); and of Gk. elegchos, “proof,” cf. Heb. 11:1, “evidence,” KJV; “conviction,” marg., “evidence,” NASB.

EVIL. The comprehensive term under which all disturbances of the divinely appointed harmony of the universe are included. Christian doctrine, in accordance with the Scriptures, carefully distinguishes between physical and moral evil.

Physical Evil. It is often called natural evil and is disorder in the physical world. Such physical causes as militate against physical well-being are therefore called evils. That such evils are, to some extent at least, the effect or penalty of sin is a clear teaching of Scripture (Gen. 3:10–12; 6:13). To what extent physical sufferings are the necessary means to greater good is, however, a great question.

Moral Evil. This is sin, disorder in the moral world. It is the failure of rational and free beings to conform in character and conduct to the will of God. This is the greatest evil (see Rom. 1:18–32). How the existence of evil is compatible with the goodness of God is the question of theodicy. For discussion of moral evil see Sin.

EVILDOER. One who is bad; from the Heb. rā`ā, to “break,” and so to render worthless (Pss. 37:1; 119:115; Isa. 1:4; etc.). The Gk. word (kakopoios) is identical with the English (1 Pet. 2:12, 14; 4:15).

EVIL-FAVOREDNESS. In the KJV (Deut. 17:1; NASB and NIV, “defect”) a term for a blemish, scurvy, wound, etc., that made an animal unfit for sacrifice (cf. Lev. 22:22–24).

E`VIL-MERO`DACH (ē`vil-me-rō`dak). The name of a king of Babylon mentioned twice in the OT (2 Kings 25:27 and Jer. 52:31). The name, in the Babylonian language, is written Amel-Marduk; i.e., man (or servant) of the god Marduk, or Merodach. Evil-merodach was the son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar and reigned 562–560 B.C. Of his reign we have but meager details. According to Berossus and the canon of Ptolemy he was slain by his sister’s husband, Neriglissar, who then made himself king in his stead. Josephus, probably following Berossus in this, makes him odious because of debauchery and cruelty. The OT narrates a kind and high-spirited act of his doing. In the first year of his reign he released from prison Jehoiachin, king of Judah, who had been in confinement thirty-seven years; “he spoke kindly to him” (2 Kings 25:28) and gave him a portion at his table for the rest of his life, honoring him above the other vassal kings who were at Babylon.

EWES. The rendering in the KJV of several Heb. words for the female sheep. See Animal Kingdom: Sheep.

EXACTOR (Heb. nāgaś, to “drive, tax, tyrannize,” Isa. 60:17). A word used to signify a driver (taskmaster, Ex. 3:7; Job 3:18; Isa. 9:3), or simply a driver of animals (Job 39:7); hence, exactor of debt (or tribute, Dan. 11:20; Zech. 9:8); hence, with oriental ideas of tyranny, a ruler (Isa. 3:12; 14:2; Zech. 10:4). In the passage, Isa. 60:17, it seems to mean magistracy, and we may read “righteousness shall be a substitute for the police force in every form” (Delitzsch, Com.).

EXCHANGER (Matt. 25:27, KJV). A broker or banker, i.e., one who exchanges money for a fee and loans out to others for a rate of interest. The NASB replaces the KJV expression with “in the bank,” giving a marginal reading of “to the bankers” (thus also the NIV). See Bank.

EXCOMMUNICATION. “A cutting off, deprivation of communion, or the privileges of intercourse; specifically, the formal exclusion of a person from religious communion and privileges” (Cent. Dict., s.v.).

Jewish. The distinction between two kinds has been handed down: The temporary exclusion and the permanent ban, hērem, “The Anathema” (which see). The former of these, the ban of the synagogue, was among the later Jews the excommunication or exclusion of a Jew, usually for heresy or alleged blasphemy, from the synagogue and the congregation or from familiar intercourse with the Jews. This was a modification of the anathema, and owes its origin to Ezra 10:8, where we find that the hērem (anathema) excluded the man from the congregation and anathematized his goods and possessions but did not consist in putting him to death. This ecclesiastical ban was pronounced for twenty-four different offenses, all of which Maimonides picked out from the Talmud. In the event of the offender’s showing signs of penitence it might be revoked. The excommunicated person was prohibited the use of bath, razor, and the convivial table, and no one was allowed to approach him within four cubits’ distance. The term of punishment was thirty days, and it was extended to a second and third thirty days, if necessary. If still rebellious the offender was subjected to the second and severer excommunication, the hērem.

In the NT, Jewish excommunication is brought before us in the case of the blind man (John 9:22). It was exclusion from the synagogue, i.e., the nidūi. Some think that our Lord in Luke 6:22 referred specifically to three forms of Jewish excommunication.

Christian. Excommunication in the Christian church is not merely founded on the natural rights possessed by all societies or in imitation of the Jews. It was instituted by our Lord (Matt. 18:15–17) and consists in the breaking off of all further Christian, brotherly fellowship with one who is hopelessly obdurate. We find the apostle Paul claiming the right to exercise discipline over his converts (2 Cor. 1:23; 13:10) and that formal excommunication on the part of the church was practiced and commanded by him (1 Cor. 5:11; 1 Tim. 1:20; Titus 3:10). The formula of delivering or handing over to Satan (1 Cor. 5:5; 1 Tim. 1:20) has been open to a difference of interpretation. Some interpret it as being merely a symbol for excommunication, which involves “exclusion from all Christian fellowship, and consequently banishment to the society of those among whom Satan dwelt, and from which the offender had publicly severed himself” (David Brown, in Schaff’s Popular Com., 3:180). Alfred

Plummer (Pastoral Epistles, pp. 75ff.) says that “this handing over to Satan was an apostolic act—a supernatural infliction of bodily infirmity, or disease, or death, as a penalty for grievous sin. It is scarcely doubtful that St. Paul delivered Hymenaeus and Alexander to Satan, in order that Satan might have power to afflict their bodies, with a view to their spiritual amelioration.”

Nature of Excommunication. We thus find that excommunication consisted in (1) separation from the communion of the church; (2) having as its object the good of the sufferer (1 Cor. 5:5) and protection of sound members (2 Tim. 3:17); (3) that it was wielded by the highest ecclesiastical officer (1 Cor. 5:3; Titus 3:10), promulgated by the congregation to which the offender belonged (1 Cor. 5:4), and in spite of any opposition on the part of a minority (2 Cor. 2:6); (4) that it was for an indefinite duration or for a period; (5) that its duration might be abridged at the discretion and by the indulgence of the person imposing the penalty (v. 8); (6) that penitence was the condition of restoration (v. 7); and (7) that the sentence was publicly revered (v. 10) as it was publicly declared (v. 10).

EXECUTION. See Punishments.

EXECUTIONER. The Heb. word describes, in the first instance, the office of executioner, and, secondarily, the general duties of the bodyguard of a monarch. Thus Potiphar was “captain of the executioners” (Gen. 37:36, KJV marg.; NIV, “captain of the guard”). That the “captain of the guard” occasionally performed the duty of an executioner himself appears in 1 Kings 2:25, 34. Nevertheless the post was one of high dignity. The Gk. spekoulatōr (Mark 6:27) is borrowed from the Lat. speculator; originally a military spy or scout, but under the emperors transferred to the bodyguard.

EXERCISE, BODILY. Exercise or training of the body, i.e., gymnastics (1 Tim. 4:8). The apostle appears to disparage not the athletic discipline, but rather that ascetic mortification of the fleshly appetites and even innocent affections (cf. 1 Tim. 4:3; Col. 2:23) characteristic of some Jewish fanatics, especially the Essenes (which see).

EXHORTATION (Gk. paraklēsis, lit., a “calling near,” “invitation”). It appears to have been recognized in the apostolic church as a special supernatural or prophetic function (Rom. 12:8), probably a subordinate exercise of the general faculty of teaching (1 Cor. 14:3). It has been defined as “the act of presenting such motives before a person as may excite him to the performance of duty.” The NIV usually renders the idea as “encourage.” The Scriptures enjoin ministers to exhort men, i.e., to rouse them to duty by proposing suitable motives (Isa. 58:1; Rom. 12:8), and it was also the constant practice of prophets (Isa. 1:17; Jer. 4:14; Ezek. 37), apostles (Acts 11:23), and of Christ Himself (Luke 3:18) (McClintock and Strong, Cyclopedia, s.v.).

EXODUS, THE. The great deliverance extended to the Israelites when “the Lord brought the sons of Israel out of the land of Egypt” (Ex. 12:51), “with a mighty hand and an outstretched arm” (Deut. 26:8), that is, “with full manifestation of divine power.”

Preparatory History. The quiet life of the patriarchs terminated in the circumstances subsequent to the selling of Joseph to the Ishmaelites and his later exaltation as viceroy in Egypt. According to the biblical chronology preserved in the MT of the Heb. Bible, the Israelites emigrated to Egypt around 1871 B.C. under the Twelfth Egyptian Dynasty of the Middle Kingdom c. 2000–1780 B.C. Multiplying rapidly in Egypt in the land of Goshen (Gen. 46:26–34) and identified with the area around the Wadi Tumilat in the eastern part of the Nile

Delta, the children of Israel soon became an important factor in Egyptian life. The land of Goshen was one of the richest parts of Egypt, “the best of the land” (47:11). Divine favor plus their happy location were factors in their increasing strength. Many scholars place Joseph’s rise to power much later, during the Hyksos Period, c. 1700 B.C., under the unnecessary supposition that it would be “a historical misrepresentation” to imagine that a young Semitic foreigner would have been elevated to such power under a native Egyptian dynasty like the Twelfth or the Eighteenth, but that such an event would be likely under the Semitic conquerors of Egypt, called the Hyksos. Unfortunately, the period 1780–1546 B.C. is one of great obscurity in Egypt, and the Hyksos conquest is as yet imperfectly understood. Although the history of Joseph cannot yet be placed in the frame of known Egyptian history, Israel was in Egypt during this period of confusion and turmoil, and the notice of the accession of an oppressive pharaoh called “a new king ... who did not know Joseph” (Ex. 1:8) has reference to one of the pharaohs of the New Empire, after the expulsion of the despised Asiatics from Egypt. Consistent with this is the fact that the Israelites were settled about the Hyksos capital of Egypt in the “plain of Tanis” called “the field of Zoan” (Ps. 78:12).

Deliverance. The ten plagues, like the story of Joseph, are replete with authentic local coloring. The plagues were supernatural and consisted of events and phenomena that were natural to Egypt, but with greater intensity and in unusual sequence. Israel’s exit from Egypt, as outlined in the Bible narrative (Ex. 12:37; 13:17–18, 20; 14:1–2), has incited a vast amount of skepticism and debate among scholars. However, with increased archaeological knowledge, the biblical itinerary is more and more credible.

Route of the Exodus. In tracing this itinerary, it is important to observe that the translation of the Heb. Yam Sup (“Red Sea”) is plainly incorrect. The proper rendering is “Reed” or “Marsh” Sea. That this can scarcely denote the Red Sea or even its northeastern arm, the Gulf of Suez, is attested by the fact that no reeds exist in the Red Sea, and that the body of water the Israelites actually passed through formed a natural barrier between Egypt and the Sinai wilderness. On the other hand, to reach the Red Sea or its arm, the Gulf of Suez, they would have had to traverse a vast expanse of desert. The account most certainly implies the proximity of the Reed Sea to Succoth, modern Tell el-Mashkutah, some thirty-two miles southeastward of their starting places from Rameses (Avaris, Ex. 12:37). The Reed or Papyrus Sea, which the Israelites miraculously went through, “may reasonably be supposed to be the Papyrus Lake or Papyrus Marsh known from an Egyptian document of the thirteenth century to be located near Tanis” (W. F. Albright, “The Old Testament Archaeology,” O. T. Commentary [1948], p. 142). The crossing of the Reed Sea was doubtless in the area around Lake Timsah and just S of it. The topography of this region has been changed to some extent since the digging of the Suez Canal. At least one body of water, Lake Ballah, has disappeared. The vicinity of Lake Timsah between Lake Ballah and the Bitter Lakes may well have been more marshy than it is at present. The starting point for the tracing of the biblical route of the Exodus was the identification of Rameses (Avaris). This city was the Hyksos capital, built c. 1720 B.C. It is located in the NE part of the Delta. Leaving Rameses (Avaris), the fleeing Israelite captives began their journey toward Canaan. The direct military route lay immediately parallel to the Mediterranean coast, past the Egyptian frontier fortress of Zilu (Thiel) and thence by “the way of the land of the Philistines” (13:17). This well-guarded and carefully traveled highway giving access to the Egyptian empire in Palestine and lower Syria would have brought the Israelites into immediate open conflict. Their morale and military organization were not equal to this. Quitting Succoth, located some ten miles E from Pithom (1:11) and now identified with Tell Retabeh, the Israelites set camp on the frontier of “the wilderness to the Red (Reed) Sea” (13:18–20), that is, the region of Lake Timsah. Pi-hahiroth, said to be “between Migdol and the sea” and “in front of Baal-zephon” (14:2), was most evidently Egyptian Pi-hathor in the general vicinity of Tanis. Migdol and Baal-zephon are Semitic names perfectly normal for this part of Egypt and attested to by the inscriptions. However, their exact positions have not yet been determined, hence the Israelites in their circuitous journey (13:18) may have gone farther northward than is commonly thought and crossed the water in the region of Lake Ballah. At any rate, the route outlined in the Bible bears every evidence of reliability.

EXODUS, THE DATE OF. The date of Israel's departure from Egypt involves difficult problems, and the subject is filled with confusion. Setting aside extreme views like those of Gardner, Hall, Wreszinski, and others, who regard the story of the Exodus as a garbled version of the Egyptian saga of Hyksos expulsion, or like those of Petrie, Eerdmans, Rowley, and others, who give it a very late date under Merneptah or even somewhat later, only two principal views exist. The first places the event around 1441 B.C. in the reign of Amenhotep II of the Eighteenth Dynasty; the second places it around 1290 B.C. in the reign of Rameses II in the Nineteenth Dynasty.

The Biblical Date. Although any view of the Exodus date is so plagued with problems that many scholars contend that "the complete harmonization" of the biblical account "and our extra-Biblical material is quite impossible," it is, nevertheless, true on the basis of many considerations that the early date view (1441 B.C.) is the biblical one. This is denied by many on the basis of Ex. 1:11 and other evidence. But if one carefully surveys all the scriptural evidence, taking into consideration the whole time scheme underlying the Pentateuch and the early history of Israel to the time of Solomon, it is clear that the OT places this great redemptive event around the middle of the fifteenth century B.C., rather than a full century and a half later. Evidence both within and without the Bible in support of this is not easily set aside.

Explicit Scriptural Statement Places the Exodus about 1441 B.C. In 1 Kings 6:1 it is explicitly stated that Solomon "began to build the house of the Lord" "in the four hundred and eightieth year after the sons of Israel came out of the land of Egypt." The fourth year of Solomon's reign, when he is said to have begun to build the Temple, would be about 961 B.C. Since Solomon ruled forty years (11:42), the fourth year of his reign would be variously computed by modern chronologists: 958 B.C. (Albright), 967 B.C. (Thiele), 962 B.C. (Begrich). Taking the year 961 B.C., which cannot be far wrong, the date 1441 B.C. as the date of the Exodus is computed, and 1871 B.C. as the time of the entrance of Israel into Egypt, since the sojourn there extended to 430 years (Ex. 12:40–41). Albright's date of the Exodus (1290 B.C.) and H. H. Rowley's (1225 B.C.) must reject 1 Kings 6:1 as late and completely unreliable, despite the fact that the chronological notice it gives has every evidence of authenticity and obviously fits into the whole time scheme underlying the Pentateuch and the books of Joshua and Judges (cf. J. W. Jack, The Date of the Exodus [1925], pp. 200–16). Scholars who thus drastically curtail the period of the Judges by a century and a half or two centuries, which the biblical figures place about 1400 to 1050 B.C., practically reject the possibility of fitting the biblical chronology into the framework of contemporary history.

Contemporary Egyptian History Allows the 1441 B.C. Date of the Exodus. This date falls very likely toward the opening years of the reign of Amenhotep II (c. 1450–1425 B.C.), son of the famous conqueror and empire-builder Thutmose III (c. 1482–1450 B.C.). The commanding person of Thutmose III, one of the greatest of the pharaohs, furnishes an ideal figure for the events of the Exodus. In the contemporary records of Amenhotep II, who would be the pharaoh who hardened his heart and would not let the children of Israel go, of course no references occur to such national disasters as the ten plagues and the loss of the Egyptian army in the Red (Reed) Sea, much less to the escape of the Hebrews. But this circumstance is to be expected. The Egyptians were the last people to record their misfortunes. Nor is there any sign upon the mummy of Amenhotep II, discovered in 1898, to show that he was drowned at sea. Nor does the Bible state that he was or that he personally accompanied his army into the water (Ex. 14:23–31). If Amenhotep II was the reigning pharaoh of the Exodus, his eldest son was slain in the tenth plague (12:29). It seems clear from the monuments that Thutmose IV (c. 1425–1412) was not the eldest son of Amenhotep II. The so-called Dream Inscription of Thutmose IV, recorded on an immense slab of red granite between the paws of the Sphinx at Gizeh, recounts the prophecy that the young Thutmose would one day be pharaoh. Such a prophecy would have been pointless had the young man been the firstborn son of Amenhotep, since the law of primogeniture was in force in Egypt at that time.

Thutmose III was a great builder and employed Semitic captives in his wide-scale construction projects. His vizier, named Rekhmire, left a tomb on which scenes of brick-making are depicted, recalling Ex. 5:6–19. Semitic foreigners are significantly found among the bricklayers on this tomb. The bricklayers are quoted as saying “He supplies us with bread, beer and every good thing,” while the taskmasters warn the laborers: “The rod is in my hand; be not idle.” Finally Joseph died and “a new king arose over Egypt, who did not know Joseph” (1:8). This ruler seems to have been the founder or an early king of the powerful Eighteenth Dynasty (1546–1319 B.C.). Because the Hyksos invasion of Egypt was led by Semites and not by Hurrians or Indo-Aryans, as recent studies have shown (W. F. Albright, The O. T. and Modern Study [1951], p. 44), it appears that the expulsion of the Hyksos around the middle of the sixteenth century B.C. was the important event that resulted in the oppression of the Israelites. Not until about 1570 B.C. were the Hyksos invaders driven out and the powerful Eighteenth Dynasty founded. Very likely under the kings of the Eighteenth Dynasty who preceded Thutmose III—Amenhotep I (1546–1525 B.C.), Thutmose I (1525–1508 B.C.), and Thutmose II (1508–1504 B.C.)—and under Queen Hatshepsut (1504–1482 B.C.), the Hebrew bondage became increasingly severe. About 1520 B.C. Moses was born, probably during the reign of Thutmose I, whose daughter, the well-known Hatshepsut, seems to have been the princess who found the baby Moses among the reeds by the riverside (2:5–10). After a struggle with Queen Hatshepsut, Thutmose III came into power about 1486 B.C. This event doubtless inaugurated the last and most severe phase of Israelite oppression.

Contemporary Events in Palestine Substantiate the 1441 B.C. Date of the Exodus. If the Exodus took place around 1441 B.C. the Israelites entered Canaan around 1401 B.C. Is there any evidence of such an invasion in extrabiblical monuments? The Amarna Letters, which concern this very period (c. 1400–1366 B.C.), refer to such an invasion, as has been known virtually from their discovery in 1886. These invaders, called Habiru, are sometimes equated etymologically with the Hebrews. There are many serious problems involved, and the best scholars are divided on the matter, but the statement of J. W. Jack is still pertinent, especially in the light of plain statement and clear intimations of the OT concerning the date of the Exodus. “Who are these invaders of south and central Palestine.... Who else could they be but the Hebrews of the Exodus, and have we not here the native version of their entry into the land?” (The Date of the Exodus, p. 128). For a full discussion see Jack, pp. 119–41.

In the Amarna Letters the correspondence of Abi-Hiba, governor of Jerusalem, with Pharaoh Akhnaton (c. 1370 B.C.), Egyptian military aid is requested against the Habiru (but see article Amarna, el-). The fall of Jericho favors the 1441 B.C. date of the Exodus as a result of the excavations of Ernest Sellin (1907–9) and especially those of John Garstang (1930–36). City D, which was taken by Joshua and the invading Israelites, was constructed about 1500 B.C., and fell around 1400 B.C. Moreover, the Egyptian empire was falling through the fingers of Pharaohs Amenhotep III and IV about 1400–1360, precisely when the Hebrews would have been conquering Canaan, according to the early date of the Exodus.

Objections to the Biblical Date. Many scholars who set aside OT chronological notices as frequently of little historical value would strenuously object to calling the 1441 B.C. date of the Exodus the biblical one. They would place it around 1290 B.C., urging the following objections:

1. It would be very improbable that Israel would have entered Egypt before the Hyksos period. Abraham went to Egypt and moved freely in high circles under the Middle Kingdom (Gen. 13:10–12), and there is no reason Joseph may not have done so at a later pre-Hyksos period, especially when his exaltation is presented in the OT narratives as entirely providential. Moreover, the details of the story have a strong Egyptian and not a Hyksos (Semitic) coloring. Had the reigning king been Hyksos, the Hebrew shepherds would not have been segregated in Goshen and a point made of the fact that “every shepherd is loathsome to the Egyptians” (46:34).

2. Exodus 1:11 is supposed to place the Exodus definitely later. But 1 Kings 6:1 is just as explicit for the earlier date. The question is, Are these two notices at variance with one another? The explanation is that Rameses (Avaris) is a modernization of its older name, and the fact that this site was called Rameses only from about 1300 to 1100 B.C. is not a decisive argument against the early date. The reference in Ex. 1:11 must be to the older city Avaris where the oppressed Israelites labored centuries earlier. Since Avaris was once a flourishing city before the Hyksos were driven out (c. 1570 B.C.), there was plenty of time for the Israelites in bondage to have constructed the earlier city as they went down into Egypt about 1870 B.C. Moreover, it is hardly conceivable that such renowned conquerors and builders as Thutmose III and Amenhotep II would have abandoned all interest in the Delta area, because this rich and vital territory was necessary to the security of their Asiatic domain.

3. Archaeological evidence from Transjordan, Lachish, and Debir allegedly disproves the early date of the Exodus. Nelson Glueck’s surface explorations in Transjordan and in the Arabah are supposed to demonstrate that there was a gap in the sedentary population of this region from about 1900 to about 1300 B.C., so that had Israel come up out of Egypt about 1400 there would supposedly have been no Edomite, Ammonite, and Moabite kingdoms to resist their progress. Only scattered nomads would have met them (cf. Num. 20:14, 17–18). But there is nothing in the narrative to demand anything more than a simple agricultural economy that would have left little or no material remains. Also archaeological evidence at Lachish and Debir is not sufficiently evident to set aside the whole testimony supporting the earlier date. The destruction of Bethel, Lachish, and Debir is claimed to have occurred about 1230 B.C., and therefore to support a late date for the Exodus. Those cities fell about the same time and near the beginning of the Conquest, according to the Joshua narrative. But it is important to note that although Joshua captured Bethel, Lachish, and Debir, nothing is said about destroying them; he burned only Ai, Jericho, and Hazor (Josh. 6:24; 8:19; 11:13). Some of Joshua’s conquests were not permanent. We know that Debir had to be recaptured later (Josh. 15:13–17), and possibly the others did also. If dates of destruction at Bethel, Lachish, and Debir are correct, they may well refer to attacks during the days of the Judges instead of to Joshua’s conquests. M.F.U.; H.F.V.

EX’ODUS, BOOK OF (ek’so-dus; from the Gk. ex, “out,” and hodos, “way,” “a going out”). Whereas Genesis is the book of origins, Exodus is the book of redemption. Delivered out of Egyptian bondage, the newly constituted nation is endowed with the law, priesthood, and sacrificial system, providing for the worship and regulation of a redeemed people.

Name. The book is named from the Lat. “exodus,” through the LXX exodus, signifying “out-going” or “departure” (cf. 19:1; Heb. 11:22). The ancient Hebrews, in accordance with their practice of designating the holy books from one or more of the opening words, called it wā ʾēlleh shēmōt (“and these are the names”), or simply shēmōt, (“names”).

Aim. The book of Exodus deals with the great event of the redemption from Egypt. It typifies our redemption and traces the constitution of Jacob’s descendants as a theocratic nation at Mt. Sinai. God, who until this time had been related to the Israelites only through the Abrahamic covenant, now brings Himself in relationship to them nationally through redemption. As a people selected to bring forth the promised Redeemer, they are put under the Mosaic covenant. The divine Presence resides among them under the cloud of glory. The constitution, Tabernacle, priesthood, and sacrificial system are minutely typical of the Person and work of Christ (note the message of the book of Hebrews). Exodus is preeminently the book of redemption.

Critical View. As in the case with Genesis and the rest of the Pentateuch, higher critics deny the Mosaic authorship and authenticity of Exodus, claiming that the book is a compilation of J, E, and P sources. This partitionist theory, however, is constructed upon shaky presuppositions involving false literary criteria and philosophic hypotheses, notably the erroneous notion that the development of Israel and Israel’s institutions were in no way different from the progressive, evolutionary development of other peoples. Sound views of inspiration must reject the essential claims of this so-called Graf-Keunen-Wellhausen theory of pentateuchal criticism as being incompatible with the claims of the Pentateuch itself and its foundational place in the whole scheme of divine revelation and redemptive history.

Conservative View. The book of Exodus is historical and from the time of Moses, who is its author. As with the other books of the Pentateuch, the great lawgiver may have used ancient sources, oral or written, but the Pentateuch bears the unmistakable hand of a one-author unity and bears the impress everywhere—in miracle, prophecy, type, and symbol—of divine inspiration, historicity, and authenticity.

EX’ORCISM (ek’sor-sizm). The practice of using magical words and ceremonies to expel evil spirits or demons. The phenomenon was characteristic of heathenism. The Jews at Ephesus encountered by Paul (Acts 19:13–19) illustrate an attempt to mix pagan traffic in demonology with expulsion of evil spirits by the power of God. See also Magic: Various Forms. M.F.U.

EXPEDIENCY, EXPEDIENT (Gk. sumpherō, to “advantage”). “The principle of doing what is deemed most practicable or serviceable under the circumstances.” A familiar rule of expediency is that laid down by the apostle Paul: “Therefore, if food causes my brother to stumble, I will never eat meat again, that I might not cause my brother to stumble” (1 Cor. 8:13). The occasion of this declaration was his writing to the Corinthians respecting the Christian’s attitude toward flesh offered up to idols (which see). This would give offense to those with scrupulous consciences, while others, like Paul, might make light of the matter, so far as personal feeling was concerned. “It is impossible to state more strongly than does the apostle the obligation to refrain from indulging in things indifferent when the use of them is an occasion of sin to others. Yet it is never to be forgotten that this, by its very nature, is a principle the application of which must be left to every man’s conscience in the sight of God. No rule of conduct founded on expediency can be enforced by church discipline. It was right in Paul to refuse to eat flesh for fear of causing others to offend, but he could not justly be subjected to censure had he seen fit to eat. The same principle is illustrated in reference to circumcision. The apostle utterly refused to circumcise Titus, and yet he circumcised Timothy, in both cases acting wisely and conscientiously. Whenever a thing is right or wrong, according to circumstances, every man must have the right to judge of those circumstances. Otherwise he is judge of another man’s conscience, a new rule of duty is introduced, and the catalogue of adiaphora (i.e., things indifferent or nonessential), which has existed in every system of ethics from the beginning, is simply abolished” (T. W. Chambers in Meyer, Com. on 1 Cor. 8).

EXPERIENCE. We speak of our knowledge of sins forgiven and enjoyment of the favor of God as our Christian experience. It means the practical acquaintance with the work of God in man that results in the consciousness of salvation. Thus experience is the personal trial of all things and the consequent knowledge of it.

EXPIATION. In the theological sense, this term denotes the end accomplished by certain divinely appointed sacrifices in respect to freeing the sinner from the punishment of his sins. The sacrifices recognized as expiatory are the sin offerings of the OT dispensation (see Offering; Sacrifice), and, preeminently, the offerings that Christ made of Himself for the sins of the world (see Atonement).

The above definition is made somewhat general for the purpose of including both of the theories that accept expiation in any real sense.

Calvinistic View. The Calvinistic or Satisfaction view teaches that the sacrifice of Christ was expiatory in the sense that Christ suffered vicariously the punishment of the sins of the elect. The expiation thus is absolute in behalf of the limited number for whom it is made. For the nonelect, or reprobate, there is no expiation. See Election.

Arminian View. The Arminian theory of expiation holds that the sacrificial sufferings of Christ were not of the nature of punishment, but were a divinely appointed, though conditional, substitute for the punishment of the sins of all mankind. The sacrifice of Christ is expiatory in the sense that all who truly repent of their sins and believe on Christ have, on account of that sacrifice, their guilt canceled, the punishment of their sins remitted.

The two theories are alike in regarding Christ’s sacrifice as the objective ground of forgiveness.

Moral Influence View. The third prominent theory of the atonement, the moral influence theory, admits of no necessity for sacrificial expiation and denies the expiatory character of sacrifices. According to this theory, Christ died to provide an example of devotion to truth and duty—the kind of devotion that might lead to a martyr’s death.

As to the fact of expiation by sacrifice, the following should be noted:

1. The idea of expiation, or of seeking reconciliation with Deity through sacrifices, is a common feature of most if not all forms of religion. It is a fair supposition that, despite all the false conceptions held in connection with the idea, some measure of important truth lies at the bottom.

2. Among the sacrifices appointed by God under the OT dispensation, there were sacrifices for which the purpose was clearly expiatory. Not only the simple and most natural understanding of such sacrifices, but also the divine teaching concerning them, was that they stood in important relation to the forgiveness of sins (see Lev. 17:11). Preeminent among these were the sacrifices on the great annual Day of Atonement. See Sacrifices; Offerings; Atonement, Day of. It is not, however, to be understood that the blood of beasts of itself had expiatory value and effect, or that the offerings in a mechanical or commercial way brought about reconciliation (see Ps. 50; Isa. 1; Amos 5:22). It was only because of divine grace that these sacrifices availed for reconciliation. The sacrifices were not only appointed by God, but were also provided by Him (Lev. 17:11; Ps. 50:10).

3. In the NT dispensation, of which the OT was predictive and for which it was preparatory, the sacrifice that Christ offered of Himself is conspicuously set before us as the ground of the forgiveness of sins. Christ is “the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world.” He is the “Lamb ... slain” “from the foundation of the world.” It was Christ’s own declaration that His blood was shed “for forgiveness of sins” (see John 1:29; Rev. 13:8; Matt. 26:28; see also John 3:14; Col. 1:14, 20; Heb. 9:13–14; 10:1–12; etc.).

As to the necessity of expiation, from which it arises, see Atonement. E.MCC.

EYE. Used as the symbol of a large number of objects and ideas, as in the following: (1) frequently a fountain; (2) color (Num. 11:7, in the Heb.; see marg., KJV); (3) the face or surface (Ex. 10:5, 15; Num. 22:5, 11, as “the surface, i.e., eye of the land”); the expression “between the eyes” means the forehead (Ex. 13:9, 16, see marg.); (4) in song of Sol. 4:9, KJV, “eye” is better rendered “glance” in the NASB and NIV; (5) “eye” (marg., KJV, Prov. 23:31, for “colour”) is applied to the beads or bubbles of wine when it is poured out (NASB, NIV, “sparkles”; NASB marg., “gives its eye”); (6) “before the eyes” (KJV, Gen. 23:11, 18; Ex. 4:30) is better translated in the NASB as “in the presence of,” “in the sight of”; “in the eyes” (KJV, Gen. 19:8) of anyone means according to his judgment or opinion (“whatever you like,” NASB and NIV); (7) to “set the eyes” (Gen. 44:21; Job 24:23; Jer. 39:12, marg.) upon anyone is to regard with favor, but may also be used in a negative sense (Amos 9:8); (8) many of the passions, such as envy, pride, pity, etc., being expressed by the eye, such phrases as the following occur: “evil eye” (Matt. 20:15, marg., i.e., “envious,” thus also NIV); “bountiful eye” (Prov. 22:9, KJV; NIV, “generous”); “seductive eyes” (Isa. 3:16); “eyes full of adultery” (2 Pet. 2:14); “the lust of the eyes” (1 John 2:16); “the desire of your eyes” (Ezek. 24:16) denotes whatever is a great delight; (9) to guard as the “apple [pupil] of the eye” (Deut. 32:10; Zech. 2:8) is to preserve with special care; “as the eyes of servants look to the hand of their master” (Ps. 123:2) is an expression that seems to indicate that masters, especially in the presence of strangers, communicated with their servants by certain motions of their hands.

EYES, BLINDING OF. See Punishments.

EYES, COVERING OF THE (Gen. 20:16, KJV; NASB, see marg.). A phrase of much disputed significance, understood by some to mean that Abimelech advised Sarah and her women, while in or near towns, to conform to the general custom of wearing veils (see Dress). Another view is the following: “By the ‘covering of the eyes’ we are not to understand a veil, which Sarah was to procure for a thousand shekels, but it is a figurative expression for an atoning gift, ... so that he may forget a wrong done, and explained by the analogy of the phrase he covereth the faces of the judges, i.e., he bribes them (Job 9:24)” (K. & D., Com., ad loc.). The NIV renders “cover the offense.”

EYES, PAINTING THE. Refers rather to the eyelids. An ancient practice known to the Hebrews and to the Egyptians millennia before them. About 4000 B.C. the Badarians of Egypt were accustomed to grind green malachite on slate palettes to use for eye paint. This was not only a beauty aid but an excellent germicide. It is still used by Africans and is particularly effective when spread around the eyes as protection against flies. One of the finest monuments of Narmer, one of the kings of the First Dynasty of Egypt, c. 2900 B.C., is a palette found at Hierakonpolis. The palette, similar to those on which the Egyptians had long ground eye paint, is of a very large size befitting a great king. The painting of the eyelids was doubtless copied by the Hebrews from their Egyptian, Phoenician, and Mesopotamian neighbors. Jezebel is spoken of as having “painted her eyes” (2 Kings 9:30). This practice was also very common in Phoenicia. Painting of the eyes is mentioned among other methods that women used to win admiration. Compare Jer. 4:30: “enlarge your eyes with paint” and Ezek. 23:40: “for whom you bathed, painted your eyes, and decorated yourselves with ornaments.” Eye paint was also prepared from antimony ore, which when pulverized produced a black powder with metallic brilliancy. It was generally made into an ointment and applied to the eyebrows and eyelashes with an eye pencil. M.F.U.

EYE SALVE (Gk. kollourion, diminutive of kollura, coarse bread of cylindrical shape). A preparation shaped like a kollura, composed of various materials and used as a remedy for tender eyelids (Rev. 3:18).

E'ZAR. See Ezer.

EZ'BAI (ez'bye). The father of Naarai, one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. 11:37), after 1000 B.C.

EZ'BON (ez'bon).

1. The fourth son of the patriarch Gad (Gen. 46:16), also called (Num. 26:16) Ozni.

2. The first named of the sons of Bela, the son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:7).

EZEKI'AS. A Gk. form (Matt. 1:9–10, KJV) of the name of King Hezekiah (which see).

EZE'KIEL (e-zēk'yel; Heb. $y\text{זקל}$ hezqēl, “God will strengthen”). The son of a priest named Buzi, and one of the four greater prophets.

Ezekiel was taken captive in the captivity of Jehoiachin, eleven years before the destruction of Jerusalem (2 Kings 24:12–15). He was a member of a community of Jewish exiles who settled on the banks of the Chebar, a “river” or canal of Babylonia. It was by this river, “in the land of the Chaldeans,” that God's message first reached him (Ezek. 1:3). His call took place “in the fifth year of King Jehoiachin's exile” (1:2; 592 B.C.). It now seems generally agreed that it was the thirtieth year from the new era of Nabopolassar, father of Nebuchadnezzar (which see). We learn from an incidental allusion (24:18)—the only reference that he makes to his personal history—that he was married and had a house (8:1) in his place of exile and lost his wife by a sudden and unforeseen stroke. He lived in the highest consideration among his companions in exile, and their elders consulted him on all occasions (8:1; 11:25; 14:1; 20:1; etc.). The last date he mentions is the twenty-seventh year of the captivity (29:17), so that his mission extended over twenty-two years.

He is distinguished by his firm and inflexible energy of will and character, and we also observe a devoted adherence to the rites and ceremonies of his national religion. Ezekiel is no cosmopolite, but displays everywhere the peculiar tendencies of a Hebrew educated under Levitical training. We may also note in Ezekiel the absorbed recognition of his high calling, which enabled him cheerfully to endure any privation or misery, if thereby he could give any warning or lesson to his people (chap. 4; 24:15–16; etc.), whom he so ardently loved (9:8; 11:13).

EZEKIEL, BOOK OF. This major prophecy takes the name of the prophet whose writing it records. Ezekiel was the son of a priest named Buzi and without doubt a priest himself (1:3). Together with King Jehoiachin he was taken captive to Babylon in 597 B.C. He settled in Babylonia in a place called Tel-abib (1:1; 3:15) by the River Chebar, a great canal SE of Babylon. He began his ministry in the fifth year of the captivity of Jehoiachin when he was about thirty years old (cf. 1:1). His ministry lasted about twenty-two years, until 571 B.C. (29:17), his last dated prophecy. It is not certain whether he survived to see King Jehoiachin liberated by Evil-Merodach in 560 B.C.

Authorship and Date. The unity and authenticity of the book of Ezekiel were not seriously attacked until comparatively recent times. As late as 1924 Gustav Hoelscher observed that the critical knife had been laid on practically all the OT prophetic books except Ezekiel's prophecy. Accordingly, following the methods of Duhm, he dissected the book, leaving not much more than one-tenth of it as authentic—the comparatively few rhythmical sections. The rest, the prosaic parts, he assumed were written by fifth-century authors.

V. Hertrich, Ezekielprobleme (1932), although largely rejecting Hoelscher's theses, approached the book in essentially the same way. W. A. Irwin rejects chaps. 40–48 entirely and accepts only 250 verses of the rest. (The Problem of Ezekiel [1943]). In 1930 C. C. Torrey rejected the book as a pseudoepigraph of Palestinian origin and dated it c. 230 B.C. (Pseudo-Ezekiel and the Original Prophecy [1930], p. 150). N. Messel (1945), and A. Bentzen (1949), advocate similar if not such drastic views. Criticism of Ezekiel illustrates the wearisome story of negative criticism. It is conceived in doubt and born in complete confusion and uncertainty. The critics' subtle attempts to solve the so-called problem of Ezekiel need not trouble the Christian student who firmly believes in and has a vital knowledge of the supernatural in his own experience. Negative critical views are largely dictated by disbelief in the supernatural. Because it contains so many supernatural visions and so much apocalyptic imagery, which, as with the book of Daniel, is reflected in the book of Revelation, it was inevitable that negative criticism would dismember the book of Ezekiel despite manifold evidences of its genuineness, which the older critics like Cornill freely admitted (Einleitung, p. 76). The arrangement and plan, the accurate dating, the use of the first person, and the clear-cut prophetic purpose all point to genuine authorship by Ezekiel.

Purpose. Ezekiel's mission was one of comfort to the captives in Babylon, constituting "the whole house of Israel" (cf. 37:11, 15–24). He directed his prophecies toward demonstrating that Jehovah was justified in permitting the captivity of His people; this is the dominant theme in chaps. 8–33. Proof is presented that instead of wiping them out, as God had done with other nations who had committed similar abominations, His dealing with His own covenant people was preventive and corrective. The purpose was to instruct them to know that He was God, that the neighboring nations exulting over their fall would be judged (25:1–32:32), and that the nation would finally be restored in the mediatorial Davidic kingdom (33:1; 48:35). The phrase "you [or "they"] will know that I am the Lord" occurs more than thirty times in 6:7–39:28.

E’ZEL (ē’zel; “separation”). The memorial stone, place of the meeting and parting of David and Jonathan (1 Sam. 20:19). The marg. of the KJV has “that showeth the way”; the marg. of the RV has “this mound.”

E’ZEM (ē’zēm; a “bone”). A city in the tribe of Simeon, originally included within the southern territory of Judah, near Baalah (or Balah or Bilhah) and Eltolad (Josh. 15:29; 19:3; 1 Chron. 4:29). Probably Ummel ‘Azam, eleven miles SE of Beersheba.

E’ZER (ē’zer; “help”).

1. The father of Hushah, one of the posterity of Hur, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:4).
2. A son (or descendant) of Ephraim who, with Elead, was slain by the aboriginal inhabitants of Gath “because they came down to take their livestock” (1 Chron. 7:21).
3. The first named of the Gadite champions who went to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:9), after 1000 B.C.
4. The son of Jeshua, the “official of Mizpah” who repaired part of the city walls near the armory (Neh. 3:19), 445 B.C.
5. One of the priests who assisted in the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. 12:42), 445 B.C.
6. One of the sons of Seir, a chief “descended from the Horites” (Gen. 36:21, 27, 30; 1 Chron. 1:38, 42).

EZION-GEBER (e’zi-on-gē’ber). Solomon’s naval base at the head of the Gulf of Aqaba (1 Kings 9:26) has been identified with Tell el-Kheleifeh, about 500 yards from the shore of the gulf. Nelson Glueck led a Smithsonian-American Schools of Oriental Research dig there during the spring seasons of 1938 to 1940. What he found was a heavily fortified site an acre and a half in extent and having five periods of occupation, from Solomon’s day to the fourth century B.C. In the NW corner of the site he found an installation that he identified as a copper smelting and refining plant. Subsequently he decided the structure was not a smeltery but a citadel also used as a storehouse or granary, and he concluded that Tell el-Kheleifeh may have been only a satellite of Ezion-geber instead of the port itself. The tell is not on the seacoast. Archaeological work in the southern Arabah has shown that the copper industry in the area did not date to Solomon's day, and various scholars have suggested that Ezion-geber may have been on the island of Jezira Fara'un, about 300 yards from the shore at Eilat. See J. J. Davis, The New International Dictionary of Biblical Archaeology (1983), pp. 189–91. H.F.V.

EZ'NITE (ez'nīt). Apparently the patronymic of Adino (which see) given (2 Sam. 23:8) as chief among David's captains. Concerning this doubtful rendering, Luther expresses the following opinion: "We believe the text to have been corrupted by a writer, probably from some book in an unknown character and bad writing, so that orer should be substituted for adino, and ha-eznib for eth hanitho"; that is to say, the reading in the Chronicles (1 Chron. 11:11), "he lifted up his spear," should be adopted (K. & D., Com.). This is done in the NIV.

EZ'RA (ez'ra; "help"). The name of two persons connected with the return of the Jews from Babylon.

1. The priest who led the second expedition of Jews back from Babylonian exile into Palestine, and the author of the book bearing his name (see the last four chapters, in which he speaks in the first person). Ezra was a lineal descendant of Phinehas, the grandson of Aaron (Ezra 7:1–5), being a son of Seraiah, who was the grandson of Hilkiah, high priest in the reign of Josiah. He is described as a "scribe skilled in the law of Moses" (v. 6); "a scribe, learned in the words of the commandments of the Lord and His statutes to Israel" (v. 11); "Ezra the priest, the scribe of the law of the God of heaven" (v. 12).

Ezra's priestly extraction acted as a powerful lever for directing his vigorous efforts specifically to the promotion of religion and learning among his people. It is recorded (7:10) that he "had set his heart to study the law of the Lord, and to practice it, and to teach His statutes and ordinances in Israel." Living in Babylon he gained the favor of King Artaxerxes, and obtained from him a commission to go up to Jerusalem (about 459 B.C.). The king's commission invited all the Israelites, priests, and Levites in the whole empire, who so wished, to accompany Ezra. Of these a list amounting to 1,754 is given (chap. 8); and these, doubtless, form part of the full list of the returned captives contained in Nehemiah (chap. 7), and in duplicate (Ezra 2). Ezra was allowed to take with him a large freewill offering of gold and silver, and silver vessels contributed by the Jews, by the king himself, and by his counselors. He was also empowered to draw upon the king's treasures beyond the river for any further supplies required, and all priests, Levites, and other ministers of the Temple were exempted from taxation. Ezra received authority to appoint magistrates and judges in Judea, with power of life and death over all offenders (7:11–28). His credentials were endorsed by the seven principal members of the royal council (v. 14).

Ezra assembled the Jews who accompanied him on the banks of the Ahava River, where they camped for three days. As mentioned above, the number was about 1,500 and included several of high-priestly and Davidic descent. Upon inspection he found that they did not have a single Levite among them. He sent a deputation to Casiphia, where many of them lived, and succeeded in adding 38 Levites and 220 Temple servants to the expedition (8:15–20). The valuable offerings to the Temple he placed in the custody of 12 of the most distinguished priests and Levites, but such was his trust in God and his lofty courage, that he refrained from asking the king for protection (v. 22). After fasting "that we might humble ourselves before our God” (vv. 21–23), the company started on its journey on the twelfth day of the first month (in the spring) of the seventh year of Artaxerxes I.

It reached Jerusalem without incident at the beginning of the fifth month (7:8). Three days after the company’s arrival the treasures were weighed and delivered to the proper custodians, burnt sacrifices were offered by the returned exiles, and the king’s commissions were delivered to viceroys and governors (8:32–36). In accordance with the royal decree, Ezra was now to be firmly established in Jerusalem as chief judge, empowered to settle everything relating to the religion of the Jews and the life that was regulated by it. Ezra soon found, to his great distress, that the people of Jerusalem had paid no regard to the law forbidding the marriage of Israelites with heathen. Overwhelmed by his emotion, he tore his robe, pulled his hair, and “sat down appalled.” Men of tender conscience gathered around him, and all remained in mourning until the hour of the evening sacrifice, when Ezra poured out his soul in prayer (9:1–15). By this time a great congregation had gathered about Ezra, and “wept bitterly.” At length Shecaniah declared the guilt of the people and their wish to comply fully with the law. A general assembly was called to meet in Jerusalem within three days to decide what course should be pursued. The people assembled on the twentieth day of the ninth month amid a great storm of rain, and having confessed their sin, they proceeded to remedy the situation with order and deliberation. All the heathen wives were put away, including those who had borne children, by the beginning of the new year (chap. 10).

Whether Ezra remained after the events recorded above, occupying about eight months, or returned to Babylon, is not known. It is conjectured by some that Ezra remained governor until superseded by Nehemiah; others think that he continued his labors in conjunction with Nehemiah. Our next mention of him is in connection with Nehemiah after the completion of the walls of Jerusalem. The functions he executed under Nehemiah’s government were purely of a priestly and ecclesiastical character, such as reading and interpreting the law of Moses to the people, praying for the congregation, assisting in the dedication of the walls, and proclaiming the religious reformation effected by Nehemiah (Neh. 8:9; 12:26). In the sealing of the covenant (10:1–27), Ezra perhaps was listed under the patronymic Seraiah or Azariah (v. 2). As Ezra is not mentioned after Nehemiah’s departure for Babylon, and as everything fell into confusion in Nehemiah’s absence, it is not unlikely that Ezra had again returned to Babylon before Nehemiah.

Ezra had a profound love for the Word of God, and “set his heart to study the law of the Lord” (Ezra 7:10); he was a man of excellent judgment (7:25), of a conscience (9:3) that led him to deplore sin deeply and strenuously oppose it. So great was his sense of dependence upon God that every step he took was marked by some devout acknowledgment of the divine help, “according to the hand of the Lord my God” (7:6, 9, 27–28; 8:22, 31).

2. The head of one of the twenty-two divisions of priests that returned from captivity with Zerubbabel and Jeshua (Neh. 12:1), 536 B.C. The same name appears in v. 13, where it is stated that his son, Meshullam, was head of his family in the time of the high priest Joiakim (see v. 12); also in v. 33, as one of the chief Israelites who formed the first division that made the circuit of the walls of Jerusalem when rebuilt, 445 B.C.

3. A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 4:17, KJV). See Ezra.

EZRA, BOOK OF. In the ancient Heb. Scriptures Ezra and Nehemiah were classified as one book called “the Book of Ezra.” Since 1448, Heb. Bibles have contained the twofold arrangement of Ezra and Nehemiah, as in our English renderings. In the LXX Ezra and Nehemiah follow Chronicles. That seems a more logical idea since Ezra and Nehemiah carry on the history at the point where Chronicles leaves off, and since the Masoretic notes on the Writings stand as the conclusion of Nehemiah and not Chronicles. Critics commonly consider Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah as originally a single work, but the reasons given for that are not completely satisfying.

Authorship and Date. There is no solid reason to give up the supposition that Ezra is the author, despite the theorizing of modern critics. It is possible that a later inspired compiler consulted Ezra's memoirs written in the first person (7:27–9:15). However, it is very likely that Ezra himself compiled that material as a framework for the book and filled out the remaining parts written in the third person from other sources to make it a unified whole. Assuming that Ezra is also the author of Chronicles, according to tradition, then the book of Ezra must have followed Chronicles somewhere during the period of 430–400 B.C. or a little later. Ezra's activity is evidently to be placed during the reign of Artaxerxes I (465–414 B.C.), but Chronicles and the book of Ezra may have been written considerably later. Modern negative criticism construes the book as a compilation dating at least a century or more subsequent to Ezra's time. It is therefore accorded little historical authenticity. Such invalid criticism as the claim of the nonhistoricity of the title "king of Persia" (1:1–2; etc.) is often made. The term, as common sense would suggest, is used interchangeably with related terms and occurs in the same passages (1:1–2, 7–8; 7:1, 7), as one would now refer to "the president" or "the president of the United States" without implying by the latter term that a new nation had superseded the United States. A heathen king, moreover, although a "king of kings" might naturally be called simply "king of Persia," even if such usage is rare on the monuments. Critics make the charge of chronological confusion in 4:6–23. Events in the reign of Xerxes (485–465 B.C.) and Artaxerxes (465–424 B.C.) come before events in the reign of Darius (521–485 B.C.) in chap. 5, but Ezra simply finishes one subject before proceeding to the next, even at the expense of chronological sequence, which any other writer would be inclined to do. The decree of Cyrus recorded in Heb. (1:1–4) and Aram. (6:3–5) is supposed to involve contradiction, but the one in Heb. was evidently made by Cyrus when he first conquered Babylon and naturally has a Jewish coloring. The second, in Aram., was evidently a formal record drawn up for the official archives at Ecbatana and consequently has a Babylonian coloring. There is no reason to suppose that both are not historical and authentic.

EZ'RAH (ez'ra). A descendant of Judah, the father of several sons. His own parentage is not given (1 Chron. 4:17).

EZ'RAHITE (ez'ra-hīt). The patronymic of the Levites Heman and Ethan (1 Kings 4:31; titles of Pss. 88, 89). Their Levitical descent is not at variance with the epithet EzraHITE (or Ezrachite), for they were incorporated into the Judean family of Zerach. Thus the Levite (Judg. 17:7) is spoken of as belonging to the family of Judah because he dwelt in Bethlehem in Judah.

EZ'RI (ez'ri; "helpful"). Son of Chelub, he "had charge of the agricultural workers who tilled the soil" during King David's reign (1 Chron. 27:26), after 1000 B.C.

EZ'RITE. See Abi-ezrite.

F

FABLE (Gk. muthos, “myth”). A fictitious story employed for the purpose of enforcing some truth or precept. Neander, Life of Christ, thus distinguishes between the parable and fable: “The parable is distinguished from the fable by this, that, in the latter qualities or acts of a higher class of beings may be attributed to a lower, e.g., those of men to brutes; while in the former the lower sphere is kept perfectly distinct from that which it seems to illustrate. The beings and powers thus introduced always follow the law of their nature, but their acts, according to this law, are used to figure those of a higher race.” Of the fable, as thus distinguished from the parable, we have but two examples in the Bible: (1) that of the trees choosing their king, addressed by Jotham to the men of Shechem (Judg. 9:8–15); (2) that of the cedar of Lebanon and the thistle, as the answer of Jehoash to the challenge of Amaziah (2 Kings 14:9).

In the NT fable is used for invention, falsehood, “cleverly devised tales,” or (NIV) “cleverly invented stories” (2 Pet. 1:16). “The fictions of the Jewish theosophists and Gnostics, especially concerning the emanations and orders of the eons, i.e., spirits of the air, are called myths” (1 Tim. 1:4; 4:7, “fables,” KJV; 2 Tim. 4:4; Titus 1:14).

FACE. There is nothing peculiar in the use of this word in Scripture, except with reference to God. Applied to God, it denotes His presence. In such phrases as seeing the Lord “face to face,” “the face of the Lord is against evildoers,” it is evidently all one with God’s manifested presence. The declaration made by Jehovah to Moses, “No man can see Me and live” (Ex. 33:20), seems to contradict the joyful assertion of Jacob, “I have seen God face to face, yet my life has been preserved” (Gen. 32:30). The apparent discrepancy is to be explained by the different respects in which the expression is used in the two cases. The face of God, as involving the full blaze of His manifested glory, no mortal can see and survive; but when veiled and appearing with the softened radiance of the human countenance, revived and quickened life is the natural result. The word is also used in the sense of favor (Ps. 67:1; Dan. 9:17) and signifies also anger, justice, severity (Gen. 16:6, 8; Ex. 2:15; Rev. 6:16, KJV; NASB, “presence”), it being natural to express these feelings in one’s countenance. “To set one’s face” denotes to determine fully and resolve, and “to fall on the face” is an attitude of fear and reverence. To see one “face to face” is to enjoy a direct, clear sight of him and not a reflection in a mirror.

FACES, BREAD OF. The bread of the Presence (which see, in the article Tabernacle), which was always set before God.

FAINTHEARTED (Gk. oligopsuchos, “little spirited”). Often occurs in the LXX and signifies one who is laboring under such trouble that his heart sinks within him; it may also mean one’s despairing of working out his salvation (1 Thess. 5:14).

NIV New International Version

KJV King James Version

NASB New American Standard Bible

LXX Septuagint

FAIR. The rendering in the KJV of several Heb. and Gk. words. In the East exposure to the sun makes a great difference in the complexion of women. Those of high condition carefully avoid such exposure and retain their fairness, which becomes a distinguishing mark of quality as well as an enhancement of beauty (so NASB and NIV; Gen. 12:11–13; song of Sol. 1:15–16).

FAIR HA´VENS (Gk. kaloι limenes, “good harbors”). A harbor in the island of Crete (Acts 27:8) near the city of Lasea, two leagues E of Cape Matala and due S of the ancient Minoan center of Phaestos. It still bears the same name in the modern Gk. dialect, Kali Limenes.

FAIRS. See Wares.

FAITH (Gk. pistis). Belief or trust—especially in a higher power. The fundamental idea in Scripture is steadfastness and faithfulness.

Scripture’s Use of the Word. The word is used in Scripture (1) most frequently in a subjective sense, denoting a moral and spiritual quality of individuals, by virtue of which men are held in relations of confidence in God and fidelity to Him; and (2) in an objective sense, meaning the body of truth, moral and religious, which God has revealed—that which men believe. Examples of this use of the word are not numerous, though they occur occasionally, as in Phil. 1:27; 1 Tim. 1:19; 6:20–21; Jude 3, 20.

The word occurs only twice in our English version of the OT, the idea being expressed by other terms, such as “trust,” etc.

This article is confined in the further discussion to faith in the sense first named. The following points are of chief importance:

Philosophical. Faith, viewed philosophically, must be regarded as lying at the basis of all knowledge. Anselm’s famous utterance “Crede ut intelligas,” “Believe that you may know,” expresses the truth in contrast with the words of Abelard, “Intellige ut credas,” “Know that you may believe.” Truths perceived intuitively imply faith in the intuitions. Truths or facts arrived at by logical processes, or processes of reasoning, are held to be known because, first of all, we have confidence in the laws of the human mind. Our knowledge obtained through the senses has underneath it faith in the senses. To this extent Goethe spoke wisely when he said, “I believe in the five senses.” A large part of knowledge rests upon human testimony, and of course this involves faith in the testimony.

The distinction between matters of faith and matters of knowledge must not be drawn too rigidly, inasmuch as all matters of knowledge are in some measure matters also of faith. The distinction, when properly made, chiefly recognizes the different objects to which our convictions relate, and the different methods by which we arrive at these convictions. The convictions themselves may be as strong in the one case as in the other.

Theological. Faith in the theological sense contains two elements recognized in the Scriptures: there is an element that is intellectual and also an element, of even deeper importance, that is moral. Faith is not simply the assent of the intellect to revealed truth; it is the practical submission of the entire man to the guidance and control of such truth. “The demons also believe, and shudder.”

Indispensable as is the assent of the intellect, that alone does not constitute the faith upon which the Scriptures lay such emphasis. The essential idea is rather that of fidelity, faithfulness, steadfastness. Or, as has been well said, “Faith, in its essential temper, is that elevation of soul by which it aspires to the good, the true, and the divine.” In illustration may be cited particularly John 3:18–21; Rom. 2:7; 4:5; Heb. 11; James 2:14–26.

Intellectual. Viewed more particularly with reference to its intellectual aspect, faith is properly defined as the conviction of the reality of the truths and facts that God has revealed, such conviction resting solely upon the testimony of God.

These truths and facts are to a large extent beyond the reach of the ordinary human processes of acquiring knowledge. Still, they are of the utmost importance in relation to human life and salvation. God has therefore revealed them. And they who accept them must do so upon the trustworthiness of the divine testimony. This testimony is contained in the Holy Scriptures. It is impressed moreover by the special sanction of the Holy Spirit. (See John 3:11, 31–33; 16:8–11; 1 John 5:10–11, and many other places.)

Results of Faith. They who receive the divine testimony and yield to it become partakers of heavenly knowledge. Their knowledge comes by faith, yet nonetheless it is knowledge. The Scriptures, it is true, recognize the difference between walking by faith and walking by sight, and thus the difference between the objects and methods of sense-perception and those of faith. Also the difference is noted between the acquisition of human learning and philosophy and the contents of the divine revelation. But still the Scriptures represent true believers as persons who “know the things freely given to us by God.” Christ said to His disciples, “To you it has been granted to know the mysteries of the kingdom of God” (Luke 8:10; see also John 8:31–32; 1 Cor. 1:5–6, 21–30; 2:9–16; Eph. 1:17; 1 Tim. 2:4).

Reason and Faith. The relation of reason to faith is that of subordination, and yet not that of opposition. The truths of revelation are in many cases above reason, though not against it. Such truths were revealed because reason could not discover them. They are therefore to be accepted, though the reason cannot demonstrate them. But this inability of reason to discover or to demonstrate is one thing; irrationality, as involving absurdity, or contradiction of the intuitions of the intellect or conscience, or contradiction of well-established truth, is another.

Reason has its justly recognized and appropriate function in examining and weighing the evidences of revelation, as well as in interpreting or determining the force of the terms in which the revelation is given. But when the reality and meaning of revelation are thus reached, reason has done its work, and it remains for faith to accept the contents of the revelation, whatever they may be.

It should be said, however, that the evidence of the saving truth of revelation, most convincing for many, is not that which appeals directly to reason. Many lack ability or opportunity to investigate the rational evidences of Christianity. But to them with all others the announcement of the truth comes attended by the ministration or direct testimony of the Holy Spirit. They are thus made to feel that they ought to repent and believe the gospel. If they yield to this conviction they obtain forgiveness of their sins and become new creatures in Christ Jesus. The Spirit bears witness to their acceptance with God. And thus in the experience of salvation they have unquestionable proof of the reality of revelation. In all this reason is subordinate to faith but by no means opposed to it (1 Cor. 1:21–31; John 16:8–11; Rom. 8:14–17; 1 John 5:9–11).

Condition of Salvation. As has been assumed in the foregoing, faith is the condition of salvation. It is not the procuring cause but the condition, or instrumental cause. It is frequently associated in the Scriptures with repentance; thus the conditions of salvation, as commonly stated in Protestant doctrine, are repentance and faith. But in reality true faith and true repentance are not separate or to be distinguished too rigidly from each other. Faith is fundamental. Repentance implies faith. Faith is not saving faith unless it includes repentance. (See Repentance.) Saving faith may therefore be properly defined for those who have the light of the gospel as such belief in the Lord Jesus Christ as leads one to submit completely to the authority of Christ and to put complete and exclusive trust in Him for salvation. (See John 3:14–16.)

Faith, which is the condition of salvation, is also, in an important measure, one of the results of salvation. In the justified and regenerated soul, faith is deepened and developed by the influence of the Holy Spirit. In its essential quality faith is unchanged, but it acquires greater steadiness, and as the Word of God is studied and its contents spiritually apprehended faith becomes broader and richer in the truths and facts that it grasps.

Thus in its beginning and completion faith is one of the fruits of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22). E.MCC.

FAITH, RULE OF. In the early church, the summary of doctrines taught to catechumens and to which they were obliged to subscribe before baptism. It was afterward applied to the Apostles' Creed. In modern theology it denotes the true source of our knowledge of Christian truth.

Protestant Doctrine. One of the chief doctrinal elements of the Reformation was the sufficiency of the Scriptures for faith and salvation. Thus the Methodist church teaches: "The Holy Scriptures contain all things necessary to salvation; so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man that it should be believed as an article of faith, or be thought requisite or necessary to salvation" (Meth. Dis. 5.5).

Roman Catholic Teaching. It emphasizes the role of the church: "The Church is the ordinary and the infallible means by which we know what the truths are which God has revealed. The testimony of the Church is the rule by which we can distinguish between true and false doctrine.... A person must believe that the Church cannot err, and that whatever it teaches is infallibly true" (Cath. Dict., s.v.).

FAITH, THE CHRISTIAN. "To those who receive the light, in the sense of not refusing it, revelation is one whole, and all its glorious system of truth is received and surely believed. To them it is both objectively and subjectively the Faith; and, inasmuch as Christianity has brought it in all fullness into the world, it is to them the Christian Faith. This phrase has therefore a larger meaning. It signifies that it is not their philosophy simply, the glory of their reason, the tradition they have derived from their fathers, but the rich inheritance which the Holy Spirit has given to that one supreme faculty of their souls, the faith which is the evidence of things not seen. It is a body of truth which, as reason did not give it, so reason cannot take it away. It is a region in which they walk by faith, which their faith habitually visits, in which their faith lives, and moves, and has its being" (Pope, Compendium of Christian Theology, p. 45).

FAITHFULNESS (Heb. ěmûnâ, "faithfulness, stability"). An attribute ascribed to God in many places, especially in the Psalms (36:5; 89:2, 5, 8; Isa. 11:5; etc.), which exhibits His character as worthy of the love and confidence of man and assures us that He will certainly fulfill His promises as well as execute His threats against sin. It covers "temporal blessings (1 Tim. 4:8; Ps. 84:11; Isa. 33:16); spiritual blessings (1 Cor. 1:9); support in temptation (10:13) and persecution (1 Pet. 4:12–13; Isa. 41:10); sanctifying afflictions (Heb. 12:4–12); directing in difficulties (2 Chron. 32:22; Ps. 32:8); enabling to persevere (Jer. 32:40), and bringing to glory (1 John 2:25)."

Faithfulness is also predicated of men: "he was a faithful man" (Heb. "trustworthy," Neh. 7:2); "who then is the faithful and sensible steward ...?" (Luke 12:42; etc.). The faithful was the general and favorite name in the early church to denote baptized persons.

FALL OF MAN. A term of theology that is not found in Scripture, though the essential fact is a matter of Scripture record and of clear though not frequent reference. The particular account is in Gen. 3. The most explicit NT references are Rom. 5:12–21; 1 Cor. 15:21–22, 45–47; 2 Cor. 11:3.

The character of the primitive record in Genesis has been the subject of much discussion. Some have contended that the account is purely literal; others, that it is figurative, poetic, or allegorical; still others, rationalistic or semirationalistic, relegate the whole matter to the realm of the mythical. This last view, of course, cannot be consistently held by anyone who accepts the Scriptures as of divine authority.

It must be admitted that the account leaves room for many questions both as to its form and its meaning in relation to incidental details. But still, the great underlying, essential facts are sufficiently clear, especially when the account is taken in connection with other Scriptures. They are as follows:

Bible Doctrine. The Fall of our first ancestors was an epoch or turning point in the moral history of the race. It was in itself an epoch of great and sad significance and of far-reaching results.

Man at his creation was in a state of moral purity. In connection with his freedom there was of necessity the possibility of sin. But still there was no evil tendency in his nature. God pronounced him, with other objects of His creation, “good.” He was made in the image and likeness of God.

As a moral being man was placed by God in a state of probation. His freedom was to be exercised and tested by his being under divine law. Of every tree in the garden he might freely eat, except the tree of knowledge of good and evil. At one point there must be restraint, self-denial for the sake of obedience. “For what will a man be profited, if he gains the whole world, and forfeits his soul?” (Matt. 16:26).

The temptation to disobedience came from an evil source outside himself. In Genesis only the serpent is mentioned. In the NT the tempter is identified as Satan, who employed the serpent as his instrument (1 Cor. 11:3, 14; Rom. 16:20; Rev. 12:9).

The temptation came in the form of an appeal to man’s intellect and to the senses. The forbidden fruit was presented as “good for food” and “desirable to make one wise.” Thus the allurements were in the direction of sensual gratification and intellectual pride.

At the beginning of the sin lay unbelief. The tempted ones doubted or disbelieved God and believed the tempter. And thus, under the strong desire awakened by the temptation, they disobeyed the divine command.

By this act of disobedience “sin entered into the world, and death through sin.” Shame and alienation from God were the first visible consequences. The image of God, which contained among its features “righteousness and holiness of the truth,” was marred and broken, though not completely lost. (See Image of God.) Expulsion from Eden followed. The ground was cursed on account of sin. Sorrow and toil and struggle with the evil in human nature became the lot of mankind.

Theological Views. The theological treatment of this topic should be particularly noted:

A favorite view of rationalistic or evolutionist theologians is that the Fall was a necessary incident in man’s moral development. The Fall is sometimes, therefore, spoken of as “a fall upward.” It was a step forward from the savage or animal state to the practical knowledge of good and evil and thus, through the experience of sin, toward the goal of developed moral purity. But this view ignores the essential evil of sin. It makes sin only an imperfect or disguised good and is, for that reason and others, opposed to the plain teaching of Scripture.

The Calvinistic types of theology regard the Fall in two ways: (1) the supralapsarian, or most rigid view, includes the Fall under the divine decree; (2) the sublapsarian, the less rigid but less logically consistent view, represents the divine decree as relating to the condition produced by the Fall. Out from the race fallen in Adam God elected a certain number to salvation.

The Arminian theology regards the Fall not as predetermined by a divine decree but as foreseen and provided against by divine grace. It asserts that, but for the redemptive purpose of God in Christ, the race of fallen descendants of Adam would not have been permitted to come into existence. When man fell he did not “fall upward,” but he fell into the arms of redeeming mercy. Probation is still the condition of mankind. For though man is fallen and therefore under the bondage of sin, through Christ (the second Adam) man has his moral freedom restored to such an extent that he can avail himself of the provisions God has made for his salvation.

The Fall and Archaeology. The so-called Myth of Adapa has often been adduced as offering a parallel to the Bible account of the Fall of man. This claim, however, is ill-founded. There is not the slightest reason to look for the Fall in the literature of the Babylonians, as such a concept is contrary to their whole system of polytheistic speculation. In Genesis man is created in the image of a holy God. But the Babylonians, like other ancient pagan peoples (notably the Greeks and the Romans), fashioned their gods, good and bad, in the image of man. Such deities schemed, hated, fought, and killed one another. They were of such dubious moral character, it was impossible that they be thought of as creating anything morally perfect. Neither could man formed out of the blood of such deities (the Babylonian notion) possess anything but an evil nature. No fall was possible because man was created evil and in heathenistic thought had no state of innocence from which to fall. Nevertheless, further features of the legend of Adapa are interesting by way of similarity or contrast. The “food of life” corresponds to “fruit” of the “tree of life” (Gen. 3:3, 22). The two accounts are in agreement that eternal life could be obtained by eating a certain kind of food. Adam, however, forfeited immortality for himself because of the sinful desire to be “like God” (3:5). Consequently, he was exiled from the garden lest he should “take also from the tree of life, and eat, and live forever” (3:22). Adapa was already endowed with wisdom by the gods. He failed to become immortal not because of disobedience or presumption, like Adam, but because he was obedient to his creator, Ea, who deceived him. The Babylonian tale, like the biblical narrative, deals with the perplexing question of why man must suffer and die. In contrast, the answer is not that man fell from his moral integrity and that sin into which he fell involved death, but that man forfeited his opportunity to gain eternal life in consequence of being deceived by one of the gods. The origin of human sin is not at all in view in the Adapa story. This is basic in the theologically pivotal third chapter of Genesis. The two narratives, the biblical and the Babylonian, are poles apart despite superficial resemblances. E.M.C.C.; M.F.U.

FALLOW DEER. See Animal Kingdom: Roebuck.

FALLOW GROUND. A field plowed up and left for seeding and summer fallow, properly conducted is a sure method of destroying weeds (Jer. 4:3; Hos. 10:12).

FALLOW YEAR. See Sabbath.

FALSE CHRIST. Those who falsely claim to be the Messiah, as foretold by Jesus (Matt. 24:24; Mark 13:22). Nothing is known of the historical fulfillment of this prophecy, but Josephus (Wars 7.11.1) mentions Jonathan as a pretender.

FALSE PROPHET, THE. The second beast of Rev. 13:11–18 (cf. 16:13; 19:20; 20:10). Twice he is associated with the first Beast (Antichrist) and once with the Dragon (Satan). As the Dragon and the first Beast are persons, so must he be a person. Jesus had a prophetic foreview of him when He said, “For false Christs and false prophets will arise and will show great signs and wonders, so as to mislead, if possible, even the elect” (Matt. 24:24). Here our Lord distinguishes between false christs and false prophets. It seems clear, therefore, that the Antichrist and the false prophet cannot be the same. The false prophet will be a miracle worker. By evil, supernatural power he will bring down fire from heaven and will command the people of the Tribulation period to make an “image to the Beast” in order to worship it, having power to give life to the image to cause it to speak and to demand that all who will not worship it be put to death (Rev 13:14–15). “And he causes all, the small and the great, and the rich and the poor, and the free men and the slaves, to be given a mark on their right hand, or on their forehead, and he provides that no one should be able to buy or to sell, except the one who has the mark, either the name of the beast or the number of his name” (13:16–17). He will thus be a consummation of deception and wickedness, this being signified by his mystical number, 666. As an aide to the Antichrist, he is one of the principal characters revolting against God at the end time, immediately prior to Christ’s second advent. M.F.U.

FAMILIAR SPIRIT (Heb. ṣōḇ). A divining demon present in the physical body of the conjurer. “A man or a woman who is a medium or a spiritist” [lit., “a familiar spirit within them”] shall surely be put to death. They shall be stoned with stones, their bloodguiltiness is upon them” (Lev. 20:27, see marg.). The term familiar is used to describe the demon because it was regarded by the English translators as a servant (“famulus”), belonging to the family (“familiaris”), who was on intimate terms with and might be readily summoned by the one possessing it. Thus a familiar spirit is a divining demon, and the ancient world, as well as the modern, had traffic in spiritism, not as mere trickery but as a spiritual reality of evil nature. The significance of the Heb. term ṣōḇ is disputed. It may be related to the Arab. root ṣawaba (“to return”), with reference to the divining spirit who periodically returns to the medium. The most common view, however, associates the fundamental etymological significance with “something hollow,” such as “wineskins” (Job 32:19). Assuming the fundamental notion of “hollowness,” various explanations are suggested as accounting for it, such as calling the divining spirit an ṣōḇ because of the hollow tone of its voice as if issuing from a cave or opening in the ground. Greek and Roman oracles, which were considered to communicate with the spirit world, were commonly situated among the deep caverns. This was notably true of Apollo’s famous oracle at Delphi. (See T. K. Oesterreich, Possession, Demoniacal and Other, pp. 312ff.; E. Langton, Essentials of Demonology, pp. 96–98.) Gesenius has the idea that the connection between “bottle” and “necromancer” probably arose “from regarding the conjurer, while possessed by the demon, as a bottle, i.e., vessel, case, in which the demon was contained” (Hebrew and English Lexicon, ad loc.). See Necromancer; Spiritist; Demons; Divination; and Magic: Various Forms. M.F.U.

FAMILY. The family relation is the institution of God lying at the foundation of all human society. Christian ethics leave nothing wanting of the main elements of that institution. It confirms monogamy: “Have you not read, that He who created them from the beginning made them male and female, and said, ‘For this cause a man shall leave his father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife’” (Matt. 19:5; Mark 10:6–7). So Christian legislation is clear and positive respecting the relation of marriage, of parents and children, of masters and servants, and the regulation of all the household. Parental obligations include the maintenance of children (1 Tim. 5:8) and their education in its fullest sense (Ex. 12:26–27; Deut. 6:6–7; Eph. 6:4).

The filial obligations are obedience (Luke 2:51; Eph. 6:1; Col. 3:20), reverence (Ex. 20:12; cf. Eph. 6:1–2), and grateful requital (1 Tim. 5:4; cf. John 19:26). The moral teaching of Christianity has a marked bearing on the relation between master and servants. Although the mutual rights, duties, and responsibilities are not in their widest range a matter of direct statute in the Scriptures, the principles laid down by Paul are of permanent application. On the employer's side there is the obligation of justice (Col. 4:1); on the side of the servants there is enjoined the duty of obedience, fidelity, and honesty (Titus 2:9–10; Col. 3:22–23; Eph. 6:5–6). Thus the family occupies a prominent place throughout Scripture, is the first form of society, and has continued to be the germ and representative of every fellowship.

FAMILY, or Father's Household. One of the divisions of the people of Israel. See Israel, Classification of.

FAMINE. Occupies a conspicuous place in Scripture among the troubles with which God's people had to contend. It is mentioned as one of the scourges that God sent to chastise men for their wickedness (Lev. 26:21, 26; Ps. 105:16; Lam. 4:4–6; Ezek. 14:21).

Causes. Several causes of famine are given: (1) God's blessing withheld (Hos. 2:8–9; Hag. 1:6). (2) Want of seasonable rain (1 Kings 17:1; Jer. 14:1–4; Amos 4:7–8). "In Egypt a deficiency in the rise of the Nile, with drying winds, produces the same results. The famines recorded in the Bible are traceable to both these phenomena; and we generally find that Egypt was resorted to when scarcity afflicted Palestine. In the whole of Syria and Arabia the fruits of the earth must ever be dependent on rain, the watersheds having few large springs and the small rivers not being sufficient for the irrigation of even the level lands. If, therefore, the heavy rains of November and December fail, the sustenance of the people is cut off in the parching drought of harvest time, when the country is almost devoid of moisture" (Smith, Dict., s.v.). (3) Rotting of seed in the ground (Joel 1:17). (4) Scorching wind and mildew (Amos 4:9; Hag. 2:17). (5) Devastation by enemies (Deut. 28:33, 51). In addition to the above causes may be given the imperfect knowledge of agriculture that prevailed, in consequence of which men had few resources to stimulate or, in unfavorable seasons and localities, to aid the productive powers of nature. Means of transit were defective, rendering it often impossible to relieve the wants of one region even when there was plenty in another. Despotic governments and frequent wars and desolation greatly interrupted agricultural industry.

Characteristics. These famines were often long (Gen. 41:27) and of great severity (12:10; 2 Kings 8:1; Jer. 52:6), accompanied with wars (14:15; 29:18) and followed by pestilence (42:17; Ezek. 7:15; Matt. 24:7). During the time of famine people fed upon wild herbs (2 Kings 4:39–40), donkey's flesh, dung (6:25; Lam. 4:5), and human flesh (Lev. 26:29; 2 Kings 6:28–29), while provisions were sold by weight and water by measure (Ezek. 4:16).

Instances. Famines are mentioned as occurring in the days of Abraham (Gen. 12:10), of Isaac (26:1), of Joseph (41:53–56), of the Judges (Ruth 1:1), of David (2 Sam. 21:1), of Ahab (1 Kings 17:1; 18:2), of Elisha (2 Kings 4:38), during the siege of Samaria (6:25), in the time of Jeremiah (Jer. 14:1–6), during the siege of Jerusalem (2 Kings 25:3), after the captivity (Neh. 5:3), in the reign of Claudius Caesar (Acts 11:28), before the destruction of Jerusalem (Matt. 24:7).

Figurative. Famine is symbolic of the withdrawal of God's word (Amos 8:11–12) and the destruction of idols (Zeph. 2:11).

FAN. See Winnow; Winnowing Fork.

Figurative. Used in the KJV to mean scatter, as enemies (Isa. 41:16); to cause defeat and dispersion on the border of the land (Jer. 15:7).

FANNERS. The rendering in the KJV of Jer. 51:2; the NASB and NIV give "foreigners"; NASB marg., "winnowers." See Winnow.

FARM. See Agriculture.

FARMER, FARMERS, FARMING. One Gk. and several Heb. terms are behind these English ones. Farming (Gen. 9:20) is from Heb. ʾîsh ʾădāmâ, lit., "man of the soil"; the term is given as "husbandman" in the KJV. Farmer and farmers are from Heb. ḥārash (Isa.

28:24); Heb. ʾikkār (Isa. 61:5; Jer. 14:4; 31:24; 51:23; Amos 5:16; 9:13; Joel 1:11); and Gk.

geōrgos, "land worker" (cf. 2 Tim. 2:6; James 5:7). The terms husbandman, plowman, and vinedressers are sometimes the rendering for the Heb. and Gk. terms, but husbandman does not appear in the NASB and NIV. Farming is among the most ancient and honorable occupations (see above; and also Gen. 26:12, 14; 37:7; Job. 1:3). The various operations of farming (see Agriculture), such as the sowing of seed, harvesting, etc., furnish many apt illustrations in Scripture.

FARTHING. The farthing (KJV), cent (NASB), or penny (NIV) was a unit of money. See Metrology.

FAST, FASTING (Heb. ṣûm, to "cover" the mouth; Gk. nēsteuō, to "abstain"). In the early ages men subsisted largely upon the spontaneous productions of the earth and the spoils of the chase; owing to the uncertainty of obtaining food, fasting was often compulsory. Superstitious ignorance could easily interpret this compulsion into an expression of divine will, and so consider fasting as a religious duty. It was believed that the gods were jealous of the pleasures of men and that abstinence would propitiate their favor. As a result we find that fasting as a religious duty is almost universal.

Jewish. The word fasting (Heb. ṣûm) is not found in the Pentateuch but often occurs in the historical books (2 Sam. 12:16; 1 Kings 21:9–12; Ezra 8:21) and the prophets (Isa. 58:3–5; Joel 1:14; 2:15; Zech. 8:19; etc.). The expression used in the law is "humble your souls" (Lev. 16:29–31; 23:27; Num. 30:13), implying the sacrifice of the personal will, which gives to fasting all its value.

The Jewish fasts were observed with various degrees of strictness. When the fast lasted only a single day it was the practice to abstain from food of every kind from evening to evening, whereas in the case of private fasts of a more prolonged character it was merely the ordinary food that was abstained from. To manifest a still profounder humbling of the soul before God is repentance and mortification on account of one's sin and the punishment with which it had been visited. It was not unusual to put on sackcloth, rend the garments, and scatter ashes over the head (2 Sam. 13:19; 1 Kings 21:27; 1 Macc. 3:47; Lam. 2:10; Jonah 3:5–8). In 1 Sam. 7:6 it is said that Israel "drew water and poured it out before the Lord, and fasted on that day." To "pour out your heart like water" (Lam. 2:19) seems to denote inward dissolution through pain and misery. In connection with the fast it would be a practical confession of misery and an act of deepest humiliation before the Lord.

The Mosaic law prescribed only one public occasion of strict fasting, namely, once a year on the great Day of Atonement (see Festivals). This observance seems always to have retained some prominence as "the fast" (Acts 27:9). But as to the nature of the observance we are nowhere expressly informed, excepting that "it shall be a holy convocation for you" (Lev. 23:27–29). The Hebrews, in the earlier period of their history, were in the habit of fasting whenever they were in hard and trying circumstances (1 Sam. 1:7), misfortune, and bereavement (20:34; 31:13; 2 Sam. 1:12), in the prospect of threatened judgments of God (12:16; 1 Kings 21:27), on occasions of falling into grievous sin (Ezra 10:6), or to avert heavy calamity (Esther 4:1, 3, 16). Extraordinary fasts were appointed by the theocratic authorities on occasions of great national calamity in order that the people might humble themselves before the Lord on account of their sins, thus averting His wrath and getting Him to look upon them again with favor (Judg. 20:26; 1 Sam. 7:6; 2 Chron. 20:3; Joel 1:14; 2:12; Jer. 36:9; Ezra 8:21; Neh. 1:4; 2 Macc. 13:12).

Postexilic. There is no mention of any other periodic fast than that on the Day of Atonement in the OT, except in Zech. 7:1–7; 8:19. These anniversary fast days were observed from about the time of the captivity and were as follows: (1) The seventeenth day of the fourth month, namely, Tammuz, or July. This fast was instituted in memory of the capture of Jerusalem (Jer. 52:6–7; Zech. 8:19). (2) The ninth day of the fifth month, Ab, or August, in memory of the burning of the Temple (2 Kings 25:8–9; Zech. 7:3; 8:19). (3) The third of the seventh month, Tishri, or October, in memory of the death of Gedaliah (Jer. 41:4; Zech. 7:5; 8:19). (4) The tenth day of the tenth month, Tebeth, or January, in memory of the commencement of the attack on Jerusalem (2 Kings 25:1; Jer. 52:4; Zech. 8:19). (5) The fast of Esther (which see), kept on the thirteenth of Adar (Esther 4:16). “Subsequent to the captivity, and with the growth of the Pharisaic spirit, the fasts became much more frequent generally, till ere long they assumed the form of ordinary pious exercises, so that the Pharisees fasted regularly on the second and fifth day of every week (Matt. 9:14; Luke 18:12), while other Jewish sects, such as the Essenes and Therapeutae, made their whole worship to consist principally of fasting.” For new archaeological light on the practices of these pre-Christian Jewish sects see W. H. Brownlee, “A Comparison of the Covenanters of the Dead Sea Scrolls with Pre-Christian Jewish Sects,” Biblical Archaeologist 13 (Sept. 1950): 50–72. There was, however, no fasting on the Sabbath, on festival and celebration days in Israel, and on the day immediately preceding the Sabbath or a festival (Judith 8:6). That in the lapse of time the practice of fasting was lamentably abused is shown by the testimony of the prophets (Isa. 58:3–6; Jer. 14:12; Zech. 7:5).

New Testament. In the NT the only references to the Jewish fasts are the mention of “the fasts” in Acts 27:9 (generally understood to denote the Day of Atonement) and the allusions to the weekly fasts (Matt. 9:14; Mark 2:18; Luke 5:33; 18:12). These fasts originated some time after the captivity. They were observed on the second and fifth days of the week, which, being appointed as the days for public fasts (because Moses was supposed to have ascended the mount for the second tables of the law on a Thursday and to have returned on a Monday), seem to have been selected for these private voluntary fasts.

Our Lord sternly rebuked the Pharisees for their hypocritical pretenses in the fasts that they observed (Matt. 6:16–18). He abstained from appointing any fast as part of His own religion (9:14–15; 11:18–19). Prayer and fasting are mentioned (17:21; Mark 9:29, see marg.) as means for promoting faith and as good works. Mention is made of fasting in the apostolic church (Acts 13:3; 14:23; 2 Cor. 6:5). In the last passage the apostle probably refers to voluntary fasting, as in 2 Cor. 11:27 he makes a distinction between fasting and “hunger and thirst” (KJV).

Christian Church. After the Jewish custom, fasting was frequently joined with prayer that the mind, unencumbered with earthly matter, might devote itself with less distraction to the contemplation of divine things. As the Pharisees were accustomed to fast on Monday and Thursday, the Christians appointed Wednesday and especially Friday as days of half-fasting or abstinence from flesh in commemoration of the passion and crucifixion of Jesus. They did this with reference to the Lord’s words “But the days will come when the bridegroom is taken away from them, and then they will fast” (Matt. 9:15).

In the second century arose also the custom of fasts before Easter, which, however, differed in length in different countries, being sometimes reduced to forty hours, sometimes extended to forty days or at least to several weeks. Perhaps equally ancient are the nocturnal fasts or vigils before the high festivals, suggested by the example of the Lord and the apostles. On special occasions the bishops appointed extraordinary fasts and applied the money saved to charitable purposes, a usage that often became a blessing to the poor.

By the sixth century fasting was made obligatory by the Second Council of Orleans (A.D. 541), which decreed that anyone neglecting to observe the stated time of abstinence should be treated as an offender. In the eighth century it was regarded as praiseworthy, and failure to observe subjected the offender to excommunication. In the Roman Catholic and Greek churches fasting remains obligatory, whereas in most Protestant churches it is merely recommended.

FAT (Heb. ḥēleb). “The Hebrews distinguished between the suet or pure fat of an animal and the fat which was intermixed with the lean (Neh. 8:10). Certain restrictions were imposed upon them in reference to the former: some parts of the suet, viz., about the stomach, the entrails, the kidneys, and the tail of a sheep, which grows to an excessive size in many Eastern countries and produces a large quantity of rich fat, were forbidden to be eaten in the case of animals offered to Jehovah in sacrifice (Lev. 3:3, 9, 17; 7:3, 23). The ground of the prohibition was that the fat was the richest part of the animal, and therefore belonged to God (3:16). The presentation of the fat as the richest part of the animal was agreeable to the dictates of natural feeling, and was the ordinary practice even of heathen nations. The burning of the fat of sacrifices was particularly specified in each kind of offering” (Smith, Dict., s.v.). See Fat Tail.

Figurative. Next to blood, the bearer of life (Lev. 17:14), the fat stood as the sign of healthfulness and vigor. “The fat of the land,” “the fat of lambs, and rams, ... and goats,” even “the fat of the mighty,” though to our view somewhat peculiar expressions, were familiar to the Hebrews as indicating the choicest specimens or examples of the several objects in question (Gen. 45:18; Deut. 32:14; Num. 18:12, marg., “fat”; 2 Sam. 1:22).

FATHER (Heb. ʾāb; Gk. patēr, lit., “nourisher,” “protector”).

Meanings. This word, besides its natural sense of progenitor (Gen. 19:31; 44:19; etc.), has a number of other meanings: (1) Any ancestor, near or remote (1 Kings 15:11; 2 Kings 14:3), e.g., a grandfather (Gen. 28:13; 31:42; 32:9; etc.), a great-grandfather (Num. 18:1–2; 1 Kings 15:11, 24; etc.); frequently in the plural fathers, i.e., forefathers (Gen. 15:15; Ps. 45:16). (2) Founder, i.e., the first ancestor of a tribe or nation (Gen. 10:21; 17:4–5; 19:37; etc.) Here we may refer to Gen. 4:21, “the father of all those who play the lyre and pipe,” i.e., the founder of a family of musicians, the inventor of the art of music. Jubal was “the father of those who dwell in tents” (4:20). The term also refers to the author of a family or society of persons animated by the same spirit as himself; thus Abraham was “the father of all who believe” (Rom 4:11); also the author or maker of anything, especially a creator (“has the rain a father?” Job 38:28). In this sense God is called the “father” of men and angels (Isa. 63:16; 64:8; Eph. 3:14–15; etc.). He is also called the “Father of lights,” i.e., stars (James 1:17). The above topical senses come from the notion of source, origin; others are drawn from the idea of paternal love and care, the honor due a father, etc. (3) Benefactor, as doing good and providing for others as a father (Job 29:16, “I was a father to the needy”). Eliakim, the prefect of the palace, was called “a father to the inhabitants of Jerusalem” (Isa. 22:21). The Messiah is the “Eternal Father” (9:6); God, the father of the righteous and of kings (2 Sam. 7:14; 1 Chron. 17:13; Ps. 89:26). (4) Teacher, from the idea of paternal instruction (1 Sam. 10:12); priests and prophets as teachers were called father (2 Kings 2:12; 5:13; etc.). In a similar sense the prime minister, as chief adviser, is called the king's father (Gen. 45:8). (5) Intimate relationship, as, "If I call to the pit, 'You are my father'" (Job 17:14).

Place and Authority. The position and authority of the father as the head of the family is expressly assumed and sanctioned in Scripture as a likeness to that of the Almighty over His creatures. It lies, of course, at the root of that so-called patriarchal government (Gen. 3:16; 1 Cor. 11:3) that was introductory to the more definite system that followed but did not wholly supersede it. "While the father lived he continued to represent the whole family, the property was held in his name, and all was under his superintendence and control. His power, however, was by no means unlimited or arbitrary, and if any occasion arose for severe discipline or capital punishment in his family he was not himself to inflict it, but to bring the matter before the constituted authorities" (Deut. 21:18–21). The children, and even the grandchildren, continued under the roof of the father and grandfather; they labored on his account and were the most submissive of his servants. The property of the soil, the power of judgment, the civil rights belonged to him only, and his sons were merely his instruments and assistants. The father's blessing was regarded as conferring special benefit and his malediction special injury to those on whom it fell (Gen. 9:25, 27; 27:27–40; 48:15–16, 20; chap. 49); and so also the sin of a parent was held to affect, in certain cases, the welfare of his descendants (2 Kings 5:27). The father, as the head of the household, had the obligation imposed upon him of bringing up his children in the fear of God, making them well acquainted with the precepts of the law, and generally acting as their instructor and guide (Ex. 12:26; Deut. 6:20; etc.). Filial duty and obedience to both parents were strictly enforced by Moses (Ex. 20:12); and any outrage against either parent, such as a blow (21:15), a curse (v. 17; Lev. 20:9), or incorrigible rebellion against their authority (Deut. 21:18–21) was made a capital offense.

FATHER, GOD THE. A term that represents several scriptural conceptions.

1. The term designates the first Person of the Trinity. God has revealed Himself as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. To the Eternal Son the Father stands related as to no other being and finds in the Son the perfect and infinite object of His love. With this highest meaning in view the apostles speak of God as the "Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Pet. 1:3; see 1 Cor. 8:6; Eph. 1:17). Thus also, although Christ taught His disciples to address God in prayer as "our Father," He did not use that form Himself. He spoke of God as "My Father" and "your Father," but at the same time He made plain that He distinguished between the relation in which they stood to God and that in which He Himself stood. The first words of the Apostles' Creed, "I believe in God the Father Almighty," are first of all a recognition of this deep truth of Holy Scriptures. See Trinity.

2. In the OT God is in quite a number of conspicuous instances called the Father of the Jewish nation. The chosen nation owed its origin and continued existence to His miraculous power and special care. As their Father He loved, pitied, rebuked, and required the obedience of His people (see Deut. 32:6; Hos. 11:1; Pss. 103:13; 68:5; Mal. 1:6).

3. In the NT, which brings the fact of the Fatherhood of God into greater prominence and distinctness, God is represented as the Father of various objects and orders of beings that He has created. The term thus used refers to the natural relationship between God and His creatures and has a significance more or less profound according to the different natures and capacities of these objects or orders of beings. Thus God is "the Father of lights," the heavenly bodies (James 1:17). He is also “the Father of spirits” (Heb. 12:9). He is particularly the Father of man, created after His image (Acts 17:26; Luke 3:8).

4. God is in a special sense the Father of His redeemed and saved people. Although the hope of the gospel rests upon the fact of the fatherly love of God for mankind even in its sinfulness (see John 3:16; Luke 15:11–32), still, only they who are actually saved through Jesus Christ are admitted to the privileges of children in the divine household. Christ taught only His disciples to pray “our Father.” He said to the unbelieving Jews, “You are of your father the devil” (John 8:44). The spiritual and moral relationship destroyed by sin must be restored by gracious, divine renewal (1:12; Rom. 8:14–16; etc.). See Adoption. E.MCC. BIBLIOGRAPHY: J. Baillie, Our Knowledge of God (1930); G. Vos, Biblical Theology (1948), pp. 381–97; A. W. Tozer, Knowledge of the Holy (1961); L. Strauss, The First Person (1967); C. C. Ryrie, A Survey of Bible Doctrine (1972), pp. 11–35.

FATHER-IN-LAW. One giving a daughter in marriage (Ex. 3:1; 4:18); one related by affinity (Gen. 38:25; 1 Sam. 4:19, 21). A wife’s father (John 18:13).

FATHER’S BROTHER (Heb. dôd). Strictly one beloved (Isa. 5:1); an uncle (Num. 36:11; 2 Kings 24:17); in Ex. 6:20 used in the feminine, father’s sister, an aunt.

FATHER’S HOUSEHOLD. The name given to families among the Israelites (Josh. 22:14; cf. 7:14, 16–18). See Israel, Classification of.

FATLING. An animal put up to be fattened for slaughter (Heb. mrûb, 2 Sam. 6:13; Isa. 11:6; Ezek. 39:18; see 1 Kings 4:23; Matt. 22:4). In the KJV fatling is the term used for a choice sheep (which see), especially of the fat-tailed variety (Heb. mēah; Ps. 66:15).

FAT TAIL (Heb. alyâ). Moses prescribed that in certain sacrifices the tail of the animal should be burned upon the altar, namely, the ram of consecration (Ex. 29:22), the lamb of the peace offering (Lev. 3:9), and the lamb of the trespass offering (7:3). The fat tail was esteemed the most delicate portion of the animal. The fat is contained in the broad part of the tail, from which the true tail hangs. See Fat.

FATTENED FOWL (Heb. barbūrîm ’ăbûsîm). Mentioned among the daily provisions for Solomon’s table (1 Kings 4:23; NIV, “choice fowl”). Evidently the “lark-heeled cuckoo” is meant. The cuckoo is a delicacy in Greece and Italy, even today (L. Koehler, Lexicon, ad loc.). See Animal Kingdom.

FEAR (Heb. yirâ, “reverence,” and other Heb. words meaning “terror,” Ex. 15:16; etc.; “carefulness,” Josh. 22:24, NASB; “concern,” Prov. 29:25; “fright,” Job 41:33; Gk. phobos, “dread, terror,” Matt. 14:26; etc.). Fear is that affection of the mind that arises with the awareness of approaching danger. The fear of God is of several kinds: superstitious, which is the fruit of ignorance; servile, which leads to abstinence from many sins through apprehension of punishment; and filial, which has its spring in love and prompts to care not to offend God and to endeavor in all things to please Him. It is another term for practical piety and comprehends the virtues of the godly character (Ps. 111:10; Prov. 14:2), whereas its absence is characteristic of a wicked and depraved person (Rom. 3:18). It is produced in the soul by the Holy Spirit, and great blessing is pronounced upon those who possess this trait: His angels protect them (Ps. 34:7); they “abide in the shadow of the Almighty” (91:1). This fear would subsist in a pious soul were there no punishment of sin. It dreads God’s displeasure, desires His favor, reveres His holiness, submits cheerfully to His will, is grateful for His benefits, sincerely worships Him, and conscientiously obeys His commandments. Fear and love must coexist in us in order that either passion may be healthy and that we may please and rightly serve God. “The fear of the Lord” is used for the worship of God, e.g., “I will teach you the fear of the Lord” (34:11) and for the law of God (19:8–9). The “fear of Isaac" (Gen. 31:42, 53) is God, whom Isaac worshiped with reverent awe. The "fear of man" is that dread of the opinions of our neighbors that makes us cowards in the performance of those duties that we fancy they do not practice (Prov. 29:25).

FEAST. See Banquet; Festivals.

FEAST OF CHARITY. See Agape.

FEEBLE KNEES. A term used to express the results of overexertion, as in an athletic contest, and, figuratively, of weariness of mind, low spirits (Heb. 12:12).

FEEBLEMINDED. See Fainthearted.

FEELING. In Eph. 4:19 we find this: "and they, having become callous, have given themselves over to sensuality," etc. The Gk. word apalegeō means "to become insensible to pain, callous, and so indifferent to truth, honor, or shame," i.e., without feeling. The writer of the epistle to the Hebrews (4:15) tells us that "we do not have a high priest who cannot sympathize with our weaknesses." Here we have the Gk. sumpatheō, "to feel for, to have compassion on." Dorner thus speaks of feeling as an element of man's nature: "In feeling he has existence within himself, in will he exists in a state of movement from self outward, in knowledge in movement from without inward... Like the other spiritual faculties, so called, feeling is receptive of infinite as of finite truth. Feeling is a third element alongside of knowledge and will. The strength of feeling depending very much on individual mental temperament, this forms no security for the purity or healthiness of religious feeling. With respect to the contents of feeling, in religious feeling the reference to a definite idea of God will likewise exert an influence, and upon its accurate or confused character—in short, upon its completeness—will the nature of religion depend. A religion, for example, acquainted merely with God's physical attributes will stand lower than one that has heard of His holiness, or, still more, of His love. Feeling alone, occupied merely with self and brooding upon self, may easily become one-sided and selfish. Knowledge, as the product of revelation, we call illumination. Revelation must possess power by its contents to inspire and intensify the will, and under this aspect it is *quicken*ing, while the feeling (the spiritual consciousness of self or life) is enhanced in freedom and blessedness" (Dorner, Christian Doctrine, 2:109, 119).

FEET. See Foot.

FE'LIX (fē'lix; "happy"). The Roman procurator before whom Paul was arraigned (Acts 24).

Elevation and Crimes. He was originally a slave and for some unknown service was freed by Claudius Caesar. He was appointed by this emperor procurator of Judea with the banishment of Ventidius Cumanus, probably A.D. 53. Suetonius speaks of the military honors that the emperor conferred upon him and specifies his appointment as governor of the province of Judea, adding an innuendo that loses nothing by its brevity, namely, that he was the husband of three queens or royal ladies ("trium reginarum maritum"). Tacitus in his History declares that during his governorship in Judea he indulged in all kinds of cruelty and lust, exercising regal power with the disposition of a slave; and in his Annals (11.54) he represents Felix as considering himself licensed to commit any crime, relying on the influence that he possessed at court. Having a grudge against Jonathan, the high priest who had expostulated with him on his misrule, he made use of Doras, an intimate friend of Jonathan, in order to get him assassinated by a gang of villains, who joined the crowds that were going up to the Temple worship. The crime led subsequently to countless evils by the encouragement that it gave to the Sicarii, or leagued assassins of the day, to whose excesses Josephus ascribes, under Providence, the overthrow of the Jewish state. While in office he became enamored of Drusilla, a daughter of King Herod Agrippa, who was married to Azizus, king of Emesa, and through the influence of Simon, a magician, prevailed upon her to consent to a union with him. With this adulteress Felix was seated when Paul reasoned before him (Acts 24:25). Another Drusilla is mentioned by Tacitus as being the (first) wife of Felix.

Hears Paul. Paul, having been arrested at Jerusalem, was sent by Claudius Lysias to Felix at Caesarea (Acts 23:23–33), where he was confined in Herod’s judgment hall until his accusers came. They arrived after five days, headed by Ananias, the high priest. Their case was managed by Tertullus, who, to conciliate Felix, expressed gratitude on the part of the Jews, “Since we have through you attained much peace, and since by your providence reforms are being carried out for this nation, we acknowledge this in every way and everywhere, most excellent Felix” (24:2–3). He then proceeded to accuse Paul, charging him, first, with sedition; second, with being “a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes”; and, third, with an attempt to profane the Temple at Jerusalem (vv. 5–6). The evident purpose was to persuade Felix to give up the apostle to the Jewish courts, in which case his assassination would have been easily accomplished. Felix now gave the prisoner permission to speak, and the apostle, after briefly expressing his satisfaction that he had to plead his cause before one so well acquainted with Jewish customs, refuted Tertullus step by step. Felix deferred inquiry into the case for the present. “When Lysias the commander comes down,” he said, “I will decide your case.” Meanwhile, he placed Paul under the charge of the centurion who had brought him to Caesarea (24:10–23). Some days after, Felix came into the audience chamber with his wife, Drusilla, and the prisoner was brought before them. As a faithful preacher Paul spoke to the Roman libertine and the profligate Jewish princess. As he spoke of righteousness, self-control, and judgment to come, Felix “became frightened.” But still nothing was decided. Felix said, “Go away for the present, and when I find time, I will summon you.” We are told why the governor shut his ears to conviction, even neglected his official duty, and kept his prisoner in cruel suspense: “He was hoping that money would be given him by Paul” (vv. 24–26). Hence he frequently sent for Paul and had many conversations with him. But his hopes were unfulfilled, and he kept the apostle a prisoner for two years (v. 27).

Summoned to Rome. Meanwhile, the political state of Judea grew more embarrassing. It was during the two years of Paul’s imprisonment that disturbances took place in the streets of Caesarea. In the end Felix was summoned to Rome, and the Jews followed him with their accusations. Thus it was that he was anxious “to do the Jews a favor” and “left Paul imprisoned” (Acts 24:27). At Rome he was saved from suffering the penalty due his atrocities by the influence of his brother Pallas.

FELLOW. A term occurring in both the KJV and NASB, though not always as the rendering of the same Heb. or Gk. word. Some special KJV uses follow.

1. A contemptuous use of Heb. ʾîsh (1 Sam. 29:4); Gk. anēr, words for man (so NASB).
2. The rendering of Heb. rēa (Ex. 2:13; Judg. 7:13; NASB, “companion,” “friend”) or ḥabbār (Eccles. 4:10; NASB, “companion”; NIV, “friend”).
3. The rendering of Heb. ʿāmîṭ, “neighbor,” given as “Associate” in Zech. 13:7. The NIV renders, “the man close to me.” See Associate; Belial.

FELLOWSHIP. Fellowship means companionship, a relation in which parties hold something in common, familiar interaction. Christians have fellowship with the Father and the Son (1 John 1:3) and the Holy Spirit (2 Cor. 13:14), and with one another (1 John 1:7). As is the case between men, no one can “know God,” i.e., be in fellowship with Him, unless he possess like purposes and feelings (2:3–6), with love (Rom. 8:38–39). The fellowship of believers embraces confession of sins one to another with prayer (James 5:16); assembly, with exhortation and stimulation to love and good works (Heb. 10:24–25); partaking of the Lord’s Supper (1 Cor. 11:24–25); “contributing to the needs of the saints” (Rom. 12:13; 15:25; Acts 11:29; 1 Cor. 16:1–2; 2 Cor. 8:4; Heb. 13:16); bearing the infirmities of the weak; and pleasing one’s neighbor (Rom. 15:1–2). Love for and fellowship with one another are necessary to, and an evidence of, fellowship with God (1 John 4:12). Christ prayed that His people might have fellowship with each other (John 17:21). Fellowship with God is essential to fruitfulness (15:4–5).

FENCE (Heb. gādēr, an “enclosure”; Pss. 62:3; 80:12, see marg.). Fences were built of unmortared stones to protect cultivated lands, sheepfolds, etc. In the crevices of such fences, serpents delighted to hide (cf. Eccles. 10:8; Amos 5:19).

Figurative. In Ps. 62:3 the wicked are compared to a tottering fence and leaning wall, i.e., their destruction comes suddenly. See Hedge.

FENCED CITY. See Fortified City.

FERRET. See Animal Kingdom: Gecko.

FERRYBOAT (Heb. ābārâ, “crossing”). A vessel for crossing a stream (2 Sam. 19:18, KJV; NIV has “ford”). Floats or rafts for this purpose were used from remote times (1 Kings 5:9, and paintings on Egyptian monuments). A ferryboat still crosses the Jordan ford near Jericho.

FESTAL ROBES. See Dress.

FESTIVALS. Besides the daily worship, the law prescribed special festivals to be observed from time to time by the congregation. One Heb. name for festival was hāg (from the verb signifying to “dance”), which, when applied to religious services, indicated that they were occasions of joy and gladness. The term most fitly designating, and which alone actually comprehended all the feasts, was môēd, (a “set time” or “assembly, place of assembly”). This name refers to the stated assemblies of the people—the occasions fixed by divine appointment for meeting together in holy fellowship, i.e., for acts and purposes of worship. There is also the Gk. heortē (“festival, holy day”). The date of every Mosaic festival without distinction, no matter what its special object may have been, gave evidence of being connected in some way or other with the number seven. So every seventh day, every seventh month, every seventh year, and last, the year that came after the lapse of seven times seven years, was marked by a festival. Again, the Passover and the feast of Booths (Tabernacles, KJV) extended over seven days; the number of special convocations (which see) during the year was seven—two at the Passover, one at Pentecost, one at the feast of Trumpets (or New Moon), one on the Day of Atonement, and two at the feast of Booths. All the festivals instituted by the law of Moses may be arranged in two series, septenary and yearly. In addition are the postexilic and doubtful festivals. See table 8, “Festivals of Israel.”

The Weekly Sabbath. In addition to entire cessation from all work the Sabbath was observed by a holy assembly, the doubling of the morning and evening sacrifices (Num. 28:9–10), and the presentation of new bread in the Holy Place (Lev. 24:8). See Sabbath.

The Seventh New Moon, or Feast of Trumpets (Heb. yôm tîrûâ, “day of blowing,” Num. 29:1). The feast of the New Moon, which fell on the seventh month, or Tishri. This differed from the ordinary festivals of the new moon because of the symbolic meaning of the seventh or sabbatical month and partly, perhaps, because it marked the beginning of the civil year. This month was distinguished above all the other months of the year by the multitude of ordinances connected with it, the first day being consecrated to sacred rest and spiritual employment, the tenth being the Day of Atonement, whereas the fifteenth began the feast of Booths (Tabernacles, KJV).

Sacrifices. (1) The usual morning and evening sacrifices, with their grain and drink offerings. (2) The ordinary sacrifice for the New Moon, except the sin offering, namely, two young bulls, one ram, seven yearling lambs, with their grain and drink offerings (Num. 28:11–14). (3) Another festive offering of one young bull, one ram, seven lambs, with their grain and drink offerings, together with “one male goat for a sin offering, to make atonement for you” (Num. 29:1–6).

Observance. This day was observed as a feast day, in the strict sense, by resting from all work, and as a holy convocation, by the blowing of horns. In later times, while the drink offering of the sacrifice was being poured out, the priests and Levites chanted Ps. 81, whereas in the evening sacrifice they sang Ps. 29. Throughout the day trumpets were blown at Jerusalem from morning to evening. In the Temple it was done even on a Sabbath, but not outside its walls. “The Day of Atonement, which falls on this month, provides full expiation of all sins and the removal of all uncleanness; and the Feast of Tabernacles, beginning five days thereafter, provides a foretaste of the blessedness of life in fellowship with the Lord. This significance of the seventh month is indicated by the sounding of trumpets, whereby the congregation present a memorial of themselves loudly and strongly before Jehovah, calling on him to vouchsafe the promised blessings of grace in fulfillment of his covenant” (Keil, Arch., 2:10). The fact that Tishri was the great month for sowing might easily have suggested the thought of commemorating on this day the finished work of creation, and thus the feast of Trumpets came to be regarded as the anniversary of the beginning of the world. The rabbis believed that on this day God judges all men, and that they pass before Him as a flock of sheep passes before a shepherd.

Sabbatic Year. The septennial rest for the land from all tillage and cultivation as enjoined by Moses (Ex. 23:10–11; Lev. 25:2–7; Deut. 15:1–10; 31:10–13).

Names. The Mosaic titles express features of their observance. These are (1) “Rest of Entire Rest” (Heb. shabbat shabbātôn, “Sabbath of Sabbatism,” Lev. 25:4; NASB and NIV, “a sabbath rest”), because the land was to have a complete rest from cultivation; (2) “Year of Rest” (Heb. sh□nat shabbātôn, “Year of Sabbatism,” Lev. 25:5; NASB, “sabbatical year”; NIV, “year of rest”), because the rest was to extend through the year; (3) “Release” (Heb. sh□mittâ, Deut. 15:1–2, KJV), or more fully, the “Year of Release” (Heb. sh□nat hashsh□mittâ, 15:9; NASB, “year of remission”; NIV, “year for canceling debts”), because in it all debts were remitted; (4) “The Seventh Year” (Heb. sh□nat hashsheba, Deut. 15:9), because it was to be celebrated every seventh year.

Design. The spirit of the sabbatic year is that of the weekly Sabbath. The rest that the land was to keep in the seventh year was not to increase its fruitfulness by lying fallow or merely to be a time of recreation for laboring men and beasts, needful and useful as that may be. It was rather to afford true spiritual rest and quickening, with their attendant life and blessing. “Thus Israel, as the people of God, was to learn two things: First, that the earth, though created for man, was not merely that he might turn its powers to his own profit, but that he might be holy to the Lord and participate also in his blessed rest; next, that the goal of life for the congregation of the Lord did not lie in that incessant laboring of the earth which is associated with sore toil in the sweat of the brow (Gen. 3:17, 19), but in the enjoyment of the fruits of the earth, free from care, which the Lord their God gave and ever would give them if they strove to keep his covenant and to take quickening from his law” (Keil, Arch., 2:12). Such an institution as the sabbatic year might seem, at first sight, to be impracticable. But we are to remember that in no year was the owner of land allowed to reap the whole harvest (Lev. 19:9; 23:22). Unless the remainder was entirely gleaned there might easily have been enough to insure quite a spontaneous crop the ensuing year, while the vines and olives would yield fruit of themselves. Then, too, the unavoidable inference from 25:20–22 is that the owners of land were to lay by grain in previous years for their own and their families’ need.

Time, Observance. The sabbatic year, like the year of Jubilee, began on the first day of the civil year, namely, the first of the month Tishri. Although this was the time fixed for the celebration of the sabbatic year during the time of the second Temple, the tillage and cultivation of certain fields and gardens had already begun to be left off in the sixth year. Thus it was ordained that fields upon which trees were planted were not to be cultivated after the feast of Pentecost of the sixth year, whereas the cultivation of grainfields was to cease from the feast of the Passover (Mishna, Shebith 1.1–8). The keeping of the sabbatic year is distinctly attested to by 1 Macc. 6:49, 53, and Josephus (Ant. 13.8.1; 14.10.6; 15.1.2; etc.), and it was observed also by the Samaritans (Josephus Ant. 11.8.6).

Laws. The laws respecting this year were four in number: (1) The soil, the vineyards, and the olive groves were to have perfect rest (Ex. 23:10–11; Lev. 25:2–5). Rabbinical regulations carried the law to such an extent that anything planted wittingly or unwittingly had to be plucked up by its roots (Mishna, Terum 2.3). (2) The spontaneous growth of the fields or of trees (cf. Isa. 37:30) was for the free use of the poor, the hireling, the stranger, servants, and cattle (Ex. 23:10–11; Lev. 25:2–7). An especially fruitful harvest was promised for the sixth year (25:20–21). (3) Debts, with the exception of ones owed by foreigners, were to be canceled (Deut. 15:1–4). This does not seem to denote the entire renunciation of what was owed but entailed not pursuing it during the sabbatic year. This enactment did not forbid the voluntary payment of debts but their enforced liquidation, and also that no poor man should be oppressed by his brother. (4) Finally, at the feast of Booths in this year, the law was to be read to the people—men, women, children, and strangers—in solemn assembly before the sanctuary (Deut. 31:10–13).

The sabbatic year seems to have been systematically neglected. Hence Jewish tradition explains (see 2 Chron. 36:21) that the seventy years' captivity was intended to make up for the neglect of sabbatical years. After the return from captivity this year was most strictly observed.

Jubilee (Heb. yôbēl, a “blast” of a trumpet). Usually in connection with the year of Jubilee (Lev. 25:28); also called the “year of liberty” (Ezek. 46:17; NIV, “year of freedom”). Its relation to the sabbatic year and the general direction for its observance are found in Lev. 25:8–16, 23–55. Its bearing on lands dedicated to Jehovah is given in 27:16–25. It is not mentioned in Deuteronomy, and the only other reference to it in the Pentateuch is in Num. 36:4.

Time. After the lapse of seven Sabbaths of years, or seven times seven years, i.e., forty-nine years, the trumpet was to sound throughout the whole land, and the fiftieth year was to be announced and hallowed as the Jubilee year. This was not the forty-ninth year, as held by some chronologists. Decisive against this view is the fact “that in Lev. 25:10[–13] not only is the fiftieth year expressly named as the year of Jubilee, but the forty-nine years which make seven Sabbatic years are expressly distinguished from it” (Winer, “Jubeljahr,” in R. W. Buch).

Observance. It should be noticed that the observance of Jubilee was to become obligatory upon the Israelites after they had taken possession of the Promised Land and had cultivated the soil for forty-nine years. The ancient Talmudic tradition, which appears to be correct, is that the first sabbatic year was the twenty-first, and the first Jubilee the sixty-fourth after the Jews came into Canaan, for it took them seven years to conquer it and seven more to distribute it. The only enactment as to the manner of its observance is that there should be announced with the blowing of trumpets the Jubilee that proclaimed to the covenant nation the gracious presence of its God. Because the Scriptures do not record any particular instance of the public celebration, some have denied or questioned whether the law of Jubilee ever came into actual operation. In favor of its actual observance are (1) the probability arising from the observance of all the other festivals; (2) the law of the inalienability of landed property that really did exist among the Hebrews (Num. 36:4, 6–7; Ezek. 46:17); (3) the unanimous voice of Hebrew tradition.

Laws. The law stated three respects in which the Jubilee was to be hallowed, i.e., separated from other years: rest for the soil, reversion of landed property, and manumission of Israelites.

Rest for the Soil. No sowing, reaping, or gathering from the unpruned vine (Lev. 25:11). Thus the soil enjoyed a holy rest, man was freed from the sore labor of sowing and reaping, and in blessed rest he was to live and enjoy the bounty provided by Jehovah in the sixth year (v. 21).

Reversion of Landed Property (Lev. 25:10–34; 27:16–24). The law of Moses provided that all the Promised Land was to be divided by lot among the Israelites, and then it was to remain absolutely inalienable. Therefore, at Jubilee all property in fields and houses situated in villages or unwalled towns, which the owner had been obliged to sell through poverty and that had not been redeemed (see Redemption), was to revert without payment to its original owner or his lawful heirs. The only exceptions were houses in walled cities, which remained with the buyer unless redeemed within one year (25:29–30), and those fields which, unless redeemed by the owner, had been sold and thereby rendered unredeemable (27:17–21), in which case they reverted to the priests.

Manumission of Israelites. Every Israelite who through poverty had sold himself to one of his countrymen or to a foreigner settled in the land, if he had been unable to redeem himself or had not been redeemed by a kinsman, was to go out free with his children (Lev. 25:35–43, 47–54). Thus ownership of a person was changed into a matter of hire (vv. 40, 53). It would seem that there must have been a perfect remission of all debts in the year of Jubilee from the fact that all persons in bondage for debt were released, and all landed property of debtors was freely returned. Thus the Jubilee year became one of freedom and grace for all suffering, bringing not only redemption to the captive and deliverance from want to the poor, but also release to the whole congregation of the Lord from the sore labor of the earth, representing the time of refreshing (Acts 3:19) that the Lord provides for His people. For in this year every kind of oppression was to cease and every member of the covenant people to find his redeemer in the Lord, who brought him back to his possession and family.

New Moon (Heb. rōsh ḥōdesh, “beginning of a month,” Num. 10:10; 28:11). The ordinary new moons, i.e., all except the seventh, were raised out of the rank of ordinary days, but not to that of festivals. They may be called demi-feast days and will therefore be inserted here.

Origin. Many nations of antiquity celebrated the returning light of the moon with festivals, sacrifices, and prayers. Some believe that the object of Moses in providing for this occasion was to suppress heathen celebrations of the day. There was, however, a deeper meaning in this observance. The new moon stood as the representative of the month. For an individual day, a burnt offering that emphasized consecration to the Lord rather than atonement was sufficient. But for the month, because of sins committed and remaining unexpiated during the course of the month, a special sin offering for atonement was required. Thus, on the ground of the forgiveness and reconciliation with God thereby obtained, the people might be able in the burnt offering to consecrate their lives anew to the Lord.

Mode of Ascertaining the New Moon. As the festivals, according to the Mosaic law, were always to be celebrated on the same day of the month, it was necessary to fix the commencement of the month. This was determined by the appearance of the new moon; for the new moon was reckoned not by astronomical calculation, but by actual personal observation. On the thirtieth day of the month watchmen were placed on commanding heights around Jerusalem to watch the sky. As soon as each of them detected the moon he hastened to a house in the city kept for this purpose and was there examined by the president of the Sanhedrin. When the evidence of the appearance was deemed satisfactory, the president stood up and formally announced it, uttering the words, “It is consecrated.” The information was immediately sent throughout the land from the Mount of Olives by beacon fires on the tops of the hills. The religious observance of the day of the new moon may plainly be regarded as the consecration of a natural division of time.

Sacrifices. These were of two types: (1) the usual morning and evening sacrifices, with their grain and drink offerings, and (2) special sacrifices, consisting of two young bulls, one ram, and seven lambs of the first year, as a burnt offering, with their grain and drink offerings. A goat was also presented as a sin offering, at which time the priests blew the silver trumpets (Num. 10:10; 28:11–15). It is evident from the writings of the prophets and from postexilic documents that the New Moon was an important national festival. It was often called a feast along with the Sabbath (Ps. 81:3; Isa. 1:13; Ezek. 46:1; Hos. 2:11), on which all business ceased (Amos 8:5), the pious Israelites waited on the prophets for edification (2 Kings 4:23), many families and clans presented their annual thank offerings (1 Sam. 20:6, 29), social gatherings and feasting were indulged in (vv. 5, 24), and the most devout persons omitted fasting (Judith 8:6).

The Passover and Feast of Unleavened Bread. Passover and the feast of Unleavened Bread as a unit constituted the most important of the three great annual festivals of Israel.

Name and Significance. It was indifferently called the feast of the Passover and the feast of Unleavened Bread, but where the object was to mark the distinction between the Passover as a sacrifice and as a feast following the sacrifice, the latter was designated the feast of Unleavened Bread (Lev. 23:5–6). The Heb. word pesaḥ (from pāsaḥ, to “leap over,” figuratively, to “spare, show mercy”) denotes (1) an overstepping and (2) the paschal sacrifice by virtue of which the passing over was effected (Ex. 12:21, 27, 48; 2 Chron. 30:15). The paschal meal was on the evening of the 14th Nisan, and the seven days following are called the feast of Unleavened Bread (Lev. 23:5–6), hence the expression “the morrow of the Passover” for the 15th Nisan (Num. 33:3; Josh. 5:11, see marg.). The whole feast, including the paschal eve, is called the festival of Unleavened Bread (Ex. 23:15; Lev. 23:6; Ezra 6:22; Luke 22:1, 7; Acts 12:3; 20:6); but the simple name “Passover” (Heb. pesaḥ) is the one commonly used by the Jews to the present day for the festival of Unleavened Bread (2 Chron. 30:15; 35:1, 11; Mark 14:1; Gk. pascha).

Institution. The Passover was instituted in memory of Israel’s preservation from the last plague visited upon Egypt (the death of the firstborn) and their deliverance from bondage (Ex. 12:1–28). “The deliverance of Israel from Egypt was accompanied by their adoption as the nation of Jehovah. For this a divine consecration was necessary that their outward severance from Egypt might be accompanied by an inward severance from everything of an Egyptian or heathen nature. This consecration was imparted by the Passover, a festival which was to lay the foundation of Israel’s birth (Hos. 2:15; Ex. 6:6–7) into the new life of grace and fellowship with God and to perpetuate it in time to come” (K. & D., Com., on Ex. 12).

Observance. Observances connected with the Passover are in two categories, those established at the keeping of the first Passover and those enacted after the Exodus.

Before the Exodus. At its first institution, just before the Exodus, the keeping of the Passover was as follows: Every head of a family chose a male of the first year without blemish from the small cattle, i.e., from the sheep or goats, on the 10th Nisan (Ex. 12:3). Later it became the fixed practice to take a lamb. On the 14th Nisan the animal was slain “at twilight” (12:6); according to the Karaite Jews between actual sunset and complete darkness but understood by the Pharisees and rabbis as the time when the sun begins to descend to its real setting (from 3:00 to 6:00 P.M.). A bunch of hyssop was dipped in the blood of the animal and applied to the two posts and the lintel of the house where the meal was to be eaten. Then the whole animal, without a broken bone, was roasted and eaten by each family, including slaves and strangers, if circumcised. If the number of the family was too small, the neighboring family might join in the eating. It was eaten that same night with unleavened bread and bitter herbs, probably endives, wild lettuce, which are eaten by Jews of the present day in Egypt and Arabia with the paschal lamb. The meal was eaten the same evening, all who partook having their loins girded, shoes on their feet, and a staff in hand, ready to march out of Egypt. What of the lamb could not be eaten was to be burned the next morning, and nothing of it was to be carried out of the house (12:1–13, 21–23, 43–51). According to Jewish authorities this was called the “Egyptian” Passover in distinction from the “Permanent” Passover. The paschal lamb was a sacrifice, combining in itself the significance of the sin offerings and holy offerings, i.e., it shadowed reconciliation as well as glad fellowship with God; the lamb suffered instead of the partakers. There being no fixed sanctuary, the houses were converted into such places of grace or altars, and the blood put on the posts and lintel of the door was the sign that the house was to be spared. This sparing and reconciliation accomplished through forgiveness of sins was immediately associated with the meal, and thus the sacrificium became the sacramentum, the sacrificial flesh a means of grace. The unleavened bread symbolized the spiritual purity after which Israel in covenant with the Lord is to strive, and the bitter herbs were intended to call to mind the bitter experiences that the Israelites had suffered in Egypt.

K. & Johann Karl Friedrich Keil and Franz Julius Delitzsch, Old Testament Commentaries (1875)

After the Exodus. The following supplementary enactments were introduced after the Exodus: all male members of the congregation were to appear before the Lord with “the choice first fruits” (Ex. 23:14–19), the first sheaf of the harvest to be offered on “the day after the sabbath” (Lev. 23:10–14; see also the article First Fruits); those prevented from keeping the Passover on the 14th Nisan were to observe it on the fourteenth of the following month (Num. 9:6–14); special sacrifices were to be offered each day of the festival (28:16–25); the paschal animals were to be slain in the national sanctuary and the blood sprinkled on the altar instead of the doorposts and lintels of the homes (Deut. 16:1–8).

Feast of Unleavened Bread. The feast of Unleavened Bread immediately followed the Passover and lasted seven days, from the 15th to the 21st Nisan (or Abib). On each of those days, after the morning sacrifice, a sacrifice in connection with the feast was presented; unleavened bread alone was eaten (Ex. 12:15–20; 13:6–7; Deut. 16:3–8).

Sacrifices. (1) The usual morning and evening sacrifices, with their grain and drink offerings. (2) Two young bulls, one ram, seven lambs of the first year, with their grain and drink offerings. These were presented after the morning sacrifice (Num. 28:19–24).

Convocations. The first and seventh days of the feast were celebrated by a holy convocation and resting from work, with the exception of preparing food. On the intervening days work might be carried on unless the weekly Sabbath fell on one of them, in which case the full strictness of Sabbath-keeping was observed, and the special feast sacrifice was not presented until after the Sabbath offering.

Barley Sheaf. On the second feast day (16th Nisan) the first sheaf of the new harvest (barley) was symbolically offered to the Lord by waving—not burning on the altar—accompanied with a lamb of the first year for a burnt offering, with its grain and drink offerings. Previous to this offering neither bread nor roasted grain of the new harvest was allowed to be eaten (Lev. 23:9–14). Those attending presented freewill, burnt, and holy offerings of sheep and oxen (Ex. 23:15, 19; Deut. 16:2), and sacrificial meals were eaten. The feast closed on the 21st, with rest from work and a holy convocation.

History. Scripture records that the Passover was kept on the evening before the Israelites left Egypt (Ex. 12:28), the second year after the Exodus (Num. 9:1–5), and then not again until they entered Canaan (Ex. 13:5; Josh. 5:10). Only three instances are recorded in which the Passover was celebrated between the entrance into the Promised Land and the Babylonian captivity, namely, under Solomon (2 Chron 8:13), under Hezekiah when he restored the national worship (30:15), and under Josiah (2 Kings 23:21; 2 Chron. 35:1–19). But the inference that the Passover was celebrated only on those occasions seems the less warranted, that in later times it was so punctually and universally observed.

Postexilic Observance. After the return of the Jews from captivity the celebration of the Passover, like that of other institutions, became more regular and systematic; and its laws, rites, manners, and customs have been faithfully transmitted to us. These were the same as those in the time of Christ and His apostles and are, therefore, of the utmost importance and interest to us in understanding the NT. We give the various practices in connection with the days of the festival on which they were respectively observed.

1. The Great Sabbath (10th Nisan). The Sabbath immediately preceding the Passover, it is so called because, according to tradition, the 10th of Nisan, when the paschal lamb was to be selected, originally fell on the Sabbath. In later legislation the animal was not required to be set aside four days beforehand, yet the Sabbath was used for the instruction of the people in the duties of this great festival. In addition to the regular ritual, special prayers bearing on the redemption from Egypt, the love of God to Israel, and Israel's obligation to keep the Passover, were prescribed for that Sabbath. Malachi 3:1–4:6 was read as the lesson of the day, and discourses were delivered explaining the laws and domestic duties connected with the festival. This is likely the Sabbath referred to in John 19:31.

2. The 13th Nisan. On the evening of the 13th Nisan, which, until that of the 14th, was called the "preparation for the Passover" (John 19:14), every head of a family searched for and collected by the light of a candle all the leaven. Before beginning the search, he pronounced the following benediction: "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who has sanctified us with thy commandments, and hast enjoined us to remove the leaven." After the search he said, "Whatever leaven remains in my possession which I cannot see, behold, it is null, and accounted as the dust of the earth."

3. The 14th Nisan. This day, called until the evening the preparation for the Passover, was also known as the "first day" of Passover (Lev. 23:5–7). Handicraftsmen, with the exception of tailors, barbers, and laundresses, were obliged to cease from work, either from morning or from noon, according to the custom of the different places in Palestine. No leaven was allowed to be eaten after noon, when all that had been found either on this day or the preceding one was to be burned. On the 14th Nisan every Israelite who was physically able, not in a state of Levitical uncleanness, or further distant from Jerusalem than fifteen miles, was to appear before the Lord with an offering proportionate to his means (Ex. 23:15; Deut. 16:16–17). Women, though not legally bound to appear in the sanctuary, were not excluded (1 Sam. 1:7; Luke 2:41–42).

4. Offering of the Paschal Lamb. The lamb was to be free from all blemish and neither less than eight days nor more than exactly one year old. Each paschal lamb was to serve a "company" of not less than ten nor more than twenty, the representatives of each company going to the Temple. The daily evening sacrifice (Ex. 29:38–39), usually killed at the eighth and a half hour (i.e., 2:30 P.M.), and offered up at the ninth and a half hour (i.e., 3:30 P.M.), was on this day killed at 1:30 and offered at 2:30 P.M., an hour earlier. And if the 14th of Nisan happened on a Friday, it was killed at 12:30 and offered at 1:30 P.M., two hours earlier than usual, so as to avoid any needless breach of the Sabbath.

Before the incense was burned or the lamps were trimmed, the paschal sacrifice had to be offered. It was done in this way: The first of the three festive divisions, with their paschal lambs, was admitted within the court of the priests. Each division was to consist of not less than thirty persons. Immediately, the massive gates were closed behind them, and the priests blew a threefold blast from their silver trumpets when the Passover was slain; altogether, the scene was most impressive. All along the court up to the altar of burnt offering priests stood in two rows, the one holding golden, the other silver, bowls. In these the blood of the paschal lambs, which each Israelite slew for himself (as representative of his company at the paschal supper), was caught up by a priest, who handed it to his colleague, receiving back an empty bowl, and so the bowls with the blood were passed up to the priest at the altar, who jerked it in one jet at the base of the altar. While this was going on, a most solemn "hymn" of praise was raised, the Levites leading in the song and the officers either repeating after them or merely responding. "The Hallel [which see] was recited the whole time, and if it was finished before all the paschal animals were slain it might be repeated a second and even a third time. Next the sacrifices were hung up on hooks along the court, or laid on staves which rested on the shoulders of two men (on Sabbaths they were not laid on staves), then flayed, the entrails taken out and cleansed, and the inside fat separated, put in a dish, salted, and placed on the fire of the altar of burnt offering. This completed the sacrifice.

“The first division of officers being dismissed, the second entered, and finally the third, the service in each case being conducted in precisely the same manner. Then the whole service concluded by burning the incense and trimming the lamps for the night.” If it was the Sabbath, the first division waited in the court of the Gentiles, the second between the ramparts, i.e., the open space between the walls of the court of the women and the trellis work in the Temple, whereas the third remained in its place. At dark all went out to roast their paschal sacrifices. According to Jewish ordinance, the paschal lamb was roasted on a spit of pomegranate wood, the spit passing through from mouth to vent. If it touched the oven, the part so touched was to be cut away, thus carrying out the idea that the lamb must not be defiled by any contact with foreign matter. It was not to be “sodden,” because the flesh must remain pure, without the addition even of water, and no bone of it was to be broken.

5. The Paschal Supper. As the guests gathered around the paschal table they were arrayed in their best festive garments, joyous and at rest, as became the children of a king. To express this idea the rabbis insisted that at least a part of the feast should be partaken in a recumbent position. The left elbow was placed on the table, the head resting on the hand, with sufficient room between each guest for the free movement of the right hand. This explains in what sense John “was reclining on Jesus’ breast,” and afterward “leaning back thus on Jesus’ breast,” when he leaned back to speak to Him (John 13:23, 25; Luke 22:14). The father, or other person presiding, took the place of honor at the table, probably somewhat raised above the rest.

The paschal supper commenced by the head of the “company” pronouncing a benediction over the first cup of wine, which had been filled for each person. It was then drunk, and a basin of water and a towel were handed around or the guests got up to wash their hands (John 13:4–5, 12), after which the appropriate blessing was pronounced.

These preliminaries ended, a table was brought in, upon which was the paschal meal. The president of the feast first took some of the herbs, dipped them in the sauce (Heb. charoseth), ate some, and gave to the others (Matt. 26:23; John 13:26). Immediately after this all the dishes were removed from the table (to excite curiosity), and the second cup of wine was filled. Then the son asked his father as follows: “Wherefore is this night distinguished from all other nights? For on all other nights we eat leavened or unleavened bread, but on this night only unleavened bread? On all other nights we eat any kind of herbs, but on this night only bitter herbs? On all other nights we eat meat roasted, stewed, or boiled but on this night only roasted? On all other nights we dip [the herbs] only once, but on this night twice?” In reply the head of the house related the whole national history, commencing with Terah, Abraham’s father, Israel’s deliverance from Egypt, and the giving of the law.

The paschal dishes were now placed back upon the table. The president took up in succession the dish with the Passover lamb, that with the bitter herbs, and that with the unleavened bread, briefly explaining the importance of each; the first part of the Hallel was sung (Pss. 113 and 114), with this brief thanksgiving at the close: “Blessed art thou, Jehovah our God, King of the universe, who hast redeemed us and redeemed our fathers from Egypt.” The second cup of wine was then drunk, and hands were washed a second time, with the same prayer as before, and one of the two unleavened cakes broken and “thanks given.”

Pieces of the broken cake, with “bitter herbs” between them and “dipped” in the charoseth, were next handed to each of the company. This, in all probability, was the “dipped morsel” which, in answer to John’s inquiry about the betrayer, the Lord “gave” to Judas (John 13:25–30; cf. Mark 14:22; Luke 22:21).

The paschal supper itself consisted of the unleavened bread, with bitter herbs, of the so-called Chagigah (i.e., a voluntary peace offering made by private individuals), and the paschal lamb itself. After that nothing more was to be eaten, so that the flesh of the paschal sacrifice might be the last meat partaken of. But since the cessation of the paschal sacrifice, the Jews conclude the supper with a piece of unleavened cake called the Aphikomen, or after dish. Hands were again washed, the third cup was filled, and grace after meat said. The service concluded with the fourth cups over which the second portion of the Hallel was sung (Pss. 115–18), the whole ending with the so-called “blessing of the song.”

6. The 15th Nisan, Unleavened Bread. On this day there was a holy convocation, and it was one of the six days on which, as on the Sabbath, no manner of work was allowed, with this exception: whereas on the Sabbath the preparation of necessary food was not allowed (Ex. 16:5, 23, 29; 35:2–3), on holy convocation it was permitted (12:16; Lev. 23:7; Num. 28:18). The other five days on which the Bible prohibits servile work are the seventh of this festival, the day of Pentecost, New Year’s Day, and the first and last of the feast of Booths (Tabernacles, KJV).

In addition to the ordinary sacrifices there were offered on this and the following six days two bulls, a ram, and seven lambs of the first year (with grain offerings) for a burnt offering, and a goat for a sin offering (28:19–23). Besides these public sacrifices voluntary offerings were made by each individual appearing before the Lord in Jerusalem (Ex. 23:15; Deut. 16:16). The Jewish canon prescribed that this freewill offering should be a burnt offering, worth not less than sixteen grains of corn; a festive offering of not less value than thirty-two grains; and a peace, or joyful offering (27:7), the value to be determined by the offerer (16:16–17).

7. The 16th Nisan, Cutting the Barley Sheaf. This day was also called “the day after the Sabbath”; and on it the omer of the first produce of the harvest (i.e., barley) was waved before the Lord (Lev. 23:10–14). Though for obvious reasons it was customary to choose barley grown in the sheltered Ashes valley across the Kedron, there were no restrictions, save that the barley was to be grown in Palestine and without being forced by manuring and artificial watering. On the 14th Nisan, delegates from the Sanhedrin had marked out the spot where the first sheaf was to be cut by tying together in bundles, while still standing, the barley to be reaped. When the time came for cutting the sheaf (i.e., the evening of the 15th Nisan, even though it was a Sabbath), just as the sun went down, three men, each with a sickle and basket, set formally to work. In order to bring out all that was distinctive in the ceremony, they first asked the bystanders the following questions three times each: “Has the sun gone down?” “With this sickle?” “Into this basket?” “On this Sabbath?” and, last, “Shall I cut?” Having each time been answered in the affirmative, they cut down the barley to the amount of one ephah (nearly three and a half pecks). The ears were brought into the court of the Temple and threshed out with canes or stalks, so that the grains might not be crushed. The grain was then “parched” on a perforated pan, so that each grain might be touched by the fire, and finally exposed to the wind. It was then ground and sifted to the required fineness, which was ascertained by one of the “Gizbarim” (treasurers) plunging his hand into it. The sifting process was continued as long as any of the flour adhered to the hand. In this manner the prescribed omer of flour was secured and offered in the Temple on the 16th Nisan. Whatever was in excess of an omer was redeemed and could be used for any purpose. The omer of flour was mixed with a “log” of oil, and a handful of frankincense put upon it. It was then waved before the Lord, and a handful taken out and burned on the altar (2:15–16). This was what is popularly, though not correctly, called “the presentation of the first, or wave sheaf.”

8. The 17th to the 20th Nisan. These days constituted a half holy day and were “the lesser festival.” As regards work during this period, all that was necessary for the public interest or to prevent private loss was allowed, but no new work of any kind for public or private purposes might be begun. The following work was allowed: irrigating dry land; digging watercourses; repairing conduits, reservoirs, roads, marketplaces, and baths; and whitewashing tombs, etc. Dealers in fruit, garments, or utensils were allowed to sell privately what was required for immediate use. In the Temple the additional sacrifices appointed for the festival were offered up, and the lesser Hallel was sung instead of the greater.

9. The 21st Nisan, or the Last Day of the Passover. The last day of the Passover was observed by a holy convocation and was celebrated in all respects like the first day, except that it did not commence with the paschal meal.

10. The second, or Little Passover. Anyone prevented by Levitical defilement, disability, or distance from keeping the regular Passover might observe the “second,” or the “little Passover,” exactly a month later (Num. 9:9–12). In this “second” Passover both leavened and unleavened bread might be kept in the house; the Hallel was not to be sung at the paschal supper; no Chagigah was offered. The supper could not be eaten by any defiled person.

11. Release of Prisoners. It is not certain whether the release of a prisoner at the Passover (Matt. 27:15; Mark 15:6; Luke 23:17; John 18:39) was a custom of Roman origin, or whether it was an old Jewish custom that Pilate allowed them to retain.

12. Preparations for the Passover. A month previous (the 15th Adar) bridges and roads had been repaired for the use of pilgrims. This was also the time for administering the testing draught to women suspected of adultery (which see), for burning the red heifer (Num. 19:1–5), and for boring the ears of those wishing to remain in bondage. One of these preliminary arrangements is especially interesting when recalling the words of the Savior. Any dead body found in the field was buried where found, and, as the pilgrims coming to the feast might have contracted “uncleanness” by unwittingly touching such graves, it was ordered that all tombs should be whitened a month before the Passover. Evidently it was in reference to what our Lord saw going on around Him at the time He spoke that He compared the Pharisees to “whitewashed tombs which on the outside appear beautiful, but inside they are full of dead men’s bones and all uncleanness” (Matt. 23:27). Two weeks before the Passover, and at the corresponding time before the other two great festivals, the flocks and herds were to be tithed and the treasure chests publicly opened and emptied. Last, “many went up to Jerusalem out of the country before the Passover, to purify themselves” (John 11:55; cf. 1 Cor. 11:27–28).

Present Observance. The Jews of today continue to celebrate the Passover largely as in the days of the second Temple. Several days before the festival all utensils are cleansed; on the eve of the 13th Nisan the master of the house with a candle or lamp searches most diligently into every hole and crevice of the house to discover any leaven that may remain about the premises. Before doing so he pronounces the benediction, following with the formal renunciation of all leaven. On the 14th Nisan (the Preparation Day) all the firstborn males above thirteen years of age fast in commemoration of the sparing of the Jewish firstborn in Egypt. On this evening the Jews, arrayed in festive garments, offer up the appointed prayers in the synagogue. Returning to their homes, they find them illuminated and the tables spread with the following food: three unleavened cakes on a plate; the shank bone of a shoulder of lamb, having a small bit of meat on it, and an egg roasted hard in hot ashes in another dish; bitter herbs in a third dish; and the sauce (Heb. charoseth) and salt water, or vinegar, in two cups. The whole family, including the servants, are gathered around the table. With blessings and benedictions, they partake of the food, together with four cups of wine. The same service is repeated the following evening, for the Jews have doubled the days of holy convocation.

Pentecost (Gk. Pentēkostē, “fiftieth,” i.e., “day”). The second of the three great annual festivals, the others being the Passover and Tabernacles. The most important Bible passages relating to it are Ex. 23:16; Lev. 23:15–22; Num. 28:26–31; Deut. 16:9–12.

Names and Significance. This festival is called (1) the feast of Weeks (Ex. 34:22; Deut. 16:10, 16; 2 Chron. 8:13), because it was celebrated seven complete weeks, or fifty days, after the Passover (Lev. 23:15–16); (2) the feast of the Harvest (Ex. 23:16), because it concluded the harvest of the later grains; and (3) the day of the first fruits (Num. 28:26), because the first loaves made from the new grain were then offered on the altar (Lev. 23:17; see also the article First Fruits).

Origin and Import. The Scriptures do not clearly attach any historical significance to this festival but seem to teach that Pentecost owes its origin to the harvest that terminated at this time. It is to be expected that, in common with other nations of antiquity who celebrated the ingathering of grain by offering to a deity among other firstling offerings the fine flour of wheat, the Jews would recognize Jehovah's bounty with the first fruits of their harvest. The Jews, at least as early as the days of Christ, connected with the Passover and commemorated on the 6th Sivan the giving of the Ten Commandments. It was made out from Ex. 19 that the law was delivered on the fiftieth day after the Exodus. It has been conjectured that a connection between the event and the festival may possibly be hinted at in the reference to the observance of the law in Deut. 16:12. Pentecost was essentially linked to the Passover—the festival that above all others expressed the fact of a race chosen and separated from other nations—and was the solemn termination of the consecrated period.

The Time of the Festival. The time fixed for celebrating Pentecost is the fiftieth day from “the day after the Sabbath” of the Passover (Lev. 23:11, 15–16); or, as given in Deut. 16:9, seven full weeks after the sickle was put to the corn. The precise meaning of the word Sabbath in this connection, which determines the date for celebrating this festival, has been from time immemorial a matter of dispute. The Boethusians and the Sadducees in the time of the second Temple, and the Karaites since the eighth century of the Christian era, have taken “Sabbath” in the sense of the “seventh day of the week” and have maintained that the omer was offered on the day following that weekly Sabbath that might happen to fall within the seven days of the Passover. This would make Pentecost always come on the first day of the week. Many arguments are presented against this, showing that such an opinion involves many arbitrary and improbable arrangements. Commenting on Lev. 23:15–22, Keil and Delitzsch (Com., ad loc.) say that “Sabbaths (v. 15) signifies weeks. Consequently, ‘the morrow after the seventh Sabbath’ (v. 16) is the day after the seventh week, not after the seventh Sabbath.” It is therefore evident that the Jews, who during the second Temple kept Pentecost fifty days after the 16th Nisan, rightly interpreted the injunction in 23:15–22. The fiftieth day, according to the Jewish canons, may fall on 5th, 6th, or 7th Sivan.

Observance, Pentateuchal. The Mosaic ordinances provided that on the Day of Pentecost there was to be a holy convocation, on which no manner of work was to be done; all the able-bodied men of the congregation were to be present (unless legally precluded) at the sanctuary; and a special sacrifice was to be offered (Lev. 23:15–22; Num. 28:26–31). The sacrifices offered were (1) the morning and evening sacrifices, with their grain and drink offerings; (2) a burnt offering, consisting of seven lambs, one young bull, two rams, with their grain and drink offering (Lev. 23:18; Num. 28:26–31); (3) the two wave loaves, the new grain offering, of two-tenths of an ephah of new flour (Lev. 23:17); and (4) with the loaves, a kid of the goats for a sin offering and two lambs for a peace offering. The firstling loaves, with the two lambs (peace offering), were devoted to the Lord by waving, as a thank offering for the harvest that had been gathered in during the seven previous weeks. The words “You shall bring in from your dwelling places two loaves of bread for a wave offering” (Lev. 23:17) are not to be understood as if every head of a house was to bring two such loaves, but that the two loaves were presented for the whole people. “From your dwelling places” appears to mean that they were to be loaves prepared for the daily nourishment of the house and not specially for a holy purpose or paid for out of the treasury. They were freewill offerings, presented by each person in proportion to the blessings received from God. These might be burnt, grain, drink, or thank offerings (Deut. 16:10). This festival was to be a season of rejoicing, in which were to share the children, men and women servants, the Levites, the
